When Tryphon underſtood that Demetrius was utterly ruined, he forſook Antiochus, and contrived how he might kill him, and make himſelf King. But the fear that he had of Jonathan Antiochus's friend, hindred his deſign; whereupon he reſolv'd firſt of all to deliver himſelf of Jonathan, and afterwards to kill the young King Antiochus. Having therefore reſolv'd to kill Jonathan by ſome Treaſon, he came from Antioch to Bethſan, (which the Greeks call Scythopolis) whither Jonathan came to meet him with 40000 choſen men, ſuppoſing that Tryphon came thither to make War upon him. But he knowing that Jonathan came thither with ſo great a ſtrength, and imagining that he could not prevail upon him by open force, he had recourſe to fraud, he made him rich Preſents, and accompanied them with a great deal of civility; and that he might free him from all diſtruſt, and ruine him when he ſhould leaſt ſuſpect it, he commanded the Officers of his Army to obey him in all things. After this, he invited Jonathan to come to Ptolomais, and to bring with him ſome few of his Soldiers, promiſing to deliver the City into his hands, and reſign all the Fortreſſes that were in the Countrey into his poſſeſſion; aſſuring him, That he came into that Countrey to no other purpoſe. Jonathan ſuſpecting no ſiniſter dealing, and believing that Tryphon ſpake what he intended, disbanded his Forces, and took only 3000 men with him, whereof two he left in Galilee, and with 1000 he came to Tryphon at Ptolomais. But the Inhabitants of the City ſhutting the gates as ſoon as he was entred, (according as Tryphon had commanded them) took Jonathan Priſoner, and ſlew all thoſe that attended upon him. Hereupon Tryphon preſently ſent part of his Army unto the 2000 that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the Sword; but they having notice of that which had befaln their Chieftain, took up their

And although the Soldiers of Tryphon exceeded them far in the number, yet were they not ſo hardy to attack them; becauſe they knew that the Jews were ready to expoſe themſelves to all dangers, to defend their lives: and ſo they returned back to him that ſent them, without doing any thing.

The Jews make choice of Simon Machabeus for their General, in the place of Jonathan his brother, who was kept Priſoner by Tryphon; who, after he had received an hundred and I two Talents of his Children for his ranſom, breaks his promiſe, and puts him to death. Simon *erects a ſtately Monnument for his father, and his other brethren. 2 Macch. 14. Jonathans want lamented by all men.

WHen the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem heard of the ſurprizal of Jonathan, and the loſs of his Soldiers, they were much troubled, that ſo great a man was taken from them, for they feared, (and that not without cauſe) that being depriv'd of his valor and conduct, the neighbouring Nations would invade them with K all manner of hoſtility, which till then they durſt not attempt, ſtanding ſo much in awe of Jonathan. Neither did their expectation deceive them. For they underſtanding Jonathan's death, began preſently to invade the Jews on all ſides, as thoſe who had no longer any Captain under whoſe conduct they might make War, and ſhew their valor. And Tryphon having likewiſe gather'd Forces, was reſolved to march into Judea, to make War againſt the Inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiving that the Citizens of Jeruſalem were alarum'd with the fear which they apprehended of thoſe Rumors and new Tumults of War, and being deſirous to animate them againſt all incurſions and attempts intended by Tryphon, aſſembled the People in the Temple, and began to exhort them after this manner:

The neighbouring Nation and Tryphon invade Judea.

Simon, Jonathans brother, aſſembleth the people, and animateth them.

You are not ignorant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, have voluntarily expoſed our ſelves to all dangers for your liberty. Since therefore I have abundance of ſuch like examples, and that it is the ordinary courſe of our family to die for our Law and Religion, there is no fear ſo great as to hinder me to prefer my honour and duty to my life. Wherefore ſince you have a Commander who deſpiſeth all danger, to procure and maintain your ſafety, you ought to follow me couragiouſly to what place ſoever I ſhall conduct you. For I am of no better account than my brethren, to value my life more than others; neither am I leſs than they, to be backward and cowardly to follow their footſteps, but I ſhall rather glory to imitate them in dying for the defence of our Countrey, Laws and Religion. I will make manifeſt therefore by M all the teſtimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawful brother; for I truſt in God, that he will give me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliver not only all of you, but your wives and children from the injury which they intended againſt you: and by the grace of God I will preſerve the holy Temple, that it may not be ruinated by their prophane hands. For I already perceive, that the prophane Nations deſpiſe us, and contemn you, as if you had no Leader; and I know already that they are marching forward to fight you.

Simon ſucceedeth his brothers, Judas and Jonathan. Simon ſendeth Jonathan, Abſalons ſon, to Joppa, to expulſe the inhabitants thereof Tryphon, by fraudulent promiſes, under certain conditions, perſuadeth Simon, that his brother ſhould be ſet at liberty.

By theſe words Simon heartned the People, who were diſtracted with fear, ſo that they revived their ſpirits, and conceived better hope. Whereupon all of them cried with a loud voice, That Simon was their General, and that he was to ſucceed his two valiant brethren, N Judas and Jonathan, in the Government; and that as touching themſelves, they would be obedient in all things that he ſhould command them. He therefore aſſembled in one inſtant all the men at Arms in that Countrey, and haſtened to repair the City-walls, fortifying them with high and ſtrong Towers, and ſent a certain friend of his, called Jonathan the ſon of Abſalon, with an Army to Joppa, commanding him to turn out the Inhabitants of that City from thence, feraing they would ſubmit themſelves to Tryphon: as for himſelf, he remained in Jeruſalem to ſecure the ſame.

Tryphon departing from Ptolomais with a great Army, came into Judea, leading his Priſoner Jonathan with him. Whereupon Simon and his Army went out againſt him as far as Addida (a City ſcituate upon a Mountain, at the foot whereof beginneth the Champain Countrey of Judea.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made Governor of the Jews, O ſent meſſengers unto him, intending to circumvent him by Treaſon and Policy, giving him to underſtand, That if he were deſirous of his brothers enlargement, he ſhould ſend him one hun- ſet at liberty, he ſhould not withdraw Judea from the obedience of the King. (For, till that preſent he was held and kept Priſoner, by reaſon of the money which he ow'd the King.) Simon was no ways ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphons, but knew well enough that he ſhould both loſe his money, if he ſhould deliver the ſame; and that his brother ſhould not be enlarged, no, though his children were deliver'd for hoſtages: on the other ſide he feared, leſt the People ſhould judge ſiniſterly of him, as if he had been the cauſe of his brothers death, both by not delivering the money, neither yet the children. Having therefore aſſembled the Army, he declar'd unto them what Tryphon demanded; telling them, That the whole ſcope of his actions were nothing elſe but treacherous ſtratagems and ſubtilties: yet notwithſtanding he told them, That he had rather ſend both the money and the B children to Tryphon, than by refuſing his conditions and demands, to be accuſed to have neglected the life of his brother. Simon ſent therefore both the money and children of Jonathan; but Tryphon having receiv'd both, kept not his promiſe, but detain'd Jonathan; and leading his Army thorow the Countrey, intended to paſs by Idumæa to repair to Jeruſalem.

He came therefore to Dora, a City in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping always right over againſt him. They that were in the Caſtle of Jeruſalem, hearing news hereof, ſent Tryphon word that he ſhould haſten and come unto them, and ſend them munition: whereupon he addreſſed his Horſemen, pretending that very night to ride unto Jeruſalem; but the ſnow about that time fell in ſuch abundance, that it covered the way in ſuch ſort and was ſo thick, as the Horſes could not C Travel, which hindred his repair to Jeruſalem. For which cauſe he departed from thence, and came into Cœloſyria, and ſpeedily invading the Countrey of Gulaad, he put Jonathan to death in that place; and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon ſent unto Baſca, and tranſported his brothers bones, and interred them in his Countrey Modin, in his fathers Sepulchre, and all the People mourned and lamented for him many days. Simon alſo built a great monument of white and poliſhed marble for his father and brethren, and rais'd it to a great height, and garniſh'd it round about with galleries and pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable Work to behold. Beſides that, he erected ſeven Pyramids for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, ſo great and ſo fair, as they cauſed admiration in thoſe that beheld them; and are D as yet to be ſeen at this preſent day. So great was Simons care, that Jonathan and the reſt of his family ſhould be honour'd with ſo magnificent a Sepulchre: which Jonathan dyed, after he had exercis'd the place of High-Prieſt, and poſſeſſed the Government for four years. Thus much as touching his death.

Simon razeth the Caſtle of Jeruſalem.

As ſoon as Simon had taken poſſeſſion of the High-Prieſthood, by the election of the People; the very firſt year of his Government, he acquitted the People of the Tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This liberty and exemption from Tribute, hapned amongſt the Jews, one hundred and ſeventy years ſince the time that Seleucus, ſirnamed Nicanor, obtain'd the kingdom of Syria. And in ſo great honour was Simon amongſt the People, that in their private Contracts and publick Letters, the date E began, From the firſt year of Simon the Benefactor and Governor of the Jewiſh Nation. For they proſpered greatly under his Government, and had the victory of all their neighbouring Enemies round about them. For he deſtroy'd the Cities of Gaza, Joppa, and Jamnia:
he demoliſhed or ſlighted alſo the Cittadel of Jeruſalem, and level'd it with the ground, to the intent the Enemies might never ſeize on it any more, nor retreat thither to endamage the City, as they had done before. Which when he had brought to paſs, he thought it not amiſs, but very profitable, to level the Hill whereon the Caſtle ſtood, to the intent the Temple might be the eminenteſt place. All this he perſuaded the People to do in a common Aſſembly, repreſenting to them how much they had ſuffer'd by the Gariſons, and how much they were like to ſuffer hereafter, if a ſtranger ſhould once F more be maſter of the kingdom, and build a Cittadel in that place. By theſe exhortations he perſuaded the People to finiſh theſe Works, and all of them began to work without intermiſſion both day and night, ſo that in the ſpace of three years they level'd the mountain; and from that time forward, there was nothing but the Temple that commanded the City. See here what Simon perform'd hitherto.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. 1 Mac. 15. Tryphon murthering Alexander, obtaineth the Kingdom.

I NOt long after the captivity of Demetrius, Tryphon killed Antiochus the ſon of Alexander, ſirnamed Good, notwithſtanding he had the care and charge of his education for four years that he reigned; and ſpreading abroad a certain report, That the young King in exerciſing himſelf fortuned to dye; he ſent his friends and familiars to the Soldiers, promiſing them, That if they would chooſe him King, he would give them a great ſum of money; giving them to underſtand, that Demetrius was a Priſoner among the Parthians; and that if Antiochus his brother ſhould obtain the kingdom, he would puniſh them divers ways, and revenge the revolt and rebellion which they were guilty of by forſaking him. The Army hoping that if they beſtow'd the kingdom on Tryphon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclaim'd him King. But after he had attain'd the fulneſs of his deſires, he ſhewed K how malicious and wicked his nature was. For when he was a private man, he flatter'd the People, and made ſhew of moderation; and, by ſuch allurements, he drew them to do what he pleaſed: but after he had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdom, he diſcover'd his hypocriſie, and ſhew'd plainly, that he was not unaptly call'd Tryphon, that is to ſay, Trifler or Mocker. By which means, he loſt the hearts of the better ſort: and as for his Army, it became ſo averſe from him, that it ſubmitted it ſelf to Cleopatra, Demetrius's wife, who had, at that time, confin'd both her ſelf and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus, ſirnamed the Devout, and brother to Demetrius, was driven from place to place, and had not any City that would entertain him, for fear of Tryphon; Cleopatra ſent unto him, inviting him both to be her husband, and to take poſſeſſion of the kingL dom. And hereunto did ſhe the rather draw him, partly for that ſhe was thereunto perſuaded by her friends, and partly for the fear ſhe had, leſt ſome one of Selucia ſhould betray the City to Tryphon. As ſoon as Antiochus was arrived in Seleucia, and that from day to day his Forces encreaſed, he marched forth into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and overcame him in battel, and drove him out of the higher Syria, and purſu'd him as far as Phœnicia: where after he had retired himſelf into Dora, a ſtrong and impregnable Caſtle, he beſieged him therein, and ſent Ambaſſadors to Simon the High-Prieſt of the Jews, to confirm a friendſhip and confederacy with him. Simon very courteouſly accepted his demands, and preſently ſent Antiochus both money and victuals, ſufficient to furniſh his Army at the ſiege of Dora; ſo that in ſhort ſpace he was accepted amongſt the number of his M entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place beſieged, taken and ſlain, after he had reigned three years.

BUT the innate avarice that was in Antiochus, and the malignity of his nature, made him forgetful of thoſe offices and ſervices that Simon had done him: ſo that he ſent N Sedebæus, his great friend, with a mighty Army to invade Jewry, and to ſurprize Simon. But he having ſome privy intelligence of Antiochus's Treachery, notwithſtanding that at this time he was very old, was ſo provoked with the injuries that Antiochus had done him, that animated with courage more than became his age, he went himſelf to the War, as if as yet he had been but youthful: he therefore cauſed his ſon to march before, with the beſt Soldiers of his Army; and having left a number of his Soldiers in ambuſh, in the hollow retreats of the mountains, he executed all his deſigns, without failing in any one of them: ſo that after he had every way obtained the upper hand of his Enemies, he ever after enjoyed his Government in peace, during the remainder of his life, and renewed likewiſe the confederacy with the Romans.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 15. 1 Mac. 6. No faith nor truſt, no not in ſons-in-law.

HE governed Judea for the ſpace of eight years, and was at laſt ſlain at a banquet, by the Treachery of Ptolomey his ſon-in-law; who ſeizing on Simons Wife, and his two children, and detaining them in Priſon, ſent out certain of his Train beſides, to kill John the third ſon, ſirnamed Hircanus of Jeruſalem. But the young man having ſome inkling of their drift, retired himſelf ſpeedily into the City, and avoided the danger that B they complotted againſt him; aſſuring himſelf of the good will of the People, in conſideration of the benefits they had received at his fathers hands, and the hatred that they bare unto Ptolomey; who intending to enter the City-gates, was ſharply repulſed by the Citizens, for they had already entertain'd Hircanus.

CHAP. XV.

Hircanus, Simon's ſon, beſiegeth Ptolomey in Dagon Caſtle, but his great love towards his mother and his brothers, (whom Ptolomey threatens to put to death, if he ſtorm'd the Caſtle) made him forbear to aſſault it, and raiſed the ſiege; after which, Ptolomey nevertheleſs put them to death. C

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 14. Ptolomey, beſieged by Hircanus, knowing the power of natural affection, keepeth his mother and brethren priſoners, whippeth them on the walls, and threatneth to throw them down.

WHereupon Ptolomey retired unto a certain Caſtle ſituate beyond Jericho, called Dagon, but Hircanus was made High-Prieſt in his fathers ſtead: who, after he had recommended himſelf to God, by the firſtling Sacrifices that he offer'd, marched out againſt Ptolomey, his brother-in-law, to make War upon him. Now when he was fully reſolved to beſiege the place whither Ptolomey was retired, he had the advantage in all other things; but only by the affection that he bare unto his mother and his brethren, he was overcome. For Ptolomey having taken them, and whipt them upon the Walls in all mens preſence, threatned Hircanus, That unleſs he levied his ſiege, he would caſt them down headlong D from the top of the Caſtle: now whereas one way Hircanus had a great deſire to force and ſurprize the place, ſo alſo on the other ſide he was wholly diſheartned, through the deſire that he had to redeem thoſe whom he loved, from the Enemies Tyranny. True it is, That his Mother ſtretching out her hands, beſought him, That for her ſake he would not give over valiantly to aſſault the place; but that he ſhould be the more encouraged to ſurprize the Fortreſs, and to lay hold upon his Enemy, and to be revenged of the wrong that was offer'd unto his deareſt friends: alledging, that ſhe thought it better to die in the midſt of a thouſand torments, than that the enemy ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed, who had been ſo manifeſt an occaſion of their miſery. When Hircanus heard his Mother ſpeak thus, he was more furiouſly incenſed to give the aſſault; but as ſoon as he ſaw his Mother ſo beaten and ſore wounded, his heart melted E within him; and the fervent deſire which he before had to batter and beat down the City, was preſently allayed and cooled: and ſo the pitiful compaſſion of his Mother, ſurmounted and overcame his wrathful deſire of revenge. Whil'ſt thus the ſiege was continued and prolonged, the year of Repoſe celebrated amongſt the Jews was come: For they obſerved the ſeventh year, as the ſeventh day is obſerved in the week; ſo that by this occaſion, Ptolomey was deliver'd of this ſiege, who afterwards ſlew both Hircanus's Mother and Brethren; which done, he fled unto Zeno, ſirnamed Cotyla, who at that time Tyrannized in the City of the Philadelphians.

ded Jewry in the fourth year of his Reign, and in the firſt of Hircanus's Govern-
I ment, which was in the 162 Olympiade. And after he had ſpoilt all the Countrey, he blockt up Hircanus within the City of Jeruſalem, which he had beſieg'd with ſeven Camps; yet with no advantage at all, both in regard of the ſtrength of the Walls, and the valor of the Citizens, beſides the want of Water which he had in his Camp; which was not-withſtanding remedied by a great fall of rain, which fell about the ſetting of the Pleia-des in the beginning of April. On the North-ſide alſo where there is a great Plain, An-tiochus cauſed 100 Towers to be erected, every one three ſtories high, on which he planted certain Companies of armed Soldiers, who daily fought with the beſieged, and who,
by the means of a double and deep Trench, depriv'd them of all conveniencies. They on the other ſide made often ſallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the Enemy K on a ſudden, they made a great ſlaughter: but if they were diſcover'd, they marched back in order. But Hircanus conſidering the great number of People that were in the City, who rather conſumed Soldiers victuals, than performed any ſervice, he divided thoſe that were unfit for War, and ſent them out of the City, retaining only thoſe with him who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to have free liberty to depart; ſo that wandring here and there between the Walls and the Camp, they were conſumed with Famine, and died miſerably. When as therefore the feaſt of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during theſe affairs, they that were within, had compaſſion of their Countreymen, and drew them within the Walls, and entertain'd them within the City. At this time Hircanus ſent a meſſenger to beſeech Antiochus to grant him Truce nour which he bare unto God. Furthermore, he ſent a magnificent Sacrifice into Jeruſalem of Bulls with gilded Horns, and veſſels full of divers Perfumes, with other veſſels of gold and ſilver. Thoſe that had the charge of the gates, received the Sacrifices at their hands that brought the ſame, and offer'd them in the Temple. Antiochus himſelf alſo gave the Soldiers certain meats to grace their Feſtival, ſhewing himſelf herein to be of a far better diſpoſition than Antiochus Epiphanes, who, after he had taken the City, cauſed Swines fleſh to be ſacrificed upon the Altar, and beſprinkled the Temple with the Hogs blood, making a confuſion of the ordinances of the Law of God, which was the cauſe that this Nation rebelled, and conceived a deadly hatred againſt him: But Antiochus, of whom

M we ſpeak at this preſent, was by all men call'd devout, becauſe of the incredible affection that he had to the ſervice of God. Hircanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his Sacrifices, ſent Ambaſſadors unto him, requiring him, that he would permit them to live according to the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms of their Forefathers.
Whereupon the good King rejected their counſel who adviſ'd him to deſtroy the Jewiſh Nation, for being contrary to the cuſtoms of all other People. And underſtanding that all the converſation of the Jews was conformable unto piety, he anſwer'd the Ambaſ-other Cities that were out of* Judea, and would receive a Gariſon, ſuch as he ſhould appoint, he would diſcharge them of this War. They accepted all other his conditions, but they con-

Talents of ſilver, of which the King receiv'd 300 in hand, with the Pledges; amongſt which, was Hircanus's brother: and after he had beaten down the Cope and Panes of the Walls, with the other fortifications, he rais'd the ſiege, and departed. But Hircanus open-

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 14. Ptolomey, beſieged by Hircanus, knowing the power of natural affection, keepeth his mother and brethren priſoners, whippeth them on the walls, and threatneth to throw them down.

WHereupon Ptolomey retired unto a certain Caſtle ſituate beyond Jericho, called Dagon, but Hircanus was made High-Prieſt in his fathers ſtead: who, after he had recommended himſelf to God, by the firſtling Sacrifices that he offer'd, marched out againſt Ptolomey, his brother-in-law, to make War upon him. Now when he was fully reſolved to beſiege the place whither Ptolomey was retired, he had the advantage in all other things; but only by the affection that he bare unto his mother and his brethren, he was overcome. For Ptolomey having taken them, and whipt them upon the Walls in all mens preſence, threatned Hircanus, That unleſs he levied his ſiege, he would caſt them down headlong from the top of the Caſtle: now whereas one way Hircanus had a great deſire to force and ſurprize the place, ſo alſo on the other ſide he was wholly diſheartned, through the deſire that he had to redeem thoſe whom he loved, from the Enemies Tyranny. True it is, That his Mother ſtretching out her hands, beſought him, That for her ſake he would not give over valiantly to aſſault the place; but that he ſhould be the more encouraged to ſurprize the Fortreſs, and to lay hold upon his Enemy, and to be revenged of the wrong that was offer'd unto his deareſt friends: alledging, that ſhe thought it better to die in the midſt of a thouſand torments, than that the enemy ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed, who had been ſo manifeſt an occaſion of their miſery. When Hircanus heard his Mother ſpeak thus, he was more furiouſly incenſed to give the aſſault; but as ſoon as he ſaw his Mother ſo beaten and ſore wounded, his heart melted within him; and the fervent deſire which he before had to batter and beat down the City, was preſently allayed and cooled: and ſo the pitiful compaſſion of his Mother, ſurmounted and overcame his wrathful deſire of revenge. Whil'ſt thus the ſiege was continued and prolonged, the year of Repoſe celebrated amongſt the Jews was come: For they obſerved the ſeventh year, as the ſeventh day is obſerved in the week; ſo that by this occaſion, Ptolomey was deliver'd of this ſiege, who afterwards ſlew both Hircanus's Mother and Brethren; which done, he fled unto Zeno, ſirnamed Cotyla, who at that time Tyrannized in the City of the Philadelphians.

A*Ntiochus* calling to mind the manifold loſſes he had receiv'd by Simons means, invaded Jewry in the fourth year of his Reign, and in the firſt of Hircanus's Govern-
I ment, which was in the 162 Olympiade. And after he had ſpoilt all the Countrey, he blockt up Hircanus within the City of Jeruſalem, which he had beſieg'd with ſeven Camps; yet with no advantage at all, both in regard of the ſtrength of the Walls, and the valor of the Citizens, beſides the want of Water which he had in his Camp; which was not-withſtanding remedied by a great fall of rain, which fell about the ſetting of the Pleia-des in the beginning of April. On the North-ſide alſo where there is a great Plain, An-tiochus cauſed 100 Towers to be erected, every one three ſtories high, on which he planted certain Companies of armed Soldiers, who daily fought with the beſieged, and who,
by the means of a double and deep Trench, depriv'd them of all conveniencies. They on the other ſide made often ſallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the Enemy K on a ſudden, they made a great ſlaughter: but if they were diſcover'd, they marched back in order. But Hircanus conſidering the great number of People that were in the City, who rather conſumed Soldiers victuals, than performed any ſervice, he divided thoſe that were unfit for War, and ſent them out of the City, retaining only thoſe with him who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to have free liberty to depart; ſo that wandring here and there between the Walls and the Camp, they were conſumed with Famine, and died miſerably. When as therefore the feaſt of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during theſe affairs, they that were within, had compaſſion of their Countreymen, and drew them within the Walls, and entertain'd them within the City. At this time Hircanus ſent a meſſenger to beſeech Antiochus to grant him Truce L for ſeven days, by reaſon of the ſolemnity of the Feaſt; which he granted, for the honour which he bare unto God. Furthermore, he ſent a magnificent Sacrifice into Jeruſalem of Bulls with gilded Horns, and veſſels full of divers Perfumes, with other veſſels of gold and ſilver. Thoſe that had the charge of the gates, received the Sacrifices at their hands that brought the ſame, and offer'd them in the Temple. Antiochus himſelf alſo gave the Soldiers certain meats to grace their Feſtival, ſhewing himſelf herein to be of a far better diſpoſition than Antiochus Epiphanes, who, after he had taken the City, cauſed Swines fleſh to be ſacrificed upon the Altar, and beſprinkled the Temple with the Hogs blood, making a confuſion of the ordinances of the Law of God, which was the cauſe that this Nation rebelled, and conceived a deadly hatred againſt him: But Antiochus, of whom
M we ſpeak at this preſent, was by all men call'd devout, becauſe of the incredible affection that he had to the ſervice of God. Hircanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his Sacrifices, ſent Ambaſſadors unto him, requiring him, that he would permit them to live according to the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms of their Forefathers.
Whereupon the good King rejected their counſel who adviſ'd him to deſtroy the Jewiſh Nation, for being contrary to the cuſtoms of all other People. And underſtanding that all the converſation of the Jews was conformable unto piety, he anſwer'd the Ambaſſadors, That if the beſieged would yield up their Arms, and pay the Tributes of Joppa, and the other Cities that were out of Judea, and would receive a Gariſon, ſuch as he ſhould appoint, he would diſcharge them of this War. They accepted all other his conditions, but they con-N ſented not to receive a Gariſon, leſt they ſhould be enforced to entertain ſuch with whom they could not converſe; but inſtead of the Gariſon they gave Pledges, and paid 500 Talents of ſilver, of which the King receiv'd 300 in hand, with the Pledges; amongſt which, was Hircanus's brother: and after he had beaten down the Cope and Panes of the Walls, with the other fortifications, he raiſ'd the ſiege, and departed. But Hircanus opening Davids monument, (who ſurpaſſed all other Kings in riches during his time) drew 3000 Talents out of the ſame, whereby he took occaſion firſt of all among the Jews to entertain a foreign Army. There was alſo a friendſhip and alliance betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertain'd in the City with all his Army, and furniſh'd him largely and magnificently with all that which was neceſſary for the ſame; and that which is

Hi*rcanus* hearing news of Antiochus death, led forth his Army with all Expedition againſt the Cities of Syria, hoping to find them unprovided both of gariſons and means of defence, as in effect it came to paſs. He therefore took the City of Medaba at the end of ſix months, after that his Army had ſuffer'd many calamities. Afterwards he ſeized Samega, and the Cities thereabout; the Cities of Sichem, and Garizim alſo, where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the model of the Temple of Jeruſalem, (which Alexander the great permitted Sanaballath to build, in favor of his Son-in-law Manaſſes, brother to the High-Prieſt Jaddus, as we have heretofore declar'd) which Temple was laid deſolate 200 years after it was built. Hircanus alſo took certain Fortreſſes and Cities of Idumæa, as Adora and Mariſſa; and after he had ſubdu'd all the Idumæans, he permitted them to inhabit the Countrey, under this condition, That they ſhould conſent to be circumciſed, and to live according to the Laws and Religion of the Jews. They, through the deſire they had to live in the place where they were born, ſubmitted themſelves to be circumcis'd, and to live according to the cuſtoms and ordinances of the Jews; and from that day forward, they were comprehended within the number of the Jews.

Hircanus maketh a league with the Romans.

Whil'ſt thus Hircanus was High-Prieſt, he thought good to renew the amity betwixt the Jews and the Romans, and to this effect he ſent an Embaſſage with Letters unto the Senate. As ſoon as the Senate had receiv'd his Letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect enſuing. Fanius M. F. Pr. aſſembled the Senate in the field of Mars the eighth day of February, in the preſence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the ſon of Doſitheus, Apollonius the ſon of Alexander, Diodorus the ſon of Jaſon, men of good reputation and honour, and ſent Ambaſſadors by the People of the Jews, have propoſed; who have dealt with us as touching the confederation and amity that this Nation had with the Romans, and have likewiſe conferred as touching the affairs of State, namely, that Joppa and the Ports thereof, Gazara and the Fountains thereunto belonging, and thoſe other Cities of the Countrey, which Antiochus took from them, contrary to the decree of the Senate, ſhould be reſtor'd unto them; and that it may not be lawful for the Kings Soldiers to paſs through their Countrey, neither any of thoſe Provinces that are under their government: and that thoſe things which were attempted by Antiochus during this War, contrary to the arreſt and decree of the Senate, ſhould be declar'd void, to the end that the Ambaſſadors ſent in the Senates behalf, may provide for the reſtitution of thoſe things which Antiochus had ſpoilt them of, and may rate and ſet down the damages which the Countrey hath receiv'd by this War. Item, That Letters of recommendation ſhould be written in the behalf of the Jewiſh Ambaſſadors, to the Kings and free People, for their ſecure and ſafe return into their Countrey. It hath been held convenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendſhip and alliance with men of ſo good reſpect, ſent unto them by a Nation ſo good and faithful towards them. And as touching the Letters, the anſwer was, That they ſhould be written at ſuch time as the affairs of the Senate would permit them any leiſure; and that from this time forward, they would have care that no injury ſhould be offer'd them. And the Pretor Fanius was commanded alſo to deliver the Ambaſſadors money out of the common Purſe, to bear their charges home into their Countrey. And thus did Fanius diſmiſs the Ambaſſadors of the Jews, after he had given them money out of the common Treaſury, with the decree of the Senate addreſſed to thoſe that ſhould conduct them, and give them a ſure convoy or ſafeguard to return into their Countrey. And this was the ſtate of the affairs during Hircanus Prieſthood.

H But King Demetrius being ſharply whetted to make War againſt Hircanus, could have neither time nor opportunity to fulfill his deſire, by reaſon that both the Syrians and his Soldiers were become his Enemies, becauſe of his wickedneſs of life. For they ſent Ambaſſadors to Ptolomey, ſirnamed Phyſcon, to require him to ſend ſome one of Seleucus's race unto them, to be eſtabliſh'd King. Whereupon Ptolomey ſent them Alexander, ſirnamed Zebina, accompanied with an Army; who giving battel to Demetrius, worſted him, and conſtrain'd him to flie to his Wife Cleopatra, to Ptolomais; who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was conſtrain'd to retire from thence unto Tyre, where he was taken: and after he had ſuffer'd many miſeries by the hands of his Enemies, he finally died. Alexander having by this means obtained the Kingdom, made a league of amity with I Hircanus. And whereas it fell out, that Antiochus, ſirnamed Gryphus, the ſon of Demetrius, made War againſt him, he was overcome and ſlain in the battel. When Antiochus had taken poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Syria, he forbare to make War againſt the Jews, for that he had intelligence that his brother, by the mothers ſide, (who was in like ſort named Antiochus) aſſembled an Army againſt him at Cyzicum. Remaining therefore in his Countrey, he reſolved to make preparation againſt his brothers coming, who was called Cyzicenus, becauſe he was brought up in that City, and was the ſon of Antiochus called the Conſerver, who died in the Countrey of the Parthians, and who was brother to Demetrius the father of Gryphus; and it fell out, that both theſe brothers were married to one and the ſame Cleopatra, as we have heretofore expreſs'd. When Antiochus the K Cyzicenian was arrived in Syria, he made War againſt his brother, which continued many years: during all which time, Hircanus lived in peace, (for preſently after Antiochus's death, he revolted from the ſubjection of the Macedonians) and from that time forward gave them no ſuccors, neither as Subject or Friend; but his fortunes both augmented and flouriſhed greatly, during the time of Alexander Zebina, and principally during the Reign of theſe two brothers. For the War, wherein they conſum'd one another, gave Hircanus an opportunity to levy all the Revenues of Judea, without any contradiction, ſo that by the ſame means he gather'd infinite ſums of money. For whil'ſt the Cyzicenian deſtroy'd his brothers Countrey, Hircanus alſo made known his inclination and diſpoſition; and ſeeing likewiſe that Antiochus was deſtitute of thoſe ſuccors he expected out of Egypt, and L that both himſelf and his brother alſo (through their natural diſcords) weakned one anothers eſtates, he deſpiſed them both.

Hircanus taketh Samaria, and ruines it totally. How much this High-Prieſt was in God Almighties favor. He leaveth the Phariſees, and betakes him to the Sadduces. His happy death.

Hircanus ſeeing himſelf ſo powerful, reſolv'd to beſiege Samaria, (which was a ſtrong M City) and is at this day called Sebaſta, becauſe it was re-edifi'd by Herod, as we will make manifeſt in time and place convenient. He therefore began to beſiege and batter the ſame with all diligence; animated thereunto, becauſe of the extreme hatred he bare the Samaritans, who, on purpoſe, to pleaſe the King of Syria, had offer'd many grievous affronts to the Mariſſens, who were deſcended from, and allied with the Jews. He therefore made a Trench round about the City, with a double Wall of 80 furlongs, and committed the general command of this ſiege to his ſons, Antigonus and Ariſtobulus, who ſo diligently and valiantly behaved themſelves, that the Samaritans being overpreſſed with extreme famine, were conſtrained to eat ſuch things as were unuſual and unaccuſtomed amongſt men, and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenian to their aid: who readily N repaired thither, but was repulſed by Ariſtobulus's Soldiers; and being purſu'd by the two brethren as far as Scythopolis, he hardly eſcaped; and they returning to their ſiege, freſhly aſſaulted and beſieged the Samaritans within their own Walls: ſo that once more they were conſtrained to ſend Ambaſſadors to Antioch for aid, who was their Ally; who ſent unto Ptolomey Lathyrus, for about ſome 6000 men, who furniſh'd him with them, contrary to his mothers mind, who therefore had almoſt thruſt him out of his dominion. As ſoon as he had receiv'd them, he made a road into Hircanus's Countrey, and ſpoilt and forag'd the ſame as far as Egypt. For he durſt not give him battel hand to hand, becauſe he had not competent Forces; but thought that in ſpoiling the Countrey, he might cauſe them to raiſe the ſiege, and forſake Samaria: but after he had loſt a great number of his O men by divers ſnares of his Enemies, he went unto Tripoly, committing the general charge of that War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. Callimander, more raſhly than wiſely, attempting to ſet upon the Enemy, was himſelf ſlain, and his Soldiers routed; the ſpace of one whole year, he became maſter of it : and not contenting himſelf with the taking hereof, he utterly deſtroy'd it, enforcing the Rivers through the midſt thereof; yea, he ruined the ſame in ſuch ſort, that the mud and ſoil both of the water and earth took away all the appearance of the City, ſo that it ſeemed as if it had never been. Of this Hircanus, there is a certain incredible matter committed to memory, namely, how during his High-Prieſthood, God had conference with him. For it is reported, That the very ſame day wherein his ſons fought againſt Antiochus the Cyzicenian, whil'ſt being B himſelf alone, he offer'd incenſe in the Temple, he heard a voice, ſaying, That his two ſons had at that preſent overcome Antiochus : all which he incontinently ſignifi'd unto the people at the gate of the Temple; and, according as he had ſaid, ſo it came to paſs. See Hircanus forſaketh the Phariſees, and followeth the Sadduces.

About this very inſtant likewiſe, the affairs of the Jews proſpered not only in Jeruſalem and Judea, but alſo amongſt the Inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally, in Egypt and Cyprus: For Queen Cleopatra rebelling againſt her ſon Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias, the ſons of that Onias who had built the Temple in Heliopolis (according to the pattern of that in Jeruſalem) her Generals. And having committed her Army unto their hands, ſhe acted nothing without their advice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witneſſeth, ſpeaking after this manner : Divers of thoſe who came with us, and C of thoſe who had been ſent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, ſuddenly revolted to Ptolomey : only the Jews that were of Onias's faction, remained conſtant in their duty, becauſe the Queen made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their Countreymen. Thus far Strabo.
This great felicity and proſperity of Hircanus, moved the Jews to conceive a hatred againſt him, and eſpecially the Phariſees oppoſed themſelves againſt him. Theſe Phariſees were one of the Sects of the Jews, (whereof we have heretofore treated) which Sect was ſo great in credit with the common people, that when they diſpoſed any thing, were it againſt the King, or the Prieſt, they were preſently believed. Hircanus had been one of their diſciples, and therefore was eaſily believed. He invited them to a feaſt, and entertain'd them with all humanity : and ſeeing them in a merry vein, he began to tell them, D That they knew his mind, how that he deſired nothing more than to be juſt, and to ſquare all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themſelves taught. He therefore requir'd them, that if they perceiv'd that he miſtook himſelf in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redreſs the ſame. Whereupon all of them gave teſtimony of his perfect virtue, wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company, called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and ſuch an one as delighted in mutiny, ſaid unto him, Since you deſire to hear the truth, if ſo be, you affect the eſtimation of a good man, give over the place of Prieſthood, and content your ſelf with the government of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cauſe wherefore he ſhould forſake the Prieſthood?
Becauſe (ſaith he) that we have heard ſay by our Anceſtors, that your mother was a E Captive during the Reign of Antiochus the famous (which notwithſtanding was a falſe report.) Hircanus hearing this, was ſore moved againſt him, and alſo all other of the Phariſees, who were preſent. Amongſt the reſt, there was a certain man called Jonathan, of the order of the Sadduces, (who maintain a contrary opinion againſt the Phariſees) who was an intimate and dear friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the injurious ſpeeches that Eleazar had ſpoken by him, who told him, That (as he thought) Eleazar had ſpoken theſe words by the publick conſent of the Phariſees; and that he might diſcover the ſame moſt manifeſtly, if he enquired of them what puniſhment Eleazar had deſerved for ſpeaking after this ſort. Hircanus therefore talked with the Phariſees concerning his puniſhment, telling them, That he ſhould very well perceive, that this injury had not been pronounced F by the common conſent of them all, if they condemned the Offender to ſuffer a puniſhment proportionable to his offence. Whereupon they decreed, That he ought to be puniſhed by impriſonment and ſcourging; for (ſaid they) an injury done in word, required no capital puniſhment : And, to ſpeak uprightly, they in their thinking cenſured ſeverely enough of this fault, for that the Phariſees are naturally inclin'd to mercy in matter of puniſhment.
But Hircanus was ſore offended with this their anſwer, and imagined that this Eleazar had ſpoken after this manner, by the common inſtigation of the reſt. This diſpleaſure, and conceived diſlike of his, Jonathan aggravated to the uttermoſt, and handled the matter in ſuch ſort, that he drew Hircanus to forſake the Phariſees, and to ſubſcribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, aboliſhing their ordinances, and cauſing them to be ſharply puniſht that G obſerve the ſame. Theſe practices of Hircanus incenſed the people againſt him and his ſons; but we will treat of this in another place. At preſent I will declare how the

Phariſees

A Phariſees have made many ordinances among the People, according to the Tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the Laws of Moſes: for which cauſe, the Sect of the Sadduces rejecteth them, affirming, That they ought to keep the written ordinances, and not to obſerve thoſe that are grounded upon the Tradition of the fathers. And great diſpute and diſſentions have been raiſed among them upon this occaſion, becauſe the richer ſort only, and not the baſer ſort of People, adhered to the Sadduces: but the Phariſees had the Commonalty on their ſides. But of theſe two ſorts, and of the Eſſeans, I have more exactly Treated in my ſecond Book of the Wars of the Jews. But Hircanus finally appeaſed this mutiny, and lived afterwards in much peace and happineſs; and after he had moſt diſcreetly govern'd his Princedom for the ſpace of 31 years, he died, leaving B five ſons behind him. This man was honored by God, with three great gifts; the gift of Government, the gift of Prieſthood, and the gift of Prophecy. For God ſpake unto him divers times by Oracles and Revelations, and gave him the knowledge of things to come; which he in ſuch ſort foretold, That he declared that his two eldeſt ſons ſhould not poſſeſs the principality any long time: whoſe end it ſhall not be amiſs to ſet down in what manner it was, to the intent that the Prophecy of their father may be the better known.

CHAP. XIX.

Ariſtobulus, eldeſt ſon of Hircanus, Prince of the Jews, makes himſelf be crown'd King; C maketh his brother Antigonus, his aſſociate of the Crown: he impriſoneth the reſt, and his mother alſo, whom he cauſed to die for hunger. He becometh jealous of Antigonus; he maketh him be killed, and he himſelf afterwards dieth for grief.

ARiſtobulus, Hircanus's eldeſt ſon, reſolved after his fathers death, to exchange the Principality into an abſolute Kingdom: and the better to attain thereunto, he firſt of all ſet the Crown upon his head, 481 years and three months after the People of the Jews were deliver'd from the bondage of Babylon, and led again unto their Countrey. And for that Ariſtobulus, amongſt all his other brethren, loved Antigonus beſt of all, who was the neareſt unto him in age, he accepted him as a companion in the government of the D kingdom: but as for the reſt, he ſhut them up in Priſon. He locked up his mother likewiſe, who had contended with him concerning the Government, (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her diſpoſition) and ſo far extended his cruelty, that he famiſh'd her to death in Priſon. After he had thus uſed his mother, he ſlew his brother Antigonus alſo; whom he pretended to love above all the reſt, and whom (as he made ſhew) he had made partner of his Kingdom. From whom he eſtranged himſelf, by reaſon of ſome ſlanders and falſe accuſations raiſed up againſt him; which at the firſt he gave no credit to, both for that the friendſhip which he bare unto him, made him not regard the ſame, as alſo for that he imagined he was enviouſly ſlandered. It came to paſs that Antigonus, returning upon a certain time from the Army with great magnificence, about the time of E the feaſt of Tabernacles, chanced to repair thither at that very time wherein Ariſtobulus hapned to fall ſick. Antigonus intending to celebrate the Solemnity, aſcended the Temple in great ſtate, attended by ſome of his Army, to pray for his brothers health. Whereupon certain malicious Wretches, deſirous to break the concord that was between them, made uſe of this occaſion, and of Antigonus magnificent pomp and good fortune; and came unto the King, amplifying unto him in malicious words, what pomp and majeſty he had ſhewed in that ſolemnity, telling him, That in his actions he demeaned himſelf no wayes like a private man, but that all his actions were levelled at royalty: finally, that his intent was to enter the Kingdom by force, and to kill him; for he made account, that ſince he might be King alone, it was a great ſimplicity for him to have a companion. But Ariſtobulus, although F he would very hardly be induced to believe theſe reports; yet notwithſtanding being deſirous both to extinguiſh the ſuſpition, and to provide for his own ſecurity, he diſpoſed certain of his Guard in a dark and privy place under ground, and lodged himſelf in a certain Tower called Antonia, commanding that no man ſhould offer violence, except to thoſe who entred armed: giving a further charge to his Guard, that if Antigonus entred armed, he ſhould be ſlain. Which done, he ſent for his brother, deſiring him to repair unto him without Weapons. Which when the Queen, and they that complotted the murther of Antigonus, underſtood, they perſuaded the Meſſenger to tell him the contrary, namely, That his brother expected (in regard he prepared for War) that in that ſtate and pomp he ſhould come and viſit him, to the end he might be an eye-witneſs of his brave fur- G niture and preparation. But Antigonus ſuſpecting no harm, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foot toward Ariſtobulus, to ſhew himſelf in that bravery: and when he came right over againſt the Tower, that is called Straton, where the paſſage was very dark, the Kings Guard killed him. By this accident a man may eaſily conjecture, That there is ſcarcely any power greater than that of Envy and Slander; and that there is not any thing that may ſooner break off the good will and amity amongſt brethren, than theſe two paſſions. And above all there is an occaſion offer'd us of great wonder, in reſpect of one that was called Judas, of the Sect of Eſſeans; who, in all thoſe things that he propheſied, varied in no ſort from the Truth. He ſeeing Antigonus come up into the Temple, cryed out among his Diſciples, (who frequented him to be inſtructed by him in the method of Prophecy) That he was weary of his life, becauſe Antigonus*'s ſecurity argued the vanity of his Prophecy, by which he had foretold, that that very day he ſhould be ſlain at* Stratons Tower; whereas the place where he ſhould be murthered, was 600 furlongs off, and the better part of the day was already ſpent: ſo that it could not be imagined, but that he ſhould be in danger to have made a falſe Prediction. Whil'ſt he declared his doubts after this manner, and was wholly overcome with choler, news was brought, That Antigonus was ſlain in a certain place under ground, which was called the Tower of Straton, of the ſame name with that other that ſtandeth near the Sea, which was afterwards called Cæſarea; which ambiguity troubled the Diviner. Incontinently after this accident, Ariſtobulus repented himſelf, in that he had put his brother to death: and this repentance of his was ſeconded by a moſt grievous ſickneſs, proceeding from the affliction of his ſpirit, and deteſtation of that cruel murther: ſo that with grievous agony and torment he vomited blood, as if all his entrals had been torn in ſunder. This blood ſo vomited by him, it fortuned (in my opinion) by the Divine Providence of God, that a certain ſervant of his bearing it from his preſence, by ſome trip of his foot hapned to ſtumble, and ſhed the ſame in that very place which had been ſoiled with the blood of the ſlaughtered Antigonus. By which means they that beheld the ſame, raiſed a great cry, exclaiming that the Page had ſhed the blood in a convenient place. Ariſtobulus hearing this outcry, demanded the cauſe thereof; and for that no man addreſſed himſelf to ſatisfie him, he was the more earneſt to know it, (according to the nature of men, who are alwayes more ſuſpicious and deſirous to know thoſe things which are moſt concealed.) At laſt, from words, he fell to Threatnings, and no body durſt tell him the Truth. Whereupon he altogether afrighted in his Conſcience, ſhedding abundance of Tears, and breathing out grievous ſighs, began to cry out in this manner, How then? My impious and deteſtable act is not hidden from God, but the ſudden puniſhment of my brothers murther purſueth me: wherefore, O thou ſhameleſs body of mine, how long wilt thou detain my ſoul, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghoſts of my mother and brother? Why doſt thou not take it all at once, ſuch as it is, without expecting that I ſhould ſacrifice my blood, poured out ſo many times to thoſe whom I have ſo treacherouſly kill'd? While he pronounced theſe words, he dyed, after he had reigned one year. He was called Philelles, that is to ſay, a Lover of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his Countrey many wayes, and ſubdued the Itureans, and joined the greater part of the Countrey to Judea; and had conſtrained them likewiſe, who ſhould remain in that Countrey, to be circumciſed, and to live according to the Laws of the Jews, he died thus miſerably. He was by nature courteous and ſhamefac't, as Strabo teſtifieth, ſpeaking after this manner, by the authority of Timagines; This was the courteous man, and profitable to his Countreymen the Jews in many things: for he enlarged their Countrey, and conquered the part of the Nations of the Itureans, whom he tied unto him by the bond of Circumciſion.

WHen Ariſtobulus was dead, Salome his Wife (whom the Greeks called Alexandra) ſet his brothers at liberty, (whom, as we have heretofore declared, he had made Priſoners) and made Jannæus (who was called Alexander) King, who both in age and modeſty ſurpaſſed all the other brethren; but he was ſo unfortunate, that from his birth-day upward, his father had conceived ſo great a hatred againſt him, that he never admitted him to his preſence ſo long as he lived. The cauſe whereof (as it is reported) was this: When as Hircanus loved Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldeſt ſons, with moſt intire affection. God appeared unto him in his ſleep, A of whom he demanded, Who ſhould ſucceed him ? Whereupon God preſented unto his ſight the reſemblance of Alexander : whereat he was diſpleaſed, that as ſoon as he was born, he ſent him out of his preſence into Galilee, to be nouriſhed and brought up in that place. But God hath apparently proved that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Ariſtobulus's death, he taking poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, cauſed one of his two brethren to be put to death, who endeavored to make himſelf King : and as for the other, who reſolved to live in idleneſs and pleaſure, he honour'd him greatly.

Alexander executeth the one brother that affected the crown, and honoured the other.

After that he had ſetled his eſtate, according as he thought it moſt expedient, he led forth his Army againſt Ptolomais : and having obtained the upper hand in the battel, he blocked up the men within their City, and afterwards beſieg'd it. For amongſt all the B Cities of the Sea-coaſt, theſe two only, namely Ptolomais and Gaza, remained as yet unconquer'd, and there was no adverſary left but Zoilus, who had ſeized of the Tower of Straton and Dora where he govern'd. Whil'ſt Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cyzicenus were thus at Debate and VVar the one againſt the other, and conſum'd each others Forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any ſuccor from them. But whil'ſt they were engag'd in this Siege, Zoilus (who held the Tower of Straton and Dora) aſſiſted them with that Army he had under his command, and gave them ſome ſuccors, by reaſon that (ſeeing theſe two Kings were ſo eagerly incens'd againſt each other) he contriv'd how to advance himſelf to the crown and ſovereignty. For theſe two Kings ſeem'd to neglect their own dangers, reſembling thoſe Wraſtlers, who, though being wearied with fighting, yet C are aſhamed to ſubmit unto their adverſary, but give themſelves a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to re-encounter. The only hopes they had, were in the Kings of Egypt, and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Iſle of Cyprus at that time, (whither he retir'd himſelf, after he had been driven out of his kingdom by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolomaidans ſent Ambaſſadors as unto their Ally, requiring him to come and deliver them from Alexander's hands, into which they were in danger to fall. Theſe Ambaſſadors perſuaded him, That if he would paſs into Syria, he ſhould have both Zoilus to friend, and thoſe of Gaza to his followers, in reſcuing of the Ptolomaidans : and moreover they aſſured him, That the Sidonians, and divers others would ſecond him : and by this means ſo encourag'd him with promiſes, that he made haſte to ſet ſail.

Zoilus Tyrant of Straton and Dora.

D But in the mean ſpace Demenetus (who was both eloquent, and in great authority with the Citizens) made the Ptolomaidans change their reſolution, telling them, That it was much better for them to hazard themſelves in ſome uncertain danger, wherewith the Jews threatned them, than to deliver themſelves into the hands of ſuch a Maſter, from whom they could expect nothing but manifeſt ſlavery. And moreover, not only to ſuſtain a preſent War ; but that which is more, an imminent War from Egypt: that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey ſhould levy an Army of the Neighbouring Nations, but would come againſt them with a great power, and would endeavor alſo to thruſt her ſon out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey, if he were fruſtrate of his hope, yet he might notwithſtanding once more return again to Cyprus ; in this caſe they were to expect no leſs than extreme danger. Now although that Ptolomey, E being at Sea, underſtood how the Ptolomaidans had chang'd their opinion, yet continued he his courſe onward, and landing in the Port of Sicamine, he cauſed his Army (who were of Foot and Horſe to the number of 30000 Men) to take Land, and with them he approach'd Ptolomais ; and perceiving that upon his encamping, they of the City admitted not his Ambaſſadors, neither in any ſort gave ear unto them, he was wondrouſly perplexed. But after Zoilus, and they of Gaza came unto him, intreating him to grant them aſſiſtance, for that their Countrey was deſtroy'd by the Jews, and by Alexander : For which cauſe Alexander raiſed his ſiege from before Ptolomais, for fear of Ptolomey ; and retiring his Army into his own Countrey, he began to uſe this ſtratagem. For covertly he incited Cleopatra againſt Ptolomey, and openly he made ſhew of amity and F confederacy with Ptolomey, promiſing him to give him 400 Talents of ſilver, provided that he would deliver him the Tyrant Zoilus, and aſſign thoſe poſſeſſions held by him unto the Jews. Ptolomey having made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus : but after that he underſtood that Alexander had ſent and incenſed his mother againſt him, he brake all agreement, and beſieg'd Ptolomais, that would not entertain him. He left his Lieutenants at the ſiege with part of his Forces, and marched away with the reſt, to invade and pillage the Countrey of Judea. Alexander perceiving Ptolomey's intent, aſſembled about 50000 fighting Men of his own Coutrey, (or as ſome Hiſtorians have written, 80000) with whom he went out to fight againſt Ptolomey, who ſuddenly ſetting upon Azoch, a City of Galilee, on a Sabbath-day, took it by G force, and carried away from thence 10000 Priſoners, and a great quantity of other booty.

HE afterwards ſet upon Sephor a City near unto Azoch, from whence he departed with the loſs of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came B forth to encounter him, and met with him near unto Jordan, in a place called Aſophon, and encamped right over againſt the Enemy. He had in his Vanguard 8000 men, but the reſt of his Forces not finding themſelves ſo well armed, were fearful to engage, who carried brazen Bucklers. Ptolomey's Vanguard alſo had Bucklers after the ſame faſhion. Philoſtephanus the Camp-maſter did not a little encourage them: For he cauſed them to paſs the River which ſeparated the two Camps, which Alexander would not oppoſe, promiſing himſelf the victory, if his Enemies could not retreat. In the beginning of the skirmiſh, each one of them fought with anſwerable valor; ſo that a great number of them fell on both ſides. But Philoſtephanus perceiving that Alexander's Army had the better, he took a part of his followers, and ſpeedily ſeconded thoſe who were ready to flie. The C Wing of the Jews Vanguard ſeeing themſelves freſhly charged, and not ſuccoured by any means, began to flie; and ſo far were thoſe that marched next them from yielding them aſſiſtance, that all of them became partners in one ſhameful flight. But they of Ptolomeys ſide behaved themſelves far otherwiſe: for they purſued and ſlew them; and after they had put them in diſorder, they charged them ſo hotly, that they blunted their Weapons, and wearied their Arms with killing them. It is reported that 30 000 were ſlain in the battel (Timagenes ſaith, 50000) as for the reſt, ſome of them were taken Priſoners, and otherſome fled unto their Houſes. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, he over-ran and ſpoiled the whole Countrey, and in the evening, he quartered himſelf in certain Villages of Judea, which he found full of Women and Children, and D commanded his Soldiers, without reſpect of perſon, to cut their Throats, and to chop them into pieces, and afterwards to caſt the morſels into a boyling Cauldron, and when they were well boiled, to eat the ſame: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battel, and retired to their own Habitations, ſhould know that their Enemies would eat mens fleſh, that by this means they might be more afraid of them.
Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themſelves after this manner, as I have declared. And Ptolomey took Ptolomais alſo by force, as I have made known elſewhere.

Cleopatra prepareth an Army againſt her ſon.

Ptolomey driven out of Egypt.

Ptolomais beſieged and taken by Cleopatra.

But Cleopatra perceiving how her ſon proſpered, and how he had ſpoilt Jewry, without any prejudice, and ſubdued the City of Gaza: ſhe concluded with her ſelf, that ſhe ought E not to ſuffer him to go on after that manner, conſidering it was upon the borders of Egypt, whoſe ſoveraignty he affected. For which cauſe, ſhe ſuddenly marched out againſt him, with an Army both by Sea and Land, committing the command of her whole Forces to Chelcias and Ananias, both Jews; and ſent the greater part of her riches into the Iſle of Coos, with her Nephews, and her Will, to be reſerved and kept there in ſafety.
And after ſhe had commanded her ſon Alexander to ſet ſail toward Phœnicia, with a great Navy, becauſe the Inhabitants of that Countrey were revolted, ſhe her ſelf came to Ptolomais, and beſieged it, when ſhe perceived that they refuſed to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haſte to depart out of Syria, and to enter Egypt, hoping to be Maſter thereof, when he ſhould find the Countrey unarmed; but he was deceived. At that time it fortuned, F that Chelcias, one of the two Generals of Cleopatra's Army, dyed in Cœloſyria, being in purſuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra having tydings of her ſons enterpriſe, and that the ſucceſs and fortune he expected in Egypt had failed him, ſhe ſent part of her Army to drive him out of the Countrey; ſo that he was enforced to return back again out of Egypt, and to go and ſpend his Winter at Gaza. Meanwhile Cleopatra beſieged and took the City of Ptolomais, whither Alexander reſorted unto her with great Preſents, ſhe received him very kindly, in regard Ptolomey had uſed him ſo ill, he having now no other recourſe left him but to her favour and aſſiſtance. Upon his arrival, certain of her familiars counſelled her to lay hands on him, and to ſeize the Countrey: and not to permit that ſo great number of Jews, and ſo valiant men, ſhould become Subjects unto one man. But Ananias gave G her counſel to the contrary, alledging, *That ſhe ſhould commit an act of great injuſtice, if

H allied unto her. For (ſaid he) I would you ſhould know, that by committing this wrong, you ſhall raiſe in all the reſt of the Jews a heinous hatred againſt you. Cleopatra conforming her ſelf to Ananias counſel, reſolved with her ſelf to offer Alexander no injury; but in ſtead thereof, ſhe entertain'd him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a City of Cœloſyria. Now when Alexander perceived, that he was freed from the fear which he had conceived of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his Army into Cœloſyria, and after ſix months ſiege, took Gadara; he took ſhortly after Amath alſo, (which is a great Fortreſs belonging to the Inhabitants about Jordan) where Theodore, the ſon of Zenon, had hoarded up the richeſt and beſt part of his ſubſtance: who ſurpriſing the Jews unawares, ſlew about 10000 of them, and pillaged Alexanders baggage.

The year of the World, 3873, before Chriſt's Nativity, 91.

Alexander's peace with Cleopatra renewed.

Alexander taketh Gadara.

I This did not any wayes aſtoniſh Alexander: but notwithſtanding the diſaſter, he marched forward toward the Cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, ſituate on the Sea-coaſts, and took them perforce; and ſeeing that Ptolomey was retired from Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Egypt, he beſieged the City of Gaza, and ſpoilt all the Countrey round about it, by reaſon of the diſpleaſure which he had conceived againſt the Citizens, for that they had ſought Ptolomey's aſſiſtance againſt him. Apollodotus, Captain of the Gazeans, made a ſally by night, and entred the Camp of the Jews, having only with him 2000 foreign Soldiers, and 1000 of his own followers. And as long as the night laſted, the Gazeans had the upper hand, becauſe that they made their Enemies believe that Ptolomey was come to their reſcue; but as ſoon
K as the day appeared, and this opinion was found falſe, as ſoon as the Jews were aſſured of the truth, they turned back upon them, and charging the Gazeans, they ſlew about 1000 of them.

Apollodotus by night invadeth the Camp of the Jews.

Notwithſtanding all this, the beſieged ſtood out ſtill, being neither daunted with loſs of Men, nor lack of Proviſion whatſoever, reſolving rather to endure any miſery, than yield to their Enemies: and that which made them more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas, King of Arabia, who had promiſed no leſs. But it came to paſs, that Apollodotus was ſlain before his arrival, and the City taken. For Lyſimachus his brother conceived a jealouſie againſt him, by reaſon of the good opinion which the Inhabitants had of him, and having ſlain him, and gather'd thoſe fighting Men that he
L might, he yielded up the City unto Alexander, who at the firſt made a peaceable entry, but afterwards diſperſed his Soldiers, and gave them licence to execute all hoſtility againſt the Citizens: ſo that they acted their cruelty in every place, and ſlew many of the Gazeans. Neither died theſe Citizens unrevenged, but ſo manfully behaved themſelves, that they butchered no leſs number of Jews, than they murthered Citizens among them. Some of them likewiſe perceiving themſelves to be alone, ſet their Houſes on fire, taking away firſt that which was therein, that the Enemy might not be enriched with their ſpoils. Others killed their Wives and Children with their own hands, to deliver them from the Enemies cruelty. But the Senators, to the number of 500, fled into the Temple of Apollo, for to ſave themſelves, but that did not ſecure them (for when the Enemy
M entred the Town, they were by chance aſſembled in counſel) Alexander put them all to the ſword, and inſtantly razed and levelled that City with the ground: which done, he returned to Jeruſalem, after he had ſpent one whole year at the ſiege before Gaza.

Aretas, King of Arabia, flattereth the Gazeans, with hope of reſcue.

About this time Antiochus, ſirnamed Grypus, died by the Treaſon of Heracleon, in the 45 year of his age, and in the 29 of his Reign. His ſon Seleucus had the Kingdom after him, who made War againſt his Uncle Antiochus, ſirnamed Cyzicenus, and having overcome him, he ſlew him. Not long after, Antiochus the ſon of Cyzicenus, and Antoninus, ſirnamed the Devout, came to Aradus, and crowned them, and made War againſt Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and drove him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriving again in the City of the Mopſeates, he exacted a ſum of money from the Citi-
N zens. But the people were ſo incenſed, that they ſet his Palace on fire; whereby it came to paſs, that both he and his friends were burnt to duſt. During the time that Antiochus the ſon of Cyzicenus reigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus's brother, made War againſt him; but he was not only overcome, but both he and his Army were put to the ſword. After him, Philip his ſon took the Crown, and governed in certain places of Syria.

They upbraided him alſo with many injurious ſpeeches, reproaching him, that he had been Priſoner in War; and that he was alſo unworthy of the honour of the Prieſthood. Whereupon, he being moved by theſe diſgraces, put to death about 6000 Men: and having made an incloſure of Wood about the Temple and the Altar (as far as the place whereinto it was lawful for none to enter but the Prieſt) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained alſo certain foreign Soldiers, Piſidians and Cilicians. And beſides this, the people hated him, againſt whom he made VVar for the ſpace of ſix years, and ſlew at the leaſt 50000 of them: and the more he entreated them to be quiet, they grew worſe againſt him, for what they had ſuffered: ſo that when he demanded of them, What they would have him do to pleaſe them? They all of them with one voice cried out, That he ſhould kill himſelf. And thereupon they preſently ſent meſſengers to Demetrius Eucarus, requeſting him of his favor and aſſiſtance. Demetrius coming onward with his Army, and taking with him thoſe who had incited him to the enterprize, came and encamped near unto the City of Sichem. But D Alexander gathering together ſome 20000 Jews (whom he knew to be well-affected towards him) with 6200 mercenary ſoldiers and ſtrangers, marched forward againſt Demetrius, who led with him 3000 Horſemen, and 40000 Footmen. Both on the one and the other ſide there fell out many ſubtil ſtratagems: the one of them ſtriving on the one ſide to inveigle and withdraw the foreign Soldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himſelf to reconcile thoſe Jews that were of Demetrius's followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other prevailed at all by theſe devices, ſo that at length they were driven to decide their quarrel by the ſword, in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand. For all the ſtrangers that were on Alexanders ſide, were every one E hewed in pieces, after they had made ſufficient proof both of their fidelity and valour. There fell alſo many of Demetrius's Soldiers. But after that Alexander had fled unto the mountains, divers Jews (to the number of 6000) in commiſeration of his deſperate eſtate, and through the fear they had of Demetrius, reſorted unto him; which when the Conqueror heard, he retired himſelf. After this, the Jews made VVar againſt Alexander, and in divers loſſes which they received, there fell a great number of them in divers combats: At length, after he had ſhut up the beſt amongſt them in the City of Bethom, he beſieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them under his ſubjection, he carried them to Jeruſalem, where he committed an unſpeakable and cruel murther. For whil'ſt he banquetted with his Concubines, in the ſight of them all, he F commanded 800 of them, or thereabout, to be crucified, and before their eyes whil'ſt they yet lived, he cauſed their wives and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did, to be revenged of thoſe wrongs which he had received; but he exceeded the bounds of Humanity herein, notwithſtanding they had rebelled againſt him, and reduc'd him into a moſt pitiful eſtate, and put him in danger both of his life and kingdom. For being not content to aſſail and make VVar upon him with their Forces, they drew ſtrangers alſo into his Countrey againſt him; and, at length, they overpower'd him, ſo that he was conſtrained to yield up into the King of Arabians hands, the Countries and Cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for fear they ſhould join with the Jews, and make War againſt him; beſides other innumerable injuries and outrages which they G committed againſt him. All this cannot hinder, but that he ought to be abhorred for his cruelty, ſo that he was juſtly called Thracidas: that is to ſay, as cruel as Thracian: and this

The Soldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of 8000, fled by night into ſtrong and ſure holds; and as long as Alexander lived, they were in exile. But at laſt, he was deliver'd of all theſe Troubles, he lived in quiet, and governed his kingdom peaceably all the reſt of his lifetime. But Demetrius marching from Judea to Berœa, beſieged his brother Philip with 10000 Foot, and 1000 Horſe. But Straton Lord of Berœa, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces Governor of the Parthians, unto his help; who repairing unto him with great Forces, beſieged Demetrius in his own Trenches, in which they ſo incloſed him, by continual ſhooting of Darts, and want of Water, that they conſtrained him, and thoſe that were with him, to ſubmit themſelves to
I their mercy. When they had ſpoilt the whole Countrey, and had ſeized on Demetrius, they ſent him priſoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as for the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the Camp, were ſuffered to be gone with the ſafety of their lives and baggage, and to return to Antioch. But Mithridates, King of Parthia, honour'd Demetrius, by all means poſſible, until he was ſurprized with a ſickneſs whereof he died. Immediately after the battel, Philip came into Antioch, and having obtained the kingdom, ruled over Syria.

After this, Antiochus called Dionyſius (who was Philip's brother) came into Damaſcus to make himſelf Maſter of it, which he did quickly, in his brothers abſence, who was gone againſt the Arabians. When his brother Philip (who had an Army in a readineſs to invade the Arabians) had tydings hereof, he came to Damaſcus with great ſpeed, and made him ſurrender up the City, both by the means of Mileſius, whom Antiochus had left Governor in the Caſtle, and alſo by the conſent of the Citizens themſelves.
L But Philip ſhewed himſelf ungrateful towards Mileſius, performing nothing of that which he had promis'd him, at the recovery of the City; that the World might think that the fear of his power, and not Mileſius's favor, was the cauſe of the ſurrender of Damaſcus. Which act of his made Mileſius ſuſpect him, and was the cauſe that he loſt the City again. For departing from thence, to exerciſe himſelf at Tilt, Mileſius lockt the gates againſt him, and kept the City for Antiochus. Who having intelligence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very inſtant led his Army into Judea, in which were 8000 Foot, and 800 Horſe. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deep Trench from Caparſabe, (which is called at this day Antipatris) as far as the Sea of Joppa, (which was the only ſtreight whereby he might be aſſailed) and made
M a Wall fortified with wooden Towers, with their Courts of Guard, diſtant the one from the other 150 Furlongs, to keep back Antiochus. But he fired all his fortifications, and made his Army paſs into Arabia thorow this ſtreight. The King of Arabia retired upon the firſt aſſault; but afterwards he preſently came into the field with 10000 Horſemen, whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onſet loſt his life, (yet with victory) whil'ſt he ſought to ſuccor a company of his men that were hard put to it. After Antiochus's death, his Army retired to the borough of Cana, where divers of them dyed for hunger.

N Judea upon a compoſition made between them. Moreover, once more Alexander marched towards the City of Dion, and took it. And afterwards he led his Army againſt Eſſa, where Zeno had hoarded up his chiefeſt riches: and before he aſſailed the Fortreſs, he invironed the place with three huge Walls, which he built round about it, and having taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana and Selencia: which having overcome, he made himſelf Maſter of a valley called the valley of Antiochus, with the Fortreſs of Gamala. And objecting many crimes againſt Demetrins, the Lord of thoſe places, he diſpoſſeſſed him of his government. After this, King Alexander fell ſick, by the means of a ſurfeit and drunkenneſs; and for the ſpace of three years, he was ſick of a Quartane Ague. Nevertheleſs he continued alwayes in the Camp, until ſuch time that being wearied with toyle, he died on the borders of the Countrey of the Geraſens, as he beſieged Regaba (which is a Caſtle ſituate on the other ſide of Jordan.) The Queen perceiving that he was at deaths door, and that there remained neither hope of life, nor recovery, ſhe began to weep and lament, and to beat her breaſts, becauſe both ſhe and her children were likely now to be left deſolate, and in theſe words ſhe bemoaned her ſelf unto him: To whom wilt thou leave both me and thy children, in the ſtate wherein we are? Or why ſhould we ſurvive or live one after another, conſidering that thou aſſuredly knoweſt, that the hearts of thy people are averſe from us? Hereupon the King comforted her, and gave her this counſel, That if ſhe would aſſure the Kingdom both unto her ſelf and her children, ſhe ſhould behave her ſelf according to his direction: which was firſt to conceal his death, and not to ſuffer his Soldiers to have notice thereof, until ſhe had taken this Caſtle. Which done, he adviſed her to repair to Jeruſalem in pomp and triumph; and that being there, ſhe ſhould beſtow ſome authority upon the Phariſees, who would ſound her praiſe, and obtain her the peoples favor. For (ſaid he) theſe kind of men are in great eſteem and credit with the people, and can do much hurt unto thoſe they hate, and benefit them very mightily towards whom they are well affected: For the people eaſily believeth them, when they find fault with any man, notwithſtanding it be of envy; and that himſelf alſo had incur'd the diſpleaſure of the people for their ſakes, in that he had offended them.

If in this ſort you frame both your manners and diſcourſe towards them, it will come to paſs, that I ſhall be buried by them with great magnificence, (which otherwiſe I could not be by any other means) becauſe they will offer no outrage to my body, no although you ſhould permit them: and beſides that, you ſhall reign in more aſſurance and quiet.*

Alexander's funeral.

AFter that Alexander had taken the Caſtle of Ragaba, ſhe conferreth with the Phariſees, according to her Husbands counſel, and committed unto their diſcretion not only that which concerned her Husbands funerals, but alſo the government of the kingdom: whereby ſhe not only appeaſed the diſpleaſure which formerly they had conceived againſt Alexander, but alſo obtained their good will and friendſhip. They came and declaimed amongſt the people, making an oration of the actions and deeds of Alexander, lamenting every where that they had loſt a good King, and by praiſing him, they incited the people to great grief and lamentation: ſo that they buried him with more magnificence than any King that reigned before him. This Alexander left two ſons behind him, the one called Hircanus, the other Ariſtobulus, and by his Teſtament committed the government of the kingdom to Alexandra his Wife. For Hircanus was uncapable to manage affairs, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Ariſtobulus, who was the younger, was

She appointed Hircanus High-Prieſt, (both in regard of his age, as alſo for that by nature he was addicted to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the diſpoſing of the Phariſees, commanding the people to obey and ſerve them. She alſo renewed and confirmed that which Hircanus had diſannulled, and the Phariſees (according to the cuſtoms of their forefathers) had introduced; ſo that ſhe bare the name, and the Phariſees the Authority Royal. For they reſtored ſuch as were baniſhed to their eſtates, and delivered Priſoners; and in all things they demeaned themſelves like great Lords. I Alexandra alſo for her part undertook the care of the Commonweal, and kept a great number of Soldiers in pay, and increaſed her power in ſuch ſort, that the Tyrants round about feared her, and deliver'd the hoſtages and pledges of peace. All the Countrey was at quiet, only the Phariſees troubled the Queen, perſuading her to put thoſe to death who had counſelled King Alexander to put thoſe 800 to death (of whom we have ſpoken before) and they themſelves afterwards ſlew one that was called Diogenes, and after him divers others, one after another: until ſuch time as thoſe in authority came unto the Royal Palace, accompanied with Ariſtobulus (who ſeemed to be diſpleaſed with that which had been done, and who, if the occaſion were offer'd, made ſhew that he would not permit his Mother to govern after that manner) and told her that which had K hapned, and in what dangers they had been, to expreſs their duty and loyalty which they ow'd to their deceaſed Maſter, and how for that cauſe they had been greatly honour'd by him; requiring of her, that ſhe would not utterly fruſtrate them of their hopes, which they expected for their ſervice; that now they that had eſcaped from the danger of their foreign Enemies, were in their houſes murthered like Beaſts, by their private Foes, without any relief or ſuccors from any one. They furthermore urged, That if their Adverſaries would content themſelves with thoſe they had ſlain, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reaſon of the ſincere affection they bare unto their Lords: but if they muſt needs as yet ſuffer the like, they required that they might have liberty to retire. For that they would not procure their ſafety otherwiſe than by her conſent; and would rather ſuffer a voluntary death near unto her Royal Palace, if they might L not be ſpared: for that it would be a ſhame both for themſelves, and for the Queen, if by her toleration, thoſe who had been her deceaſed husbands friends, ſhould be thus abuſed by them which were his Enemies.

Hircanus High-Prieſt.

The Phariſees admitted to the adminiſtration of the Commonweal, are greedy of revenge.

Ariſtobulus & his followers accuſe the Phariſees of Tyranny.

That Aretas, King of Arabias, and other Princes, would be glad of this news, to hear that ſhe ſhould deprive her ſelf of thoſe whoſe names have been dreadful even amongſt thoſe neighbouring Kings who have but heard of them. And if ſhe had reſolved to make more account of the Phariſees favor, than of their ſervice, they intreated her that ſhe would at leaſt diſtribute them in ſeveral Caſtles; that rather than any ill ſhould fall upon their Sovereign Alexander*'s houſe, they were content to lead their lives in that contemptible and deſpicable condition.* Whileſt thus they ſpake, directing their ſupplications to Alexander's ſoul, praying him to have M compaſſion as well of thoſe that were already dead, as of thoſe who were in danger of their lives, the tears ran from the eyes of all the aſſiſtants: and Ariſtobulus above the reſt was heartily diſcontent, and expreſſed the ſame, by finding fault with his Mother. But they themſelves were the cauſe of their own calamity, becauſe that againſt all right and reaſon, they had permitted a head-ſtrong and ambitious Woman to reign over them, as if the King had no Heirs reſerv'd to ſucceed him in the kingdom. The Queen, uncertain how to determine the matter at that inſtant, committed the charge of all her Caſtles into their hands, reſerving only Hircania, Alexandrion, and Macheron, wherein the Princes Moveables and Wealth was kept.

Alexandra committeth the cuſtody of the Caſtles to the Jews.

Not long after, ſhe ſent her ſon Ariſtobulus with a ſtrong Army, commanding him to N draw his Forces towards Damaſcus, againſt Ptolomey, called Mennæus, who was an ill Neighbor unto that City; but he returned thence, without doing any memorable action. About the ſame time news was brought, that Tigranes, King of Armenia, invaded Syria with 500000 Men of War, intending ſhortly to ſet upon Jewry. This rumor afrighted the Queen, and all the Commonalty (and not without cauſe.) Whereupon ſhe ſent Ambaſſadors with many Princely Preſents unto Tigranes, who beſieged the City of Ptolomais. (For Queen Selena, otherwiſe called Cleopatra, reigned in Syria, and perſuaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes paſſage.) But Alexandra's Ambaſſadors met with the King of Armenia, and pray'd him to conceive a good opinion of their Queen, and of all the whole Nation of the Jews; who received them willingly, commending them for that O they had ſought him out ſo far to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolomais, it was told Tigranes, that Lucullus purſued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cauſe that Lucullus had Alexandra's ſickneſs, and Ariſtobulus's attempt.

After this, Queen Alexandra fell ſick of a dangerous diſeaſe, whereby Ariſtobulus took occaſion to intermeddle with the affairs of State. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a truſty ſervant, he repaired unto thoſe Caſtles which were committed to the cuſtody of his fathers friends: for he had miſliked his Mothers government long, and feared more than ever, that if ſhe ſhould die, all her poſterity ſhould be made ſubject to the power of the Phariſees, For he perceived how unapt his elder brother was to govern the kingdom, unto whom notwithſtanding the ſucceſſion appertained: only his Wife, whom (accompanied with his Children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went firſt of all to Agaba, where Galeſtes, one of the chiefeſt Potentates, commanded, who entertained him with great joy.

Ariſtobulus ſeizeth the Caſtles, and great concourſe of people reſort to him.

The next day, the Queen heard that Ariſtobulus was departed from Court, ſhe little ſuſpected at firſt, that he was retired, to work ſome alteration in the State. But when Meſſengers came flocking one after another, and told her, that after the firſt Caſtle, the ſecond; and after the ſecond, all the reſt had conſequently been ſurprized by Ariſtobulus: at that time both the Queen and the whole Nation were alarmed, fearing leſt he ſhould preſently uſurp the Sovereignty; but above all they feared, leſt he ſhould revenge himſelf on thoſe who had abuſed his ſervants: and it was thought fit, that both his Wife and Children ſhould be committed to the Caſtle that adjoined to the Temple. But from all parts round about, there reſorted Soldiers to Ariſtobulus, ſo that he was attended like a King: for in the ſpace of ſome 15 dayes, he took 22 Forts, whither he made his retreats, and aſſembled an Army of Soldiers, and levied them amongſt the Lords that inhabited Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude had alwayes reſort [illegible] the ſtronger ſide, ſuppoſing that if they ſubmit thereunto willingly, and maintain and authorize the ſame, that they ſhall draw ſome profit thereby, as being thoſe that were the occaſion of the confirmation of his Monarchy.

Hircanus and the Elders inform the Queen, and accuſe Ariſtobulus. Alexandra's death.

Hereupon the ancient Jews and Hircanus repaired unto the Queen, humbly intreating her to take ſome mature counſel and good advice concerning the preſent affairs, becauſe that Ariſtobulus her ſon was already very near Lord of the whole Countrey, ſince he had ſo many Forts under his command: Beſides, that it was inconvenient and undecent for them to conſult without her expreſs order, notwithſtanding ſhe were grievouſly ſick, but that the preſent danger compelled them. The Queen deſired them to do that which they thought ſhould be moſt profitable for the Commonweal; telling them, That they had many means, for that their Nation was mighty, great and ſtrong, and had great ſtore both of money and riches in the common Treaſury: ſhewing them, that becauſe ſhe knew that ſhe had not long to live, ſhe had no more reaſon to take care of thoſe affairs. Having ſpoken thus, ſhe died, after ſhe had reigned nine years, and lived in all 73. This Woman was endued with greater excellency than could be expected from one of her ſex, and expreſſed both in her actions and ordinances how fit ſhe was to govern a kingdom, and how unworthy ſome Princes are of the dignities they have amongſt men. For making more account of the preſent than future occurrences, and neglecting all other things in reſpect of thoſe which are requiſite in a moderate Government, ſhe never, upon any inſtigation whatſoever, perverted juſtice; notwithſtanding her family fell into ſuch inconveniencies, that the ſame ſovereignty which ſhe had obtained by divers dangers and labours, was not long after that, ruinated and loſt for her ſcarce effeminate deſires. For ſhe gave ear unto thoſe who were ill-affected towards her poſterity, and left the Kingdom deſtitute of ſuch as were fit to govern: ſo that the Government which ſhe enjoyed during her life-time, was after her death diſtracted with infinite troubles and calamities, wherewith her family was involved. And notwithſtanding her Government after this manner, yet, during her life-time, ſhe kept the kingdom in peace. And thus died Alexandra.

Alexandra's Family incur much trouble.

Ariſtobulus and Hircanus ſtrive for the kingdom.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken upon him the High-Prieſthood, in the third year of the Hundred ſeventy and ſeven Olympiade, and in the year that Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretenſian) were Conſuls at Rome, Ariſtobulus ſuddenly undertook the War againſt Hircanus, and fought with him near unto Jericho: where a great number of Hircanus's followers ſubmitted themſelves of their own accord to Ariſtobulus. Through which accident Hircanus was forced to flie to the fortreſs of the higher City, where Alexandra, Ariſtobulus mother, had impriſoned both his Wife and Children (as before is I ſpecified.) The reſt of the faction, for fear of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themſelves within the precincts of the Temple, where they were beſieged and taken. After this, a Peace was Treated of betwixt both the brethren, and their difference was decided in this manner, That Hircanus ſhould paſs the reſt of his life without medling with State Affairs, and Ariſtobulus ſhould reign. This League was ratified between them in the Temple, and confirmed with oaths, conjunction of hands and embraces, in the ſight of all the people: which being finiſhed, Ariſtobulus retired himſelf into the Palace, and Hircanus to Ariſtobulus lodging, to lead a private and quiet life.

Antipater an Idumæan, perſuades Hircanus to flie, and to retire himſelf to Aretas, King of the Arabians, who promiſeth to re-eſtabliſh him in the Kingdom of Judea.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 11. Antipater the Idumæan, Hircanus's friend. Antipater of Judæa, as Nicholas Damaſcenus implies, firſt called Antipas.

BUT a certain friend of Hircanus, (by Nation an Idumæan, and by name Antipater) being very rich, and by nature both factious and induſtrious, was as much Ariſtobulus's Enemy, as Hircanus's Friend. True it is, that Nicholas Damaſcene writeth of this man, That he was deſcended of the nobleſt amongſt thoſe Jews who returned from Babylon into Jewry: but this he did on purpoſe to gratifie Herod, Antipater's ſon, who, by a caſualty, became afterwards King of the Jews (as we will expreſs hereafter in time and place L convenient.) This Antipater was at the firſt called Antipas, according to his fathers name, who (as it is reported) was made Governor of all Idumæa by King Alexander and his Wife: and afterwards made a League with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Aſcalonites, corrupting them, and inſinuating himſelf into their favors, by divers great Preſents beſtowed upon them. This young Antipater conſidering with himſelf what Ariſtobulus power was, and fearing leſt ſome miſchief might befall him, through the hatred the young King had conceived againſt him, he communicated with certain of the greateſt amongſt the Jews, and ſecretly and cunningly incenſed them againſt Ariſtobulus, telling them, That they had done amiſs, both to ſee and ſuffer Ariſtobulus to detain the Kingdom unjuſtly in his hands, and to diſpoſſeſs his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it did belong. M
He likewiſe accoſted and ſounded Hircanus ordinarily with theſe words, telling him, That he lived in danger of his life, and would doubtleſs be ſnared, except he ſought his own ſecurity, and fled his evident danger: alledging, That Ariſtobulus*'s friends would never ceaſe to conſult how they might ſhorten his life, to the end that he might live in more ſecurity.* To theſe inſtigations of his, Hircanus gave ſmall credit, (for that of his own nature he was courteous, and could not eaſily be induced or ſeduced by detractions) but this negligence and careleſneſs in him, was the cauſe that he was accounted a ſilly man. On the contrary ſide, Ariſtobulus was of a different and more heroick nature, being more active in performance, and careful to prevent.

Now although Antipater ſaw that Hircanus made ſmall account of his inſtigations, yet N ceaſed not daily to invent and propoſe new ſurmiſes and accuſations, urging Ariſtobulus's hatred and practice to murther him: and prevailed ſo by his importunity, that at laſt he perſuaded him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, promiſing him, That in ſo doing, he would give him both aid and aſſiſtance. Hircanus was the more eaſie to be induced to follow Antipater's advice, for that Arabia was adjacent to Jewry. Whereupon he firſt of all ſent Antipater to Aretas, to take aſſurance of him that he ſhould not betray him into his Enemies hands, if he ſhould ſubmit himſelf unto him, and require his aſſiſtance. When Antipater had received his aſſurance from the King, he returned to Jeruſalem unto Hircanus: and not long after that took him away with him, and departed the City by night, and afterwards with great journies arrived at Petra, where Aretas kept his Royal Court. O
And being very familiar with the King, he entreated him to re-eſtabliſh him in the Kingdom of Jewry, and did ſo much by his importunity and the Preſents which he gave him, that he

H perſuaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promiſed, That if he confirmed him again in his Royal dignity, he would, upon the recovery of his Realm, reſtore unto him thoſe twelve Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are theſe that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Livias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Nariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, Oryba.

Ariſtobulus is enforced to retire into the Caſtle of Jeruſalem, the King Aretas beſiegeth him: The cruelty of ſome Jews who ſtoned Onias, a juſt man, to death. The puniſhment which I God inflicted upon them for it.

A*Retas*, induced by theſe promiſes, was content to ſend forth an Army againſt Ariſtobulus, and himſelf in perſon conducted in that expedition 50000 Men Foot and Horſe, and had ſo much the upper hand of his Enemy, that divers after this victory, of their own accord, ſubmitted themſelves to Hircanus: and Ariſtobulus perceiving himſelf to be deſtitute of all his friends and followers, fled unto Jeruſalem. The King of Arabia followed him with all expedition, and beſieged him in the Temple: in this ſiege the common people aſſiſted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Prieſts only that ſtuck to Ariſtobulus's ſide. Whereupon Aretas drew up the Forces he had, and buſily ſet the Ar- K my both of Jews and Arabians about the ſiege. Whil'ſt theſe things were thus, the feaſt of unleavened bread, which we call the Paſſeover, was at hand, and the Princes of the Jews forſaking their Countrey, were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certain man called Onias (ſuch an one who for his virtue was beloved of God, and in times paſt, had by his devout prayers and ſupplications, in a time of drought, obtained rain from God) hid himſelf, perceiving that this ſedition would be of ſome continuance. This man therefore being ſurprized, and brought into the Camp of the Jews, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained water, ſo at that time likewiſe he would by his imprecations, incenſe God againſt Ariſtobulus, and his adherents. But whereas he refuſed and excuſed himſelf, he was at laſt conſtrained by the people to perform their requeſt; ſo that ſtand- L ing up in the midſt of them, he ſpake after this manner:

Aretas maketh War againſt Ariſtobulus, and inforceth him to flie to Jeruſalem. The Arabian beſiegeth Ariſtobulus in the Temple. The Jews flie into Egypt.

O God, King of the whole world, ſince they who are at this preſent here with me are thy people, and thoſe that are beſieged are thy Prieſts, I humbly beſeech thee, that when they ſhall require thee to be incenſed againſt their brethren, thou wilt not hear them: and when as likewiſe they ſhall provoke thee againſt the other, thou wilt not reſpect them.

Hereupon, a certain ſort of reprobate Soldiers amongſt the Jews, hearing theſe words of his, ſtoneth him to death: But God immediately puniſhed this cruelty in them, and the murther of Onias ſo curſedly perpetrated, was revenged by this means which enſueth. Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts being beſieged, the feaſt of Eaſter, or the Paſſeover fell out, during which time it was an uſual cuſtom among the Jews to honour God with many ſa- M crifices: Now they who were with Ariſtobulus, not having any beaſts to offer up in ſacrifice, they requeſted the other Jews that were without, That they might have ſome delivered unto them for their money. Whereunto it was anſwered, That if they would give one thouſand drachms for every head, they ſhould have ſome delivered unto them. To this demand of theirs, Ariſtobulus and the Prieſts that were with him, willingly condeſcended, and let down the prefixed price, and deliver'd the ſame from the wall; but the others, after they had received the money, deliver'd them not thoſe beaſts which they deſired them to ſell them to ſacrifice; but they were ſo impious, that they falſified their oaths not only toward men, but defrauded God alſo, in denying that which they had promiſed toward the furniſhing of their ſacrifice. For which cauſe, the Prieſts (being defrauded in this N manner, contrary to the oath and proteſtations of their adverſaries) beſought God to ſhew vengeance on their Countreymen that had committed this heinous and perjurious impiety: neither did God defer their puniſhment, but immediately after he ſent a great and violent Wind, that ſpoiled all the fruits of the Countrey; ſo that a meaſure of Wheat was ſold for eleven drachms.

Onias contradicting the Jews petition, is ſtoned to death.

Meanwhile Pompey ſent Scaurus into Syria (himſelf being in perſon detained in Armenia, in purſuit of the War betwixt him and Tigranes.) When Scaurus came unto Damaſcus, he found that Metellus and Lollius had newly taken the City, for which B cauſe he marched on towards Jewry: where being arrived, certain Ambaſſadors came unto him in the behalf of Ariſtobulus, and others alſo in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacy in the behalf of them both, and offering from each of them a Tribute of 400 Talents. But Scaurus preferred Ariſtobulus's promiſes, becauſe he was the ableſt, and of the nobleſt ſpirit, and withall more moderate in his demand: whereas Hircanus was poor and covetous, notwithſtanding he demanded greater things than his brother did: for it was a harder matter to ſubdue a City that was ſo ſtrong, than to beat a company of runnagate Nabatheans, and ſcarcely well animated to proſecute that War. For theſe cauſes therefore he (receiving his money) raiſed the ſiege, commanding Aretas to return; which if he refuſed, he declared him an Enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damaſcus, and Ariſtobulus led forth his Army againſt Aretas and C Hircanus; and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and killed about ſome 7000 of his Enemies, amongſt the number of which, was Cephalins, Antipater's brother.

For Ariſtobulus ſent him a Preſent of great value, namely, a golden Vine of 500 Talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in theſe words:

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 5. A Caſtle deſtroyed in Apamea.

Straight after this, there came other freſh Ambaſſadors to Pompey, (Antipater from Hircanus, and Nicodemus from Ariſtobulus) who accuſed thoſe that had taken money, namely Gabinius, for that he firſt of all had received 300 Talents, beſides other Preſents: and ſecondly Scaurus, who had received 400; alledging, that by that means they had incenſed them againſt him. He therefore gave direction, that they ſhould repair unto him about the Spring, each of them to juſtifie and maintain their ſeveral Rights: as for himſelf, he drew his Forces from their wintering places, and marched towards Damaſcus, deſtroying in his way a certain Fortreſs which Antiochus the Cyzicenius had fortified in Apamæa. He viſited alſo the Countrey of Ptolomey Mennæus (who was a wicked and perverſe man, and no wayes differed from Dionyſius Tripolitane) who was puniſhed F with the loſs of his head, and was united alſo with him in friendſhip and affinity; yet acquitted of the death he deſerved, by the means of a 1000 Talents Ranſom, which Ptolomey diſtributed among his Soldiers for their pay. He demoliſhed likewiſe the Caſtle of Lyſias (wherein a Jew called Sylas tyrannized) and paſſing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis, and having likewiſe aſcended the mountain (which is between them) he came to Cœloſyria, and from Pella repaired to Damaſcus. In which place he gave audience to the Jews, and their Princes Hircanus and Ariſtobulus, who were at odds the one againſt the other, concerning their particular intereſts: the Jews complained againſt Hircanus and Ariſtobulus both, and alledged, that they would not be governed by Kings, becauſe their cuſtom was to obey Gods Prieſts, whom they honoured, affirming that theſe G two brethren (who were deſcended of the race of Prieſts) endeavoured to draw their Nation under a different form of government, and to reduce them under ſlavery. Hircanus Ptolomey Mennæus fined at a great ſum of money.

Ariſtobulus and Hircanus accuſed by the Jews before Pompey.]

H nus complained, that being the elder born, he had been deprived of his inheritance by Ariſtobulus, and had only but a ſmall portion of the Countrey alotted him, becauſe Ariſtobulus had ſeized the reſt by force. He complained likewiſe of thoſe incurſions that both by Land and Sea Ariſtobulus's followers had endamaged their Frontiers with. For the people had not revolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accuſation of his, a thouſand of the principalleſt of the Jews (drawn on by Antipater's perſuaſion) ſubſcribed. But Ariſtobulus anſwered, That Hircanus was diſpoſſeſſed of the Kingdom, by reaſon of his incapacity, and natural defects, alledging for himſelf, That the government was forced on him of neceſſity, leſt it ſhould be tranſported to others: he proteſted that he challenged no other title than that which his father Alexander had had. I He brought in alſo for his Witneſſes certain arrogant young men, who were hated for their pomp, purple Robes, their curioſity in painting and curling their Hair, and other braveries which they preſented, not like men that intended to hear a Caſe decided, but rather to ſhew their vanity. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemn'd Ariſtobulus's violence, but for that time he diſmiſs'd them (after ſome favorable and gracious conference) promiſing them that he would come into their Countrey, and determine their differences, after he had ſeen the Region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the meanwhile to live in peace. He uſed Ariſtobulus likewiſe very kindly, fearing leſt he ſhould incenſe the people, and ſhut up his paſſage: which notwithſtanding came to paſs. For Ariſtobulus came into the City of Delion, and from thence K went into Judea, without regarding what Pompey had commanded him.

There he found a ſtrong Caſtle ſituate upon the top of a mountain called Alexandrion, whither Ariſtobulus was retired. He ſent to invite him to come and parley with him: who, perſuaded by the counſel of many of his beſt friends, by no means to make War againſt the Romans, came down to him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, concerning the Kingdom, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Caſtle. And this he did two or three times, alwayes flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the Kingdom. Meanwhile he retired himſelf, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the War, leſt Pompey ſhould alot the Kingdom to Hircanus. Pompey commanded him to M deliver up the fortreſſes that he held, and to write with his own hand to the Captains of the Gariſons (who otherwiſe would not have obeyed him.) Ariſtobulus ſubmitted, but was ſo diſpleaſed, that he repaired to Jeruſalem, on purpoſe to make preparations for War. CHAP. VIII.

Pompey, after a three months ſiege, took the Temple of Jeruſalem by aſſault, and forbeareth plundering of it. He leſſens the Jews power. He leaveth Scaurus to command his Army; carrieth Ariſtobulus Priſoner to Rome, with Alexander and Antigonus his two ſons, and his two daughters. Alexander maketh his eſcape out of Priſon.

Jeruſalem partly betrayed, partly beſieged by Pompey.

IN the mean time the City of Jeruſalem was divided, for ſome thought good to yield up the City to Pompey; others (that were of Ariſtobulus's faction) counſelled that the gates ſhould be kept ſhut, and preparation for War ſhould be made, becauſe the Romans L detained Ariſtobulus Priſoner. The laſt prevailing, ſeized the Temple: and breaking down the bridge which was betwixt it and the City, reſolved to ſtand on their defence. But the others not only deliver'd the City into Pompey's hands, but the Royal Palace alſo, who ſent Piſo his Lieutenant thither with his Forces to take poſſeſſion thereof, and to plant his Gariſons therein, and to fortifie the houſes near the Temple. Firſt therefore Pompey offer'd the beſieged certain conditions of peace, which when they refus'd, he ſhut them in on every ſide, being in all theſe his endeavors aſſiſted by Hircanus.

Pompey maketh preparation to beſiege the Temple.

Pompey incamped with his Army on the North-ſide of the Temple (which was the eaſieſt to be aſſaulted) on this ſide alſo there were certain high Towers, and a huge Trench, beſides a deep Valley that begirt the Temple. For on the City-ſide there was ſuch Precipices, that M there was no paſſage, the bridge being broken. The Romans wrought vigorouſly in cutting down of Trees to make Bulwarks, which being done, they planted great Machines and Engines that Pompey had cauſed them to bring from Tyre, they threw great ſtone Bullets with them to batter the Temple. The Romans had hardly got their Works accompliſhed, if the ſtrict keeping of the Sabbath had not hinder'd the beſieged to make any oppoſition that day. For the Law permitteth them to defend themſelves againſt their Enemies, being aſſaulted, but not to aſſail them when they intend any other work. Which when the Romans underſtood, they neither gave aſſault, nor proffered skirmiſh on thoſe dayes which we call Sabbaths: but they built their Fortifications and Towers, and planted their Engines, ſo that the next day they were ready to put them in N execution againſt the Jews.

The Jews intermitted not their ſacrifice, notwithſtanding the ſiege. The taking of the Temple.

And hereby it is eaſie to conjecture, how incredible the piety of our Nation is, and how ſtudious and induſtrious it is in obſerving the Divine Laws. For notwithſtanding any preſent or imminent danger, they never deſiſted to offer their ſolemn Sacrifices: twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth hour, the Prieſts offered duly upon the Altar. For when the Temple was taken (in the third month, and on a faſting day, in the hundred ſeventy nine Olympiade, in the year wherein Cajus Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero were Conſuls) the Enemy entred the Temple by force, and kill'd all they met. Yet notwithſtanding all this, the Prieſts ceaſed not to offer their accuſtomed Sacrifice: and neither the hazard of their lives, nor the great number of thoſe that were kill'd, could force them to flie; they held it more convenient for them O to indure all things that might befall them in attending upon the Altar, than to tranſgreſs or vary one jot from their ordinances. And that this may ſeem to be no fable, or praiſe

H praiſe of their diſſembled devotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all thoſe that write the Hiſtories concerning Pompey and his acts, do witneſs no leſs: amongſt the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Livius the Roman Hiſtoriographer, the moſt famous among the reſt. The greateſt of theſe Towers was battered by theſe Engines, and fell, bearing a great Pane of the Wall to the Earth with it, which was the cauſe that the Enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The firſt that aſcended the Wall, was Cornelius Fauſtus, the ſon of Sylla, with his Soldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with thoſe that follow'd him on the other ſide; and through the midſt of the breach did the Centurion Fabius enter with a ſtrong Squadron. The whole circuit was filled with dead bodies, and ſome of the Jews dyed by the Romans ſwords, others I ſlew one another, the reſt caſt themſelves down headlong from the precipices; many likewiſe ſet their houſes on fire, and conſumed themſelves therein, leſt they ſhould behold the executions that were performed by their Enemies. There fell about 12000 Jews, and very few Romans. Abſalom alſo, who was Ariſtobulus's Father-in-law and Uncle, was taken Priſoner. The holineſs of the Temple likewiſe was not a little prophaned.
For whereas before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the Temple, Pompey, and divers others that accompanied him, entred the ſame, and ſaw that which was not lawful to be beheld by any other but the High-Prieſts only. But although he found a Table of gold, and a ſacred Candleſtick, with divers other veſſels and perfumes, in great quantity; and whereas beſides, there was about 2000 Talents of ſilver K in the ſacred Treaſury in the Temple: yet his piety was ſuch that he would touch none of it, neither did he any thing in this occaſion but what was worthy of his ſingular virtue. The next day he commanded thoſe that had the charge of the Temple, to purifie it, and to offer Sacrifices unto God, according to the Law; committing the High-Prieſthood to Hircanus, both becauſe he had been very uſeful in many things, and for having hindred the Jews to join with Ariſtobulus. After this, he beheaded the Authors of this War, and honour'd Fauſtus and the reſt with gifts, ſutable to their valor, for having been the firſt that entred the breach. As for Jeruſalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Jews thoſe Cities they had conquer'd in Cœloſyria, and aſſigning them a proper and peculiar government. After this, he incloſed the Nation within L certain limits, whereas before-time their Dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, he repaired Gadara, that not long before was deſtroyed: all which he performed in favor of Demetrius the Gadarenian, his late ſervant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azot, Jamnia, and Arethuſa, he reſtored them to the ancient Inhabitants thereof, all which were ſcituate in the heart of the Land: Beſides Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the Tower of Straton (Cities ſcituate upon the Sea-coaſts, and ruinated formerly with divers Wars) he ſet at liberty, and annex'd them unto the Province. As for the Tower of Straton, it was magnificently built by Herod, and adorned with Gates and fair Temples, and the name thereof was changed, and called Cæſarea.
Thus Hircanus and Ariſtobulus, through their diſſentions and civil broyles, were the cauſe M of that ſervitude and miſery that fell upon the Jews. For we have loſt our liberty, and have been ſubdu'd by the Romans. Beſides that we have been enforced to ſurrender up thoſe Cities unto the Syrians, which we had formerly conquer'd by force of Arms. And that which is to be lamented, the Romans in a little time have drawn from us more than 10000 Talents: and the Royalty which before-time was an honour reſerved for thoſe that were of the Race of the High-Prieſts, hath been beſtowed on men of mean extraction; whereof we will ſpeak in place convenient. After that Pompey had given Cœlaſyria to Scaurus, from Euphrates to the frontiers of Egypt, with two Legions of the Romans, he went into Cilicia, and from thence drew towards Rome, leading with him Ariſtobulus in bonds, and his children (who were two ſons, and two daughters) one of which called Alexander, eſcaped; and as for Antigonus, (who was the younger) he was led to Rome N with his ſiſters.

Antipater proveth very uſeful to Scaurus in Arabia.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 9.

SCaurus led forth his Army againſt Petra a City in Arabia; and the wayes being ſo bad that he could hardly get to it, he ſpoilt all the Countrey round about; his Army was preſſed with famine, Antipater, by the order of Hircanus, furniſh'd him with Corn, and all other neceſſaries, out of Jewry: who being ſent Ambaſſador to Aretas from Scaurus, perſuaded him to contribute a certain ſum of ſilver to ſecure his Country from being pillaged, and he himſelf alſo became pledge for 300 Talents. This done, Scaurus B finiſhed the War, according to his deſire, and with no leſs contentment to Aretas and his Country.

Alexander, Ariſtobulus's ſon, armeth in Judea, and fortifieth the Towns. Gabinius overthrows him in battel, and beſiegeth him in the Caſtle of Alexandrion. Alexander delivereth it up to him, with ſeveral other places. Gabinius eſtabliſheth Hircanus High-Prieſt in his room, and reduceth Judea to be governed under the Nobility.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. al. 11. Caſtles fortified.

NOt long after this, Alexander, Ariſtobulus's ſon, made divers inroads into Jewry; for C which cauſe Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (beſides other things worthy of memory which he atchieved) he led forth his Army againſt Alexander, for that Hircanus had not as yet ſufficient power to reſiſt him, being otherwiſe exerciſed in building the Walls of Jeruſalem that were beaten down by Pompey; notwithſtanding the Romans that were in Jewry hindred him from performing the ſame. This Alexander travelling through the whole Countrey, aſſembled divers Jews; ſo that in ſhort time having gotten together 10000 Foot, and 1500 Horſe, with good ammunition, he fortified the Caſtle of Alexandrion near to the City of Coreas. He fortified Machæron alſo in the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth againſt him, having ſent before him D Marcus Antonius, accompanied with other Commanders, who recruited the Romans with their coming, and the Jews that were under their obedience, whoſe Captains were Pitholaus and Malichus. They took alſo thoſe Allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage they came againſt Alexander. Gabinius alſo ſeconded them with his Troops. Hereupon Alexander drew nearer with his Army towards Jeruſalem, where giving battel to the Romans, he loſt about 3000 of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away Priſoners. After this, Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and invited thoſe that held it to yield, promiſing them pardon for the Rebellion they had begun. And many of his Enemies having encamped themſelves before the Fort, the Romans charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius behaved himſelf very valiantly, having killed ſeve- E ral of the Enemy with his own hand; Gabinius left a part of his Army in that place, to the end that during the ſiege thereof, he might go and viſit the Countrey of Judea: he commanded therefore all thoſe Cities which in his journey he found either deſolate or deſtroyed, to be repaired; for that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Mariſſa and Gaza, with divers others, were new built: ſo that through the obedience that was given to Gabinius's command, it came to paſs that the Cities were ſafely inhabited, which had layen long time before deſart.

Gabinius cauſeth divers Cities in Jewry to be repaired that were defaced.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 11. al. 12. Alexandrion, and other Caſtles razed.

And after Gabinius had behaved himſelf in this manner in the Countrey, he returned to Alexandrion. Whil'ſt he thus inſiſted about the ſiege, Alexander ſent Ambaſſadors unto him, demanding pardon for his offences, and reſtoring into his hands the Caſtles of F Hircania and Machæron, and finally that of Alexandrion, which Gabinius levelled with the ground. And whereas Alexander's mother came unto him (who favoured the Roman faction, and whoſe husband and children were kept in Priſon in Rome) ſhe obtained all that which ſhe requeſted at his hands: and after he had carefully and friendly diſpoſed of her affairs, he led Hircanus to Jeruſalem, to take charge of the Temple and Prieſthood. He ordained alſo five judgment ſeats and places of ſeſſion, and divided the Province into anſwerable parts: for the one anſwered in Jeruſalem, the ſecond at Gadara, the third in Amatha, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Saphora, which is a Town of Galilee. By this means the Jews were deliver'd of their Monarchy, and lived under an Ariſtocracy, or government of the Nobility. G

BUt Ariſtobulus flying from Rome, returneth to Jewry, and reſolved to rebuild the Caſtle
I of Alexandrion, which not long ſince was ruinated. Againſt him Gabinius ſent out certain Men of War with their Captains, namely, Siſenna, Antonius and Servilius, both to keep him from the poſſeſſion of the place, and to apprehend and ſurprize him likewiſe. For many Jews reſorted unto him, being drawn thereunto by the ancient Reputation that he had, who deſired likewiſe revolutions and changes. Pitholaus alſo (who was eſtabliſhed Lieutenant-General in Jeruſalem) of his own accord came unto him, with a 1000 Men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the moſt part were not ſufficiently furniſh'd with Arms; for Ariſtobulus making his reckoning to ſeize Machæron, diſmiſſed thoſe followers of his that were diſarmed, and were unapt for any execution, and retaining only 8000 well armed Men, he marched thither. But the Romans K purſuing and overtaking him, fought deſperately with him, and overcame both him and his; notwithſtanding their valiant reſiſtance, about 5000 of them were killed, and the reſt diſperſed, wandring here and there, where they could beſt ſecure themſelves: but Ariſtobulus fled to Macharon with more than a 1000 followers, and fortified the place. And though his affairs had very ſlender ſucceſs, yet he loſt not his hope; but after he had endured the ſiege ſome two dayes, and received many Wounds, he was taken Priſoner, and with his ſon Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away Captive by Gabinius Such was Ariſtobulus's fortune, that he was ſent Priſoner back again to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had been King and High-Prieſt three years and ſix months.
A man in that dignity both magnificent and magnanimous, yet the Senate ſent back his L children (according to the tenor of Gabinius's letters) who had promiſed their delivery to their mother, when ſhe ſurrendred the Caſtles into his hands: whereupon they returned into Jewry. But Gabinius, intending to make War againſt the Parthians, and having already paſt Euphrates, changed his reſolution, and determined to return into Egypt, and re-eſtabliſh Ptolomey, as it is declared in another place. In this expedition alſo he was ſupplied by Antipater's means, with Victuals, Money and Ammunition; and by his advice, thoſe Jews that inhabit Peluſium (who kept as it were the very entry into Egypt) were reconciled to him. When Gabinius returned back out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of Tumult and Rebellion. For Alexander, Ariſtobulus's ſon, taking once more poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, cauſed divers Jews from day to day to revolt; and foraging the M Countrey with a huge Army, he ſlew all thoſe Romans whom he met withall, and beſieged all thoſe that fled into the mount Garizim. Gabinius ſeeing the affairs of Syria in that ſtate, ſent Antipater before him unto them, to appeaſe theſe commotions; and to cure them of their phrenzy, and if it were poſſible to reduce them to a better mind: for Antipater was really a very diſcreet man. He repairing unto them, moderated divers of them, and brought them under obedience: but it was impoſſible for him to reconcile Alexander; for he having 30000 Men with him, came forth to meet with Gabinius, with whom he fought, and was overcome, with the loſs of 10000 of his Men, near unto the Mount Itabyr.

Craſſus robbeth the Temple of Jeruſalem. He is defeated by the Parthians. Caſſius retireth into Syria, and defends it againſt the Parthians. Antipater's great credit, his marriage, and his children.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 13. al. 14. Marcus Craſſus in his expedition againſt the Parthians, taketh the Treaſure out of the Temple of Jeruſalem.

C*Raſſus* intending to make War againſt the Parthians, came into Jewry, and took away with him the ſacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the ſum of 2000 Talents:) He ſpoilt the Temple alſo of all the gold that was in it, to the ſum of 8000 Talents. He took away a wedge of ſolid gold, to the weight of 300 pounds, which pound, amongſt the Jews, containeth two pounds and an half. He that deliver'd him this wedge was a Prieſt, and the Keeper of the ſacred Treaſure, call'd Eleazar, who gave him the ſame upon no malicious intent (for he was a virtuous and juſt man;) but whereas he had the cuſtody of the Tapeſtries of the Temple committed to his hands (which were both admirable to behold, by reaſon of their beauty and worth, and withall were in like ſort tied and faſtned to this beam) and perceiving that Craſſus uſed all means to gather all the money he could, he fearing leſt he ſhould have ſeized on all the ornaments of the Temple, gave him this beam for a Ranſom to redeem all the reſt: binding him, upon the delivery thereof, by an oath, that he ſhould not take any thing away that was in the Temple, but ſhould content himſelf with that onely piece of great eſteem and value which he gave him. This beam was incloſed in another hollow beam of wood, ſo that no man knew thereof but only Eleazar. Craſſus therefore took his beam, as if he determined to leave all other things in the Temple; yet notwithſtanding he falſified his oath, and carried away whatſoever was therein. Neither is it to be wondred at, that there was ſo great Riches found in our Temple, ſince all thoſe Jews that were diſperſed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all thoſe that feared God (both in Aſia and Europe) for a long time offered their Preſents in that place. The greatneſs and multitude whereof wanteth no teſtimony: neither is it feigned in way of oſtentation, but divers other Hiſtorians make mention thereof; and, amongſt the reſt, Strabo of Cappadocia, ſpeaketh after this manner.

Craſſus breaketh his oath. Whence the Temple of Jeruſalem grew ſo rich. Strabo of Cappadocia.

Mithridates ſent Men into the Iſle of Coos, to fetch from thence the money that Queen Cleopatra had laid up there, and 800 Talents of the Jews. But we have no publick money, but that which is dedicated unto God. It is therefore a thing moſt manifeſt, that the Jews that inhabit Aſia, tranſported this money into Coos for fear of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they who inhabited Judea, and had a City ſo ſtrong, and a Temple ſo well fortified, ſhould ſend their money to Coos. Neither is it credible likewiſe, that the Jews remaining in Alexandria ſhould do it, for that they feared not to fall into danger through this War of Mithridates.

The ſame Strabo alſo ſaith in another place, That when Sylla paſſed thorow Greece to make War againſt Mithridates and Lucullus, he ſent Men unto Cyrene, which was troubled by reaſon of the mutinies of our Nation, wherewith the whole world was filled. There were four ſorts of people in the City of the Cyrenians: one of them were Citizens, the ſecond were Labourers, the third were Strangers, and the fourth were Jews, who at this preſent are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place throughout the world; neither was there any Nation that inhabit the ſame, wherein theſe have not ſet foot and fortified. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being under the ſubjection of the ſame Princes, and divers other Nations, conformed themſelves to their cuſtoms, and nouriſhed aſſemblies of Jews, and advanced them, and more and more uſed the Jewiſh ordinances. It appeareth therefore that there was a Colony of Jews in Egypt. A great part likewiſe of the City of Alexandria is aſſigned to the Jewiſh Nation. They have likewiſe their peculiar Magiſtrate, who governeth the people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordinances, as if he governed in his own Commonwealth. By this means this Nation hath fortified and eſtabliſhed it ſelf in Egypt, for that the Jews had their original amongſt the Egyptians; and for that Judea is near unto Egypt, from whence the Jews are deſcended: And as for Cyrene, they have entred it, in that it bordereth with that Countrey which is under the obedience of the Egyptians, (in like manner as Judea doth) or rather for that in times paſt it appertained to the ſame Kingdom. Thus far Strabo.

Craſſus ſlain in Parthia. Caſſius reſiſteth the Parthians.

After that Craſſus had diſpoſed all things according to his own pleaſure, he removed and marched forward to make War againſt the Parthians, where both he and all his Army were deſtroyed (as is declared in another place) As for Caſſius, he retired himſelf into Syria, and took poſſeſſion thereof, to the end he might affront the Parthians; who being proud

A proud of their victory lately obtain'd, made excurſions ſo far: and coming to Tyre, he at length arrived in Judea, where upon his firſt entrance he took the City of Tarichæa, and led away from thence 30000 Priſoners. He put Pitholaus alſo to death, for having maintain'd Ariſtobulus's faction. All which he did by Antipater's procurement and perſuaſion, who was in great credit with him, and who alſo at that time was highly eſteem'd amongſt the Idumæans, amongſt whom he married his Wife, who was deſcended of one of the moſt famous families of Arabia, her name was Cypron, by whom he had theſe four ſons, Phaſælus and Herod (who after was made King) Joſeph and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome. This Antipater alſo made alliance with other Princes, and eſpecially with the Arabian, to whoſe cuſtody he committed his children, during the time B he made War againſt Ariſtobulus. But Caſſius gather'd another Army, and marched towards Euphrates, to go againſt the Parthians, as it is ſpecified and recorded by other Writers.

E AFter Pompey's death, and that Victory which Cæſar had obtained againſt him, Antipater (Governor of Judea by the commandment of Hircanus) was very uſeful unto Cæſar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamenian brought him certain ſupplies, and could not bring them on, by reaſon of an arm of Nilus paſſing through Peluſium; but was conſtrained to ſtay at Aſcalon: Antipater came unto him, and brought with him 3000 Soldiers, and dealt ſo with the Princes of Arabia to aſſociate them with Cæſar, that by his means, all they of Syria gave him their aſſiſtance, and never altered their affection that they bear unto Cæſar. Theſe were Jamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolomey his ſon; and Tholomæus, the ſon of Sohemus, dwelling on the mount of Libanus, and well nigh all F the Cities. Mithridates being departed from Syria, came to Peluſium, where being repulſed and excluded by the Citizens, he beſieged the City. Antipater in this War behav'd himſelf valiantly; and after he had beaten down a pane of the Wall, he firſt of all ſet forward to enter the City. Whil'ſt Peluſium was in this eſtate, the Jews that inhabited Egypt in the Countrey of Onias, would neither grant paſſage to Antipater, nor Mithridates, that marched towards Cæſar. But Antipater, who was of their Nation, perſuaded them to take their parts, ſhewing them the Letter of the High-Prieſt Hircanus, in which he invited them to be friends unto Cæſar, and exhorted them to furniſh his Army with whatſoever they ſtood in need of; ſo that ſeeing that Antipater and the High-Prieſt were agreed together, they ſubmitted themſelves. Mithridates commendeth Antipater's ſervice to Cæſar.

WHen he was come to a place called Delta, he fought with the Enemies in a place which is called the Camp of the Jews: in which battel, Mithridates led the right Wing, and Antipater the left. Being hotly engaged, the Wing that Mithridates commanded, began to give ground, and was like to have been utterly routed, had not Antipater (running with his Soldiers along the River ſide) obtained the upper hand of his Enemies, by putting the Egyptians that were Conquerors to flight, and reſtored Mithridates. And purſued them ſo far, that he got their Camp, and called Mithridates to take part of the prey that he had recover'd from the fugitive Enemy. Mithridates loſt 800 of his men in this battel, but Antipater loſt but 50. Mithridates wrote hereof unto Cæſar, and ſhew'd him that Antipater was the cauſe of the victory, and of their preſervation: ſo that Cæſar ever afterward highly commended him, and in all his War made uſe of Antipater in his moſt dangerous attempts, ſo that Antipater was grievouſly wounded in divers fights, and behav'd himſelf bravely.

Antigonus, Ariſtobulus's ſon, accuſeth Hircanus and Antipater before Cæſar. Antipater's anſwer to his objection. Antipater made Governor over Judea.

Now after that the War was finiſhed, Cæſar came by Sea into Syria, and beſtowed great honours as well on Hircanus, to whom he confirmed the High-Prieſthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free Citizen of Rome, and granted him all other priviledges belonging thereunto. Divers report that Hircanus himſelf was in this War, and that he came into Egypt, which Strabo the Cappadocian affirmeth, ſpeaking after this manner, by the authority of Aſinius; after that Mithridates had entred Egypt, with Hircanus the High-Prieſt of the Jews. The ſame Strabo in another place ſpeaketh thus by the authority of Hypſicrates, That Mithridates went alone; and that Antipater was ſent for into Aſcalon, where he prepared 3000 Soldiers, becauſe he was Governor of Judea, and encouraged the reſt of the Governors; and Hircanus the High-Prieſt alſo had a part in this War. Thus far Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Ariſtobulus's ſon, to Cæſar, lamenting his father, who had been poyſoned in his ſervice, and how his brother had his head ſtruck off by Scipio, beſeeching him to have compaſſion of him, being thruſt out of his Kingdom. He accuſed Hircanus and Antipater alſo, for their tyrannical and violent government over their Nation, and injuries offered to himſelf. Antipater being at that time preſent, anſwered for himſelf to thoſe points wherein he was accuſed; declaring, That Antigonus and his friends were factious and ſeditious men, as for himſelf how much he had done, and how many exploits he had executed in the late War, whereof Cæſar himſelf was a witneſs. Moreover, he avowed that Ariſtobulus had been juſtly led twice into captivity to Rome, for that he had been alwayes an Enemy, and no wayes well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, he averred that he was juſtly puniſhed by him for his Roberies, and not injuriouſly and outragiouſly, as he pretended. After that Antipater had ſpoken to this effect, Cæſar declared Hircanus High-Prieſt, and gave Antipater any government whatſoever he liked beſt: who, according to his choice, was appointed Governor of Judea.

the new Tragedies are play'd. Likewiſe in the ſolemnities Panathean and Eleuſynian, and at the publick Exerciſes: We will alſo that the Governors provide, that all that which we have adviſed for the honour, favour, affection and good will towards this man, as he hath well deserved, be diligently performed, to the end that thereby it may appear how our Nation rewards, and entertains ſuch men that are virtuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart unto him, may encourage others to be the better affected towards us. It is likewiſe decreed, that amongſt all the Athenians there be certain Ambaſſadors choſen, who ſhall bear this Decree unto him, and exhort
L him to do whatſoever is profitable for our common good, ſeeing himſelf ſo much honour'd by us.
Let this ſuffice to expreſs the honours beſtow'd on Hircanus by the People of Rome, and the Citizens of Athens.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 18.

Cæſar departeth out of Syria.

Antipater pacifieth all occaſion of commotion in Judea.

After that Cæſar had given order for the affairs of Syria, he returned back by Sea.
And as ſoon as Antipater had accompanied Cæſar out of Syria, he returned into Judea, and ſuddenly built up the Walls of Jeruſalem, which Pompey had beaten down; and in riding a Circuit about the Countrey, he pacified the troubles not only by threatnings, but by good advice alſo, which he gave every one to live in peace; aſſuring them, That if they ſubmitted themſelves to Hircanus their Prince, they ſhould live happily, and enjoy their poſſeſſions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to advance themſelves by any new commotion, M (ſuppoſing by that means to benefit themſelves) they ſhould feel, that inſtead of a Governor, they had a Maſter; and inſtead of a King, they ſhould find Hircanus a Tyrant; and inſtead of the Romans and Cæſar to be their Governors, they ſhould find them to be their moſt hateful Enemies: for they would not ſuffer, that any thing ſhould be altered that they had eſtabliſhed. By theſe, and ſuch like admonitions, he kept and continued all the Country in peace.

Sextus Cæſar Governor of Syria.

The form of Phaſælus's government.

Antipater, notwithſtanding his high authority, was alwayes faithful to Hircanus.

Antipater winneth the Romans hearts by Hircanus's money, and draweth the Jews into hatred.

The Jews accuſe Antipater and Herod before Hircanus.

Herod called in queſtion appeareth with a great train.

Sextus Cæſar writeth to Hircanus to diſcharge Herod.

A*Ntipater* perceiving that Hircanus was ſlow and idle, he declared and appointed Phaſælus, his eldeſt ſon, Governor over Jeruſalem, and the Countrey thereabout: As for Herod (who was very young, for he was not at that time above 15 years old) he committed Galilee unto his charge; who, although young in years, yet he was ripe in courage and conduct, which he witneſſed in apprehending Ezechias, who was the chief of thoſe Thieves, who ranged over all Syria; he put him to death, with divers of his Complices. Which act of his got him eſteem and credit among the Syrians: for by that means he freed their Countrey of all thoſe Robbers, according as they deſir'd. He was therefore praiſed thorow the Villages and Cities for this action, as he that had given them peace, and aſſured poſſeſſion of their Eſtates. For this cauſe he was made known to Sextus Cæſar, who was Uncle to Cæſar the Great. Furthermore, his brother Phaſælus was encouraged to follow his noble actions, and inforced himſelf to obtain no leſs reputation than he had; for which cauſe, he ſtrove to get the good will of the common People in Jeruſalem, and govern'd the City with ſuch diſcretion, that he acted all things to every mans content, and abuſed not his power to any private mans injury: which was the cauſe that Antipater was honour'd by the whole Nation, with no leſs reſpect than if he had been their only Lord and Soveraign. Yet did not this eminency of eſtate ſo far diſtract him, that he forgot the love and duty he ought to Hircanus (as in ſuch like occaſions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithſtanding divers of the greateſt amongſt the Jews (ſeeing Antipater and his ſons ſo highly advanced both by the publick favor of the whole Nation, as alſo by the Revenues that they drew both out of Jewry, as alſo by the employment of Hircanus's money) were grievouſly incenſed againſt them. For Antipater had made friendſhip with the Emperors of Rome, and having perſuaded Hircanus to ſend them money, he had appropriated the ſame unto himſelf, ſending it not in Hircanus's name, but in his own; which though Hircanus knew, yet he was not moved therewith, but rather well contented. But that which moſt of all terrifi'd the Princes of the Jews, was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who govern'd after a tyrannical manner: For this cauſe they addreſs'd themſelves to Hircanus, and accus'd Antipater openly. How long (ſaid they) will you diſſemble, and wink at thoſe things that are daily practiſed? See you not that Antipater and his ſons, poſſeſs, in effect, the Royal Power and Authority of the Kingdom, and that you have only the name? Aſſure your ſelf that you are not out of danger, in contemning thus both your ſelf and your Kingdom. For Antipater and his ſons are not now your Subſtitutes, neither intend they your profit, or your Countries good (whatſoever your opinion is of them) they are publickly acknowledg'd Lords and Maſters. For Herod (Antipater*'s ſon*) hath already put Ezechias and his Confederates to death, and thereby tranſgreſſed our Laws, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked ſoever he be) except he be firſt of all condemned to death by the Council: and notwithſtanding this, he hath been ſo bold, as to do juſtice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew angry (for their mothers, whom Herod had ſlain, had incenſed him by their continual Exclamations in the Temple, exhorting the King and People to call Herod to account before the Council, of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus moved by theſe Women, called Herod to anſwer unto thoſe accuſations which were objected againſt him. Who made his appearance, forewarned by his father not to preſent himſelf after the manner of a private perſon, but well attended and accompanied to withſtand all inconveniencies. After he had taken order for the affairs in Galilee (according as he thought fit) and that he himſelf was ſufficiently accompanied to make his Voyage, with ſuch a Guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leave himſelf unſecured in danger, he reſorted to Jeruſalem. Moreover, Sextus Cæſar, Governor of Syria, wrote unto Hircanus to abſolve him, adding threats to his perſuaſions, if ſo be he ſhould perform the contrary; which gave Hircanus occaſion to deliver Herod in deſpite of the Council: the rather alſo, for that he loved him as intirely as his ſon. Therefore when Herod preſented himſelf before the Council with

H with his retinue, all of them were aſtoniſhed, and none of thoſe that accuſed him in his abſence, durſt open their mouths to ſpeak one word, but all of them kept ſilence, not knowing what do. Now whilſt they ſtood upon theſe terms, a certain man, called Sameas, who was of upright dealing, and for this cauſe was not daunted, aroſe and ſpake to this purpoſe, Dread King, and you honourable aſſiſtants, I could never yet remember, that ever any man which was called in queſtion to defend his cauſe before us, hath appeared in this equipage; and I ſuppoſe that none of you can ſay, that the like hath ever happened: but whoſoever cometh into this place to receive judgment, he preſented himſelf with humility and fear, with a countenance prepared to implore mercy, having his hair long, and his garment black: but this gallant Herod, accuſed of murther (and this for occaſion called before I us) who could imagine that he ſhould appear before us in a purple robe, having his hairs trimmed; and beſides that, a guard of armed men about him? with an intent that if we condemn him, according to Law, he may put us to death without Law, that after he hath violated all right, he may eſcape and ſave himſelf. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, than of the Law: but I accuſe both you and the King, who have given him ſuch aſſurance. Know therefore, that there is a ſoveraign God, that will one day puniſh both you and the King, and him whom you will deliver by the Kings means. And ſo fell it out as he had ſaid: For as ſoon as Herod had obtained the Kingdom, he put all thoſe of the council to death, and Hircanus himſelf likewiſe, onely Sameas was exempted: for he eſteemed him mightily, becauſe of his wiſdom and K juſtice, and becauſe when the City was beſieged by Herod and Soſius, Sameas perſwaded the people to receive Herod, telling them, that by reaſon of their ſins and offences, they could not eſcape from him; whereof we will ſpeak in time and place. Hircanus perceiving that the Judges were inclined to condemn Herod, deferred the ſentence till the next day, and ſent ſecretly unto Herod, counſelling him to flie out of the City, aſſuring him, that there was no other means to ſave his life. Thus he poſted to Damaſcus (as if he had fled from the Kings preſence) and preſenting himſelf before Sextus Cæſar, after he had aſſured his perſon, he reſolved with himſelf, that if the council ſhould call him once more to anſwer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the council was diſpleaſed with Hircanus, and endeavoured to perſwade him, L that all theſe things tended to his deſtruction: which he perceived, yet knew not what to do, he was ſo negligent and void of foreſight. When Sextus had made Herod Governor of Cæloſyria (which eſtate he ſold unto him for ready money) Hircanus was afraid leſt Herod ſhould make War againſt him: neither paſſed there long time before the effect grew anſwerable to his fear. For Herod marched forth againſt him, with a great Army, ſuppoſing himſelf to be much wronged by the aſſignation he had ſent him, and in that he was ſummoned to give a reaſon of his actions before the council. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phaſælus came forth againſt him, to hinder his approach towards Jeruſalem, ſtriving to appeaſe his fury, and counſelling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himſelf that he had threatned and affrighted Hircanus, he ſhould not attempt M any thing further againſt him, who had raiſed him to that high degree. They told him alſo, that it became him not onely to remember that he was cited to anſwer, but that he was abſolved alſo, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreover, that he ought to think, that God governeth the ballance of War, and that the iſſues of battels are uncertain, and for that cauſe he ought not to expect the victory, if he made War againſt the King who was his familiar, and from whom he had received far more kindneſs, and no diſpleaſure: who though he made ſome appearance and ſhadow of ſeverity, touching the accuſation intended againſt him, yet notwithſtanding, it proceeded not ſo much from him, as from his evil counſellers. Herod in ſome ſort pacified by theſe perſwaſions, obeyed his father, ſuppoſing that it ſufficed him, in regard of his N future hopes, that he had given the people ſo large a teſtimony of his power. This was the ſtate of the Jews at that time. But Cæſar arriving at Rome, prepared himſelf to ſet ſail towards Affrick, with an intent to make War againſt Scipio and Cato. Hircanus ſent Embaſſadors to him, beſeeching him to confirm the amity and alliance that he had with him. But now I think it very convenient to declare all the Prerogatives and alliances that the Romans and their Emperors made with thoſe of our Nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Aſia and Europe have been well affected towards us, and have made great account of our valor and fidelity. And although divers men ill affected towards us, believe not that which the Macedonians and Perſians have written of us, becauſe the ſame matters are not extant in all places, neither ſet down in publick writings, O but onely amongſt our ſelves and ſome Barbarians; yet it is manifeſt that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romans which are manifeſtly affixed in publick places in Cities; as likewiſe at this preſent they are engraven in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Julius Cæſar in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared red unto the Jews that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein, A and to the intent that theſe things may more manifeſtly appear, I will propoſe the decrees of the Senate, and of Julius Cæſar, made in the favor of Hircanus and our Nation.

Caius Julius Cæſar Emperor, High-Prieſt, Dictator the ſecond Time, To the Governors, Senate, and People of the Sidonians, Health: If you are well, we are in health, both our ſelves and our Army.

I have ſent you the copy of an inſcription, regiſtred in favor of Hircanus, Alexander's ſon, High-Prieſt, and Prince of the Jews, to the end it may be placed among publick B monuments: and my will is, that it be engraven in a table of braſs, both in Greek and Latine letters; the Tenour whereof is this that followeth: Becauſe Hircanus, Alexanders ſon, the Jew, both at this preſent, as alſo heretofore, as well in Peace as in War, hath expreſſed his fidelity towards us and our eſtate, as divers Commanders of our Armies yield teſtimony of him, and for that in our laſt Alexandrine War, he ſeconded us in the battel with Fifteen hundred Men; and having been ſent by us to Mithridates, hath ſurmounted all thoſe of his Company in valor. For theſe cauſes my will is, That Hircanus, Alexanders ſon and his ſucceſſors, be Princes of the Jews*: and further, that they continue always in the High-Prieſthood, according to the ordinance and cuſtom of their Countrey: and that both he and his children be our aſſociates; and be inrolled likewiſe, as our chiefeſt friends: and all* C that which appertaineth to the Prieſthood, according to the ordinances of the Jews, be attributed to him and his, and if there happen any difference touching the diſcipline of the Jews, our pleaſure is, that it be determined by him. And as for the munitions of War, and the money to be levied for the entertainment of Souldiers, we think it not fit that they ſhould be charged. The Decrees made and granted by Caius Cæſar being Conſul, are theſe:

That the ſons of Hircanus be Princes over the Nation of the Jews, and enjoy the places granted unto them. That the High-Prieſt and Prince of the Jews give favor and aid unto thoſe that are offended. That Ambaſſadors be ſent to Hircanus, the ſon of Alexander, High-Prieſt of the Jews, to treat of amity and aſſociation with us. That a brazen table be erected in the Capitol: and likewiſe at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Aſcalon in the Temples, wherein ſhall be engraven the Contents hereof, in Roman and Greek letters, to the end, that all D the Treaſurers that are in the Cities, and all other Magiſtrates may by this our Decree underſtand, that they are our friends, and that their Ambaſſadors be entertained with kindneſs and preſents, and that theſe Edicts be ſent into all places.

Caius Cæſar Emperor, Dictator, Conſul, for the good of the Senate and people of Rome, hath granted to the honour, vertue, and humanity of Hircanus the ſon of Alexander, that both he and his children ſhall be High-Prieſts in Jeruſalem, and of the whole Nation according to the Rites and Cuſtoms whereby their anceſtors have enjoyed the Prieſthood.

Caius Cæſar, Conſul the fifth time, hath ordained that they ſhall inhabit Jeruſalem, and build again the Walls of the City; and that Hircanus (Alexanders ſon, the High-Prieſt and Prince of the Jews) ſhall govern as he thinks fit, and that every ſecond year of their tribute, E there be a part deducted out of the rent they owe, and that they be exempt from all other impoſitions and tributes.

Caius Cæſar, twice Emperor, hath ordained, that the Jews ſhall contribute every year for their Cities, except Joppa; he acquitteth them alſo every ſeventh year (which they call the year of the reſt) becauſe that therein, they neither reap nor ſow, neither gather the fruit of Trees. His further pleaſure is, That every ſecond year, they bring their Tributes unto Sidon, which ſhall be the fourth part of that which ſhall be ſown; and beſides this, that they pay the tenths to Hircanus and his ſons, which they have paid unto their Predeceſſors unto this day. Commanding that no man, whether he be Governor, Captain, or Embaſſador, or F any other whatſoever he be, levy Souldiers within the Countrey of Judæa, or draw any therehence: neither exact any money, whether it be for Gariſons in Winter, or for any other cauſe, but that the Jews be exempt from all troubles in all places, and enjoy all that which they have had, bought, and poſſeſſed. It is our pleaſure alſo, that the City of Joppe be under their government (which they have ever enjoyed ſince the beginning of their league with the Romans.) We further grant, that Hircanus, Alexanders, ſon and his children, receive the tribute of that City (as well by them that till the land, as by the gates, entries, and cuſtoms of merchandizes that are tranſported unto Sidon) Twenty thouſand, ſix hundred ſeventy and five buſhels every year, exempting the ſeventh year, which is called the year of reſt, wherein they neither labour nor gather any fruit of the Trees. It is the Senates pleaſure alſo, that Hircanus and the Jews have thoſe Villages which are in the great champain, G which he and his predeceſſors have poſſeſſed, and that with the like intereſts that they held them before this; and that the ſame cuſtoms continue therein, whereby they held and governed them.

H them. Their will is likewiſe, That the ſame Laws which have from the beginning been reſpectively obſerved between the Jews, and their High-Prieſts, be continued; and whatſoever benefits were granted them, by conſent of the Senate and People of Rome. Moreover it ſhall be lawful for thoſe of Lydda, to uſe the ſame Rites and Priviledges alſo. And as touching the demains, places, and habitations that have appertained to the Kings of Syria and Phœnicia, by the gift made unto them at ſuch time as they were allied to the Romans: the Senate (I ſay) ordaineth, That Hircanus the High-Prieſt and Prince of the Jews poſſeſs the ſame. It is lawful alſo for Hircanus and his ſons, and their Ambaſſadors ſent by them, to behold the tiltings and gladiators, and to ſit among the Senators, and that at all times, wherein they ſhall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the Maſter of the Horſe, they I may have free entrance; and that within ten dayes at the moſt they receive their anſwer, if there be any Decree ratified by the Senate.

The year of the World, 3922. before Chriſt's Nativity, 42.

Caius Cæſar, Emperor, the fourth time Conſul, and the fifth time Dictator for the term of life, hath ratified theſe things, as touching Hircanus the ſon of Alexander, the High-Prieſt and Prince of the Jews: Becauſe that the Generals, my Predeceſſors, have witneſſed as well in the Provinces, as before the Senate and People of Rome, both of the good deſerts of Hircanus High-Prieſt and Prince of the Jews, and that Nation alſo, toardsw us and our State; and whereas both the Senate and People of Rome have gratified them for the ſame: we think it convenient alſo to have the ſame recorded, and to give order, that K Hircanus and his ſons may be remunerated by the Senate, and People of Rome, according to the meaſure of their loyalties and good deſerts.

Julius Caius Cæſar, Roman Conſul, To the Governors, Senate and People of Patras Health: The Jews are come unto us to Delos, with ſome of the Colonies of their Countrey-men, in the preſence of your Ambaſſadors, and aſſure us of a Decree made by you, whereby you forbid them the practice and ancient uſe of their ſacrifices and oblations: I think it not fit that you make any ſuch Decrees againſt our friends, and aſſociates; neither that you forbid them to live according to their faſhions and cuſtoms; or to employ their purſes together in ſupplying their feaſts and ſacrifices; ſince in Rome it ſelf they are not interdicted or forbidden to perform the ſame. For at ſuch time as Caius Cæſar Conſul, had prohibited by Edict, That in celebrating the Bacchanals, no one ſhould dance about the City; yet were the L Jews alone exempted from this inhibition: and neither have they been prohibited to contribute, neither to banquet together My ſelf alſo in like caſe, in the defence I have made to forbid all other ſocieties, have excepted the Jews therein, and have given them leave to aſſemble and demean themſelves according to the cuſtoms, ceremonies, and ordinances of their Countrey: If therefore you have made any ſuch Decrees againſt our friends and aſſociates, you ſhall do well to diſanul them, by reaſon of the vertue of the Jews, and the forwardneſs they have proteſted in performance of our ſervice.

After Caius Cæſar*'s death, the Conſuls,* Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolobella, aſſembled the Senate, and having brought in Hircanus's Embaſſadors, they declared their requeſt, and contracted amity with them: The Senate likewiſe ordained, that each thing ſhould M be granted them that they required. And Dolobella having received Hircanus's Letters, ſent them throughout all Aſia, to Epheſus (which is the Metropolitan City of Aſia*) in theſe* The General Dolobella to the Princes, Senate, and People of Epheſus, Health: terms: [The General or Emperor Dolobella; (this word Emperor was in thoſe times a title of honour conferred on thoſe Generals who had obtained ſome great Victory.] Alexander the ſon of Theodore, Embaſſador to Hircanus, the High-Prieſt and Prince of the Jews, hath given us to underſtand, that his Subjects cannot go to Wars, becauſe it is not lawful for them to bear Arms, nor travel on the Sabbath day; as alſo for that they may not ſeek for their victuals and other neceſſaries on that day, according to the cuſtom of their Countrey: for this cauſe I grant them exemption from the War, as my Predeceſſors have done; permitting them N to uſe the ceremonies and rites of their Countrey, aſſembling themſelves to make their oblations and ſacrifices, as their laws and cuſtoms require, in contributing to the offering of the ſacrifices in the Temple. And my will is, That you write to this effect to every City of the Province. See here how Dolobella honoured Hircanus when heſent his Embaſſadors unto him.

There are beſides theſe many other Edicts and Ordinances made to this purpoſe, by the ſame Generals, and by the Roman Senate, in favor of Hircanus and our Nation, and ſome O other Cities. In like ſort there were divers Decrees and writs ſent unto the Governors and Rulers of the Provinces, concerning our Priviledges: all which may be eaſily believed by thoſe that ſhall read our Hiſtory, with no prejudicate opinion, if they conſider thoſe that we have here inſerted. For we have ſhewed more expreſs and lively A teſtimonies of the friendſhip that we have had with the Romans, and ſuch as at this day are affixed to Pillars, and engraven in Tables of Braſs on the Capitol; and that hereafter ſhall remain affixed for ever: For which cauſe, I have thought it to be a frivolous and unneceſſary matter to inſert all in this place; and I think that there is not any man of ſo ſiniſter judgment, that will not believe how much we have been eſteemed by the Romans, as they have given teſtimonies by divers Decrees publiſhed in our behalf; neither may any man ſuppoſe that we lie, conſidering the truth of that which we publiſh.

•Thus have we ſufficiently declared the amity and league that in time paſt we have had with the Romans. About this time it came to paſs, that the eſtate of Syria was B ſore troubled upon the occaſion that enſueth: Cæcilius Baſſus, one of Pompeys followers, laid an ambuſh for Sextus Cæſar, and ſlew him, and ſeiſing upon his Army, uſurped the Government: Whereby there aroſe great War near Apamea. For Cæſars Captains marched out againſt Cæcilius, with great force both of Foot and Horſe, to whom Antipater ſent his ſons with forces to ſecond them (in remembrance of the benefits he had received at Cæſars hands) ſuppoſing it to be an act of juſtice, that the murtherer ſhould be puniſhed for his ſo hainous offence. Now whereas this War continued a long time, Marcus came and ſucceeded Sextus. And Cæſar was ſlain by Caſſius and Brutus in the midſt of the Senate, after he had commanded three years, and ſix months, as it is expreſſed in another place. C

CHAP. XVIII.

Caſſius cometh from Syria, draweth Seven hundred Talents out of Judæa. Herod gains his favor. Malichus*'s ingratitude towards* Antipater.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 20. Caſſius cometh into Syria, and exacteth more then 700 Talents of ſilver from the Jews. Herod winneth Caſſius's heart by the money that he levieth in Galilee.

AFter Cæſar's death, the brand of Civil War began to flame, and the chiefeſt of Rome made it their buſineſs to raiſe forces, But Caſſius came into Syria, with an intent to take the Army that was near to Apamea: and having raiſed the ſiege, he drew both Baſſus and Marcus to be of his faction, and travelling from City to City, he gathered a number of Soldiers, and much warlike proviſion, and impoſed huge Tributes: but eſpecially he afflicted Jewry, and exacted of that Countrey Seven hundred D Talents of Silver. Antipater ſeeing the State in ſo great fear and trouble, committing the exaction of a part of this money to his ſons; the reſt he commanded to be aſſigned to Malichus, who was his Enemy. Herod firſt of all gathered that which was commanded him in the Countrey of Galilee, and for this cauſe was greatly beloved by Caſſius: for he being prudent and diſcreet, thought it no ſmall policy at that time, to win the Romans good will on other mens expences. Under the other Governors the Cities were ſet to ſale, together with their Inhabitants: and amongſt them, theſe four were the chiefeſt, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Caſſius ſold the people thereof to them that would give moſt. Beſides, Caſſius was ſo much tranſported with choler, E that he had ſlain Malichus if Hircanus had not reſtrained his fury, by ſending him One hundred Talents of his own money by Antipater. But as ſoon as Caſſius was departed out of the Countrey of Judæa, he practiſed Antipater's death, ſuppoſing that his cutting off would aſſure Hircanus's ſtate. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his reſolution; for having an inkling thereof, he got himſelf on the other ſide of Jordan, and aſſembled an Army of Soldiers, both Jews and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politick and ſubtil fellow) denied ſtoutly that he had intended any Treaſon, clearing himſelf with an Oath before Antipater and his Children, that he had never any ſuch intent, eſpecially ſeeing that Phaſælus held Jeruſalem, and Herod F had an Army at command. And in the end, perceiving the difficulty wherein he was, he reconciled himſelf to Antipater, and they agreed at that time, that Marcus governed Syria, who perceiving that Malichus began to raiſe troubles in Jewry, reſorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had ſlain him, had not Antipater by earneſt requeſt obtained his life.

Malichus layeth in wait to murther Antipater, but forſweareth the ſame, and is reconciled.

H Foot and Horſe, and Ships by Sea: They promiſed him likewiſe the Kingdom of Judæa, after they had finiſhed the War, that was at that time betwixt them, and Anthony, and Cæſar the younger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power, determined to deſtroy him; and having corrupted Hircanus's Butler with Money (with whom both of them celebrated a Feaſt) he poyſoned him, and afterwards aſſembling many Soldiers about him, he made himſelf Maſter of the City. When Herod and Phaſælus underſtood the traiterous conſpiracy attempted againſt their Father, they were grievouſly incenſed againſt Malichus. But he denied all, and eſpecial abjured the intent or practice of the murther. Thus died Antipater a juſt and virtuous man, and ſuch an one as dearly loved his Countrey. But Herod who was his younger ſon, immediately reſolved to I revenge his fathers death, and came forth with an Army againſt Malichus: But Phaſælus, who was the elder, reſolved to circumvent him by policy, leſt he ſhould raiſe a Civil War. He therefore accepted of Malichus juſtifications, and made a ſhew that he ſuppoſed that he had in no manner contrived Antipater's death, and onely minded his Fathers Monument and Funerals. Mean while, Herod reſorting to Samaria, and finding it in a deſperate condition, reſtored the ſame, and pacified the diſſentions that were amongſt the Inhabitants. Not long after (by reaſon of a Feaſt) he came to Jeruſalem with his Soldiers. Malichus being afraid of his acceſs, perſwaded Hircanus that he ſhould not permit him to enter into the City: whereunto Hircanus condeſcended, alleadging, that amongſt the holy People it was not lawful to intermix a Troop of polluted Men. K But Herod ſlighted them that brought him this news, and notwithſtanding his command, entred the City by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his ordinary diſſimulation, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater his eſpecial friend; but under-hand he prepared a guard for his own ſafety. Notwithſtanding it was thought fit by Herod's friends, to take no notice of his diſſimulation; but to make ſhew that they were well-affected towards Malichus.

Herod having aſſured Caſſius of Antipater his fathers death, he knowing very well of what a wicked man Malichus was, wrote back unto Herod that he ſhould revenge the death of his father: beſides, he ſent ſecret Letters to the Captains that were in Tyre, commanding them to aid and aſſiſt Herod in that juſt execution which he intended. After that Caſſius had taken Laodicea, and the Inhabitants of the Countrey came together, bringing with them Crowns and Silver to preſent him. Herod expecting that Malichus ſhould receive his puniſhment there, but Malichus miſtruſting their deſigns M when he was drawing near to Tyre in Phœnicia, he contriv'd a greater enterprize. For whereas his ſon was an hoſtage in Tyre, he entred the City to draw him thence, and afterwards return into Judæa; taking that opportunity by reaſon of Caſſius's troubles (who marched to meet with Anthony) he reſolved to draw the people to an inſurrection, and to make himſelf Lord of the Countrey: but God diſappointed his unjuſt purpoſes: For Herod being a man of a ripe judgment, immediately diſcovered his intention, and ſent one of his ſervants before, under the notion to prepare a banquet, becauſe he had told him formerly that he would entertein all his followers: but in effect, he ſent him to the Captains, to command them to go out with their Daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth, and meeting with him near the ſhore, he N ſtabbed him. Which act did ſo much aſtoniſh Hircanus, that through amaze he grew ſpeechleſs: and being much moved, he demanded of Herod's men how this accident had hapned, and who it was that had killed Malichus; which having heard, and how nothing was done without Caſſius's commannd: he anſwered that all was well done, Malichus being a wicked Man, and a Traitor to his Countrey. See here how Malichus was juſtly puniſhed for the wickedneſs he committed againſt Antipater.

When Caſſius was gone out of Syria, there aroſe a new tumult in Judæa: for Felix, who was left in Jeruſalem with an Army, marched forth againſt Phaſælus, and all the people were in arms. For which cauſe Herod ſpeedily repaired to Fabius, Governor of Damaſco, and intending to ſuccor his brother, was prevented by a ſickneſs: ſo that O Phaſælus obtaining a victory by his own forces againſt Felix, encloſed him up in a Tower, whence afterwards he diſmiſſed him under compoſition. Whereupon he grievouſly rebuked Hircanus, that being forgetful of divers good offices which he had received by by him, he had given aid unto his enemies. For Malichus's brother being at that time A revolted, planted Gariſons in divers Fortreſſes, and namely in Maſada, which was the ſtrongeſt of them all. As ſoon as Herod had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces againſt him, and dipoſſeſſed him of divers places that he held, and after ſuffered him to depart with his life and goods.

And that done, he came and encountred with Antigonus, and fought him, and overcame him before he had ſcarcely entred on the marches of Judæa, and drove him from thence. C Being come in triumph to Jeruſalem, Hircanus and all the People honoured him with Crowns. For Hircanus look'd upon him as one of his Family, becauſe he was to marry Mariamna, daughter of Alexander, ſon of Ariſtobulus, and of Alexandra, Hircanus's daughter: on whom he begat three ſons and two daughters. ANtonius and Cæſar having overcome Caſſius, near unto the City of Philippi; Cæſar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Aſia. And being in Bithynia, Embaſſadors reſorted to him from all parts: Thither alſo repaired certain principal Men among the Jews, to accuſe Phaſælus and Herod; ſaying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdom. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came unto him, to anſwer thoſe accuſations that they had impoſed on him: for which cauſe, they that were his adverſaries could obtain no Audience: for E Herod had bought that priviledge from them with his Money. As ſoon as Antonius was arrived in Epheſus, Hircanus the High-Prieſt, and all our Nation preſently ſent an Embaſſador unto him, with a Crown of Gold; requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Caſſius had taken Priſoners (contrary to the law of Arms) might be ſet at liberty, and that their Countrey, which was taken from them in Caſſius's time) might be reſtored. Antonius ſuppoſing that the demands which the Jews had propoſed, were reaſonable, wrote back preſently to the High-Prieſt Hircanus and the Jews; and ſent an Edict alſo to the Tyrians, ta this effect:

Marcus Antonius writeth to the Magiſtrates of Tyre to reſtore Hircanus and the Jews their Lands, Goods and Liberties.

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to the Governors Senate, and People of Tyre, Health: I have been informed in Epheſus by Hircanus*'s Embaſſadors (who is High-Prieſt and Prince of*

Our will is, that you ſuffer our allies to live in peace; and as touching that which you have obtained of our adverſaries; our pleaſure is, that you reſtore the ſame to thoſe that are diſpoſſeſſed.
For none of them had obtained either Province or Army by the conſent of the Senate; but had uſurped them by force, and afterwards beſtowed them on thoſe who have been to have any right in them, when I ſhall repair to thoſe places, it ſhall be lawful for you to debate your right, and we will ſo judge, that our allies ſhall receive no wrong.

Marcus Antonius Emperor, to the Governors, Senate, and People of Tyre, Health:
I have ſent you my Edict, my pleaſure is that you carefully conſider it, and that you regiſter and for that by our valor, we have repreſſed his inſolence, by our Edicts and Judgments we will correct his offences, to the end that all things may be reſtored to our Allies, and that all whatſoever hath been ſold, and appertained to the Jews (whether they be Priſoners or before, and that each mans poſſeſſion may be reſtored to his firſt owner. And my pleaſure is, N That whoſoever diſobeyeth this Ordinance, he may be puniſhed accordingly. He wrote to CHAP. XXIII.

The beginning of Antonius*'s love for* Cleopatra; he is very ſevere to thoſe Jews who came to accuſe Herod and Phaſælas. Antigonus, Ariſtobulus*'s ſon contracteth a friendſhip with the Parthians.*

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Cleopatra cometh into Cilicia to Antonius. Herod accuſeth by one hundred Jews before Antonius.

Antonius maketh Phaſælus and Herod Tetrarchs.

Ten thouſand Jews repair to Tyre to accuſe Herod who are partly ſlain, partly wounded, and partly put to flight.

AFter this Antonius went into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him near unto Silicia, and entangled him in her love. At that time alſo, One hundred of the chiefeſt among the Jews came in Embaſſage to him to accuſe Herod and Phaſælus: they had choſen the moſt eſteemed Orator that might be found. Meſſala likewiſe undertook the B defence of the young men that were accuſed, and made them anſwer. Hircanus alſo was there in perſon, who was already by marriage allied unto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the City of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanas, which of both the parties governed the Common-weal beſt? who returned him anſwer, That they who were on Herod's ſide, were moſt ſtudious of the publick good. Antonius (who long ſince had born a good affection towards them, by reaſon of the ancient hoſpitality that he had received of their father, during the time Gabinius was in Judæa) eſtabliſhed them both Governors of the fourth part, committing to their hands the affairs in Judæa: and to this effect wrote Letters, and committed fourteen of their enemies to priſon; had not H*erod* interceeded for their lives, he had C condemned them to death. Notwithſtanding this, as ſoon as they returned from their Embaſſage, they could not contain themſelves in quiet, but reſorted once more unto Antonius, to the uumber of 10000, to the City of Tyre, where Antonius was. But Antonius (already corrupted by ſtore of mony by H*erod* and his brother, who commanded in that place ordained that the Embaſſadors of the Jews ſhould be puniſhed, for that they had attempted to make new diſturbances, and he confirmed H*erod*'s Government. At that time H*erod* walking by the Sea ſide, came unto them, adviſing both them and H*ircanus* (who at that preſent was with them) to give over their appeal, leſt ſome misfortune ſhould befal them. Which they not regarding, certain Jews and Inhabitants of that City, all at once ran upon them, killed ſome of them, and hurt others, and the reſt taking their D flight towards their Counerey, ever afterwards contained themſelves and lived in quiet, through the fear the had conceived. But when the people ceaſed not to exclaim and proteſt againſt H*erod*, Antonius was ſo diſpleeſed, that he commanded all thoſe whom he held priſoners to be put to death.

The year after Pacorus the Kings ſon, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, invaded and ſeized Syria. About this time Ptolomey died, the ſon of Mennæus; and his ſon Lyſias reigned in his ſtead, who plighted friendſhip with Antigonus the ſon of Ariſtobulus, who obtained his favor at his hands, by the councel and ſollicitation of a certain Prince of great authority and credit with him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 21. Antigonus promiſeth the Parthians a great ſum of money to inſtal him in the Kingdom. Pacorus ſendeth Horſemen to Antigonus in Judæa. The Jews inhabiting about Mount Carmel, joyn themſelves with Antigonus.

ANtigonus having promiſed the Parthians to give them One thouſand Talents of Silver, and five hundred Women, if ſo be they would deprive H*ircanus* of the Kingdom, and reſtore it unto him, and withal, put H*erod* and his friends to death. The F Parthians undertook it, and marched towards Judæa, though they had not received as yet any of Antigonus's Money. Pachorus led his Troops along the Sea-coaſt, and Barzapharnes conducted his more within the Land. The Tyrians ſhut their Gates againſt Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolomaidans received him into their City. He ſent a body of Horſe into Jewry, to diſcover the eſtate of the Countrey, and to give ſuccors to Antigonus. The commander of theſe Horſe was the Kings chief Cup-bearer, who was alſo called Pacorus. Certain Jews (inhabiting about the Carmel) joined themſelves with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to invade his Enemies, he conceived ſome hope that he might by their means reduce a certain part of the Countrey under his Government, which is called Drymæ: and other Jews joining with him in the way, perſwaded him to preſs forward as far as Jeruſalem; G where being ſeconded by others (and his followers already much increaſed in number) they put themſelves in a poſture to aſſault the Kings Palace. The two Brothers, viz. Phaſælus and Herod with their followers

H Followers attacked them in the Market-place, repulſed the Enemy, and drove him into the Temple. Which done, they ſent armed men into the houſes near adjoining, to guard them; but the people ruſhing in upon them, and ſeeing they were deſtitute of aid, burned both them and the houſes wherein they were. But this cruelty of theirs was preſently revenged by Herod, who in a skirmiſh that he had with them, killed a great number of them. And whereas there were daily skirmiſhes between both parties, the enemies expected until the people (aſſembled from all parts of the Countrey) ſhould repair to Jeruſalem, to celebrate the Feaſt of Pentecoſt. Which being come, many thouſands of men aſſembled about the Temple, both armed and unarmed, who ſeized both the Temple and the City; except the Kings houſe onely, which Herod I made good with a few Men of War. The Wall thereof Phaſælus his Brother defended. Herod with a company of his followers ſallied out upon the Enmy, who were planted in the ſuburbs, and fighting valiantly againſt them, he put divers thouſands of them to flight, whereof ſome retired into the City; others into the Temple; the reſt into a certain Bulwark near at hand. In this battel Phaſælus ſhewed no little valor.

Pacorus Conductor of the Parthians, came into the City with ſome few Horſemen at Antigonus's requeſt, making ſhew that he came to appeaſe the ſedition; but the ſcope of his coming was, to obtain the ſoveraignty for Antigonus. After that Phaſælus was come out to meet him, and courteouſly entertain'd him in his houſe. Pacorus perſwaded him to go Embaſſador with him to Barzapharnes, intending under this pretence to ſurpriſe K him. He ſuſpecting no treacheries, was eaſily perſwaded, notwithſtanding that Herod miſliked the courſe, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to aſſail Pacorus, and to aſſault and oppreſs his Forces, when they were come unto him. Nevertheleſs, Hircanus and Phaſælus undertook this Embaſſage, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod Two hundred Horſemen, and Ten of thoſe whom they call Free-men) conducted the Embaſſadors. Now as ſoon as they came into Galilee, the Governors of the Cities in that Countrey, came forth armed to meet them: Barzapharnes alſo at the firſt gave them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with Preſents; but ſhortly after he began to practiſe treachery. For Phaſælus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adjoined the Sea; where hearing tidings that Antigonus L had promiſed One thouſand Talents, and Five hundred Virgins to the Parthians, he began already to ſuſpect the Barbarians. For a certain friend of his had given him an inkling that there were treaſons intended againſt him that very night, and that his lodging was privily beſet with a Guard. And ſurely they had been ſurpriſed, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Jeruſalem) ſhould have ſeized on Herod, fearing leſt he having an inkling of their diſaſter, ſhould betake himſelf to flight. This was ſhortly confirmed to be true by the guards that arrived: For which cauſe there were ſome of Phaſælus's friends, who counſelled him, that without any more delay, he ſhould betake him to his Horſe, and fly from thence: and amongſt the reſt, Ofilius was moſt earneſt, who had diſcovered this plot, by Saramalla a rich Syrian (who M offered them his ſhips that road hard by, to further their flight.) Phaſælus would neither forſake Hircanus, nor leave his Brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to uſe theſe ſiniſter practiſes againſt him. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receive it at his hands, than from Antigonus; and that it was an intollerable injuſtice to put Embaſſadors to death, who came unto him upon his honour, and had no ways offended him. But the Barbarian hearing theſe things proteſted, by an Oath, that not one point of that which he had ſuſpected was true; whereupon he preſently went to Pacorus.

Pacorus Chieftain of the Parthians entring the City, perſwadeth Phaſælus to go Embaſſador to Barzapharnes.

As ſoon as Barzapharnes was gone, ſome of the Parthians took Hircanus and Phaſælus priſoners, who mightily deteſted his perjuries. But the Eunuch that was ſent unto Herod, had inſtructions given him to intice him without the City Walls, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certain Meſſengers (who were ſent by Phaſælus to give him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemy in the way, and Herod getteth notice thereof, he addreſſed himſelf to Pacorus (and thoſe in greateſt authority among the Parthians) who ſubtilly diſſembled, O notwithſtanding they knew how all things went, telling him, that he ſhould do well to repair with them without the Wall, to go and meet thoſe Meſſengers, who brought him Letters; who had not as yet been ſeized by their adverſaries, but came to acquaint him that Phaſælus was well. But Herod gave them no credit, becauſe he was already otherways ways advertiſed of his brothers ſurpriſal, and had alſo far greater ſuſpition of the Parthians, by the ſollicitation of Hircanus's daughter, whom he had married. And although the reſt made no account of her advertiſements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that ſhe was a moſt wiſe woman. Now whilſt the Parthians were in deliberation what were beſt to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open aſſault upon ſuch a man) they deferred the whole matter until the next morning. Whilſt thus they were debating of their differences, Herod, who rather gaving credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treaſons intended againſt him by the Parthians) than to his adverſaries; as ſoon as it was night, concluded to make uſe of the time, and to make away, without ſtaying any longer amongſt thoſe uncertain dangers, which his enemies intended againſt him. For which cauſe he fled with thoſe Forces he had with him: and mounting his mother, his ſiſter and his betrothed, whom he was to marry (who was Alexander's daughter) the niece of Ariſtobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus's daughter (and her younger brother, with all their family and train, he departed into Idumæa without ſuſpition of the enemy. Amongſt whom there was not one ſo hard-hearted, who ſeeing ſuch a pitiful ſpectacle, could not be moved to compaſſion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their Countrey with tears and complaints: and that which was worſe, to leave their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redreſs.

But Herod maſtered theſe misfortunes by his invincible courage, and for that he was a conſtant man in all fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themſelves to immeaſurable ſorrow, for that by ſuch means they might hinder his retreat, on which their ſole and ſecureſt conſervation depended: whereupon they for their part endeavoured themſelves to digeſt their griefs, according to Herod's exhortation. Mean-while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himſelf, by reaſon of the Chariot wherein his mother rode, which overturned, and had almoſt ſlain her; yea ſo much did this caſualty terrifie him (for fear leſt the enemy in purſuit ſhould ſurpriſe him during theſe delays) ſo that he drew and prepared his ſword to kill himſelf, had not ſome aſſiſtants and followers ſtept in to him, and ſtayed the ſtroke, beſeeching him inſtantly not to forſake them, and leave them ſubject to the enemies violence: aſſuring him, that it was not the part of a valiant man to reſpect his own private intereſt, and neglect his friends danger. By theſe perſwaſions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reaſon of the apprehenſion of theſe words, which were ſpoken unto him, as alſo for that he was over-ruled by the multitude of thoſe who would not permit his hand to execute his will, ſo that taking up his mother, and doing her all the ſervice that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the ſpeedieſt and neareſt means he could he retired toward the Caſtle of Maſſada; where in the way, he oftentimes fought againſt the Parthians that charged and purſued him, but he always got the victory. The Jews alſo purſued him during his flight; for ſcarcely had he travelled ſixty furlogs out of the City, but that they aſſailed him in the high-way: but he put them to flight, and obtained the victory, not like a deſperate man, enforced thereunto through neceſſity, but like a diſcreet, clear couraged and valiant Soldier. So that in the very place where he obtained the victory againſt the Jews (after he was made King) he builded a moſt ſumptuous Palace, and a City, which he called Herodium. Whilſt he remained at Reſſa (a borough of Idumæa) Joſeph his brother came forth to meet him, and to conſult with him concerning their preſent condition, and to know of him what ſhould become of that great multitude that followed him, conſidering that they had no Soldiers in pay, and the Caſtle of Maſſada, (whither they intended too fly) was too little to hold all the people: for which cauſe he ſent away many, to the number of Nine thouſand, willing them to diſperſe themſelves here and there in the Countrey of Idumæa, and for the better diſpatch of their journey, he furniſhed them with victuals. As for himſelf, he took with him his moſt able Soldiers and Friends, and repaired to the Caſtle of Maſſada (in which place he left the women and their train, to the number of Eight hundred, or thereabouts, and furniſhing the place with Corn, Water, and other Proviſions neceſſary, he went unto Petra, the chiefeſt City of Arabia. As ſoon as it was day, the Parthians plundered all that Herod left in Jeruſalem; and amongſt other things, they ſpoiled the Palace; but they medled not with Hircanus's money, which amounted to ſome 300 Talents. They left divers other things them behind alſo that appertained to Herod, and eſpecially that which had been tranſported into Idumæa by his providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the ſpoil of the City, but they forraged all the Countrey round about, and ruined Mariſſa a very rich City.

Herod ſeeing his mothers chariot overturned, is ready to murther himſelf.

Herod retiring towards Maſſada, is aſſailed, by the Parthians.

The Paathians ſpoil the Citizens of Jeruſalem, and deſtroy Mariſſa.

H Thus Antigonus, brought back into his Countrey by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phaſælus that were Priſoners: yet he was vehemently dipleaſed, becauſe the women was eſcaped, whom according to his promiſe he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing leſt Hircanus through the favor of the people ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom (who then was Priſoner in the cuſtody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Prieſthood any more, by reaſon of that maim, becauſe the Law commanded that they who are in that dignity ſhould be ſound in all their members. But Phaſælus is to be admired for his great courage at that time.: for underſtanding that he muſt needs die, he was no wayes diſheartned with death, but that which he eſteemed moſt miſerable I and diſhonourable was, that he muſt needs die by the hands of his Enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not diſpatch himſelf by other means, (becauſe he was bound and chained) he knockt out his own brains againſt a ſtone, and ſo ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in ſuch a deſperate eſtate) depriving his Enemy of that power which he intended to practiſe in tyrannizing over him at his pleaſure: It is ſaid, that the wound being very deep, Antigonus ſent privily Chirurgions to cure him; and that under colour of healing him, they ſhould put poyſon into the ſame, wherethrough he might die. But before Phaſælus gave up the ghoſt, he underſtood by a certain womans that his brother Herod had eſcaped from his Enemies: for which cauſe he endured his death with far greater cheerfulneſs and conſtancy, ſeeing that he left K behind him ſuch a man as would revenge his death, and puniſh his Enemies. But Herod was no ways diſcomfited with the greatneſs of thoſe adverſities which invironed him round about, but was the more whetted on to find out new inventions, and to adventure conſiderable attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom formerly he had ſhewed much courteſie) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great neceſſity, and to draw ſome money from him, either by intereſt or gift. For being ignorant of his brothers death, he endeavoured to redeem him ſpeedily from his Enemies, by paying his Ranſom (which amounted to Three hundred Talents) and for that cauſe he led with him the ſon of Phaſælus, who was only ſeven years old, to leave him in pledge amongſt the Arabians for the ſum that was demanded.
L But certain meſſengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoyned him that he ſhould neither receive nor retain Herod; And uſed this colourable pretence, becauſe he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was perſwaded by the advice of the greateſt in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themſelves maſters of that treaſure that Antipater had committed to their cuſtody. Herod anſwered them, That he repaired not into their Countrey to give them cauſe of any trouble, but onely to conſult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own eſtate, and that afterwards he was reſolved to depart, and withdraw himſelf into Egypt as ſecretly as might be poſſible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of M his followers; and the next day he came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tidings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himſelf of his ingratitude, and ſpeedily ſent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten far on his way, and was already arrived near to Peluſium: where being denyed his paſſage to Alexandria, in thoſe ſhips that were there, he addreſſed himſelf to the Magiſtrates of the place, who highly reſpected and honoured him, and ſent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithſtanding ſhe could not perſwade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithſtanding the Winter, and thoſe grievous troubles that at the very ſame time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himſelf therefore to ſail into Pamphilia, he was toſt with a moſt N cruel ſtorm; ſo that with great danger at laſt he arrived in Rhodes, having been inforced in the tempeſt to caſt into the Sea great part of his goods. There he met with Sappinas and Ptolomey, two of his endeared friends. He found alſo the City of Rhodes had ſuffered much miſery by Caſſius's Wars: and although his means were very ſhort, yet he helped them in what he might, and cauſed their Walls to be repaired, notwithſtanding that by ſo doing he greatly hindred himſelf. After that, he cauſed a little Frigot to be built, and embarked himſelf with his friends to repair into Italy, and arrived at Arunduſium, and from thence went to Rome. The firſt to whom he diſcovered his misfortunes, was Marcus Antonius: to whom he reported all the occurrances in Judæa:

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 23. al. 25.

Antonius loved Herod, and hated Antigonus.

Cæſar Auguſtus, Herods friend.

Herod admitted into the Senate, and declared King.

ANtonius hearing of all thoſe alterations that had befallen Herod, had compaſſion of B his miſery (bethinking himſelf of the eſtate and condition of great men, who are likewiſe ſubject to no leſs caſualties) and the rather was he induced to do him good, both in remembrance of the friendſhip he had with Antipater his father, and alſo by reaſon of Herods promiſes of certain ſums of money, if he were made King by his means, as he had been formerly declared Tetrarch. But that which moſt moved him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare unto Antigonus, whom he accounted to be a mutinous man, and an Enemy to the Romans. On the other ſide, Cæſar was well inclined to ſuccor him, both in regard of thoſe Armies which Antipater had brought into Egypt in his fathers ſervice, as alſo becauſe of the good hoſpitality and kindneſs that he had ſhewed him in all things; and eſpecially to gratifie Antonius, who was well affected C towards Herod. Whereupon the Senate being aſſembled, Meſſala and Atratinus brought forth Herod, and after they had praiſed him, and recited the favors which the Romans had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accuſed and declared Antigonus the Romans Enemy, not only for his ancient crimes, but alſo, that in contempt of the Romans, he had received the Kingdom from the Parthians. Whilſt the Senate was ſore diſpleaſed at the report of theſe things, Antonius aroſe, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian War, it were not amiſs that Herod ſhould be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principal demonſtration of the love and affection which Antonius bare unto Herod, was, that he D not only obtained him the Kingdom, beyond all hope, for he never thought that the Romans would grant that dignity unto him, who were wont to reſerve that honour to thoſe of the Kings blood; and therefore he intended to have demanded it for his Wifes Brother Alexander, and Nephew to Ariſtobulus by the Fathers ſide, and to Hircanus by the Mother (which Alexander, Herod afterwards put to death, as ſhall be declared in time and place) but alſo for that, within the term of ſeven dayes, he ſent him out of Italy, with the unexpected titles of his felicity.

Herod intending the Kingdom for his Wifes brother, enjoyeth the ſame himſelf.

Herod aſcendeth the Capitol with Antonius and Cæſa.

As ſoon as the Senate was riſen, Antonius and Cæſar went forth, leading Herod between them, and being accompanied by the Conſuls and other Magiſtrates, went up into the Capitol to do ſacrifice, and to place there this Decree the Senate had made as touching E this matter. The firſt day of Herod's Reign Antonius feaſted him; and after this manner he was eſtabliſhed King, the hundred and eighty fourth olympiade, in the year wherein C. Domitius Calvinus twice Conſul, and Caius Aſinius Pollio were Conſuls. Mean while Antigonus beſieged thoſe that were in the Caſtle of Maſſada, who were plentifully furniſhed with all things neceſſary (except it were water) for which cauſe Joſeph, Herod's Brother, that was within, and Two hundred of his friends, had concluded to fly unto the Arabians: for that they underſtood that Malchus had repented himſelf of the fault he had committed againſt Herod. But whilſt they ſtood upon theſe terms, God poured down a huge rain on a certain night, that in ſhort time filled their Ciſterns, ſo that they had no more neceſſity to fly; and from that time forward they took courage; and made a ſally upon their Enemies, in which they charged Antigonus's Soldiers after ſuch a F manner, ſometimes in open field, ſometimes by ſurprizal, that they ſlew a great number of them. At that time Ventidius, a Roman Captain, was ſent into Syria, to drive the Parthians from thence, and after their departure he arrived in Jewry, making ſhow that he would aſſiſt Joſeph: but in effect all his pretence was to draw money from Antigonus. Being therefore encamped near unto Jeruſalem, and having drawn ſufficient money from Antigonus, he retired himſelf with the greater part of his Forces: and to the intent his deceitful dealing might not be diſcovered, he left Silo with a company of his Soldiers: who likewiſe was honoured by Antigonus, leſt he ſhould be cauſe of ſome new trouble, before the Parthians, whoſe coming he expected ſhould yield him aid. AFter that Herod was come from Italy by Sea to Ptolomais, and that he had aſſembled no ſmall number of Soldiers both ſtrangers and his own Country-men, he marched forward againſt Antigonus, and paſſed thorow Galilee. Silo and Ventidius alſo gave him aſſiſtance in this action, having received direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they ſhould aſſiſt Herod to recover his Countrey. But Ventidius was employed in appeaſing the troubles that were raiſed in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo he kept in Judæa, having been corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the Countrey, the more his forces did increaſe; and all Galilee (except a very few) ſubmitted themſelves unto him. Whileſt he marched forward K towards Maſſada, (being moved thereunto, for to relieve his parents that were beſieged therein) the City of Joppe would not grant him paſſage: for the Citizens thereof were his Enemies: ſo that it behoved him firſt of all to ruinate the ſame, to the end he might leave no retreat behind him for his Enemy, if he made toward Jeruſalem.
Upon which occaſion Silo laying hold, diſlodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Jews did purſue Herod ſallieth out with a ſmall company, and put them to flight, and ſaved Silo: who could not reſiſt any longer. Afterwards having ſeized on Joppe, he haſted forwards to deliver his friends that were beſieged in Maſſada; but part of the inhabitants ſubmitted themſelves unto him for the friendſhip they had born unto his father: and others of them, for the honor that they bear unto him: the reſt admitted L his government, in acknowledgement of thoſe favors they had received from them both. But the greateſt part was moved thereunto by the hope they had conceived of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his Government. Thus by theſe means was his Army mightily increaſed.

Herod returning back out of Italy, leadeth forth his army againſt Antigonus.

Herod aſſaulteth Joppe, and taketh it.

Many ſubmit themſelves to Herod.

Whileſt thus he marched forward, Antigonus ſeized on thoſe places that were fitteſt to lay ambuſhes in, or to fight at advantages by the way (notwithſtanding that by thoſe ſtratagems he did but ſmall or no hurt at all to his enemy; ſo that Herod raiſed the ſiege, and relieved his friends out of the Caſtle of Maſſada: and after he had taken the Fort of Reſſa, he approached Jeruſalem, being attended by Silo's Army, and by divers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when he had M pitched his Camp to the weſtward of the City, thoſe that kept the watch and guard on that ſide, ſhot their Arrows and threw ſtones againſt him: divers likewiſe ſallied forth, and fought hand to hand againſt thoſe that were planted there: For which cauſe firſt of all Herod cauſed a Proclamation to be made round about the Walls, ſignifying unto them that he reſorted thither for the common good of the people, and for the conſervation of the City, without intent of revenge or memory of any wrongs that his private Enemies had offered him, promiſing his moſt free pardon to all thoſe whoſoever had hainouſly offended him. Hereunto Antigonus made this anſwer (directing his ſpeech to Silo and the Roman Soldiers) that contrary to all juſtice they gave the Kingdom to Herod, who was a private man, and an Idumæan (that is to ſay, a half N Jew) whereas it hath been a cuſtome to beſtow the ſame on them that are of the line of the Prieſts. For albeit at that preſent they were diſpleaſed with him, for that he had ſeized on the Kingdom by the means of the Parthians, and had reſolved with themſelves to diſpoſſeſs him; yet that there were divers others of that Royal Race, who might be made Kings according to the law, who have no wayes miſdemeaned themſelves towards the Romanes; and moreover there are Prieſts, who ſhould not be juſtly and uprightly dealt withall, if they ſhould be deprived of that honor which appertaineth unto them. Whileſt they debated the matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and injurious taunts the one againſt the other, Antigonus commanded his men to aſſail thoſe that were near unto the wall: who ſhooting many Arrows with Antigonus upbraideth Herod that he is but half a Jew, and of no Kingly Race.

The enemy repulſeth Herods power from the wall.

At that time Silon gave manifeſt proof that he had been corrupted by money: for he ſuborned convenient garriſons to winter in, for that the places round about the City were deſolate A becauſe all neceſſaries for maintenance of life had been taken away and waſted by Antigonus Soldiers. Thus was the whole Army diſcompoſed; ſo that each of them prepared themſelves to diſlodge. But Herod importuned and cried out upon the Captains and Soldiers that were under Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him whom Cæſar, Antony and the Senate of Rome, had ſent thither: That for his own part he would give order that they ſhould have abundance of whatſoever they demanded; and immediatly after he deprived Silon of all colour and pretext of flight, for he cauſed an incredible quantity of victuals to be brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them Corn, Wine, Oyl, Cattel, and all other ſuch proviſion from Jericho, to the end that from that time forward the Souldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof, ſo that B he preſently ſent men thorowout the Countrey, to intercept and ſurprize the purveiors and victualars. Who following Antigonus command, aſſembled a great number of Soldiers near unto Jericho, and encamping in the mountains, eſpied and watched thoſe that brought the victuals. Mean-while Herod lay ſtill, but took with him ten companies, five of Roman Soldiers, and five of the Jews, with home he intermixed ſome forrain Soldiers, with ſome few horſemen, and came to Jericho; where being arrived, he ſeized on the Town, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom five hundred with their Wives and Children were retired into the top of the mountains, whom he took, and afterwards ſet at liberty: but the Roman Soldiers, entring into their houſes, and finding them full of all ſorts of moveables, they plundred them. And the King C having left a Garriſon in Jericho, diſmiſſed the Roman Army to go and winter in the Countries lately ſurrendred unto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus

Herod fighteth with his enemies in Galilee, and overcometh them, and bringeth all Galilee under his ſubjection.

Whileſt thus the Romans lived in all abundance and bare no Arms; Herod would who were removed ont of Maſſada. After this he went into Galilee to ſurprize certain Caſtles which were held by Antigonus Garriſons, and being arrived at Sephoris (during a great ſnow) after that Antigonus Garriſons were gone out of the foreſaid D Caſtles, he found a great abundance of all ſorts of neceſſary proviſion, And there having notice of certain thieves, who inhabited in Caves, he ſent a troop of horſe, with three companys of foot, againſt them: whom he commanded to puniſh thoſe robbers the place where they lay, was not far from a borough called Arbela: and fourty dayes after, he himſelf with all his Army marched thither, where the enemies charged him fiercely that the left wing of his ſquadron retreated; but he coming on with his main battel, put them to flight, who were already almoſt maſters of the field, and made thoſe of his followers that fled, face about and to purſue their enemies as far as the flood Jordan: who fled ſome one way and ſome another; ſo that he drew all Galilee under his ſubjection, except thoſe that lurked in the Caves. He diſtributed money E alſo amongſt his Soldiers, and gave each Soldier an hundred and fifty drachmes, and far more unto their officers, and afterwards ſent them to winter in Garriſons near at hand.

Antigonus refuſeth to victual the Romane army.

Ventius ſendeth for Silon to War againſt the Parthians.

About this time Silon and his Captains, who had paſſed the Winter in the ſaid Garriſons, came unto him Antigonus would no more furniſh them with victuals: for he gave them maintenance for no more time then a month, commanding thoſe that dwelt round about them, to ſpoil the Countrey, and afterwards to retire themſelves into the mountains, to the end that the Romans might be deſtitute of neceſſary maintenance, and by that means might be conſumed with famine. Herod gave Pheroras his youngeſt brother the charge of that proviſion, commanding him to incloſe the fort of Alexandrion with F a wall; who ſpeedily brought to paſs that the Soldiers had all ſorts of neceſſaries at command: re-edefied alſo the fort of Alexandrion which had been laid deſolate. About that time Antony was in Athenes, and Ventidius was in Syria, who having ſent for Silon to accompany him againſt the Parthians, did firſt of all charge him to aſſiſt Herod in that War: and afterwards to excite the provincial confederates to further his War. But Herod diſmiſſing Silon and his company to follow their deſtinated Wars with Ventidius, did in his own perſon lead out his Soldiers againſt thoſe thieves that lived in dens.
Theſe Caves were ſituate in the moſt higheſt and inacceſſible Mountains, impregnable through narrow paths environed with ſharp Rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited ſecretly, with all their families. King Herod cauſed a certain number of Coffers to be G made faſt to iron Chains, which he cauſed to be let down by an Engins from the top

H hill to aſcend the ſame from beneath, neither from above to creep downward againſt them.) Theſe Cheſts were filled with Soldiers, armed with great Hooks to draw theſe thieves unto them, and to break their necks headlong from the height to the bottom. But the uſe of theſe Coffers was dangerous, for it was neceſſary to let them down an infinite depth into the caves, eſpecially for that the thieves had neceſſary proviſion among them: notwithſtanding when they had gotten down none of the Thieves durſt peep out of the mouths of their Caves, but fear conſtrained them to hold themſelves quiet. But a certain Souldier having girt his Sword by his ſide, and taken hold of the chain with both his hands whereto the Coffer was faſtned, ſlid down as far as the entry of the Cave: and being diſpleaſed that none came out, he ſhot divers Arrows at thoſe that were within, I and wounded them; and after that, with his hook he drew thoſe unto him who reſiſted, and tumbled them down headlong from the ſteep Rock: which done, he ruſhed in upon thoſe that were within the Cave, and ſlew many of them, and afterwards returned and reſted himſelf in his Coffer. Divers hearing the groans of thoſe that were wounded, were ſurpriſed with fear and diſpair of their life, but the nights approach was the cauſe that the matter was not fully accompliſhed, and many of them getting notice of the Kings free pardon by a Herauld, ſubmitted themſelves. The next day they renewed and continued the ſame manner of fight, and divers went out of their Coffers to fight at the enterances of the Caves throwing in fire, which there being much fewel in the Caves, did great execution. Within theſe Caves there was a certain old man apprehended, K with his wife and ſeven Sons: who being deſired by them that he would ſuffer them to go and ſubmit themſelves to their enemies, took up the entrey of the cave, and as his Sons advanced to get out he ſlew them all, and after them his Wife; and at laſt, when he had caſt their dead bodies down the Rocks, he threw himſelf down headlong after them, prefering death to ſlavery. Yet before his death he reviled Herod bitterly, and upbraided him with his ignoble extraction: and although Herod (who ſaw all that which had happned) ſtretched out his hand unto him for pardon, yet he would not give ear to him; and by this means were all theſe Caves entred, and the theeves taken.

Now when the King had eſtabliſhed Ptolomey General over the Army in that Countrey, he retired into Samaria, with ſix hundred horſe, and three thouſand foot, with a reſolution L to fight Antigonus, and to end their quarrel. But Ptolomey had but very ſlender ſucceſs in his Government: for they that before-time had troubled the Countrey of Galilee ſallied out upon him, and defeated him. After which execution they fled into the Mariſhes and unacceſſible places, where they robbed and ſpoiled all the Countrey. But Herod returning and ſetting upon them, puniſhed them: for he ſlew ſome of them, and the reſt were conſtrained to flie into ſtrong places, where he beſieged them and entring their fortreſſes perforce, put them to the ſword, and deſtroyed their fortifications: and having brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the ſum of one hundred talents. Mean while, Pacorus was killed in the War, and the Parthians were defeated with him; which was the cauſe that Ventidius ſent Macharas to ſuccor M Herod with two legions and 1000 horſe by Antonius order corupted by Antigonus mony. But Machæras was notwithſtanding Herods diſſwaſion, yet he went to him, alleadging that he did it to look into his actions. But Antigonus ſuſpecting his ſudden approach, entertained him not, but cauſed him to be darted at and driven thence, giving him to underſtand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, who at that time perceived plainly that Herod had given him good counſel, and that himſelf had failed in miſbelieving his advice: for which cauſe he returned to the City Emaus, and killed all thoſe Jews whom he met withall in the way, being much troubled at it whether friends or enemies, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed at that which had happned. Herod came to Samaria, reſolving with himſelf to go to Antonius to complain of theſe grievances; and to tell N him that he had no need of ſuch aſſociates, who did him more harm than his enemies; whereas of himſelf he was able to make good his War againſt Antigonus. But Macharas, haſted after him, entreating him to ſtay, and to go no further on that journey, and prayed him to leave his brother Joſeph behind him, to go with him againſt Antigonus. By theſe perſwaſions and inſtant intreaties of Machæras, he was ſomewhat appeaſed: ſo that he left his brother Joſeph behind him, with an Army,; charging him no way to hazard his fortune, or to fall at odds with Machæras. As for himſelf he haſted toward Antony, who at that time beſieged Samotſata (a City ſituate near unto Euphrates) having with him an Army of his aſſociates, both horſe and foot. When Herod was arrived in Antioch he found divers men aſſembled there, who were deſirous to go and ſeek out Antony: O but they durſt not advance, for fear the Barbarians ſhould ſet upon them in their journey: Herod encouraged them and offered himſelf to be their guide. up the way with Hurdles, and had likewiſe hidden ſome Horſemen thereabouts, until the A Paſſengers had recover'd the Plain. Now when the foremoſt were paſt, the ambuſh conſiſting of about ſome 500 Horſemen, they ſuddenly charged Herod who was in the Rear; when they had broken the firſt Ranks whom they had met, Herod, with his Troop that was about him, immediately repulſed them; and after he had encouraged his followers, and whetted them on to the fight, he did ſo much, that he made thoſe, that fled, to face about, and fight, ſo that the Barbarians were put to the ſword on all ſides. The King alſo purſu'd them ſo long, until at laſt he recover'd that which had been taken by them, which was a certain number of Sumpter-horſes and Slaves. But being charged afreſh by others, and they in greater number than thoſe who encountred him at firſt, he like- B wiſe (rallying his Forces together) charged and overcame them; and killing divers of them, he ſecured the way to thoſe that follow'd after, who all of them acknowledg'd him for their preſerver.

Herod was honourably entertained by Antonius and his Hoſt.

When he drew near unto Samoſata, Antonius ſent out the beſt of his Army to meet and honour him. As ſoon as he came to Antonius's preſence, he entertain'd him kindly; and after he had heard that which had befaln him in the way, he embraced him, in admiration of his virtue, and did him great honour, as to him whom a little before he had raiſed to a Royal dignity. Not long after this, Antiochus ſurrendred the Fort of Samoſata to Antonius, and upon this occaſion the War was ended. Whereupon Antonius committed the Province with the Army to Soſius: and after he had commanded him to ſuccor Herod, he departed into Egypt. Soſius therefore ſent two Legions of Soldiers before C into Judea to ſuccor Herod, and afterwards he follow'd with the reſt of his Army.

Soſius hath the army committed to his charge by Antonius, who departeth into Egypt.

Joſeph, Herods brother, is ſlain by Antigonus.

The Galileans revolt from Herod.

Machæras fortifieth Gath.

Herod departeth from Daphne, a Suburb of Antioch into Galilee.

Herod fighteth with the Galileans, and overcometh them, and driveth them into a Caſtle.

In the mean while Joſeph is killed in Jewry, on this occaſion that enſueth: For forgetting his brother Herod's command which he gave him when he repaired to Antonius, he took five Companies of Soldiers which Machæras had left him, and marching towards Jericho to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his Tents upon the Mountains; and for that the Roman Troops were but newly levied, and conſiſted of thoſe Men who were untrained in the Wars, and for the moſt part were gather'd out of the Countrey of Cœloſyria; the Enemies having advertiſement hereof, aſſailed and ſurprized him in certain places of diſadvantage, where there was a hot skirmiſh between them, in which Joſeph died fighting valiantly, and all his Army was defeated. The dead bodies being in D Antigonus's power, he cut off Joſeph's head, notwithſtanding that his brother Pheroras proffer'd him 50 Talents for the whole body. Which done, the Galileans revolting from their Governors, drowned thoſe of Herods party in the Lake; ſo that divers Commotions and Troubles were raiſed in Jewry. Macharas, he fortified the Caſtle of Gath. This misfortune of Joſephs was reported to the King, in a certain Suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who, before the tydings, had already conceived ſome ſuſpition and fear, grounded upon certain dreams, which gave him certain intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition, he arrived near to the Mount Libanus, where he took about 800 Men with him, and the Roman Legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolomais; from whence he departed with his Army by night, and E croſſed Galilee with them. Whereupon the Enemies came forth againſt him, and were overcome by him, and ſhut up in a Fort from whence they were come out but the day before, where Herod aſſailed them by break of day: but being unable to do them any harm, by reaſon of the bad Weather, he led his Men into the Villages near adjoining. But when Antonius's ſecond Legion was come, and joined to his Forces, they that were within the Fort grew diſheartned, and forſook the ſame by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Jericho, with an intent to revenge his brothers death; and being encamped near unto the ſame, he banquetted and entertained the Officers of his Army: and after the Feaſt was ended, and he had diſmiſſed his company, he withdrew himſelf into his lodging; in which place it appeared, how much God loved the King: for the roof of F the houſe where he had ſolemniz'd his Feaſt, fell down, without hurt, to any one whomſoever, for not one was left within it. Whence it came to paſs, that each one perſuaded himſelf that Herod was beloved by God, conſidering he had avoided ſo great and unexpected a danger.

The houſe wherein Herod ſolemnized his Feaſt, fell down when the gueſts were gone, without any mans detriment.

Herod wounded by his enemies.

Antigonus ſendeth Pappus to Samaria

The next day, 6000 Enemies came down from the top of the Mountains to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans; and their forlorn hope chaſed Herods Soldiers with darts, and ſtones, who was himſelf alſo hurt in the Thigh with an arrow. Antigonus ſent a Captain to Samaria, whoſe name was Pappus, with ſome Soldiers, intending thereby to ſignifie unto his Enemies, that he had more Forces than he needed. Pappus drew near to Machæras the Roman Captain; and as for Herod, he took five Cities by force, and put G ſome 2000 of them that were in Gariſon to the ſword; and afterwards (having ſet the houſes on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus, who was encamped in a Borough called Divers that came from Jericho and Jewry ſubmitted themſelves to Herod; who drawing near the Enemy (who marched forward with great boldneſs, he fought them, and overcame them; and being inflamed with a great deſire he had to revenge his brothers death, he purſued them that fled, and killed them even within their borough. Theſe Houſes were preſently filled with Soldiers, and divers fled and hid themſelves upon the tops thereof, who were at laſt taken; for the Roofs of the Houſes were beaten down, whereby divers were killed by ſtones that were thrown at them from above; the moſt grievous ſpectacle of all thoſe that had hapned in thoſe Wars, was, to ſee an infinite number of bodies heaped up amidſt the Rooms of the Houſes.

Fight in the houſes.

This exploit of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemies, who loſt all I hopes of any better ſucceſs for the future; for a man might have ſeen them flie away in whole droves: and had not a ſudden and violent tempeſt fallen upon them, the triumphant Army of Herod had immediately entred Jeruſalem with aſſurance of victory, which had made an end of all that War. For Antigonus had no other thoughts but to flie away, and to forſake the City. Now the night drawing on, Herod gave order for the Soldiers to eat; and himſelf being weary, retired into his Chamber to bathe, where he eſcaped a moſt evident danger through Gods providence; for being naked, and having no body within but one of his ſervants, three of the enemies who had hid themſelves for fear, ſtarted out with their Swords in their hands, and ran away, without daring to attempt any thing againſt the Kings perſon, ſo terrible was his preſence to them. The next day K Herod cauſed Pappus's Head to be cut off, and ſent it to Pheroras, to comfort him for the loſs of his brother Joſeph, whom this Pappus had killed. When the Tempeſt was over, he departed from thence, and approached near to Jeruſalem, and encamped near unto the City. This was about the third year after he had been declared King at Rome; and encamping in the places which were fitteſt for battery, he took up his own quarter before the Temple, as Pompey had done formerly. Having therefore erected three bulwarks in three places, he built Towers thereon, by means of a great quantity of Wood, which he cauſed to be cut down round about the place: and having put the ſiege in a forwardneſs, he went to Samaria, to marry Mariamna, who was Alexander's daughter, and Ariſtobulus's Grand-daughter, with whom he had been contracted, as we have already told you.

After this Marriage was ſolemniz'd, Soſius repaireth thither through the Countrey of Phœnicia; and having firſt of all ſent his Army through the Continent, he himſelf alſo reſorted thither with many Foot and Horſe: thither alſo repaired the King from Samaria, with a conſiderable Army, to join with the old Bands; for he had about 30000 Men. All theſe aſſembled themſelves together near unto the Walls of Jeruſalem, and planted their ſiege nigh unto the Wall of the City that extendeth towards the Northward. The Army conſiſted of eleven Legions of Foot, with 6000 Horſe, beſides the Auxiliaries that came from Syria. Two Generals commanded this Army: namely, Soſius, who was ſent by Antonius to ſuccor Herod: and Herod himſelf, who made War for himſelf, with an intent that having diſpoſſeſſed Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed Enemy to Rome) he himſelf might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree: Thoſe Jews that were within the Walls (that is to ſay, almoſt all the Nation) reſiſted the Herodians with great courage, boaſting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wiſhing all good ſucceſs to the people; namely, that God would deliver them from all dangers: and ſpoiling all proviſion without the City, that was either behoveful for the uſe of man and beaſt, by their ſecret excurſions, they made the beſiegers deſtitute of victuals. Which inconvenience Herod prevented, having laid ambuſhes to cut them off. As for victuals, he made much proviſion be brought from remote places; ſo that within a very little ſpace they had abundance of all that which was neceſſary in the Camp. He erected alſo with no leſs care three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of Workmen: for it was Summer-time; and neither was the air incommodious, or negligence of the Workmen ſuch, but that they preſently furniſh'd and finiſh'd them. Afterwards having raiſed their Engines upon them, they batter'd the Wall, with as much violence and diligence as was poſſible: notwithſtanding all this, they did no wayes daunt thoſe that were within; who for their parts uſed all the cunning imaginable to defend themſelves, and by divers ſallies ſet on fire the Enemies Engines; and burnt not only thoſe that were half made, but thoſe that were wholly perfected: and when neceſſity drave them to cloſe fighting, they ſhew no leſs valor than the Romans; but they were inferior to them in skill and martial diſcipline. And when as the firſt Wall was beaten down, they built up a new, and countermined againſt thoſe Mines that were made by the Enemy, ſo that they fought under-ground hand to hand. Thus uſing deſpair rather than courage, they reſiſted to the uttermoſt; notwithſtanding they were beſieged by a great Army, and preſſed by famine and want of victuals: for the year wherein the ſiege was continued was the ſeventh, in which the earth was unmanured, which by us is called the year of reſt. But at laſt, 20 choſen Soldiers firſt of all mounted upon the Wall, and after them one of Soſius's Centurions; for the firſt Wall was taken in the fortieth day after the ſiege, and the ſecond on the fiftieth, and ſome galleries were burnt which were near unto the Temple: which (as Herod ſaid) were burnt by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Jews. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the City were taken, the Jews fled into the Temple, and into the higher Town, leſt the Romans ſhould hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary ſacrifices unto God: and they ſent Ambaſſadors to their Enemies, to require that it might be lawful for them only to bring in certain beaſts to offer them for ſacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this means that they would ſubmit themſelves, and yield up the places. But perceiving that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obſtinately reſiſted him, to continue the ſovereignty in Antigonus, he gave the aſſault, and took the City by force: where all places were preſently filled with murthers, in that the Romans were diſpleaſed, becauſe they had continued the ſiege ſo long; and the Jews that were on Herods ſide, enforced them utterly to deſtroy all thoſe that were of the contrary party; ſo that ſlaughters ranged and reigned everywhere, both in porches, and in the houſes whereinto they entred: Neither did the religious reverence of the Temple ſave thoſe Suppliants that reſorted thither for ſafety, but without compaſſion both old and young were put to death: neither did their murthering hand ſpare or refrain from Women; nay, not ſo much as from young Infants. And although the King requeſted them to forbear, yet no man gave over, but all ſorts of perſons were murthered by them, without reſpect either of ſex or age. Antigonus inconſiderate of that eſtate wherein he had he might moderate his aſſociates and ſtrangers, after he had the upper hand over his Enemies: for the ſtrangers ſwarmed into the City, and not only into the Temple, but alſo into the Sanctuary. He therefore exhorted ſome, and threatned others, and reſtrained the reſt by force of arms; and he was more troubled at that preſent in being a Conqueror, than if he had been conquered: for that thoſe things that were not lawful to be much as in him lay: beſeeching Soſius moſt inſtantly, to preſerve it to the utmoſt, asking the Senate by proteſt, that he was deſcended of the Royal Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common perſon: and that although he had offended the Romans, and L thereby might not deſerve to be King; yet at leaſt his Children, who were of the Prince-Antony cauſeth Antigonus, King of the Jews, to be beheaded.

Herod preferreth his Favorites, and killeth his enemies.
The Phiriſees honoured by him.
Pollio foreprophesied Herods Tyranny.

IN the former Book I have declared how Soſius and Herod took the City of Jeruſalem by force, and with it Antigonus Priſoner: Now we will alſo declare that which hath ſubſequently followed; for after that Herod had obtained the abſolute government over the whole land of Judea, he advanced all thoſe among the common people, who favoured his proceedings: as for thoſe who were oppoſed againſt him, there paſſed not a day wherein ſome one or other of them ſuffered not puniſhment. But, amongſt the reſt, Pollio the Phariſee, and Sameas his Diſciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the ſiege of Jeruſalem, they counſelled the Inhabitants to receive and entertain Herod; for which cauſe, he reſpected them accordingly. Some are of opinion that Sameas made this Prediction. This Pollio heretofore (when Herod was found guilty of death) foretold to Hircanus, and the reſt of the Judges, That being abſolved by them, he ſhould one day inflict puniſhment on them all. Which Prediction God in proceſs of time approv'd by the event: no ſooner therefore became he Maſter of Jeruſalem, but he gather'd together all the rich Houſhold goods that was in the Palace; and furthermore having robb'd the rich men of their goods, and by this means raiſed a great ſum of gold and ſilver, he ſent great Preſents to Antony and his friends. Moreover, he condemn'd 45 of Antigonus's principal and nobleſt Favourites to death, ſetting a Watch about their doors, that none of them might be carried out under colour of being dead. The dead bodies likewiſe were trodden under foot: and all the gold, ſilver, or jewels, that was to be found amongſt them, was carried to the King, and converted to his uſe, ſo that there was no end of theſe miſeries. For the covetouſneſs of the Conqueror (whoſe greedy and thirſty deſire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on whatſoever was theirs. And becauſe it was the ſeventh year, it neceſſarily came to paſs, that the Land was left uncultivated, for we are forbidden to ſowe in this year. Antony having taken Antigonus Priſoner, reſolv'd to keep him in Priſon until the time of his triumph: But after that he had heard the Jews were ready to rebel, and continu'd their good affection towards Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceiv'd againſt Herod, he concluded with himſelf to take his head from him at Antioch: for the Jews could ſcarcely contain themſelves. Strabo of Cappadocia teſtifieth no leſs in theſe words:

The ſlaughter of them that were of Antigonus's faction.

Hircanus highly honoured in Babylon by the Jews.

PHraates, King of Parthia, underſtanding how nobly Hircanus was deſcended, who was brought Priſoner unto him, entertain'd him graciouſly, and for this cauſe drew him out of Priſon, permitting him to converſe in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Jews, who honour'd Hircanus very much, and no leſs than their High-Prieſt and King. The like alſo did all they of that Nation inhabiting as far as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that he was advertiſed that Herod was poſſeſſed of the Kingdom, he transferred his hopes another way, being of his own nature ten-
L derly affected towards his friends, expecting that one day Herod would requite him, for that he had deliver'd him from death whereunto he was condemned, and in danger likewiſe of the penalty and puniſhment. He began therefore to conſult with the Jews about his journey, who, in way of duty and love came to viſit him, and who prayed him, and importuned him to continue with them, offering him all ſervice and honour; aſſuring him, that he ſhould in no leſs manner be reſpected among them than their High-Prieſt and King: yea, in far higher regard than he might any wayes be in his own Countrey, by reaſon of the maim he had in his body through Antigonus's tyranny; alledging, that Kings do not ordinarily call to their remembrance thoſe pleaſures that they have received in their mean condition, becauſe that with their eſtates they change both their manners
M and inclinations. But notwithſtanding all theſe, or ſuch like Allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawn from the deſire he had to repair homeward. Herod alſo wrote unto him, That he ſhould require Phraates, and the Jews that inhabited his Kingdom, in no ſort to envy his felicity, in that he ſhould partake with him both in dignity and royalty; alledging that the time was now come, wherein he might acknowledge the kindneſs he had received, by being heretofore nouriſhed and preſerved by him. With theſe Letters he ſent Samaralla likewiſe, in quality of an Ambaſſador, to Phraates, furniſh'd with great and rich Preſents, endeavouring by that means to win him, that he in no wayes ſhould hinder his good intent towards one that had ſo highly deſerved it at his hands: yet his proteſtations were not anſwerable to his pretence. For inſomuch as he governed not with that uprightneſs N which became a juſt King, he feared leſt ſome alteration might befall him, according to his demerits: for which cauſe he ſought to get Hircanus under his power, or at leaſt wiſe to diſpatch him out of his life, which he afterwards performed. When therefore Herod had perſuaded the Parthian to diſmiſs Hircanus, and the Jews to furniſh him with money ſufficient to bear his expence in his journey, he received him with all honour. In common Aſſemblies, he gave him alwayes the higheſt place; and in the time of Feſtivals, he made him alwayes ſit down before him: and the more cloſely to deceive him, he called him brother, endeavouring by all means wholly to take away all colour and ſuſpition of treachery: neither omitted he any other ſtratagems, whereby he might any ways further or promote his cauſe; and yet by theſe means occaſioned no ſmall ſedition in his O own family. For, fearing leſt any one among the Nobility ſhould be eſtabliſhed High-Prieſt, he ſent to Babylon for a certain man of a baſe extraction, called Ananel, and gave him the Prieſthood. For which cauſe Alexandra grew ſuddenly diſpleaſed, not being able

able to endure that afront. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexanders wife, who was King Ariſtobulus ſon, who had two children by her husband, the one very beautiful, who was called Ariſtobulus: the other was Mariamne, who was likewiſe fair, and married to Herod. She was highly diſpleaſed to ſee her ſon ſo much undervalued, that during his life another was called to the honor of High-prieſthood: for which cauſe ſhe wrote unto Cleopatra by the means of a certain Muſician, beſeeching her to beg the High-Prieſthood at Antonius hands for her ſon. Which Cleopatra did moſt willingly, but Antonius made little reckoning of thoſe ſuits. A certain friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Jewry about certain of his affairs, and who had ſeen Ariſtobulus, fell in love with him by reaſon of his beauty: and admiring likewiſe his tall ſtature, and allured by Mariamnes admirable beauty, he openly proteſted, that he accounted Alexandra a happy Mother in her children: and diſcourſing to this effect with her he perſwaded her to ſend the pictures of her two children to Antonius; for that if he ſhould but behold them, he would refuſe him nothing wherein he ſhould requeſt his friendſhip. Alexandra perſwaded by theſe words, ſent their pictures unto Antonius. Gellius alſo made the matter more wonderful, telling him that the children ſeemed rather to be ingendred of no mortal ſtrain, but by ſome divine power, endeavoring as much as in him lay, that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who ſuppoſing it to be a matter ill beſeeming him to ſend for Mariamne, who was married to Herod, and deſirous likewiſe to avoid Cleopatras ſuſpitions, wrote unto Herod, that under ſome honeſt pretext he ſhould ſend Alexandras ſon unto him (with this addition, if it might not ſeem troubleſome unto him.) Which matter when Herod underſtood, he thought it no waies ſafe for him to ſend Ariſtobulus, (who was a hanſome young man, and little more at that time then ſixteen years old, and ſo nobly born:) conſidering that Antonius was at that preſent in ſuch authority, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who beſides that, was very much addicted to his pleaſures, which he openly hunted after without fear of puniſhment in regard of his greatneſs and power. He therefore wrote him this anſwer, that if the young man ſhould but only depart out of the Countrey, all the Land would preſently be filled with War and Troubles, for that the Jews pretended alteration in Government, and ſought to innovate by prefering a new King. When he had in this manner excuſed himſelf unto Antonius, he reſolved to entertain both the younger Ariſtobulus and his Mother Alexandra, with more reſpect. Moreover his Wife Mariamne did continually importune him to give the Prieſt-hood to her brother, alleadging that by that honour he might prevent the occaſion of his journey. For which cauſe aſſembling his friends together in councel, he grievouſly accuſed Alexandra before them, proteſting that ſhe ſecretly conſpired againſt the Kingdom, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra ſhe laboured to diſpoſſeſs him of the ſoveraignty, to the intent that her Son by Antonius meanes might Govern in his ſted. Which practice of hers was ſo much the more unjuſt, becauſe ſhe deprived her own Daughter of that honour wherein ſhe was, and raiſed up troubles likewiſe in that Kingdom which he had conquered with great labor, and extreme danger: Yet notwithſtanding that he willingly forgat that which was paſt, and forgave thoſe wrongs ſhe had done againſt him, and was ready notwithſtanding to ſhew all kindneſs and courteſie both to her and hers. He gave the High-Prieſthood to young Ariſtobulus, alleadging that heretofore he had eſtabliſhed Ananel in that place for no other reſpect, than for that Ariſtobulus was under years.

Alexandra excuſeth her ſelf and having promiſe of the Prieſt Hood for her ſon, is reconciled to Herod.

After that he had thus ſeriouſly and conſiderately diſcourſed in the preſence of the Ladies, and conſiſtory of his friends, Alexandra almoſt beſide her ſelf, not only through the joy ſhe had conceived by this unexpected good fortune, but alſo for the fear ſhe had to be ſuſpected, began to defend her ſelf with tears and proteſtations, ſaying, that all whatſoever ſhe had either practiced or done, was to prefer her Son unto the Prieſthood whom ſhe ſaw diſhonoured: but as touching the Kingdom, that ſhe had never pretended, neither would (if ſo be ſhe ſhould be preſented therewith) receive the ſame, thinking her ſelf for the preſent ſufficiently honoured, both for that ſhe ſaw Ariſtobulus in that eſtate, for the aſſurance that all her progeny ſhould receive, in that he was raiſed up in dignity above the reſt. Being therefore overcome by thoſe favors, ſhe accepted willingly the honor for her Son and ſhewed her ſelf obedient in all things, requeſting him that if ſhe had committed any thing raſhly and through inconſideration or paſſion, either in reſpect of her children, or by the looſneſs of her tongue, he would be pleaſed to pardon her. After theſe debates and interchangeable diſcourſes on both ſides, they ſhook hands the one with the other, in token of a more fixed and unfained friendſhip than was before, burying (as they pretended) all evill ſuſpition or cauſe of unkindneſs.

HEreupon Herod took away the Prieſt-hood inſtantly from Ananel, who was not that Countrey-man born (as we have heretofore declared) but was born amongſt thoſe Jews that inhabit and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Aſſyrians. For divers thouſand Jews inhabited the Cuntrey of Babylon, and from thence took he his Original alſo, being otherwiſe of the race of the Prieſts, and well affected toward Herod for a long time before, with whom he had familiar acquaintance. He had prefered him to this honor when he was made King, and degraded him likewiſe, to appeaſe the troubles of his famiely: demeaning himſelf herein contrary to the law of the Countrey: for whereas any one hath once been inſtalled in that degree, he is never to be diſplaced. The firſt that tranſgreſſed this Ordinance, was Antiochus Epiphanes, who diſpoſſeſſed Joſuh and prefered his brother Onias to this place. The ſecond was Ariſtobulus, away from his brother Hircanus, and uſurped it himſelf. Herod was the third, who gave the Prieſt-hood to Ariſtobulus eſtabliſhing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this means ſuppoſing that he had found out a remedy to appeaſe the diſcords of his family, he notwithſtanding all this lived not without ſuſpition what event would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, leſt demeaning her ſelf as ſhe had done, ſhe ſhould ſeek occaſion hereafter to raiſe new troubles. He commanded her therefore to contain herſelf within the royal Palace, and to do nothing of her own authority. Beſides that he had appointed certain intelligencers, who ſhould diligently obſerve that nothing ſhould be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exaſperated her againſt Herod, for being full of feminine pride, ſhe diſdained to ſee her ſelf thus wrongfully ſuſpected deſiring rather to ſuffer any thing, than to be deprived of the liberty of free ſpeech, and under colour to be honoured, to live continually in ſervitude and fear. Whereupon ſhe ſent ſome of her truſty friends to Cleopatra to complain and lament the inſuportable miſeries of her preſent eſtate, entreating her according to her power, to give ſpeedy relief. Whereupon Cleopatra ſent her word, that both ſhe and her Son ſhould reſort unto her into Egypt with as great ſecrecie as might be poſſible. Upon which advice ſhe practiſed this policy. She cauſed two Coffins to be made, ſuch as men were wont to bury their dead in, in which ſhe hid her ſelf and her ſon, comanding thoſe ſervants of hers that were privy to her deſign, to carry them out in the night time, and to go directly towards the Sea, where there was a Bark in readineſs prepared to convoy them into Egypt. But Eſop one of her houſhold ſervants declared this enterprize of hers to Sabbion on of Alexandras friends, ſuppoſing that he had been made privy thereunto: who had no ſooner inkling thereof, but (for that beforetimes he was Herods enemy, by reaſon he was ſuſpected to have been one of thoſe that ſought to poyſon Antipatar) he reſolved by diſcovery of this ſecret flight to convert Herods hatred into friendſhip: and preſently diſcovered Alexandras ſecret enterprize to the King. Who diſſembling the matter until it was upon the point of execution, ſurprized her at ſuch time as ſhe thought to fly, and yet notwithſtanding, he pardoned her that fault (in that he durſt not decree any puniſhment againſt her, though he could have found in his heart to have uſed ſeverity) for that Cleopatra would not have contained her ſelf, had ſhe but had ſuch an occaſion offered her to expreſs her hatred againſt Herod. For which cauſe, under the colour of a high and magnanimous ſpirit, he made ſhew to pardon her of his meere clemency: yet inwardly reſolved to deſtroy young Ariſtobulus; yet not raſhly upon the inſtant, leſt the act ſhould grow apparent and palpable.

The Prieſt-hood taken from three.

Alexandra ſuſpected by Herod, is ſpied and watched, and her actions obſerved.

Herod contriveth Ariſtobulus death.

Now the feaſt of Tabernacles was at hand, which was one of thoſe that was ceremoniouſly and ſolemnly celebrated among us; for which cauſe he concealed his intents during the feſtival dayes, intending both in himſelf, and in the preſence and company of the people, to follow all kind of pleaſure and delight; yet his envy incited him to haſten the execution of his will. Ariſtobulus was at that time ſome ſeventeen years old who when he approached the Altar to offer ſacrifices, according to the law, apparelled in the High Prieſts Ornaments to perform the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and good ſtature, ſurpaſſed the tenderneſs of his years) expreſſing in his countenance the dignity and Nobility of his Race, drew the eyes and good affections A of all the people unto him; ſo that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Ariſtobulus his Grand-Father. All the people being therefore ſurmounted by their affections, and at that preſent time being all of them overjoyed, they brake out by little and little into acclamations, mixt with wiſhes and prayers: ſo that the good will the people bare to Ariſtobulus diſcovered it ſelf openly, and they manifeſtly (although too haſtily in ſuch a Kingdom) declared what evils they generaly endured: For all which cauſes Herod concluded to execute that which he had plotted againſt Ariſtobulus. As ſoon therefore as the feaſt was over-paſſed, he went into Jericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he uſed Ariſtobulus with all kindneſs to draw him to ſecure ſome place, playing with him, and counterfeting to ſport, after the faſhion B of the young men, to gratifie him. Now the place where they ſported being too hot they quickly wearied left their ſport, and went out together to take freſh air, and finding a pleaſant ſhade under certain Arbours, and near certain fiſh-pools, which were largely ſpred round about, they beheld certain of their Servants and Friends that ſwom therein, with whom not long after Ariſtobulus began to ſwim, being perſwaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murther) laid hands on him and thruſt him under the water pretending to duck him, in ſport, and never gave him over untill ſuch time as they had ſtifled him in the water. This hapned about the evening, and after this manner died Ariſtobulus, after he had lived in all for the ſpace of eighteen years, and adminiſtred the Prieſt-hood one whole C year: and after this, Ananel preſently recovered his former dignity.

Ariſtobulus is drowned by Herods direction. Ananel reſtored to the Prieſt-hood.

When this accident was reported to the women, all of them burſt out in tears, and were tranſported with ſtrange lamentations, which they uttered over the dead body. All the City alſo was mightily troubled, neither was there any private family that thought not it ſelf touched by this inconvenience, but imagined the loſs in particular to concern himſelf and no other. But above all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed ſhe was more paſſionate and perplexed than any other, being ſo much the more diſcomforted for that ſhe knew how all things had hapned. But the fear of a far greater miſchief conſtrained her to repreſs her paſſion, ſo that divers times ſhe was ready to bereave her of her own life, and diſpatch her ſelf out of miſery with her own hands. D But ſhe contained her ſelf, to the end, that ſurviving, and living after her ſon, who was ſo fraudulently deſtroyed, and prolonging her own life, without giving any ſuſpition or ſhadow, that ſhe might with more opportunity expect the occaſion to revenge her ſelf: For which cauſe ſhe diſſembled all things, concealed her grief, and made ſhew that ſhe knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all means to perſwade the ſtrangers, that this death had befallen Ariſtobulus without his knowledg; and did not only prepare that which was requiſite for the funeral, but made ſhew to be truly ſorrowful; and it may be, that in remembrance of Ariſtobulus beauty and flouriſhing young years, he was realy touched with compaſſion, notwithſtanding, that he imagined that his death ſhould be a means of his own ſecurity, E demeaning himſelf in all things circumſpectly, with intent to purge himſelf of that crime: But eſpecially, he ſhewed his great magnificence in the interring of his body, both in the furniſhing and preparation of the Herſe, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in ſuch ſort, as the grief which the Ladies had conceived was pacified after this manner of conſolation.

The lamentation for Ariſtobulus death.

Herods counterfeit ſorrow.

During this Period of the Jewish History, God seems almost totally to have forsaken the Jews. The Gift of Prophecy was withdrawn, & that free Communication of the divine Will, which had been the Glory of their Nation, & their State, which had made so great a Figure in former Times, was become mean & contemptible, the Prey of every Tyrant & Conqueror. This indeed was a Punishment for their F overflowing Wickedness But thus all the Designs of Providence were carried on; for by their various Revolutions & Dispersions, They were mixed among other Nations, & spread more & more the Knowledge of their Religion & their Hopes; so that there prevailed about this Time a general & earnest Expectation of Him, who was to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, & the Salvation of God unto the Ends of the World — Sellon Ch: 41

CHAP. IV.

Herod is obliged to repair to Antonius, to clear himſelf from Ariſtobulus*'s death; he winneth him with Preſents: He gave order, before his way-going, to his Brother-in-Law* Joſeph, to put Mariamne to death, if Antonius ſhould condemn him to die. Joſeph revealed it imprudently to this Princeſs; and Herod put him to death, for being jealous of him, and Mariamne. Cleopatra*'s unſatiable ambition and avarice.*

The year of the World, 3931. before Chriſt's Nativity, 165.

Herod seems here to have been actuated by the same passion for Mariamne that inspired Mr Hackman to destroy Miss Ray & afterwards himself.

BUT none of all theſe things could either move or mollifie Alexandra, but daily more and more ſhe increaſed her ſorrow, and in the height of her tears kindled her wrath with a deſire of revenge. She therefore acquainted Cleopatra by her I private Letters of Herods Treaſons, and her ſons moſt miſerable, and untimely death: Cleopatra long before that time deſirous to aſſiſt her, and having compaſſion of her miſery, undertook the matter, and ceaſed not to incite Antony to revenge Ariſtobulus's death; telling him, that it was an unpardonable errour, that Herod being created King in ſuch a ſtate, whereunto he had no right, ſhould be ſuffered to practice ſuch conſpiracies again the true and lawful Kings. Antony perſwaded by theſe her words (as ſoon as he came to Laodicea) ſent for Herod, to the end, that making his appearance he might anſwer that which might be objected againſt him, concerning Ariſtobulus's death: for he diſliked the act, notwithſtanding, that Herod himſelf had attempted it. But although Herod was afraid of this accuſation, and did not a little ſuſpect Cleopatra's diſpleaſure K (for that ſhe ceaſed not continually to provoke Antony againſt him) yet he obeyed his commands, and tranſported himſelf thither (the rather for that he durſt not otherwiſe do;) notwithſtanding he left his Uncle Joſeph behind him, committing the Government both of the Kingdom, and his private eſtate unto him; giving him ſecret inſtructions to kill Mariamne, if ſo be, that Antony ſhould happen to do him any miſchief. For he loved her ſo extremely, by reaſon of her beauty, that he ſuppoſed himſelf wronged, if after his deceaſe, ſhe ſhould be beloved by another; and he openly declared, that all that miſery which befel him, proceeded from Antonies paſſion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beauty, whereof he had formerly heard ſome report. As ſoon therefore, as he had diſpoſed his affairs, notwithſtanding he had little hope of L good hap, yet he repaired to Antony.

Herod ready to repair unto Antony, commandeth Joſeph, to whoſe charge he committed the Kingdom, to kill his wife.

But Joſepth governing that Kingdom that was committed to his hands, converſed divers times upon this occaſion with Mariamne, and communicated oftentimes with her, not only about publick affairs, but alſo to do her that honour which ſo great a Princeſs deſerved. Therefore as he ſecretly convers'd with her, witneſſing the friendſhip, and ardent affection which Herod bare unto her; He found, that neither ſhe nor Alexandra did credit any ſuch thing, but rather laugh'd at it. For which cauſe, Joſeph being too forward to expreſs the Kings good will towards her, proceeded ſo far, that he diſcovered the commands that was given him; thereby to make manifeſt, that it was not poſſible for Herod to live without her, and that if any inconvenience ſhould happen unto M him, he would not in death alſo be diſ-joyned from her. This diſcourſe of Joſephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonſtration of his good will, but rather, as a manifeſtation of Herods wickedneſs; who dying, deſired alſo that they ſhould periſh; and interpreted, that which he had ſpoken, as the teſtimony of his tyrannical and malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour ſpread in the City of Jeruſalem by Herods Enemies, that Antony had ſo tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all thoſe of the Kings houſe were troubled, and eſpecially the Ladies; ſo that Alexandra incited Joſeph to forſake the Palace, and take the Ladies, and retire under the protection of the Roman Legion, who at that time, was about the City, for the ſecurity of the Kingdom, under the Conduct of the Tribune Julius, to the end firſt of all, that if any trouN ble ſhould happen in the Kings houſe, they might be by this means in ſafety, having the Romans to be-friend them; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Antony ſhould ſee Mariamne, ſhe might obtain at his hands whatſoever ſhe deſired, and that he would reſtore the Kingdom unto her, and deprive her of nothing that concerned her, or was anſwerable to her Royal eſtate.

A fooliſh rumour of Herods death

But whilſt they were in theſe deliberations, there came Letters from Herod, contrary to thoſe reports, and all mens expectation. For as as ſoon he came unto Antony he compaſſed his favor by his many Preſents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Jeruſalem, and ſuddenly debated the matter with him, he appeaſed him ſo, that he was no more diſpleaſed againſt him: and from that time forward, Cleopatra's ſpeeches O were but coldly received in regard of his ſo ample ſatisfaction. For Antony ſaid, That there was no reaſon that a King ſhould be anſwerable for that which he had done in his Kingdom; for that in ſo doing, he ſhould no more be King: but that when the honour is once given him, he hath the authority likewiſe left him to uſe his regal Power. Urging further, That it concerned Cleopatra likewiſe her ſelf, not to ſearch too curiouſly into the affairs and Government of Kingdoms. Herod ſhewed all this by his Letters, and ſignified further, what other honours he had received at Antoni's hands in Aſſemblies and Feaſts, to which he invited him always; notwithſtanding that Cleopatra ſeemed to be diſpleaſed therewith, detracting him; and being deſirous to get the Kingdom of Jewry into her hands, ſtrove, with all means poſſible, to put him to death: but that he had found Antony always an upright man, and feared not henceforward that any evil ſhould befal him: and returning preſently upon this, he brought with him a more ample teſtimony of Antony's moſt aſſured affection, both in reſpect of his own Kingdom, and of his particular affairs. And as touching Cleopatra, ſhe pretended not to ſeek any further than that which ſhe had becauſe that Antony had given her Cœloſyria inſtead of that which ſhe had demanded, forbearing thenceforward to mention Jewry any more, becauſe that Antony wholly rejected thoſe ſuits.

Joſeph and Mariamne accuſed before Herod.

Mariamne excuſeth and purgeth her ſelf before the King, and is reconciled.

After theſe Letters came unto their hands, the trouble and diſturbance wherein they were, and the deſire to retire unto the Romans, as if Herod had been dead, was wholly extinguiſhed. Yet their reſolution was not hidden from the King; for his ſiſter Salome, and his mother informed him of every particular at his arrival, after he had parted from Antonius, who was marching againſt the Parthians. Salome likewiſe ſpake againſt Joſeph her husband, and ſlandered him, objecting againſt him, that he had Mariamnes company. All which ſhe ſpake through malice, for that in a certain debate, Mariamne had, in her rage, deſpightfully hit her in the teeth with her obſcure birth. Herod (who was always inflamed with the earneſt affection which he bare unto his wife Mariamne) was ſuddenly troubled hereat: and although jealouſie preſſed him forward, yet love reſtrained him, and kept him from doing any thing raſhly, for which cauſe he called Mariamne aſide, and demanded of her in ſecret, what familiar company ſhe had kept with Joſeph? She by ſolemn oaths, and by all poſſible allegations in her own defence, appeaſed the King by little and little, and pacified his choller. For he was ſo tranſported with the love that he bare unto his wife; that he believed ſhe had ſufficiently purged her ſelf of thoſe ſlanders, that had been forged againſt her; yielding her moſt hearty thanks for her honeſt affection towards him, and declaring unto her openly, the great eſteem and love that he bare unto her. At length, (as it often falleth out amongſt Lovers) they fell to tears, and embraced each other with great affection: for that ſhe gave him no credit, he endeavoured the more to draw her to belief. Whereupon Mariamne ſaid unto him: It is not the act of a Lover to have commanded, that if any thing ſhould befall thee otherwiſe than well with Antony, I ſhould preſently be put to death, notwithſtanding I have no wayes offended thee. No ſooner were theſe words out of her mouth, but the King entred in a ſtrange paſſion, and giving over his embraces, he cryed out with a loud voice, and tore his hair, ſaying, That he had a moſt evident proof that Joſeph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not have diſcovered thoſe things which he had ſpoken to him in ſecret, except they had greatly truſted one another. And in this emotion or rage of jealouſie he hardly contained himſelf from killing his wife. But the force of love overcame him ſo much, that he bridled his rage, notwithſtanding it was grievous and irkſome unto him. Yet he gave order that Joſeph ſhould be killed without either audience or juſtification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandra, who was the cauſe of all theſe troubles, he kept her Priſoner.

Herod commandeth that Joſeph ſhould be ſlain, and impriſoneth Alexandra.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 9.

Cleopatra very covetous. Cleopatra murthered her brother and ſiſter.

About the ſame time there hapned troubles and revolutions in Syria: for Cleopatra continually ſollicited and importuned Antony, and whetted on his diſpleaſure againſt all; perſwading him to remove them from their Governments, and beſtow the ſame on her ſelf. And for that Antony loved her extremely, ſhe was in great eſtimation and credit with him: and being in her own nature inclined to covetouſneſs, ſhe abſtained from no kind of corrupt dealing and wickedneſs. For knowing that the Kingdom ſhould deſcend unto her brother, ſhe cauſed him to be poyſoned, when as he was but fifteen years old; as for her ſiſter Arſinoe, ſhe cauſed her to be ſlain by Antony's means, being at her prayers in the Temple of Diana in Epheſus. Moreover, in what place ſoever ſhe underſtood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples, or in breaking open of Sepulchres, ſhe would be poſſeſſed thereof: neither was there any religious place ſo ſacred, from whence ſhe took not away the Ornaments. There was not any thing ſo prophane and prohibited, which ſhe laid not hands on to ſatisfie her unbribled avarice. Neither was the whole World ſufficient enough to content this ſtately Lady, who was ſo much a ſlave to her own deſires, and her diſordinate appetite, that all the riches in the World were not able to ſatisfie the ſame. For this cauſe, ſhe conſtantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberal towards her: and therefore

H fore entring into Syria with him, ſhe preſently contriv'd how ſhe might get it into her poſſeſſion. For ſhe cauſed Lyſanias, Ptolomeys ſon, to be put to death, objecting againſt him, that he had private intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Jewry alſo at Antonius's hands, and required him beſides that, to diſpoſſeſs the Kings of Arabia. He was ſo poſſeſſed by this Woman, that he ſeemed not only to be bewitched with her words, but alſo inchanted by her poyſons, to obey her in whatſoever ſhe thought fit: yet he was aſhamed to commit ſo manifeſt injuſties, leſt being ſo far over-ruled by her, he ſhould happen to offend in matters of more conſequence. Leſt therefore, either by denying her, he ſhould diſoblige her, or by condeſcending to her demands, he ſhould ſeem to be the wickedeſt man alive; he deducted a ſeveral portion of both their dominions, and preſented her with the ſame. He gave her likewiſe, thoſe Cities that are ſcituate between the floud Elutherius and Egypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free Cities of long continuance: although by earneſt ſollicitation, ſhe thought to ſeize theſe alſo.

CHAP. V.

Cleopatra goeth into Judea, and uſed all her endeavors (but in vain) to make Herod fall in love with her. Antonius having conquered Armenia giveth her great Preſents.

K After that Cleopatra had obtained all theſe things, and had accompanied Antonius as far as Euphrates, who at that time went to make War in Armenia: ſhe returned back again, and by the way, viſited Apamea and Damaſco, and at laſt, took her progreſs into Jewry: where King Herod met with her, and aſſured that portion which had been given unto her in Arabia, with all the revenues of Jericho, unto her. This Countrey bringeth forth that balm which of all other ointments is the moſt precious, and onely groweth in that place; and alſo the fineſt Palm-trees in the World. Being arrived in that place, and grown inwardly familiar with Herod, ſhe ſought to allure and draw him to her luſt; being of her ſelf naturally addicted to ſuch pleaſures and intemperance, or rather (as it ſeemeth moſt likely) ſhe laid this foundation to intrap him, under colour to L revenge her ſelf of ſome injury by that means. But in effect, ſhe generally manifeſted, that ſhe had a paſſionate love for Herod; but he was not ſo kindly bent towards Cleopatra; knowing how badly ſhe was inclined towards all men; and at that time he conceived the greater hatred againſt her, becauſe, by that intemperance of hers, ſhe pretended to deſtroy him: and although, that from the beginning, he had rejected her ſollicitations; yet he reſolved to be reveng'd of her, if ſo be by theſe her ſubtil undermindings ſhe ſhould continue her policies to betray him. He asked counſel of all his friends, whether having her in his poſſeſſion, he ſhould put her to death. For in ſo doing, all thoſe ſhould be delivered from divers evils, whom either in time paſt ſhe had moleſted, or hereafter ſhe ſhould bring in trouble. Moreover, that it ſhould be profitable for M Antonius alſo, whom without all doubt ſhe would forſake, if any occaſion or neceſſity ſhould enforce him to make tryal of her friendſhip. But whilſt he debated and diſcourſed upon this reſolution, his friends diſſwaded him; aſſuring him that it was far below a Prince of his worth, to caſt himſelf into ſo manifeſt peril, beſeeching him to attempt nothing raſhly: For that Antonius would not endure the ſame, notwithſtanding, it might be approved that it ſtood with his profit: nay, rather, that by this means he ſhould encreaſe his deſire. Further, that no one colour of excuſe ſhould be left him, in that ſhe was the Woman of the greateſt Note and Nobility of that time; and that whatſoever profit might redound unto him by her death, it would be an affront to Antonius: Whereby it moſt evidently appeared, how great damages would befal to the Kingdom, and the N Kings family alſo; adviſing him, to humour her in all things, except in her unlawfull requeſt. By theſe, and ſuch reaſons, and probable conjectures, they deterred and diſſwaded him from adventuring upon this apparent danger, and attempting ſo hainous an act: ſo that contrariwiſe they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich Preſents, aud to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

But Artaxias his elder ſon (who at that time had ſaved himſelf by flight) reigned in Armenia: whom Archelaus and Nero the Empe-O peror drove out of his Kingdom, and placed his younger brother Tigranes in his room, as it ſhall be declared hereafter. As for the Tributes of the Countreys which Herod was bound to pay unto Cleopatra, for the lands beſtowed on her by Antonius, he, without deceit, deceit, juſtly paid them, ſuppoſing it to be very ſuitable to his ſecurity, to continue A himſelf in her good favor. As for the Arabians, they ſeeing that Herod had the levying of ſuch a Tribute, payed him for ſome little time 200 Talents a year, but afterwards they grew ſlow and negligent in their payments, and ſcarcely ſatisfied the half.

Cleopatra's Chieftain overthroweth Herod.

The Arabians returning to the Battel, kill thoſe that fly, and take the Camp.

ARetas demeaning himſelf thus ungratefully, and refuſing to do that which in right B he ought to perform; Herod made ſhew to take Arms againſt him, but deferred his revenge, in regard of the contentions amongſt the Romans. For at that time nothing elſe was expected but the Actian War (which fell in the hundred and eighty ſeven Olympyade) in which Auguſtus Cæſar determined to try his Title with Antonius for the Monarchy. In the mean while Herod, who had already for many years been Maſter of a peaceable and fruitful Countrey, from whence he drew rich Revenues, and many Forces; gathered divers Forces with the greateſt expedition that he might, to ſuccor Antonius. But he by Letters ſignified unto him, that he had no need of his aſſiſtance: notwithſtanding, he commanded him to make a road upon the Arabians, whoſe perfidious dealing Antonius had not only underſtood by Herod himſelf, but alſo by Cleopatra's advertiſements. For ſhe very cunningly conceived, that it would redound unto her C profit, if one of theſe two ſhould overthrow the other. Herod according to theſe inſtructions from Antonius, returned back into his Countrey, and retained his Army always ready about him, and preſently invaded Arabia, and with his Forces, both Horſe and Foot, came directly to Dioſpolis, where the Arabians (having notice of his intended War againſt them) came out to meet him. They fought a moſt cruel Battel, wherein, at laſt the Jews had the upper hand. After this, a great Army of the Arabians aſſembled themſelves at Cana, a certain place in Cœloſyria. Whereof, when Herod was fore-advertiſed, he marched forth againſt them, accompanied with the greater part of his Forces. As ſoon as he drew near to Cana, he reſolved to incamp in that place, and after he had well fortified and intrenched his Forces, to ſet on the Enemy with the firſt opportunity: but D whilſt he employed himſelf in the execution hereof, all the Army of the Jews cryed out, requiring him without delay, to lead them forward againſt the Arabians, and were ſo encouraged, both in reſpect of the confidence they had in the good conduct and ordering of their Army, as in regard of their forwardneſs, who had been actors in the former War, and partakers of the Victory; ſo that they ſcarce gave their Enemies leiſure to ſtand to their Arms. When Herod perceived that the heat and forwardneſs of the Souldiers could hardly be appeaſed; he thought good to make uſe of the readineſs of his Army, and arming himſelf, he marched on Head of his Army in battalia; This ſudden approach danted the Arabians: For although, for a while, they made head againſt them; yet perceiving their Enemies full of heart, and themſelves unable E to reſiſt them, divers of them retreated, and betook themſelves to flight: ſo that all them had been utterly defeated, had not Athenio endamaged Herod and the Jews. For he having the command of that Army which Cleopatra had in that place; and beſides that, bearing a privy grudge to Herod, diſpoſed his Army in a readineſs, and expecting the event of the Battel, reſolved with himſelf to contain his Forces if the Arabians overcame the Jews; and ſo if they had the worſt (as indeed it came to paſs) to ſet upon the Jews, who ſhould be ſpent by that time; and ſurpriſing them unawares, even in the height of their hope of good ſucceſs, to maſſacre them with freſh ſupplies. When the Jews had ſpent all their ſtrength againſt their Enemies, and expected nothing leſs than the aſſurance of the Victory, he charged, and overcame them, who had retreated F into certain rough, and difficult places (whereunto their Enemies were better accuſtomed than themſelves) being grievouſly wounded by the Arabians, who returned back, and ſet upon them, divers of them that fled were killed; and of thoſe that eſcaped, few of them recovered the Camp. Herod loſing the hope of this Battel, poſted on Horſeback as faſt as he could, to bring on freſh ſupplies: but notwithſtanding all his expedition and diligence, yet could he not recover the place in time. The Camp of the Jews was taken and ſacked, and the Arabians obtained no ſmall ſucceſs, beyond their expectation. From that time forward Herod began to make certain incurſions into Arabia, preying on the Countrey, and doing them much miſchief. He incamped himſelf likewiſe upon the Mountains, forbearing to draw his whole Forces into the field; and G by his diligence and induſtry, his labours were not fruitleſs; for prevailing in ſome exploits, he put his Men in a capacity to recover their former loſſes.

A terrible Earthquake happeneth in Judæa. The Arabians attack the Jews, and kill their Ambaſſadors who were ſent to treat of a Peace.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6.

An Earthquake in Judæa killeth ten thouſand men.

AT ſuch time as Cæſar and Antony made trial of their titles in the Actian War, and in the ſeventh year of the Reign of King Herod, there hapned ſuch an earthquake in the Countrey of Judæa, that never the like was ſeen in any other place: ſo that divers beaſts were ſlain thereby, and many men were overwhelmed with ruines of their I houſes, and periſhed to the number of ten thouſand. Only the Soldiers received no damage, becauſe they encamped in the open field. The Arabians bearing tidings thereof which were far greater by report, than they were in effect, by ſuch, who in favour of the Arabians, and hatred of the Jews, reported the ſame, grew proud: yea, ſo much was their courage increaſed hereby, as if all the Cities of Jewry had been already overthrown, and the men thereof extinguiſhed; and as if they had no adverſaries remaining alive to oppoſe them. For which cauſe laying hold of thoſe Ambaſſadors of the Jews, who came unto them to Treat of Peace in their deſperate condition, they killed them, and afterwards in the heat of their ſpleen, ſet upon their Enemies Camp. But the Jews not daring to expect or prevent their aſſault, for their preſent miſeries had ſo deK jected their ſpirits, ſeemed to neglect their Common-weale, and in a manner to diſpair of their ſafety. Theſe thus affected did the King encourage, and called unto him the Captains, and (as much as in him lay) reviving their drooping ſpirits; and when he had reſtored ſome to better hopes, at length he attempted to ſpeak unto all the Army, who in the former overthrows would yield to no perſwaſion. Theſe he did both comfort and exhort in ſuch manner as followeth.

King Herods Oration to his Soldiers, by which he doth ſo incourage them that they give the Arabians a terrible overthrow and oblige them to take Herod for their Protector.

Herod comforteth and exhorteth his Soldiers.

FRiends and fellow Soldiers, there is not one of you but knoweth, how many misfortunes have hindred our progreſs of late, which are able to wearie and amaze men of the greateſt reſolution. But ſince we muſt needs fight, and that all thoſe things that have befallen us unto this preſent, are of that nature, that by your own valour they may be recovered; I have reſolved to inform, and confirme you in thoſe means, whereby you may retain and continue your accuſtomed valour and courage.

The cauſe of War againſt the Arabians.

Firſt of all therefore (as to our War) it conſiſteth on juſt grounds, for we are inforced M thereunto through the inſolence of our Enemies: the Knowledge whereof ſhould chiefly make you recover your courage. Secondly, I will apparently prove unto you, that our condition is not ſo deſperate, but that we have great and aſſured hopes to obtain the victory. Firſt of all therefore, I will diſcourſe of that which formerly I propoſed, and will make your ſelves judges of thoſe things which I will diſcourſe upon. For you are privy to the Arabians unjuſtice, and how perfidious they are to their friends, and impious and barbarous towards all men; but eſpecialy they have always troubled us, provoking us through their extreame avarice and maligant envie, with perpetual injuries. And yet to let ſlip all other our benefits to that Nation, who is he that delivered them from their imminent peril and thraldom, that was hazarded by Cleopatras means, but our ſelves? For the friendſhip I had with Antony, N and his benevolence toward me, was the cauſe that their burthen of miſeries was ſo lightned; Antony forbore to commit any thing that might draw us to ſuſpition.

Beſides, after ſhe had wrought him by her ſolicitation to cut off certain portions of the two Kingdoms to be given unto her, the matter was ſo handled by me, that by divers preſents particularly beſtowed upon him by my hands, I have obtained ſecurity for us both, and by disburſing two hundred talents of mine own, and giving my word for two hundred more for others, for the Revenues of that very Land which in time paſt was ours, and theſe now poſſeſs and enjoy. Notwithſtaanding, reaſon it were in my opinion, that we that are Jews ſhould not be tributaries, or give any portion of our Countrey to any man; and if we muſt needs do it, it ill becometh us to pay it for theſe, who enjoy their lives by our means. It ſhould not be O reaſonable for the Arabians, who after they had confeſſed with many plauſible proteſtations and thankſgivings, that they enjoy their liberty by our benefit, to have deprived and thruſt us from our own, and to have unjuſtly dealt with us; yea even with us, I ſay, who were not their Enemies, but rather on the contrary ſide their chiefeſt friends in the time of Peace. And if A fidelity ſhould be reſpected even amongſt thoſe that are our moſt hated Enemies, much more neceſſarily ought it to be obſerved by thoſe that are friends. But theſe men ſet light thereby, who think nothing honeſt, but that which is annexed with lucre; and think no wrong unexcuſable, that hath but a ſhew of profit. Is there any queſtion then, whether we ſhould chaſtiſe theſe unjuſt men by a juſt War? ſince both God commandeth no leſs, and enjoyneth us alwayes to hate outrage, and revenge injuſtice, eſpecially in that War which is not only juſt, but neceſſary. For that which both in the confeſſion of the Grecians, and opinion of the Barbarians is moſt hatefull and heinous, this have they perpetrated in murthering our Ambaſſadors. For the Greeks ſay, that Ambaſſadors are ſacred and inviolable, and we our ſelves have received our wholſome and holieſt precepts of the Law of God by Angels, that is, from B his Heraulds and Meſſengers: for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile Enemy to Enemy.

With whomſoever juſtice is, there is God alſo.

What Impietie therefore is more unpardonable, then to put thoſe Ambaſſadors to death, who bring tidings of right and juſtice? or what proſperity can they expect either in their Wars, or felicity in their whole lives, after ſo hainous a crime? Truely I cannot imagine any: But perhaps ſome man will ſay, that right and equitie is on our ſide; but that the greater number of men and means are with them: but this their ſpeech is unworthy of my followers. For with thoſe with whom juſtice is, with thoſe alſo is God; and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let us wade further, and weigh our own own forces by themſelves. In the firſt Battel we had the victory, in the ſecond, upon the firſt charge we C put them to flight, and found them unable to make their party good againſt us. Afterwards, when the victory was ours, behold, Athenio, not by lawful War, but by ſubtil treachery aſſaulted us: But ſhall this be called their valour, or rather their fraud and ſecond iniquitie? why therefore ſhould we have leſs courage, who ought to have the greater confidence? or why ſhould we fear them who are alwayes inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraud; and when they ſeem to overcome, they do it by unjuſtice?

Moreover, if any man ſuppoſe them to be valiant, this ſhould the rather incite them more and more unto vertue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble minde to overcome his inferiour, but to have meanes and might to conquer his ſuperiour, And if any one be terrified by our domeſtick and homebred miſeries; and by our late earthquake, firſt of all let him think D with himſelf, that he erreth in that which deceiveth the Arabians by ſuppoſing the ſame to be more grievous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it becometh them not to draw matter of fear from thence, whence the other took occaſion of courage. For as touching themſelves they conceive not any hope thorow any good that is in themſelves, but only in the truſt they have that we are already dejected by our calamities. But when they ſhall ſee us march forth againſt them, their courage will be weakned, and our confidence by this means ſhall be awakened, for that we are not at this time to encounter with deſperate men: For neither are we overmuch afflicted; neither (as ſome think) hath this miſery befallen us through Gods diſpleaſure, but theſe are the caſualties of fortune. And if by the will of God theſe things are come to paſs, it is marvel if by the ſame will our calamity ceaſe not; and that E our puniſhment ſhould not ſatisfie his diſpleaſure. But that this preſent War is approved by him for juſt, he himſelf hath evidently declared. For whereas divers thorow the whole Nation have been oppreſſed by the earthquake, none of you that bear Arms have incurred any miſchief; but all of you have been preſerved, which is a manifeſt token of the will of God; and if your Children and Wives had generally followed the Wars as you do, none of you ſhould have been wanting. When as therefore you ſhall have bethought your ſelves of theſe things, and moreover in regard that God hath at all times an eſpeciall care over you, fail not to purſue this injurious Nation with a juſt war that neither reſpecteth the laws of friendſhip nor keepeth the league of of covenant; valiant in murthering ſacred Ambaſſadors; and abject and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour. F

Theſe perſwaſions of his did not a little encourage the Jews to the battel, and made them more forward then before. As For Herod, after he had offered ſacrifice, according to the cuſtom, he drew his Army forth, and led them with great confidence againſt the Arabians, and paſſing Jordan, he encamped near unto the Enemy, with an intent to ſurpriſe a Fort Situate between them both; making this account that it would further him much, either if preſently he ſhould be drawn forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march forward, for that this place ſhould ſerve him to encamp in with more ſecurity. The ſame reſolution alſo had the Arabians, for which cauſe they fell to skirmiſh in that place, wherein the firſt on both ſides that gave the charge, and afterwards ſome other followers were killed: ſo that thoſe of the Arabians ſide being G overcome betook them to retreat. This ſucceſs of theirs bred no little hope in the Jews, who ſeeing the Enemies Army addreſſed to attempt any thing rather then to fight

H fight grew the more bold to aſſail the Arabian in his trenches, and beat him from his camp. They being forced by theſe aſſaults drew forward to their defence in great diſorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them : yet notwithſtanding they defended themſelves,both in regard of their great number,as alſo in reſpect of that neceſſity whereunto they were inforced by the Jews. The skirmiſh on both ſides was hot,and divers on either party were put to the Sword : but in the end,the Arabians being put to the worſt, turned their backs. The ſlaughter was ſo great, that they not only periſhed by their Enemies Swords, but they themſelves murthered one another in the croud, and diſorderly flight, in which they were troden under foot, and lay murthered in a manner by their own weapons. So that,in that defeat there fell ſome five I thouſand : the reſt fled on the other ſide of the Rampire : but being overpreſſed with want of victuals, and eſpecially with lack of water, they had not any ground or aſſurance to eſcape. After them poſted the Jews, and being unable to recover the fortreſs with them, they begirt the camp with a ſiege, and ſhut up all the paſſages that no ſuccor could come unto them,and took from them all opportunity to eſcape, although they would have gone away.

When as therefore they ſaw themſelves reduced into ſuch extremity, they ſent Ambaſſadors unto Herod, firſt of all to demand a truce : and afterwards for that they were oppreſſed with thirſt, to crave ſome remedy for their preſent neceſſities. But he neither reſpected the Ambaſſadors, neither the proffered ranſome for the Captives, K nor any other whatſoever reaſonable demand, deſiring earneſtly to revenge himſelf of thoſe injurious treacheries they had practiſed againſt his Ambaſſadors. Being therefore inforced by thirſt (which amongſt other plagues moſt grievouſly afflicted them) many of them forſook their Trenches, and offered themſelves to bonds and to be led away Captives ; ſo that within five dayes ſpace four thouſand of them yielded themſelves Priſoners. On the ſixth day, all the reſt determined to ſally out, and aſſail the Enemy ; rather making choyce of aſſured death, then thus lingringly and ignominiouſly to pine away. When as therefore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontineptly brake out of their Trenches,but like unapt Soldiers for a skirmiſh, decayed not only in body, but in courage ; reputing their death for advantage, to L eſcape thereby their extream misfortunes. For which cauſe upon the firſt onſet, about ſome ſeven thouſand of them were killed : and thus the fierceneſs of this Nation being allaied by this overthrow, they ſubmitted themſelves to Herod, whom to their own ſorrow they had approved to be a valiant Souldier.

The Arabians enforced by thirſt, require truce at Herods hands.

M

HErod puffed up with his ſucceſsful fortune, returned back into his own Countrey, having obtained great reputation by his valour and vertue. But when he ſuppoſed his State to be moſt aſſured, he grew in danger both to loſe his dignity and life, by reaſon of that victory that Cæſar obtained againſt Antony in the Actian War. For at that time he not only ſuppoſed himſelf to be utterly overthrown, but both his friends and Enemies that were round about him loſt their hopes, for that it was unlikely that he ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed with Antony. Whereby it came to paſs, that his friends could not conceal their deſpair, and his Enemies under their colourable and diſſembled griefs, covered their joy, promiſing themſelves thereafter a better and N pleaſing adminiſtration of the Common-Wealth. Hereupon Herod perceiving that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the blood Royal alive, determined to cut him off, reſolving with himſelf, that if he hapned to eſcape the danger, a man who at that time was worthier the Kingdom then himſelf, ſhould not claime the Crown : and if any misfortune ſhould befall him in regard of Cæſar, he deſired to diſpoſſeſs Hircanus of the Kingdom, in regard of the envy which he bare him, for that he was the only man who deſerved to be advanced to that dignity. Whileſt thus he was tormented in his thoughts, he had an occaſion offered him by Hircanus own followers to execute his intention. endure the ſubiection of Herod, who was the very ſcourge of their family, but rather that he ſhould ſtand upon his own guard, and reſerve himſelf to his better fortune. A She gave him counſel to write unto Malchus, who had the Government of Arabia, requeſting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herod ſhould chance to be cut off by Cæſars diſpleaſure, doubtleſs the Kingdom would return unto him, both in regard of his Nobility, as alſo of the peoples favour. Theſe perſwaſions of hers Hircanus, at the firſt repulſed, but afterwards being overcome by the importunity of the woman, who ceaſed not day and night to ſing the ſame Song of future hope, and of Herods Treaſons, he gave certain Letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherein he required him to ſend him certain Horſemen, who might conduct him to the Aſphaltite Lake, which lieth diſtant from the confines of Jeruſalem ſome three hundred Furlongs. And therefore he committed theſe Letters to Doſitheus truſt, both B for that he favoured Hircanus and his Daughter, and ſeemed likely for divers cauſes to hate Herod: for he was Joſephs kinſman, who was killed by Herod; and not long before, certain of his Brothers were put to death amongſt others at Tyre by Antonies command: yet for none of thoſe conſiderations continued he faithful to Hircanus. For he preferring the preſent favour of the King that then reigned to the reſt, diſcovered the Letter unto the King; who firſt of all giving him thanks, required one office of friendſhip more at his hands; which was that folding up the Letter, and ſealing it he ſhould conveigh and deliver the ſame to Malchus, and return his anſwer, for that it neerly concerned him, if he knew his reſolution alſo. Which when Doſitheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this anſwer, for that it neerly concerned him, if he knew C his reſolution alſo. Which when Doſitheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this anſwer, that he was ready to entertain both himſelf and his whole family, and all thoſe Jews likewiſe which were of this faction, promiſing to ſend him a band of Soldiers, who ſhould be able to conduct him ſafely thither, and ſhould be obedient to his command in all things. Now as ſoon as Herod had ſeized on theſe Letters, he called for Hircanus and demanded of him whether he had any confederacy with Malchus: he denied it, but Herod proteſting and bringing forth his Letter in an open aſſembly, commanded him afterwards to be put to death. Thus are theſe matters Regiſtred in Herods commentaries: for by ſome they are delivered otherwiſe, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which he had committed, but for ſome Treaſons againſt the King. For D they Write to this effect, that Herod at a certain banquet (diſſembling his ſuſpition) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had received any Letters from Malchus: and that he anſwered, that he had received Letters, but ſuch as contained nothing elſe but compliments. He asked him alſo whether he had received any preſent: and when he had anſwered, that he had received nothing but four Courſers for his Saddle: the King wreſted this to a Capitall offence of corruption and treaſon, and commanded him preſently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltleſs, they alledge this for a moſt approved argument; namely, his gentle diſpoſition, who even in his youthful years never gave ſign or appearance of raſhneſs, or pride, or ſignification of audaciouſneſs, no not even then when he had the royal government in his hands, but in the freedome E of authority diſpoſed of the moſt things by Antipaters advice. But at that time he was more then foureſcore years old, and knew that Herods eſtate was ſecured: and that there is no likelyhood that he would remove from beyond Eufrates where he lived in great repute, to live under Herods Juriſdiction, or to engage in any trouble contrary to his humor, and ſo far different from his nature; ſo that all theſe things ſeem to be fained by Herod.

Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and adverſe fortunes, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For when his mother Alexandra lived he was created High Prieſt of the Jews, and obtained that honor for the ſpace of nine years: and after his mothers death, he had ſcarcely governed the Kingdom for the ſpace of three F months, but that he was expulſed by his brother Ariſtobulus; and afterwards reſtored by Pompeys aſſiſtance, and receiving all his former honours, he lived in full poſſeſſion of them for the ſpace of fourty years. After this he was once more diſpoſſeſſed by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, lived certain years in captivity among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though he had many things promiſed him by Herod, yet after ſo many alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands; and that which amongſt all the reſt is moſt of all to be lamented, as we have ſaid, he was unjuſtly put to death, an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a lover of juſtice, and an obſerver of perpetual modeſty, and governed his Kingdom for the moſt part by other mens direction, being only guilty in himſelf of ignorance and the love G of idleneſs. Truly, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodneſs obtained ſo great riches:
For which deſerts of his, againſt all Law and right, he was cruelly put to death.

Herods diſpoſition of his affairs before he repaired to Cæſar.

H But Herod, after Hircanus's death, addreſſed himſelf to perform his journey towards Cæſar: and having little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendſhip with Antonius; he grew deſperately jealous of Alexandra, leſt ſhe taking opportunity of the time, ſhould incite the people to rebel, and fill the Kingdom with domeſtical ſedition: for which cauſe, committing the Government to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his ſiſter, and all his Kindred in the Caſtle of Maſſada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune ſhould befal him, he ſhould retain the Kingdom in his own hands, and maintain it. As for his Wife Mariamne, for that by reaſon of certain diſlikes betwixt her, his mother and ſiſter, he left her with her mother, in the Caſtle of Alexandrion, and committed them to the cuſtody of his Treaſurer Joſeph, and Sohemus the Iturean, I and with her, the keeping of his Caſtles, both which, had always been his faithful friends, and to whom, in way of honour, he committed the cuſtody of theſe Princely Ladies. But he gave them alſo this command, That if they ſhould be certainly informed, that any ſiniſter miſhap had befallen him, they ſhould preſently kill them both, and to the utmoſt of their power continue the Kingdom in his Children, and his Brother Pheroras.

CHAP. X.

Herod ſpeaketh ſo generouſly to Auguſtus, that he obtained his favor; he accompanieth him K into Egypt, and receiveth him with ſuch an extraordinary magnificence, that it put him in repute with all the Romans.

AFter he had in this ſort given order for all his affairs, he took ſhipping to Rhodes, to meet with Cæſar. And as ſoon as he arrived in that City, he took the Crown from his Head, aud laid it apart, but as for his other Princely ornaments, he changed them not; and being admitted to Cæſars preſence, he gave a more ample teſtimony of the greatneſs of his courage than ever: for he neither addreſſed his ſpeech to intreat his favor (according to the cuſtom of ſuppliants) neither preſented he any requeſt, as if he had in any ſort offended him, but gave account of all that which he had done, without being daunted L in the leaſt.

Herod cometh to Cæſar, and declareth unto him what pleaſures he had done Antony; promiſing him no leſs duty and love, if ſo be he might be received into his favor.

For he freely confeſſed before Cæſar, that he had intirely loved Antonius, and that to the utmoſt of his power he had done him ſervice, to the end that he might obtain the ſoveraignty and the Empire of the World; not by joining his Forces unto his, in that he was otherwiſe imployed in the Arabian War, but in furniſhing him both with Wheat and Money, and that this was the leaſt office which it behoved him to perform towards Antonius; for that being once his profeſſed friend, it behoved him not onely to imploy his beſt endeavors on his ſo Princely benefactor, but alſo to hazard both his head and happineſs to deliver him from perils. All which (ſaid he) I have not performed according as I ought to have done; yet notwithſtanding I know, that at ſuch time as he was overcome in the Actian Battel, I did not alter my affection with M his fortune: neither did I reſtrain my ſelf; for although, I befriended not Antonius with my preſence and aſſiſtance in the Actian War, yet, at leaſt I aſſiſted him with my counſel, aſſuring him, that he had but one onely means left him for his ſecurity, and prevention of his utter ruine, which was, to put Cleopatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might enjoy her eſtate, and might more eaſily obtain his peace, and pacifie thy diſpleaſure againſt him. And for that he gave but ſlender regard to theſe my admonitions by his own ſottiſhneſs and indiſcretion, he hath hurt himſelf and profited you, becauſe, as I ſaid, he did not follow my counſel. Now therefore (O Cæſar) in regard of the hatred which you bear unto Antony, you condemn my friendſhip alſo. I will not deny that which I have done; neither am I afraid freely and publickly to proteſt how much I have loved him: but if without regard of perſons N you conſider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, and how reſolute and conſtant a friend I am, and how mindful of kindneſs, the effect of that which I have done may make me known unto thee: For if the name be onely changed, the friendſhip notwithſtanding may remain, and deſerve a due praiſe.

By theſe words (which were manifeſt teſtimonies of his reſolute and noble courage) he ſo inwardly indeared himſelf unto Cæſar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he converted this his accuſation into an occaſion to win and work him to be his friend: for which cauſe Cæſar, ſetting the Crown upon his head, exhorted him that he ſhould no leſs reſpect his friendſhip, than he had in former times Antonies: and withal, did him much honour; certifying him moreover, that Capidius had written unto O him, how much Herod had aſſiſted him in his Wars that he had with the Monarchs of Syria. Herod ſeeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the Kingdom was more ſurely confirmed unto him, than before time, both by Cæſars bounty, bounty; and alſo by the decree of the Senate, which he had practiſed to obtain, for A his greater aſſurance, accompanied Cæſar as far as Ægypt, preſenting both himſelf and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his eſtate: endeavoring, by theſe means, both to win their favor, and to ſhew alſo the greatneſs of his courage; requiring moreover at Cæſars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Antonies deareſt friends, might not be ſought out to be puniſhed: yet notwithſtanding, he could not obtain the ſame, by reaſon of an Oath that Cæſar had paſt before he ſollicited him. That done, he returned back again unto Jewry, with greater honour and aſſurance than before; whereby he ſtruck them with wonderful amazement, who expected his contrary ſucceſs, as if by Gods ſpecial providence he alwayes over-went his dangers, to his great honour. Therefore he prepared himſelf to entertain Cæſar, who returned out of Syria, B to take his journey into Egypt, and received him at Ptolomais, with all Royal honour, and gave his Army Preſents with all abundance of Proviſion: ſo that he was accounted for one of Cæſars moſt affectionate friends, and rode about with him, when he took the view of his Army; he entertained him alſo, and his friends with One hundred and fifty Men, adorned with moſt rich and ſumptuous apparel. And for that they were to paſs thorow a Countrey, wherein there was great ſcarcity of Water, he furniſhed them with both Water and Wine; ſo that they needed neither of them. He gave Cæſar alſo Eight hundred Talents, and ſo royally ſatisfi'd he all Men, that they confeſſed themſelves to have had a far greater entertainment, than the Revenues and Profits of his Kingdom could afford them. By which means, he gave the more ample teſtimony of his C forward friendſhip, and free affection to deſerve well: and making uſe of the opportunity of the time, he obtained the reputation of a Prince of an heroick and noble ſpirit; ſo that he was held inferiour unto no man, for the good entertainment which he gave to the chiefeſt Romans in their return from Egypt.

Herod entertaineth both Cæſar and his Army very heroically.

Herod giveth Cæſar 800 Talents.

Mariamne and Alexandra diſpleaſed with Herod.

BUT as ſoon as he returned unto his Kingdom, he found all his Houſhold troubled, and both his Wife Mariamne, and her Mother Alexandra grievouſly diſpleaſed with him. For they ſuppoſed (and not without cauſe) that they were not ſhut up in that E Caſtle for their ſecurities ſake, but as it were in a Priſon; ſo that, in as much as they neithay might make uſe of other Mens, nor enjoy their own goods, they were highly diſcontented. Mariamne alſo ſuppoſed that her Husband did but diſſemble his love, rather for his own profit than for any entire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieved her, than that ſhe had not any hope to live after him, if ſo be, he ſhould happen to die, eſpecially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could ſhe ever forget what commands he had before that time left with Joſeph; ſo that by all means poſſible, ſhe laboured to win the affections of thoſe that had the charge of her, and eſpecially Sohemus, knowing very well, that her ſafety depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaved himſelf very wiſely and faithfully, containing himſelf F very circumſpectively within the bounds of his commiſſion; but after theſe Ladies had with pretty preſents, and feminine flatteries, wrought and mollifi'd him by little and little, at laſt he blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him; eſpecially, for that he hoped not that he ſhould return with the ſame power and authority, which before he had: and for that cauſe he thought thus in himſelf, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood ſhould not be deprived of that dignity wherein they were at that time; but would return them the like kindneſs when Mariamne ſhould be Queen, or next unto the King. Furthermore, he hoped, that if Herod alſo ſhould return with all things anſwerable to his deſires, that he would perform nothing without his Wifes conſent; or upbraid him G with the act, if ſhe contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loved her ſo, that it was impoſſible to equal or expreſs his affections; and for theſe cauſes he diſcloſed Herod but coldly entertained by his wife Mariamne.

Herod's ſorrows to ſee his wifes affections diſtracted and changed.

Herods ſiſter and his mother incenſe the King by ſlanderous reports againſt Mariamne.

Anthony and Cleopatra ſlain; Cæſar Lord of Egypt.

Sohemus honoured by Herod with dignities.

H the truſt that was committed unto him. But Mariamne was very ſore diſpleaſed to hear that there was no end of her miſeries, but they were altogether united and tied to the dangers of Herod; and ſhe oftentimes wiſhed that he might never more return again in ſafety, ſuppoſing that her life with him ſhould be very intolerable: all which, ſhe afterwards diſſembled not, but openly confeſſed that which afflicted her with diſcontent.
For when as Herod, beyond all expectation, arrived in his Countrey, being adorned with mighty fortune, he firſt of all, as it became him, acquainted his Wife with his good tydings, and happy ſucceſs, whom onely amongſt all other his friends and Wives, he embraced and ſaluted, for the pleaſing converſation and affection that was in her. But ſhe, while he repeated unto her theſe fortunate events of his affairs, rather entertained I the ſame with a diſpleaſant attention, than applauding joy: Neither could her great ſincerity cover the agitation of her mind. For when he folded his arms about her neck, ſhe unfolded her ſorrow in her ſighes; ſo ſimple and unfeigned were her affections; and ſeemed rather to be diſpleaſed than appeaſed by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was ſore troubled, perceiving theſe things not onely ſuſpected, but alſo fully manifeſt: but above all things, he was diſtracted, when he conſidered the incredible and apparent hatred that his Wife had conceived againſt him, which incenſed him ſo, that he could not reſiſt the love that had attainted him; ſo that he neither could continue in wrath, nor liſten long to peace, and being unreſolved in himſelf, he now was attempted by this; ſtraight diſtracted by a contrary affection: ſo much was his mind toſſed between K love and hatred, when oftentimes he deſired to puniſh the womans pride, his heart by loves mediation failed him in the enterprize. For nothing did more torment him than this fear, leſt executing his diſpleaſure againſt her, he ſhould by this means more grievouſly wound himſelf, through the deſire he bare unto his deceaſed delight.
Whilſt thus he was tortured in his paſſions, and conceived ſiniſter opinions againſt Mariamne his Wife; Salome his ſiſter, and his mother, having an inkling of his diſcontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunity to expreſs and execute their hatred towards Mariamne: for which cauſe they conferred with Herod, and whetted his ſpleen and diſpleaſure with variety of ſlanders, ſufficient at one aſſault to engender hatred, and kindle his jealouſie againſt her. To theſe reproaches of theirs he lent no unwilling ears; yet L he had not the heart to attempt any thing againſt his Wife, or to give free credit to their report; notwithſtanding his diſpleaſure increaſed, and was inflamed more and more againſt her, for that neither ſhe could colour her cares and diſcontents, nor he contain himſelf from exchanging his love into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had publiſhed ſome fatal doom againſt her, had not a happy meſſenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra being dead, Cæſar was become Lord of Egypt: for which cauſe, haſting forward to meet and entertain him, he left his family in that preſent eſtate. Upon his departure, he recommended Mariamne to Sohemus, giving him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granting him in way of gratuity a part of Jewry to govern.

Cæſar enlargeth Herods dominions.

Mariamne a froward woman.

M When Herod was arrived in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cæſar, he was highly honoured by him: for Cæſar gave him thoſe four hundred French men that were of Cleopatra's guard; and reſtored that part of his Countrey unto him again, which was taken away, and ſpoiled by her. He annexed alſo unto his Kingdom Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the Sea Coaſts, the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppe, with the Tower of Straton: which when he had obtained, he grew more mighty than before: and after he had accompanied Cæſar as far as Antioch, he returned into his own Countrey. Upon his arrival, he found that fortune which was favourable unto him abroad, too froward at home, eſpecially in regard of his Wife, in whoſe affection he ſeemed to be moſt happy. For he was as inwardly touched with the lawful love of N Mariamne, as any other of whom the Hiſtories make report; and as for her, ſhe was both chaſte and faithfull unto him; yet ſhe had a certain womanly imperfection and natural frowardneſs, which was the cauſe that ſhe preſumed too much upon the intire affection wherewith her huſband was intangled; ſo that without regard of his perſon, who had power and authority over others, ſhe entertained him oftentimes very outragiouſly: All which endured he patiently, without any ſhew of diſcontent. But Mariamne upbraided, and publickly reproached both the Kings mother and ſiſter, telling them, that they were but abjectly and baſely born.

Whereupon there grew a great enmity, and unincoverable hatred between the Ladies; and from thence alſo, there aroſe an occaſion of greater accuſations and calumniation O than before. Theſe ſuſpitions were nouriſhed amongſt them, for the ſpace of one whole year after Herods return from Cæſar; and at length, this long contriv'd hatred brake out violently, upon this occaſion that enſueth: Whenas about mid-day the King had had withdrawn himſelf into his Chamber to take his reſt, he called Mariamne to him to ſport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that he bare unto her. Upon this his command ſhe came unto him; yet would ſhe not lie with him, nor entertain his courtings with friendly acceptance, but upbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King took theſe reproachful words in very evil part, and was almoſt ready to ſtrike her: but his ſiſter hearing a greater ſtir and noiſe than was uſual, ſent the Butler, who long before that time was ſuborned by her, whom ſhe commanded to tell the King, that Mariamne had prepared a drink for him to incite and quicken him unto love. Charging him moreover, that if the King in hearing him ſpeak of this potion, ſhould ſeem to be moved therewith, that then he ſhould proceed further in his diſcourſe. He therefore (being in this manner before-hand inſtructed what he ought to do) at that very inſtant was ſent to diſcover his treachery unto the King; for which cauſe with a ſober and ſtayed countenance he entred in unto him, being ſeriouſly and well prepared to diſcourſe, and told him, that Mariamne had bribed him to preſent his Majeſty with an amorous cup of drink. Now when he perceived that the King was troubled with theſe words, he proſecuted his diſcourſe, alledging that the potion was a certain medicine which Mariamne had given him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which he had received according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his own ſecurity, and the Kings ſafety.

Herod, who before this, was highly diſpleaſed, hearing theſe words, was ſo much the more incenſed: for which cauſe, he preſently commanded Mariamne's moſt faithful ſervant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poiſon, ſuppoſing that it was impoſſible for her to undertake any thing whatſoever without his privity. He being tried and tormented after this cruel manner, confeſſed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared unto the King, that the hatred which his wife had conceived againſt him, proceeded from certain words that Sohemus had told her. Scarcely had he finiſhed theſe words, but that the King cryed out with a loud voice, ſaying, That Sohemus, who before time had been moſt faithfull, both to him and his Kingdom, would not have declared theſe his privy commands, except there had been ſome more inward familiarity and ſecrecy betwixt him and Mariamne: for which cauſe he preſently commanded his Miniſters to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her tryal, and to this effect he aſſembled his moſt familiar friends, before whom he began to accuſe her with great ſpight and ſpleen, as touching theſe potions and poiſons aforeſaid; wherein he uſed intemperate and unſeemly ſpeches, and ſuch as for their bitterneſs did ill become him in cauſe of juſtice; ſo that in the end, the aſſiſtants ſeeing the ſcope of his deſire, pronounced ſentence of death againſt her: which being paſt, both he, and all other the aſſiſtants were of his opinion, that ſhe ſhould not ſo ſpeedily be executed, but that ſhe ſhould be kept cloſe priſoner in ſome ſure place in the Palace. But by Salomes ſollicitations, Herod was incited to haſten her death, for that ſhe alledged that the King ought to fear, leſt ſome ſedition ſhould be raiſed amongſt the people, if he ſhould keep her alive in priſon. And by this means Mariamne was led unto her death.

Sohemus ſuſpected by Herod in Mariamnes behalf is put to death.

Mariamne is accuſed by Herod, and condemned, and impriſoned.

Mariamne by Salomes inſtigations is led to execution.

Alexandra her mother conſidering the eſtate of the time, and fearing no leſs miſchief from Herods hands than her daughter was aſſured of; ſhe undecently changed her mind, and abjectly laid aſide her former courage and magnanimity. For intending to make it known, that ſhe was neither party nor privy to thoſe crimes wherewith Mariamne was charged, ſhe went out to meet her daughter, and entertained her injuriouſly, proteſting publickly that ſhe was a wicked woman, and ungrateful towards her husband; and that ſhe well deſerved the puniſhment that was adjudged her, for that ſhe durſt be ſo bold to attempt ſo heinous a fact, reſpecting to requite her husbands entire love with her unfeigned loyalty. Whilſt thus diſhoneſtly ſhe counterfeited her diſpleaſure, and was ready to pull Mariamne by the hair; the aſſiſtants, according to her deſert, condemned her generally for her hypocriſie: but ſhe that was led to be puniſhed, convicted her ſelf by her mild behaviour; for firſt of all, ſhe gave her no anſwer, neither was any ways altered by her reproaches, neither would ſo much as caſt her eye upon her; making it appear, that ſhe diſcreetly concealed and covered her mothers imperfections, and was aggrieved that ſhe had ſo openly ſhewed ſo great indignity: expreſſing for her own part, a conſtant behaviour, and going to her death without change of colour, ſo that thoſe that beheld her, perceived in her a kind of manifeſt courage and nobility, even in her utmoſt extremity.

Alexandra undecently ſtriveth to acquit her ſelf of Mariamnes Treaſon.

H Thus died Mariamne, having been a woman that excelled both in continence and courage; notwithſtanding that ſhe failed ſomewhat in affability and impatience of nature: for the reſt of her parts, ſhe was an admirable and pleaſing beauty, and of ſuch a carriage in thoſe companies wherein ſhe was entertained, that it was impoſſible to expreſs the ſame, in that ſhe ſurpaſſed all thoſe of her time; which was the principal cauſe that ſhe lived not graciouſly and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loved her, and from whom ſhe received nothing that might diſcontent her, ſhe preſumed upon a great and intemperate liberty in her diſcourſe. She digeſted alſo the loſs of her friends very hardly, according as in open terms ſhe made known unto the King; whereby alſo it came to paſs, I that both Herods mother and ſiſter, and himſelf likewiſe grew at odds with her.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections, who before as we have declared, was already miſerably diſtracted. For neither did he love after the common manner of married folk; but whereas almoſt even unto madneſs he nouriſhed this his deſire, he could not be induced by the too unbridled manners of his wife to allay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doating on her, he increaſed the ſame. And all that time eſpecially he ſuppoſed that God was diſpleaſed with him for the death of Mariamne. Oftentimes he did invocate her name, uſing ſuch lamentable expreſſions that did not become the Majeſty of a King. And notwithſtanding he deviſed all kinds of delights and ſports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and K inviting gueſts with Princely hoſpitality, to paſs away the time; yet all thoſe profited him nothing, for which cauſe he gave over the charge and adminiſtration of his Kingdom. At length he was ſo beſotted with grief, that oftentimes he commanded his ſervants to call his wife Mariamne, as if ſhe had been alive. Whileſt thus he was afflicted, there came a peſtilence within the City, that conſumed a great part of the people, and moſt of the nobility, and all interpreted that this puniſhment was inflicted by God upon them, for the unjuſt death of the Queen. Thus the Kings diſcontents being by this means increaſed, he at laſt hid himſelf in a ſolitary wilderneſs, under pretext of hunting: where afflicting himſelf inceſſantly, at laſt, he fell into a moſt grievous ſickneſs. This diſeaſe of his was an inflammation or pain in the neck: he ſeemed alſo in ſome ſort to rave and grow mad: neither L could any remedies relieve him of his agony: but when the ſickneſs ſeemed rather to increaſe, all men at laſt grew almoſt deſperate of his recovery. For which cauſe his Phyſician, partly in reſpect of the contumacy of his diſeaſe, partly, becauſe in ſo great a danger there was not any free election of dyet, they gave him leave to taſte whatſoever beſt pleaſed his appetite, committing the uncertain event of his health to the hands of fortune.

Herods miſerable eſtate and moan after the death of his wife.

A plague invadeth Jeruſalem.

Herod falleth grievouſly ſick.

Whileſt thus he continued in Samaria, which now is called Sebaſte, Alexandra, being at that time in Jeruſalem, having notice of this his condition, endeavored to reduce all the ſtrong fortreſſes that were within the City under her ſubjection: the one of which was hard by the Temple: the other was ſituate within the City: for they that are Maſters of theſe keep all the reſt of the nation under their awe: becauſe that without theſe, neither the uſual and M daily ſacrifices may be performed: neither may the Jews live without ſuch ſacrifices and oblations, who had rather loſe their lives than contemn their religion. She therefore ſolicited thoſe that had the government thereof, to ſurrender them up to her and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mariamne, leſt he being dead, they ſhould be ſeiſed on by others: and if it ſhould fortune him to recover his health, in the mean while they might be kept and held by no man more ſecurely, than ſuch as were his neareſt friends. This ſuit and ſolicitation of hers was but coldly received: and the Captains who at all times ſhewed themſelves always faithful, at that time were the rather far more conſtant in their duty, both for that they hated Alexandra, and alſo that they thought it a great offence to deſpair of the health of their Prince. For theſe were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods own Nephew, N whoſe name was Achiabus. For which cauſe they ſent preſently meſſengers unto him to ſhew him Alexandra's intent: who having heard theſe news, preſently commanded her to be put to death: and at length overcoming his ſickneſs, he grew ſo badly affected both in body and mind, that he grew hateful unto all men: ſo that all thoſe who offended him, and for how little cauſe ſoever, were preſently puniſhed. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of divers of his friends, as Coſtabarus, Lyſimachus, Antipater, ſirnamed Gadias, and Doſitheus, for this occaſion that enſueth. Coſtabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greateſt account amongſt his countreymen, who was deſcended from the Prieſts of Cozas, whom the Idumæans eſteem for a god, before that Hircanus had obliged them to embrace the Jews Religion. Herod being made King of the Jews, appointed Coſtabarus to be Governor in O Idumæa and Gaza, giving him Salome his ſiſter to wife, after he had put Joſeph to death, to whom ſhe had been married before, as we have declared. Coſtabarus ſeeing himſelf in this eſtate beyond his expectation, grew more proud then this good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himſelf ſo far, that he thought himſelf diſhonoured, if he ſhould perform had withdrawn himſelf into his Chamber to take his reſt, he called Mariamne to him to A ſport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that he bare unto her. Upon this his command ſhe came unto him; yet would ſhe not lie with him, nor entertain his courtings with friendly acceptance, but upbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King took theſe reproachful words in very evil part, and was almoſt ready to ſtrike her: but his ſiſter hearing a greater ſtir and noiſe than was uſual, ſent the Butler, who long before that time was ſuborned by her, whom ſhe commanded to tell the King, that Mariamne had prepared a drink for him to incite and quicken him unto love. After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections, who before as we have declared, was already miſerably diſtracted. For neither did he love after the common manner of married folk; but whereas almoſt even unto madneſs he nouriſhed this his deſire, he could not be induced by the too unbridled manners of his wife to allay the heat of his affection; but that daily more and more by doating on her, he increaſed the ſame. And all that time eſpecially he ſuppoſed that God was diſpleaſed with him for the death of Mariamne. Oftentimes he did invocate her name, uſing ſuch lamentable expreſſions that did not become the Majeſty of a King. And notwithſtanding he deviſed all kinds of delights and ſports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and K inviting gueſts with Princely hoſpitality, to paſs away the time; yet all thoſe profited him nothing, for which cauſe he gave over the charge and adminiſtration of his Kingdom. At length he was ſo beſotted with grief, that oftentimes he commanded his ſervants to call his wife Mariamne, as if ſhe had been alive. Whileſt thus he was afflicted, there came a peſtilence within the City, that conſumed a great part of the people, and moſt of the nobility, and all interpreted that this puniſhment was inflicted by God upon them, for the unjuſt death of the Queen. Thus the Kings diſcontents being by this means increaſed, he at laſt hid himſelf in a ſolitary wilderneſs, under pretext of hunting: where afflicting himſelf inceſſantly, at laſt, he fell into a moſt grievous ſickneſs. that which Herod commanded him, and ſcorned that the Idumæans ſhould be under the Jews ſubjection, notwithſtanding they had received their manner of government from them. He therefore ſent meſſengers unto Cleopatra, giving her to underſtand, that Idumæa had alwayes been under her anceſtors ſubjection: and for that cauſe ſhe ought upon juſt cauſe to demand and beg that countrey at Antonius hands, and that for himſelf he was ready to become her ſervant. All which he practiſed, not to gratifie Cleopatra in any ſort whatſoever, but to the intent that if Herods fortunes ſhould be any wayes weakned, he might more eaſily by this means both enlarge and obtain the Kingdom of Idumæa. And with theſe fooliſh hopes was he tranſported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together by ſuch diſhoneſt means as he continually practiſed, as he that intended no ſmall matters. But notwithſtanding Cleopatra's often and earneſt petition to obtain his ſoveraignty, yet could ſhe not obtain it at Antonius hands. When Herod had notice of theſe covert and cunning practices, he was ready to kill Coſtabarus. But upon the earneſt ſupplications of his ſiſter and her mother, he diſmiſſed and pardoned him; yet held him alwayes in ſuſpicion, by reaſon of this practice. Not long after it hapned, that Salome fell at debate with Coſtabarus, for which cauſe ſhe ſent a Bill of divorce to her husband, notwithſtanding it were againſt the laws and ordinary cuſtoms of the Jews. For according to our ordinances, it is only lawful for the husband to do the ſame; and as touching the wife, notwithſtanding ſhe were ſeparated, yet it is not lawful for her to marry again, except her husband firſt give her licence. But Salome without reſpect of the laws of the countrey grounding her ſelf too much upon her own authority, forſook her husband: ſaying, that ſhe ſeparated her ſelf from her husband, by reaſon of the great friendſhip which ſhe bare unto her brother, for that ſhe had received ſome notice that Coſtabarus conſpired againſt her with Antipater, Lyſimachus and Doſitheus. And this accuſation ſhe confirmed by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all ſecurity for the ſpace of twelve years. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as ſoon as he heard it. For as for Babas ſons, he had heretofore reſolved to cut them off, for that they had been always diſaffected towards him and all his enterpriſes; but all that time he had let them paſs, becauſe by continuance they were grown out of his remembrance. Now the cauſe of this enmity and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground; when Antigonus enjoyed the ſoveraignty, and Herod beſieged the City of Jeruſalem with an army; thoſe incommodities and neceſſities that ordinarily happen unto thoſe that are beſieged, were the cauſe that divers acknowledged Herod, and fixed their hopes upon him. But Babas ſons being in authority, and beſides that, attended by a great number of men, perſevered in their faithful obſervation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the Kingdom in thoſe to whom it appertained by deſcent: and they themſelves followed that courſe, which in their opinion was moſt profitable for the Commonweal. But after that the City was ſurprized by Herod, and he grew maſter of the eſtate, Coſtabarus, who was appointed to keep the City gates, and to lie in wait that none of thoſe who were accuſed to have forſaken the Kings ſide, ſhould eſcape, knowing that the ſons of Babas were greatly eſteemed and honoured among the people, and foreſeeing that their ſafety might be no ſmall furtherance to himſelf, if at any time there might enſue any alteration, he diſcharged and hid them within his own poſſeſſions: and notwithſtanding that at that time he had proteſted to Herod by an oath, that he knew not what was become of them, yet though ſuſpected of perjury, he concealed them. And afterwards when the King had by Proclamation promiſed a reward to him that ſhould diſcover them, and ſought for them by all means, neither then alſo would he confeſs the fact. For being afraid leſt he ſhould be puniſhed for his firſt denial, he concealed them ſtill, not ſo much for their ſake as for his own intereſt.

The Theater and the Wraſtling places.

Now when the King had notice hereof by his ſiſters report, he ſent to the place where they were hidden, and made kill them, and all thoſe that were guilty of the ſame crime: ſo that no one of Hircanus kindred was now left alive, but all of them being killed, who excelled in nobility and dignity, he did what he pleaſed without any contradiction: for which cauſe he by little and little forſook the ceremonies and ordinances of his Countrey, and corrupted the decrees and inſtitutions of their anceſtors, which he ought to have kept inviolable, by his new and ſtrange inventions. In whoſe time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of living: for all fell from bad to worſe: and the politick order, whereby the people ought to be governed and kept within compaſs of their duty, went to decay. For firſt of all, he ordained certain wraſtlings from five years to five years, in honour of Cæſar: and builded a Theater for that purpoſe within Jeruſalem. He erected alſo a moſt huge Amphitheater within the Plain, which were two Monuments worthy to be ſeen, by reaſon of the ſumptuouſneſs thereof: but wholly contrary to the faſhions of the Jews. For neither the uſe,

H uſe,nor the preſentation of theſe ſpectacles,hath ever been practiſed or taught by our Anceſtors; yet was it his pleaſure to ennoble this aſſembly,to the end it might be continued from five to five years,and this he proclaimed publickly in the Countries round about,and to this ſight he aſſembled all the nations. The wraſtlers alſo and all that which concerned their exerciſe, were ſought out from all corners of the world,under the hope to obtain the propoſed palm and victory; and all the moſt expedient in thoſe exercrſes that were to be found,were invited to that aſſembly: For he propoſed moſt huge rewards,not only to thoſe that exerciſed wraſtling,but alſo to thoſe who are called Muſicians,and to all ſorts of players on inſtruments, endeavoring to his utmoſt power, that all the moſt famous in thoſe profeſſions ſhould I be aſſiſtant in thoſe paſtimes. He appointed alſo a reward of great value for ſuch as ran upon the chariots of three,four,or of one horſe,and all that which was both ſumptuous and magnificent to behold;for every one thing was moſt carefully provided; for he ſtrove to have the Cæſars titles,and the trophees of thoſe nations which were overcome by him,altogether ſet out and ſhining with gold and ſilver. As for the inſtruments thereof,there wanted neither furniture,coſtly veſtments,or precious ſtones. Thither alſo were drawn certain wild beaſts,as Lions and other beaſts,which were worthy to be placed in this famous ſhew, being admirable both for their force and rareneſs of nature,who fought the one with the other,and againſt ſuch men likewiſe who were condemned to die: whereby the ſtrangers conceived,together K with the admiration of his expence an uncomparable and unaccuſtomed pleaſure. But his countreymen interpreted this thing for a manifeſt corruption of thoſe diſciplines and manners which they had entertained and honoured amongſt them. For it was an act moſt manifeſtly impious,to hazard men againſt wild beaſts,to delight the eyes of other men: It was alſo a matter as impious,to change and prophane the ordinances of the countrey,for forrain exerciſes:

But the moſt hated of all theſe were the Trophees;for in that they were certain Images attired in armor,the uſe and veneration whereof were forbidden by our laws, this diſpleaſed and grieved them more than any thing whatſoever:neither was Herod ignorant of thoſe troubles which they procured. But he thought it to be a matter of danger to attempt the ſame for the preſent by force, and for that cauſe he familiarly debated the ſame with L ſome few of them,and diſcourſed unto them his occaſions,to the end to rid them of their ſuperſtition, but could not prevail. For all of them,with one conſent,cried out againſt the indignity which they ſaw him commit: telling him that although all other things were to be tolerated,yet the Trophees,which were Images of Men,were unſupportable,becauſe they were unuſual in their Countrey. Herod perceiving that they were diſcontented,and that they would not be eaſily wrought upon,except they had ſome contentment,he called the worthieſt men amongſt them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them what they thought theſe Trophees were: and when they cried out that they were images of men; he incontinently cauſed all the ornaments to be taken off from them, letting them ſee that they were nought elſe but naked ſtocks of wood;ſo that ſuddenly their diſpleaſure was turned into a M laughter, and their doubts were preſently diſcuſſed. Thus appeaſed he the people,and moderated the fury of their diſcontent; ſo that divers of them changed their opinions,and were no more diſpleaſed. Notwithſtanding there were ſome of theſe that perſiſted in the conceit they had of thoſe exerciſes,ſuppoſing that the corruption of their ancient diſcipline was an inducement to their grievous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to undergo all dangers,than to endure any alteration in their cuſtoms,by permitting that Herod ſhould introduce new and extraordinary faſhions, who onely in word was their King, but in effect an enemy of their whole nation. For this cauſe there were ten men amongſt them,who bound themſelves by oath to hazard all extremities,and to this intent they had hid certain ſhort ſwords under their garments: amongſt theſe there was one that was blind,who urged N and egged on by the ſtrangeneſs of thoſe things which he had heard,not for that he was of ability to execute any thing with his hand, but to teſtifie that he was ready to ſuffer with the reſt,if any misfortune ſhould befall them, by his example the reſt of them were not a little confirmed: Theſe having mutually undertaken this reſolution,repaired to the Theater, under hope that Herod ſhould not eſcape them, for that they intended to aſſail him unawares:
at leaſt if they failed of him,their hope was to fall foul on ſome of his favourites and followers,accounting this to be ſome comfort in their expected death,if in regard of their violated religion they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. And theſe intending to offer themſelves as Leaders unto the reſt, reſolved to execute theſe things. But one of thoſe intelligencers that Herod had ſent abroad to pry and ſearch into O ſuch like actions, having diſcovered all their conſpiracy, ſignified the ſame unto the King, when he was ready to enter into the Theater. He knowing very well what hatred was continually hatched againſt him,betook himſelf to his Palace,and ſent for the conſpirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact,and knowing that there

The ten men are executed, and the intelligencer is cut in pieces.

A was no way for them to eſcape, reſolved to endure their preſent misfortunes with courage: for being no wayes daunted, with a reſolute countenance they drew out their weapons, proteſting that their conſpiracy was honeſt and holy, not attempted by them for private affection, or their own profit ſake, but in the behalf of their publick diſcipline, which no good man would either ſee or ſuffer to be violated, though it coſt him his life.

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged theſe things for their juſtification they were led away by the Kings Miniſters to be put to death by divers ſorts of torments. Not long after this, that Intelligencer who had betrayed them, growing hateful in all mens eyes, was ſtabd by certain men, and chopt in pieces with their ſwords, and afterwards caſt B unto the dogs in ſight and preſence of many. Yet did no man diſcover this act, until after long and weariſome inquiſitions made by Herod, it was got out of certain poor women (who were privy to the fact) with divers torments. Then were all the actors of that murther puniſhed, with their whole families: and notwithſtanding all this, the common people was no wayes daunted, but were ready to defend their laws, except they were reſtrained by ſome greater power. Which when the King perceived, he reſiſted their endeavors with all diligence, leſt through theſe alterations in affairs, the people ſhould be drawn to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two ſtrong Caſtles within the City, one wherein his palace was, another called Antonia, that adjoyned near unto the Temple, fortified by him; he thought good to ſtrengthen a third called Samaria, the name whereof he C changed, and called it Sebaſte (which was diſtant from Jeruſalem ſome dayes journey) to contain thoſe of the common ſort that were abroad, under his obedience, and very fit to bridle any uproars that might be raiſed in the City and Countrey. And for the whole Nation he builded a Fort, which in times paſt was called Straton, and afterwards he named it Cæſarea. He builded alſo a Fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala, in a large Plain, where by turns he kept his horſemen. Beſides theſe, he builded the Fort of Eſthmonites in the Countrey of Peræa on the other ſide Jordan.

Now when he had fitly diſpoſed all theſe Caſtles through his whole Countrey, for the ſecurity and ſafety of his Kingdom, the matter of rebellion was taken from the common people, who upon every light cauſe are ſubject to commotions, in that he had prepared a D remedy againſt all privy conſpiracies, by planting ſuch forces always near at hand, who might prevent and pacifie all alterations at their beginning. After this, betaking himſelf to encompaſs Samaria with a wall, he brought to paſs that divers of thoſe who had born arms with him againſt his enemies, and divers of the people likewiſe that dwelt round about, came to inhabit it, both in regard of the Temple, which he intended to build in that place, as alſo for that he fortified the ſame for his own ſecurity (although that formerly it was not in the number of famous Cities.) He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebaſte, and diſtributed the lands that confined the City among the inhabitants of the ſame (which was by natnre a fruitful countrey) to the intent that within a little ſpace they might inrich themſelves. He invironed the City alſo with a ſtrong wall, being aſ- E ſiſted by the natural ſtrength and ſteepneſs of the place: and beſides the whole circuit, he included ſo much ground, that it was no wayes inferiour to any of the famous Cities; for it contained the circuit of twenty furlongs or ſtadia's. And in the midſt thereof there was a ſacred place, containing a furlong & a half, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a Temple builded, famous both for beuty and bigneſs. And as for the other parts of the City, he adorned them with all ſorts of ornaments. And ſeeing how nearly it concerned him to provide for the ſecurity of his perſon in this walled City, he erected a Fortreſs for himſelf. And as for the beauty thereof, his intent was that it ſhould remain for a monument to poſterity, of his magnificence and liberality.

The want of victuals breedeth the plague.

THat very year, which was the thirteenth year of Herods reign, very great calamities hapned in that countrey (either through Gods diſpleaſure, or for that the revolution of time would have it ſo.) For firſt of all, there were ſuch continual droughts, that by reaſon thereof the earth G grew barren, and produced not thoſe fruits which of it ſelf it was accuſtomed to bear. And after this the ordinary courſe of mens diets being altered by reaſon of the want of corn, the want of food was accompanied with a bodily ſickneſs (for that by cuſtom theſe two plagues do ordinarily entertain one another:) for this made the plague and ſickneſs more vehement, The year of the World, 3942. before the Nativity of Christ, 22.

H for that the ſick in this great penury could neither have care of themſelves, as was expedient, nor get convenient nouriſhment for preſervation of life: ſo that many died daily, and thoſe alſo that remained alive were in deſpair, becauſe they could not relieve their want and neceſſities, what diligence ſoever they uſed. For which cauſe, after the old fruits of that year were wholly conſumed, and all the reſt of their ſtore was utterly ſpent, there appeared not any means whereupon they might hope; namely, for that the miſery increaſed more than was expected, yea, and extended it ſelf beyond that year: ſo that they had nothing remaining by them, and the ſeed that was ſowed at that time mouldred away, and the earth for all their labours afforded them no encreaſe. The neceſſity therefore being I thus great, conſtrained men to ſearch out many new inventions to maintain their life: and the King likewiſe was in no leſs perplexity; in that he was deprived of thoſe ordinary revenues which he received by the fruits of the earth, and the rather, for that he had ſpent his money in repairing his Cities, according as before this we have declared: all things were waſted by divers calamities, ſo that a man could conceive no hope of remedy. Be-ſides this, the people hated their King; for that it is their cuſtom ordinarily to accuſe their Governors, as if they were the authors of all their evils. Yet did the King bethink himſelf how he might remedy theſe inconveniences, but he hardly could find the means, for their neighbors could not ſell them victuals, becauſe they were no leſs afflicted than themſelves; and although he might have recovered ſome little for a great ſum of money, Herod maketh money of all his rich ornaments and houſhold ſtuffe of gold and ſilver, and buyeth corn.

K yet he wanted it alſo to defray the charges: notwithſtanding in that he knew, that it behoved him to employ his uttermoſt endeavors for a general remedy to ſuch a violent oppreſſion, he melted down all thoſe movables he had either of Gold or Silver within his Palace, and ſpared nothing, either for the matter, the excellency, or the faſhion; no not ſo much as the veſſels wherein he was ordinarily ſerved. This money was ſent into Egypt, where at that time, under Cæſar, Petronius held the government. This man being Herod's friend, in that he deſired the ſafety of his ſubjects, at ſuch time as divers of them retired themſelves unto him, by reaſon of their neceſſity, he permitted them to buy up corn, and aſſiſted them in all things, both in their bargains, and in their carriages: ſo that the greater or the whole ſum of their ſuccours was attributed to him. But after their return, Herod L did ſo much, that the care that was taken by him did not only change the affections of thoſe which were his enemies, but beſides all this, he purchaſed great praiſe and commendation for his liberality and ſingular providence. For, firſt of all, he diſtributed a certain quantity of corn to all thoſe who were not able of themſelves to ſupply their own wants, uſing herein both great care and diligence. After this, for that there were a great number of ſuch, who in regard of their age, or ſome other infirmity, were unable to prepare their victuals, he took order for their relief, and appointed them certain Bakers, who ſhould furniſh them with bread ſufficient for their ſubſiſtance. He gave order alſo, that they ſhould not paſs the winter without cloathing, but provided for ſuch as were naked ſufficient raiment, conſidering that the ſheep were partly dead, and partly devoured, and M that there was no wool to ſet them awork, or other ſtuff to make garments of. Now after he had furniſhed his ſubjects with theſe things, he thought good alſo to ſhew kindneſs to the neighboring Cities, and ſtored the Syrians with ſeed-corn to ſow their lands, which yielded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gave him a large and plentiful tribute for that ſhe had received, ſo that all of them had abundance of victuals: and as ſoon as the harveſt was ready, he ſent fifty thouſand men into that Country which he had relieved: and by this means he with all diligence reſtored his afflicted Kingdom, and comforted his neighbors, who were oppreſſed with the like calamity. For there was not any man in neceſſity, that according to his quality was not aſſiſted and ſuccoured.

The Jews favour Herod for his bounty.

The Villages likewiſe and the Cities, and thoſe of the common ſort who entertained N great houſholds, and were in want, having their recourſe unto him, received that which they had need of: ſo that to reckon up all the Corn which he gave unto thoſe who were not his ſubjects, it appeareth that he employed ten thouſand Cores of Wheat: now the Core containeth ten Athenian buſhels: and within the compaſs of his Realm he employed eighty thouſand: which care of his, and diſcreet favour, wrought ſo much in the hearts of the Jews, and was ſo highly renowned amongſt other Nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceived againſt him, for that he had altered certain cuſtoms of their Kingdom, was wholly forgotten, and he was ſuppoſed by them to have made a ſufficient recompence, by the diligence he had ſhewed in aſſiſting them in their neceſſities: and no leſs glory obtained he amongſt ſtrangers: ſo that by theſe miſeries the King's honour O was not a little magnified, and whatſoever damage he received at home, ſo much honour and reputation atchieved he abroad. For whereas in ſtrangers neceſſities he had ſhewed himſelf ſo generous, none did regard what he had been before, but ſuch as they lately found him to be.

Herod ſendeth Cæſar five hundred of his guard. The Palace built in Jeruſalem. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12.

About the ſame time alſo he ſent Cæſar certain ſupplies, namely, five hundred choſen A men of his Guard, whom Ellius Gallus led into the Wars in Arabia, and had often uſe of them in his moſt dangerous attempts. When therefore his Kingdom was reſtored to its former felicity, he builded a Royal Palace in the higher part of the City, furniſhed with many large buildings, and adorned with gold and marble ſeats, ſo that they might receive a great number of men: he named alſo each room of the houſe according to their ſeveral names, and called one the lodging of Cæſar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with love, he married a wife, leſt he ſhould be diſtracted by vain deſires; and the cauſe of this his new marriage was this: There was amongſt thoſe that dwelt in Jeruſalem a certain Citizen called Simon, the ſon of Bœthas the Alexandrine, who was a Prieſt, and B one of the chiefeſt in Nobility amongſt them: this man had a daughter, the faireſt and comlieſt creature of that age, whoſe beauty being renowned by the common voice, it came to paſs, that Herod was taken with her good character, and afterwards obtaining the ſight of her, he fell in love with her; yet would not uſe his authority, leſt he ſhould ſeem to behave himſelf tyrannically, but choſe rather to accept her for his wife. Whereas therefore Simon ſeemed unworthy of his affinity, and yet too worthy to be contemned, he made election of a convenient means to obtain the fulneſs of his deſire; which was, to raiſe both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cauſe he preſently depoſed the high Prieſt Jeſus, the ſon of Phabetes, and eſtabliſhed Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinity with him. After the marriage was conſummate, he builded C a new Caſtle in that place wherein he had overcome the Jews, when he made war againſt Antigonus.

Herod removeth Jeſus from his Prieſthood, and placeth Simon in his room, and marrieth his daughter.

This place is diſtant from Jeruſalem ſome ſixty furlongs, or ſtades, ſtrong by nature, and fit for defence and fortification. For near it there is a certain ſteep hill made by Art, after the manner of a round dug, environed with round Towers, with a ſteep aſcent of two hundred ſteps cut out of hewed ſtone. Within the ſame there are divers places builded with great and ſumptuous workmanſhip, made both for defence and delight.
At the foot of this hill there are two houſes worthy to be ſeen, for divers ſingularities, and namely, by reaſon of thoſe Conduits of water, which although they ſpring not in that place, yet notwithſtanding they are brought from far with great coſt and expence. The D Plain that adjoyneth upon it, is all full of buildings, after the manner of a City, and the top of the Caſtle commandeth all the Plain. As ſoon as he had diſpoſed all his affairs, according to his hearts deſire, he poſſeſſed the Kingdom in great quietneſs, for that he made his ſubjects obedient unto him, both by fear, in ſhewing himſelf inexorable when it concerned him to puniſh; and by liberality, whereby he provided for their publick neceſſities: he therefore took an eſpecial care of himſelf, as if the life and ſafety of his perſon had been the ſecurity of his people. He behaved himſelf officiouſly and favourably towards all foreign Cities; he entertained the Princes with preſents, which according to his occaſions he ſent unto them, to inſinuate himſelf into their favors, being in his own nature magnificent and fit to govern: ſo that all his fortunes increaſed, and E all things fell out happily according to his deſire. True it is, that the care which he imployed in honouring Cæſar, and other mighty Magiſtrates of Rome, cauſed him to outſtrip his cuſtoms, and to alter divers Ordinances of his Country in building Cities, and erecting Temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the Land of Jury: for the Jews would not have endured it, becauſe we are forbidden to honour images and figures, formed according to the likeneſs of a man, as the Greeks are accuſtomed to do; but he did this in the Country and foreign Cities, and excuſed himſelf to the Jews: ſaying, that he did it not of his own head, but performed that according to the charge which he had from others, who were greater than himſelf: and in the mean while gratified Cæſar and the Romans, in that he reſpected their honour more than he did the ordinances of his F Country: although in all things he had regard to his particular advantage, and determined with himſelf to leave behind him after his death, large and ample teſtimonies of his power and greatneſs; which was the cauſe that he builded Cities with great charge and expence.

Herod beſtoweth great diligence, and no leſs coſts in his building.

The Tower of Straton, otherwiſe called Cæſarea, builded by Herod.

WHen as therefore he had found out a fit and convenient place upon the Sea-coaſt to build a City on, which of long time had been called the Tower of Straton, he both magnificently deſigned and ſet down the model and form thereof, and made many ſumptuous

H ptuous buildings, both Palaces and other private Lodgings, not builded after a ſlight manner, or of weak and fading matter, but of Marble. But the greateſt work of all, was the Haven which he made exempt and free from ſtorms and tempeſts, that in greatneſs reſembled that of Piræus, and was ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receive many great Ships into the Road, and had divers Rooms and Warehouſes to lay up the Merchandize therein. And the more admirable was this Structure, becauſe the materials that were fit to finiſh this great work, were not gotten in that place, but muſt needs be brought from other places, with great charge and expence. This City is ſeated in Phœnicia, upon the Coaſt in the way to Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, certain Villages ſcituate upon the Sea-coaſts, unfit either I for landing or harbour, by reaſon of the Affrick wind, and driving the ſand of the Sea upon the ſhore, giveth not any quiet road unto the ſhips, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at Anchor. To correct this incommodity of the place, he made the circuit round about the Port ſo ſpacious, that it was able to receive a great Fleet: and he caſt down to the bottom therof, which was about ſome twenty fathoms deep, certain huge ſtones, that for the moſt part were fifty foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, ſome more, and ſome leſs. This Mole extended two hundred foot, of which one half ſerved to break the violence of the waves; on the other half was built a wall fortified with Towers, whereof the faireſt was called by the name of Druſus, Livia, Auguſtus Empreſs Son, who died young: there was alſo many Vaults like Arches, to lodge Sea-men.
K The deſcent being hard by, incompaſſed all the Port like a round plat-form, that ſerved for a pleaſant walking place. The entrance and mouth of the Haven was toward the North, which is a wind that of all other moſt purifieth and cleanſeth. The ſupporter and ſtrength of all the circuit on the left hand, upon the entrance to the Port, was an ample and huge Tower, to faſten it the more ſtrongly; and on the right hand were two huge Pillars of Stone, higher than the Tower, that ſtood oppoſite againſt them, erected and faſtened together. All round about the Haven there were certain buildings, all of a row, of poliſhed Marble, and in the midſt there was a little Mount, on which there was a Temple dedicated to Auguſtus, which preſented it ſelf to their ſight who ſailed to the Port, there being two Statues, the one repreſenting Rome, and the other Auguſtus Cæſar. This City alſo L was called Cæſarea, as much to be wondred at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the Art whereby it was erected: and no leſs cunning was there ſhewed in the Vaults and Conduits under ground, then in thoſe buildings that were about them: ſome of them were conveyed toward the Port, and diſcharged themſelves into the Sea: but there was one that went athwarts all the reſt, to the end that thereby the rain-water, and the cleanſings of the City might be conveyed into the Sea, and that when the Sea ſhould flow, it might waſh and cleanſe all the City.

That part of the Mole that kept off the Sea was called Procymation, that is, Stop flood in Greek.

He erected alſo a Theater of Stone, and behind the ſame, to the Southward, an Amphitheater, that was able to receive a great number of men, and ſo pleaſantly and fitly ſcituated, that from thence a man might diſcover Ships at a great diſtance on the Sea. This M City was finiſhed at the end of twelve years, during which time the King was never wearied in following the work, nor negligent in furniſhing the neceſſary charges. After this, perceiving that the City of Sebaſta was already inhabited alſo, he reſolved to ſend his two ſons, Alexander and Ariſtobulus, to Rome, to preſent them unto the Emperor Cæſar.
Pollio, who was Herod's moſt intimate friend, had prepared them lodgings at his houſe; but it was needleſs, becauſe Auguſtus gave them an appartment in his own Palace. This great Emperor received them with all the kindneſs and civility imaginable; and gave their father the freedom to make choice of either of them to ſucceed him in his Kingdom, enlarging it with the addition of three Provinces, Trachona, Baranea, and Auranita, on this occaſion that followeth. A certain man, called Zenodorus, had rented Lyſanias lands; N and not contenting himſelf with thoſe revenues which he gathered, but deſirous to gather more, he lived upon ſpoils and robberies in Trachona, which is a Country the inhabitants whereof commonly live by pillage and ſpoil, which they purchaſe from the Citizens and Merchants of Damaſco. And ſo far was Zenodorus from prohibiting theſe robberies, that he himſelf alſo was partaker of the booty: ſo that the Nations neighbouring about, ſeeing themſelves thus abuſed, ſought for remedy at Varus hands, who was their Governor, requiring him to acquaint Cæſar with Zenodorus's proceedings. Which when he underſtood, he commanded that ſuch lawleſs ryoters ſhould be puniſhed, and that the Country ſhould be added to the Juriſdiction of Herod, to the intent that by his vigilancy, the inhabitants of Trachona ſhould no more moleſt their neighbors. For it was hard to reſtrain them, conſidering O that they were accuſtomed, and traded in ſuch theft, and could not live otherwaies.
For they neither had Towns nor Lands, neither heritages nor any poſſeſſions, but only certain retreats and caves under ground, and lived pell-mell like beaſts: and having made abundant proviſion of water and victuals, they might eaſily endure War a long time, time, and maintain themſelves in their caves, when their enemies aſſailed them without. A

The doors of theſe dens were ſo narrow, that they could be entred but by one at once: but within it was incredible ſpacious and large: the upper part thereof was not ſteepy, but plain, and in form of a ſmooth earth: for the whole place naturally conſiſted of a ſharp and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult paſſage thereon, unleſs a man be guided thorow the paths. For the way was not direct and ſtraight, but full of winding and many turnings. At ſuch time as they wanted opportunity to ſpoil their neighbors, they robbed one another; and omitted no kind of wickedneſs. Herod having received the gift of this Countrey from Cæſar, reſorted thither under the conduct of certain guides that knew the wayes, and having brought their power and proling to an end, he left the neighbouring nations B in aſſured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with envy, partly incited by the grief which he conceived through the loſs of his poſſeſſions, reſorted to Rome to accuſe Herod; yet could compaſs nothing of that which he intended.

Agrippa is ſent into Aſia.

Agrippa ſendeth the Gadareans bound unto Herod, who came to accuſe him.

Zenodorus Signiory ſold to the Auranites, and beſtowed on Herod by Cæſar, is the cauſe of the Wars.

When Agrippa was ſent into Aſia by Cæſar to govern the Provinces beyond the ſeas, Herod, becauſe he was his familiar friend, went to ſalute him at Mitylene where he wintered, and afterwards returned into Jewry. But certain Gadareans came unto Agrippa with an intent to accuſe Herod: but he ſent them bound unto the King, and vouchſafed them no audience. On the other ſide, the Auranites, who of long time hated Herod's government, ſtirred up commotions, and endeavored to draw the countrey into rebellion, and that upon a juſt ground, as it ſeemed, at that time: for Zenodorus deſpairing of his affairs, went C and ſold them a certain part of the Lordſhip in Auranita (which was comprehended within Cæſar's donation to Herod) for the ſum of fifty talents of yearly revenue, wherewith they grew diſcontented, for that they were unjuſtly deprived of their eſtates: and hereupon they made often incurſions, endeavoring ſometimes to recover the ſame by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their poſſeſſion by courſe of juſtice. They drew alſo unto them certain needy Souldiers; who according to the cuſtom of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innovation: which though Herod knew, and could have providently prevented them, yet exhorted them to maintain their titles rather by good means than open violence, being loth to give any occaſion of new trouble or diſquiet. At length, in the ſeventeenth year of his reign, Cæſar came into Syria: upon whoſe D arrival divers of the Gadareans began to exclaim againſt Herod, accuſing him of his ſeverity and tyranny: which accuſation they the rather attempted, becauſe they were chiefly incited thereunto by the inſtigations and falſe ſuggeſtions of Zenodorus, who bound himſelf by an oath, that he would never give over, until that delivering them from Herod's tyranny, they were reduced under Cæſar's protection. The Gadareans perſwaded by theſe his proteſtations, began to continue their exclamations, and ſomewhat the more audaciouſly, for that they perceived that they lived as yet unpuniſhed whom Agrippa had delivered into *Herod*s hands: for Herod had ſet them at liberty without any puniſhment, notwithſtanding that in regard of his own ſubjects he was inexorable as ever man was; and moſt patient in induring thoſe injuries that were offered him by ſtrangers, whom he alwayes diſmiſſed E without revenge. When therefore they accuſed him of violence and rapine, and for violating and razing down their Temples, Herod being nothing concerned thereat, preſented himſelf before the Emperor to juſtifie his actions. But Cæſar entertained him very kindly, and diminiſhed nothing of the good affection which he bare unto him, notwithſtanding all the uproars and inſolent tumults of the people. Thus was the firſt day ſpent in audience of their complaints, and in thoſe dayes that followed there were no further objections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiving both Cæſar's diſpoſition and the inclination of his Council, and fearing (as it was moſt likely) to be delivered into *Herod*s hands, the next night after ſome of them killed themſelves; others for fear of torments brake their own necks; and ſome of them alſo drowned themſelves in the river. And thus whereas F they ſeemed to condemn themſelves, Cæſar preſently abſolved Herod.

Cæſar commeth into Syria, before him the Gadareans accuſe Herod, and afterwards murther themſelves.

Ulatha, Paneas, and other regions are given to Herod.

Herod highly eſteemed by Cæſar, and Cæſar maketh Pheroras a Tetrarch.

And this felicity of his was ſeconded with another of ſmall conſequence. For Zenodorus having his bowels broken through an extream flux of blood, finiſhed his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Cæſar gave Herod his Countrey, which was a large poſſeſſion, and was ſituate between Tracbonita and Galilee, containing Ulatha, Paneas, and the Countries thereabouts. He made him one of the Governors of Syria alſo, commanding them to execute nothing without his advice. At this time he attained to the height of all worldly felicity: For whereas within the mighty Roman Empire all things were diſpoſed by Cæſar and Agrippa, Cæſar honoured no man more than Herod next to Agrippa: and Agrippa reſpected him above all men next to Cæſar. Whereupon he grew to be ſo confident, that G he begged a Tetrarchy at Cæſars hands, for his brother Pheroras: on whom he beſtowed one hundred talents of his revenue out of his own Kingdom, that if he ſhould happen to die, Pheroras eſtate might be aſſured and left no wayes ſubject unto his children.

H As ſoon as he had conducted Cæſar as far as the Sea, upon his return he builded a ſtately Temple of White Marble in honour of his Name, in the countrey which belonged to Zenodorus, near to a place which is called Panion, which is a huge cave in the heart of a Mountain, and a place of great pleaſure, under which there is a wide pool of immeaſurable depth, which is full of ſtanding Water, and the upper part of the Mountain is very high. From under this cave ſprings the fountain heads of the flood Jordan. This place of it ſelf ſo famous and delightful, was choſen out by Herod, and adorned alſo with a Temple which he built in honour of Cæſar. At that time alſo he releaſed the third part of thoſe tributes which his ſubjects paid unto him, to the end (as he ſaid) that he might I relieve his ſubjects after the penury they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their favours, who were ſiniſterly affected towards him. For they had conceived an hatred againſt him, becauſe all piety was in a manner aboliſhed, and the ordinances of the countrey in a ſort diſannulled by the means of thoſe temples which he had built, and each man privily murmured bitterly againſt him; ſo that they were inclining to a mutiny. But Herod with great diſcretion prevented it, and cut off all occaſions of inſurrection, commanding every one to mind his buſineſs; forbidding them to make any aſſemblies in the City, or to talk one with another under colour of walking abroad for pleaſure or feaſts ſake. Moreover he had ſent out certain Intelligencers to diſcover all that which was done, appointing grievous puniſhments for thoſe that miſliked his K Government. For divers of them were led unto the Caſtle of Hircania, ſome openly, ſome privately, where they were no ſooner impriſoned, but they were put to death; and both in the City and in the countrey, there were certain men appointed to take note of all ſuch that uſed any aſſemblies upon any occaſion whatſoever. He was ſo concerned at his ſubjects diſtaſtes, that as it is reported of him, he took the habit of a private man, and thruſt himſelf in the night time into the company of the people, to underſtand and gather what they thought of his government; and thoſe whom he found to be untractable and obſtinate, and would not be conformed to his will, he diſpatched them by one means or other, binding the reſt of the people by an oath to ſerve him faithfully, and conſtrained them to keep the oath they had ſworn, and to acknowledge his Soveraignty: whereunto L divers through the fear they conceived, eaſily condeſcended. But they who had more courage, & were diſcontented to ſee themſelves conſtrained, he cut them off by all means poſſible. He required alſo an oath of divers of thoſe Sectaries who followed the Phariſees Pollio and Sameas: and notwithſtanding they denied to take the oath, yet he did not puniſh them as he did the other for their refuſal, in reſpect and reverence of Pollio their Maſter. From this rigor alſo were they exempt, who amongſt us are called Eſſeans, which is a ſort of men that live after that manner that Pythagoras did among the Grecians, of whom I have more expreſly diſcourſed in another place.

Herod buildeth a Temple near unto Panion.

Herod remitteth the third part of his tribute.

Herod bindeth the people by an oath.

Herod excuſeth the Phariſees from ſwearing for Pollio's and Samea's ſakes.

The Eſſeans not much unlike the Pythagoniſts.

I think it not a matter to be overſlipt, neither varying from my Hiſtory, to report for what cauſe the King had ſo religious an opinion of thoſe men. There was a certain Eſſe-M an called Manahem, who in his ſect was accounted an upright and juſt man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He ſeeing Herod one day at ſuch time as he was very young and went to School, ſaluted him and called him King of the Jews. Herod ſuppoſing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reproved him ſharply for his ſpeech, ſaying, that he acknowledged himſelf to be one of the common ſort. Manahem ſmiling, hit him gently with his hand upon the back, and ſaid unto him, Thou ſhalt be King, and ſhalt have a happy reign; for ſuch is Gods pleaſure: and at that time remember thy ſelf of the words that Manahem ſpake unto thee, which ſhall ſerve for a teſtimony to put thee in mind of thy mutable eſtate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, than by juſtice, piety, and equity, to win the hearts of thy ſubjects: yet know I by revelation from God, N that thou wilt not follow theſe inſtructions; for thou ſhalt forget and neglect both divine and humane laws, though in other reſpects thou ſhalt be moſt fortunate, and purchaſe eternal glory. Yet ſhalt thou not eſcape Gods hands, for he ſhall chaſtiſe thee in the latter time of thy life with a grievous puniſhment.

Manahem foretelleth Herods government.

At that time Herod gave ſmall regard to thoſe his words, in that he had no hope that any ſuch thing ſhould happen: but not long after, as ſoon as he had obtained the Kingdom to the fulneſs of his felicity, he in the greatneſs of his power ſent for Manahem, and asked him how long he ſhould reign. But he returned him a doubtful anſwer. Which when Herod perceived, he asked him anew if he ſhould reign ten years. Whereunto Manahem anſwered, And twenty, and thirty, without ſetting him down any prefixed term. He-O rod contenting himſelf herewith, embraced Manahem, and gave him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Eſſeans for his ſake. I have thought good to regiſter theſe things, notwithſtanding they may ſeem uncredible, to declare that divers of our nation have had communication with G O D by reaſon of their holineſs.

Herod queſtioneth with Manahem about the continuance of his Kingdom, and loveth the Eſſeans for his ſake.

Herod buildeth a New Temple in Jeruſalem, after he had pulled down the Old.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 14. al. 11. Herod intendeth to re-edifie Gods Temple. Herod certifieth the people that he will re-edifie the Temple.

IN the eighteenth year of his reign, Herod, after he had finiſhed theſe many and admirable actions, conceived in his mind, a mighty project, which was to re-edifie Gods Temple of greater bigneſs and anſwerable height, hoping that this work, which was the moſt admirable of all thoſe he had undertaken (as indeed it was) being finiſhed, would B eternize his memory. But fearing leſt the people, in regard of the greatneſs of the enterprize, would be hardly drawn thereunto, he determined to ſound their intentions by his diſcourſe, and for that cauſe aſſembling them together, he ſpake after this manner:

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vain and ſuperfluous, to recount unto you what things I have performed, during the time of my government. For they have been of that nature, that they have returned me but little honour, and your ſelf great profit and ſecurity. For you your ſelves know, that in thoſe adverſities that have befallen you, I have been no wayes negligent in that which concerned your profit: and in thoſe buildings I have erected by Gods aſſiſtance, I have not ſo much regarded my ſelf, as that which concerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God, that I have brought the eſtate of the Jews to that degree C of felicity, that they never had or expected before this time. As for that which I have particularly done in the heart of the Countrey, and in the Cities which I have augmented, as well with ornament and beauty, as with a number of inhabitants: ſince you your ſelves know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your memory. But I muſt aſſure you that the deſign which I will preſently undertake, is far more holy and more excellent, than may be performed by us. For our predeceſſors, after they were returned from the captivity of Babilon, builded a Temple in Honour of our great and mighty God, which in height wanted ſixty cubits of that which Solomon firſt built: yet ought we not to object it as a blame, or aſcribe this action to any impiety in our Anceſtors. For the Temple was not at their diſpoſing, but the meaſure of their Building was ſet down by Cyrus and Darius the Son of Hy- D ſtaſpes, to whom and their Succeſſors, they have firſt of all been ſlaves, as after their time they have been under the ſubjection of the Macedonians: ſo that they had not the means and opportunity to raiſe this religious Monument, according to the firſt pattern, to that requiſite and convenient height. But ſince at this preſent, by Gods permiſſion, I have obtained the Kingdom: and that for a long time hitherto we have enjoyed a happy peace: and that neither money nor great revenues are wanting: and that which is our greateſt good, we are made happy by the favour of the Romans, who in a ſort are Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire friends: I will enforce my ſelf to repair that defect, which hapned in times paſt through the miſeries of our noble predeceſſors: reſolving with my ſelf to perfect that which is requiſite for the ſervice of God, in acknowledgment of the benefits which I have recei- E ved from him, by whoſe mercy and means I have obtained my Kingdom.

The Jews fearing leaſt Herod ſhould pull down the old Temple before he had prepared matter for the new, he promiſeth the contrary. Convenient ſtuff is gathered for the building of the Temple.

This ſudden and unexpected ſpeech of Herods filled all mens ears with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he ſeemed to promiſe ſuch a thing, as was beyond their hope, and as they thought far greater than his power: and that which moſt diſtracted them was, for that they had conceived a fear, leſt after he had pulled down the old, he ſhould not be of ability to erect a new. For which cauſe his counſel ſeemed to be dangerous, and attempt over difficult. But the King perceiving with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promiſing in no ſort to deface the Old Temple, before all that was prepared and poliſhed, which was requiſite for the building of the New. And in this he kept his word: For he appointed a thouſand chariots to draw F ſtones unto the place, and choſe out amongſt the reſt ten thouſand expert workmen. He apparelled alſo at his own charge one thouſand Prieſts in their accuſtomed Veſtments, whereof ſome gave the Maſons inſtructions how they ſhould work, and the reſt aſſiſted the Carpenters. This done, after he had prepared all things requiſite, he cauſed them to fall to their building. As ſoon as therefore the former foundations were taken away, and new were planted in their place, the Temple was erected upon them, in length one hundred cubits, and twenty cubits in height, above thoſe hundred cubits which the former contained, which twenty cubits were in ſome manner ſunck, after that by proceſs of time the foundations began to be ſetled: and during Nero's reign our Countreymen thought to have raiſed it to the firſt height. The building was of white G and ſtrong marble ſtones, which were each of them twenty and five cubits long, eight cubits high, and about ſome twelve cubits broad. All the ſtructure of the ſame was made after the manner of a Princely Palace on all ſides, and the middle part thereof was higher

H than the reſt: ſo that it might eaſily be diſcovered by the inhabitants of the Countrey many furlongs off; and eſpecially it was moſt apparent and ſubject to their ſight, who dwelt oppoſite againſt it, or repaired unto the City. The doors thereof and their porches were correſpondent to the reſt of the magnificence of the Temple, garniſhed with divers Tapeſtries and Azured Flowers, which adorned the Pillars: under whoſe chapters a Golden Vine ſpread it ſelf on each ſide, repleniſhed with many goodly cluſters of Grapes hanging down: which was an admirable work to behold, both in reſpect of the greatneſs, as alſo for the workmanſhip and matter whereof it was made. He encompaſſed all the Temple with moſt ſtately Galleries, correſpondent to the magnificence I of the ſame, and ſurpaſſing thoſe in times paſt for the coſt: ſo that never any man before him ſo magnificently adorned the Temple. Two of which were underpropped with very ſtrong walls, whoſe Workmanſhip was ſo exquiſite, that it is incredible to relate.
There was a ſtony riſing or hillock, and very ſtreight and high, the top whereof towards the Eaſtermoſt part of the City was ſomewhat ſmooth and bending. The firſt that encompaſſed it with a wall, was Solomon our King, who by Gods favour and labour of divers workmen, did firſt of all build the higher part: Herod alſo incloſed the lower part thereof with another wall, under which to the Southward there lieth a moſt deep valley. This wall was made of huge ſtones, cloſe faſtned the one unto the other with Lead, ſhutting all within his encloſure, and extending it ſelf very deep: ſo that the greatneſs K and height of this four-ſquare-building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatneſs of the Stones appeared in the Front, but on the inſide they were faſtned together with claſpes of Iron, which fortified and ſtrengthned the building for ever againſt all injuries of times. This work having been thus continued to the top, and the void ſpace between the wall and the riſing hillock filling up the floor above, was made level.
The whole circuit of the Tower contained about four ſtades or furlongs, a ſtade or furlong in length from angle to angle. On the inſide and near unto the top there was another wall of ſtone extended along the Eaſtern ſide: having a double porch of equal greatneſs with that of the wall, and placed in the midſt of the Temple, and openeth right upon the gates thereof, which the Kings formerly had adorned. Round about the L Temple were planted thoſe ſpoils which were taken from the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with all thoſe ſpoils which he had taken from the Arabians.
In a corner on the North ſide there ſtood a very ſtrong Fortreſs, builded by the Aſmonians; who were Herods predeceſſours, and had been both Kings and High Prieſts, and had impoſed a name on that Tower which was Baris, in which they kept the Prieſtly Veſture, wherewith the High Prieſt was wont to be adorned at that time only, when he was to offer ſacrifice. King Herod kept the ſame in that place, and there remained it after his death, until the time of Tiberius Cæſar, under whom Vitellius Governor of Syria, came unto Jeruſalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence, as was poſſible: and being deſirous to acknowledge the favour that he had received M at their hands, being requeſted by them that they might have the keeping of the High Prieſts Ornaments, he wrote unto Tiberius Cæſar to grant them that favour: and till the death of King Agrippa the Jews had the ſame in their poſſeſſion. But after that Agrippa was dead, Caſſius Longinus that governed Syria, and Cuſpius Fadus Lieutenant of Judæa, commanded the Jews to return the ſame into the Fortreſs Antonia; ſaying, That the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had been in times paſt. For which cauſe the Jews ſent Embaſſadors to Claudius Cæſar, to requeſt his favour therein, who arriving at Rome, found the young King Agrippa there, who beſought the Emperor that it might be lawful for him to have the keeping of the habit: who commanded Vitellius the Governour of Syria, to deliver it into his hands. It was formerly kept under the N ſeal of the High Prieſt and the cuſtody of the Treaſurers, and on the Eve of a certain ſolemn Feaſt, the Treaſurers went up to the Captain, who kept the Fortreſs for the Romans, and after they had opened their ſeal, they took the habit: and after the Feaſt was paſt, they returned it back again unto the ſame place, and ſhut it up under the ſame ſeal in the preſence of the Captain.

The Tower of Antonia.

After that Herod had in this manner builded this ſtrong Tower for the ſecurity and guard of the Temple, he called it Antonia, for the love of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefeſt men in Rome. In the Weſtern part of this porch, there were four gates, whereof the one opened upon the Kings Palace, to which there was a direct way thorow the midſt of the valley: the two others led unto the ſuburbs: and the fourth O opened upon the reſt of the City, and gave open paſſage unto the ſame, by the means of a number of ſtairs, by which men might deſcend to the foot of the valley: and from thence there was an aſcent by other ſtairs to aſcend upwards. For the City was ſcituate oppoſite to the Temple, after the manner of a Theater, which ended at this valley on the South ſide, where, on the very front of this ſquare, there was alſo another A gate in the middle, equally diſtant from both corners, and a ſtately Tripple Gallery, the length whereof extended from the oriental valley, as far as the Weſtern. It was impoſſible to extend it any further; for it took up all the ſpace. This work was one of the moſt famous pieces that was ever ſeen under the Sun. For the depth of the valley was ſo great, that it was impoſſible for a man to ſee the bottom if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithſtanding, on the ſame he erected this porch of ſo great a height, that but to look from the top thereof, and to conſider the depth as well of the Valley, as the height of the Porch, it would make a man giddy, and his eye could not pierce unto the bottom of the ſame. Thoſe Galleries B were ſupported by four ranks of Pillars equally diſtant; and a ſtrong ſtone wall filled up the ſpaces that were between the pillars of the fourth rank: the thickneſs of the pillars was ſuch, that one was as much as three men could fathom, holding one another by the hand, for each of them was twenty and ſeven foot about, with a double baſe at the bottom. The whole number of them was one hundred ſixty and two, they were engraven and damaskt with Corinthian work, ſo that it moved admiration in thoſe that beheld it. Betwixt theſe four ranks of pillars there were three Porches, containing in breadth each of them thirty foot, and in length a ſtade or furlong: and more than fifty foot in height. That in the midſt was in breadth once and half as much as theſe two; and in height twice as much. The floor was made of rare planks, C engraven with divers figures, and the roof thereof was far higher than any of the reſt, in which were certain huge beams morteiſed, on which there were certain pillars builded, united and joyned ſo together, that it is incredible to thoſe that have not ſeen it, and admirable to him that beholdeth it: for all the work ſeemed to be but one ſtone. Such was the faſhion of the circuit of the firſt Porch. In the midſt, and not far off from the other, ſtood the ſecond: whereunto there was an aſcent made with few ſteps. It was incloſed with a ſeparation of ſtone, with an Inſcription, forbidding any ſtranger to enter the ſame upon pain of death. This inward porch both to the Southward and the Northward had three gates, in rank equidiſtant the one from the other: and toward the eaſtward had one great gate, by which thoſe D men entred, who were cleanſed with their wives. For beyond that place it was not lawful for the women to have acceſs. But the third inward ſpace was onely acceſſible by the Prieſts. In it was the Temple, and within it the Altar, on which they were wont to offer up ſacrifices unto God. But Herod durſt not enter into the interiour Sanctuary, becauſe he was not a Prieſt, he committed that Fabrick to the Prieſts care, which they accompliſhed in a year and a halfs time: Herod had been eight years about the reſt. The people were repleniſhed with the fulneſs of joy, and every one gave thanks unto God for that the whole Work was finiſhed ſo ſpeedily, and wiſhed all happineſs to the King for his coſt and diligence in the execution and finiſhing thereof: and they celebrated a great Feaſt in honour of the reſtauration of the E Temple. Then did the King offer up three hundred Oxen unto God, and the reſt of them, each one according to his ability offered ſo many ſacrifices, that they can hardly be numbered.

A Conduit under ground from the Caſtle Antonia.

During the building of the Temple, it never rained by day.

About the very time of the Celebration of this Feaſt, in the honour of the Re-edification of the Temple, the Kings day of Coronation fell out, which he was wont to ſolemnize every year with great joy: and for this two-fold occaſion the ſolemnity and joy was far more ſumptuous and compleat. The King alſo cauſed a Conduit of Water to be made, and conveyed by pipes under ground, drawing it from the Caſtle Antonia unto the Eaſt gate of the Temple; near to which he builded another Tower alſo, to the end, that by the Conduits he might aſcend privily unto the Temple, if haply F the people ſhould practiſe any inſurrections againſt his Royalty. It is reported, that during the building of this Temple, it never rained by day time, but only by night, to the intent the work might not be interrupted: and our Predeceſſors have teſtified no leſs unto us. Neither is this thing incredible, if we attentively conſider thoſe other effects of Gods Providence.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 1. Herod made a new Law, that wall-breakers ſhould be ſold into Bondage out of the Kingdom. The puniſhment of theft according to the law of Moſes. Exod. 1. 22 Deut. 12. 15.

AMongſt the reſt of the affairs of the Commonwealth, the King thought it behoved him to redreſs and hinder private injuries, both in the City and Countrey: For the which purpoſe he made a new law unlike to the former, that it ſhould be lawful for ſuch as were Wall-breakers, to be ſold for ſlaves without the limits of his Kingdom:. Which Law did not ſeem ſo much to intend the puniſhment of Malefactors, as the diſſolution of his K own Countrey cuſtoms. For to ſerve Forreign Nations, who lived not after the manner of the Jews, and to do whatſoever they commanded them, was more prejudicial unto Religion than unto the parties convicted of that fact. Wherefore it was ſufficiently already in the old ancient Laws provided for the puniſhment of ſuch people, to wit, that a thief ſhould reſtore four times as much as he ſtole: Which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be ſold; not unto ſtrangers, nor into perpetual bondage, but only for ſeven years; at which time he ſhould again be ſet free. So that the common people did interpret this new Law to ſet down an unjuſt puniſhment, and rather to ſavour of tyranny, than of Princely dignity, and to be enacted not without contempt of their ancient Laws: So that L for this cauſe all men ſpake very ill of the King.

At the ſame time Herod ſailed into Italy to ſalute Cæſar, and to ſee his Children living at Rome. Where Cæſar receiving him very courteouſly, permitted him to take his Sons home with him, as being now ſufficiently inſtructed in the Liberal Arts. Who returning into their Countrey, were joyfully received of all their Countrey-men, both for that they were of comely ſtature, and of courteous behaviour, and in their very carriage did ſhew that they came of Kingly lineage. Which things moved Salome and the reſt, by whoſe falſe accuſations their Mother Mariam was deſtroyed, to envy them; fearing their power, and verily perſwading themſelves that they would be revengers of their Mother's injuries. M So taking hereby occaſion, they began alſo falſely to accuſe them, as miſliking their Father, who had cauſed their Mother to be ſlain; and as though they had an averſion from him, whoſe hands were imbrued in their Mother's blood. For they knew that by ſuch calumniation they might draw them into hatred, and avert their Father's good will from them. Yet did they not carry theſe their inventions to the King's ears, but contented themſelves to bruit them abroad amongſt the common people; which ſo in the end coming to his hearing, would cauſe in him ſuch enmity and hatred againſt his Sons, that it would overcome in him all natural affection.

CHAP. II.

How Herod gave Wives unto Alexander and Ariſtobulus, and how nobly he received Agrippa in his Dominions.

Herod married his Son Ariſtobulus to Bernice Salome's daughter, and Alexander to Glaphyra the daughter of the King of Cappadocia.

BUt the King as yet miſtruſting nothing, moved with a Fatherly care over them, had them in ſuch eſteem as reaſon did require, and for that they were now come unto man's eſtate, he married them both: Unto Ariſtobulus he gave Bernice the daughter of Salome; and unto Alexander, Glaphyra the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. O Which done, underſtanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Aſia, he went unto him thither, and invited him into his Kingdom, requeſting him to accept of his Friend's entertainment. Which Agrippa yielding unto, Herod o-

A mitted nothing that might delight him: For he received him in his Cities newly built, ſhewing him the fair houſes, and goodly Edifices, entertaining him and the reſt of his friends and followers with all ſorts of delights, pomp and magnificence, as well at Sebaſte, as at the Haven of Cæſarea, and in the Caſtles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium and Hircania. He alſo brought him to Jeruſalem, where all the people met him apparelled in ſuch rich and brave attire, as they were accuſtomed to adorn themſelves withal, when they celebrate their Feſtivals, and with many joyful acclamations received and ſaluted him. Agrippa offered an hundred head of fat Oxen to God, and feaſted all the people; and although he would willingly have made a longer abode there, yet Winter drawing on, fearing tempeſtuous weather, he was forced to ſail a- B way with all ſpeed to Jonia, both he and his friends being honoured with very great preſents.

Herod goeth to meet Agrippa at Pontus with a Fleet, by which he reinforceth his Army; and returning back with him a great part of his way, did much good to ſeveral Towns.

C HErod having paſt the Winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was with an Army minded to go to Boſphorus, the Spring time being now at hand, he ſailed unto him again, and taking his courſe by Rhodes and Cous, he came towards Lesbus, thinking there to find Agrippa: But by a contrary wind he was driven from thence, and forced to ſtay a while at Chius; where many privately coming to ſalute him, he rewarded them with Princely rewards: and perceiving that the City gate, deſtroyed in the Wars againſt Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but ſtill lay ruinated for want of money to repair it, he gave ſo much money as largely ſufficed to reſtore it to the former beauty and bigneſs; exhorting them with all expedition to re-edifie and adorn the City as it was in times paſt. At laſt the wind changing, he ſailed firſt to Mitylene, and then to Bizantium; and there underſtanding that Agrippa had already paſt the Rocks D of Cyanes, he followed him with all ſpeed, and overtook him at Synope a City of Pontus: Who contrary to Agrippa's expectation arrived there with his Navy: Herod's coming was very grateful unto Agrippa, and with eſpecial affection they embraced one another. It was an evident ſign of friendſhip, that the King omitting his own private buſineſs, would now come unto him in ſo convenient a time. Wherefore Herod abode ſtill with him in the Army, always preſent either to aſſiſt him with counſel, or to bear part of the Labour with him. He was alſo preſent with him at ſuch times as he meant to be merry, being his only Counſellor in difficult matters, for the benevolence he bare unto him, and alſo in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa having diſpatcht the buſineſs in Pontus for which he came, it pleaſed him not to return E by Sea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and ſo they came by land to Epheſus: and there taking ſhip they came to Samos. And in that whole Journey, almoſt in every City he gratified Herod, at his entreaty relieving many of their neceſſities. And Herod did in the way help many with money that wanted, and ſpent much upon his Gueſts; and moreover, if any one had any ſuit unto Agrippa, Herod was the only man that might obtain his ſuit for him. And though Agrippa alſo was both nobly minded and eaſily entreated to grant all ſuch things as were not prejudicial to any man; yet was it a matter of no ſmall moment and importance in King Herod, to incite him to uſe beneficence, being even of his own accord forward enough to put the ſame in practice. For firſt of all he reconciled Agrippa, being angry againſt F the Ilienſians, and himſelf paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted unto Cæſar's receivers, obtaining for them an immunity: And he alſo aſſiſted and pleaſured others in whatſoever they needed.

Herod ſailed unto Agrippa to Chius, and gave a great ſum of money to re-edifie the porch.

Herod found Agrippa at Synope a City of Pontus, and was by him honourably entertained.

The Jews who lived in Jonia complain to Agrippa, that the Grecians will not let them enjoy their Privileges.

The Jews of Jonia complain unto Agrippa of the injuries offered them by thoſe Countrey-men.

G WHen they came into Jonia, a great multitude of the Jews inhabiting that Countrey being gathered together, expected him to ſpeak unto him; and finding oportunity, they complained unto him of the wrongs that thoſe Countrey-men ofſered them, not permitting them to live according to their Laws ; and that upon Fe- H ſtival days they pulled and haled them before their Tribunal : and that they would not permit them to ſend ſacred money unto Jeruſalem, and that they compelled them to do publick buſineſs, and to ſpend the Holy money in thoſe affairs, contrary to the Privileges granted unto them by the Romans. Herod endeavoured to have the Jews complaints heard by Agrippa, and deſired one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Jews cauſe : Who made a ſpeech unto Agrippa, ſitting with the reſt of the Roman Nobility, and other Kings and Princes, in their behalf after this manner : " Moſt worthy Agrippa, true it is, that all men that ſuffer injury, are con" ſtrained to fly for redreſs to the Higher Powers, and we, over and above, hope to " obtain our ſuit. For we ask nothing but that which your goodneſs hath already I " granted, and that which they endeavour to take from us that are as we alſo are, your " Subjects. And although that your benefit beſtowed upon us was great, yet we are " worthy ſtill to enjoy it, only for that you your ſelf judged us worthy thereof. And " ſuppoſe it was a ſmall matter, it is a diſcredit for you not to grant ſo ſmall a trifle.

" Wherefore it is evident, that the injury done unto us, doth alſo redound unto " you, whoſe decrees thoſe that have injured us, fear not to contemn, and do diſanul " your benevolence towards us. For if any one ſhould ask any of them, whether they " had rather loſe their lives, than be deprived of their Countrey Laws, rites, ſacrifices
" and feſtivities, wherewith they honour their gods, I know they would rather " endure any calamity, than to be forced to forſake their Countrey-cuſtoms. For many K
" Wars ariſe only for defence of Religion : and the greateſt reward and content " that we reap by this happy peace, which through your means we enjoy, is this, that " we are every one permitted to live according to the cuſtom of his Countrey, and to " continue in piety. Wherefore they endeavour to take from others that, which by " no means they would permit to be taken from themſelves, as who would ſay, it was " not as great offence to hinder other men's piety and devotion, as neglect their own.
" Let us conſider whether there be any City or Nation, that doth not count their felicity " to be ſituate in your dominion, and the power of the Romans ? or is there any " that deſireth your honour and power to decay and be of no force ? Truly none that " is wiſe : For there is none, whom either publickly or privately it concerneth not : L
" But theſe people endeavouring to take from us our liberty, do alſo as it were deprive " themſelves of all benefits which they have received at your hands, which are infinite.
" For what a benefit is it, that whereas other Nations living under the dominion " of rigorous Kings conſtituted over them ; theſe do only obey the Romans, and " live in happy peace and tranquility ? But as for our affairs, were no man troubleſome " unto us, yet are they not ſuch as deſerve to be envied. For enjoying the common " felicity, which others your Subjects do, we deſire nothing of high eſteem or worth,
" but only requeſt that we may live according to the Religion of our Countrey, which
" of it ſelf is not to be envied, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God
" doth always love them who honour him, and them who do not hinder his honour. M
" What is there in our Religion offenſive to any man ? nay, what is there that is not
" according to all piety and juſtice, whereby all things continue and are preſerved ?
" For neither do we conceal what life we follow, nor the labours and exerciſe we uſe,
" but reſting the ſeventh day from all labours, we ſpend that day in learning our Religion,
" and the Laws and cuſtoms thereof, eſteeming this cuſtom not to be of ſmall
" force to correct and amend our manners. Theſe our cuſtoms having in them nothing " that any that ſearcheth them can juſtly reprehend, they are now alſo, though many " are perſwaded the contrary, conſecrated and confirmed by their antiquity : So that " we muſt needs make a conſcience of it to forſake our Laws, that have endured ſo
" many ages. Theſe are the injuries that theſe people by violence offer us ; they ſacrilegiouſly N
" take from us the money dedicated to God : They impoſe tributes upon " us, who are free : They upon feſtival days force us to their Tribunals, to Law, and " other prophane buſineſs, without any neceſſity, but only in contempt and diſgrace " of our Religion, which they know well in the mean time while they perſecute with " unjuſt and unlawful hatred. For your Empire, equally providing for the good of " all your Subjects, doth not only nouriſh the mutual concord of them all, but alſo " reſiſteth hatred and malice. Theſe are the injuries, moſt worthy Agrippa, whereof
" we ſeek redreſs at thy hands, requeſting thee that hereafter we may live according to " our Religion as formerly, and that our adverſaries may have no more authority over " us than we over them : which is not only juſtice and equity, but already alſo O " granted by your clemency. And there are yet extant, to be ſeen in the Capitol, many

A “which are read unto this day: doubtleſs for our truth and fidelity ſo oftentimes tried; “or at leaſt, though we not deſerving it, yet holy and inviolate. For you do “not only not withdraw from us and all other Nations, your former benefits granted “unto us, but you do rather every day, beſide all hope and expectation, increaſe them; “all which, time will not ſuffer me to rehearſe. And that we may not ſeem vainly “to boaſt of our duties and officiouſneſs towards you, and alſo omitting other things “that are paſt; our King now ſitting with you, can ſufficiently teſtifie it ſo to be.
“For what kind of love and good will hath he omitted to ſhew unto your Nation?
“where was he not proved truſty? what hath he not deviſed to honour you? where “ſtood you in need, when he was not the firſt man to help you? Why therefore, ſhould B “not we receive ſome favour for his deſerts? I will not omit to put you in mind of “the Valour of his Father Antipater, who came in with 2000 Souldiers to aſſiſt Cæſar
“in the Egyptian Wars, wherein he ſo valiantly behaved himſelf, that neither by Sea “nor Land any one in thoſe Wars deſerved more commendations than himſelf. I will “not repeat at this time how much good he did Cæſar in thoſe Wars, and what and how “great rewards he received; but rather I ſhould firſt of all put you in remembrance of “the Letters that the Emperour writ unto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith “he obtained for Antipater the honours and privileges of the City. For this only argument “had been ſufficient to have declared that we did not obtain ſuch favour without “deſert, and requeſt thee now to confirm the ſame, of whom we might juſtly hope for C “new benefits, ſeeing ſuch friendſhip and familiarity between thee and our King. For “we have underſtood by our Nation that dwell in Judæa, how many offerings thou didſt “there ſacrifice unto our God, and with what vows thou honouredſt him; how thou “feaſtedſt the people, and waſt delighted in that mutual hoſpitality. All which was an “argument of the friendſhip confirmed between ſo great a Roman Prince and the Nation “of the Jews, even in Herod's houſe. By all theſe, we humbly requeſt in the preſence
“of the King, nothing but this only, that thou wouldeſt not permit us deceitfully “to be defrauded of that, which you your ſelves have already granted unto the “Nation of the Jews.

Now no one of the Greeks offered to oppoſe himſelf againſt that which Nicholaus
D did ſpeak; for this was no contention to a Judge concerning their right, but only a deprecation and ſupplication to avoid injury. Neither did they deny it, only thus they excuſed themſelves, that the Jews dwelling amongſt them, were troubleſome unto them. But the Jews ſhewed themſelves to be free Citizens, and to live according to their Religion and Laws of their Countrey, without any man's moleſtation or injury.
Wherefore Agrippa underſtanding that they were wronged, anſwered thus: That he would not only gratifie them for his friend Herod's ſake, but alſo for that they ſeemed to him to demand a reaſonable matter. Wherefore, though they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would have granted them whatſoever he might, without prejudicing the people of Rome. And now, ſeeing they only demand of him that which E already the Romans had granted unto them, he would ratifie and confirm unto them the benefit which they had already received at the Romans hands, and provide that henceforth no man ſhould moleſt them for living according to the inſtitution and ordinances of their Countrey. Having thus ſpoken, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. Then Herod ariſing, thanked him in all their names. And then, after mutual embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaves from Lesbus.

Agrippa confirmeth the Jews privilege.

Agrippa departed from Lesbus.

F How Herod returned into Judea, and freed his Subjects from the payment of the fourth part of the Taxes.

THe King having a proſperous wind, within a few days after arrived at Cæſarea; from thence he went to Jeruſalem, and calling together all the people, as well the Citizens as alſo the Countrey people there preſent, there he told them the cauſe of his journey, and how he had obtained immunities for the Jews living in Aſia, that they might converſe there among the Gentiles, without moleſtation. Then he told them what felicity they had received and enjoyed by his reign, ſeeing that his greateſt care was ſo to provide for his Subjects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them G the more, he told them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the Taxes and Tribute they were to pay for the year paſt. The people greatly comforted, as well with the King's ſpeech unto them, as with his liberality, departed joyfully, wiſhing the Herod was fortunate abroad and unfortunate at home.

Herod advanceth Antipater to bridle the arrogancy of his Sons.

Antipater inciteth his Father againſt his Brothers.

IN the mean time, the diſcord of his houſe was daily encreaſed, by reaſon of Salome's inveterate hatred againſt Alexander and Ariſtobulus; ſhe preſumed ſo much on her ſucceſs againſt their mother, that ſhe hoped to leave none of her children alive to revenge her death: And ſhe wanted no occaſion, for it ſeems the two young Princes were not I very well affected towards their Father, partly for the memory of their Mother's death, and partly alſo for that they deſired the Kingdom. So that they upbraiding Salome and Pheroras, did renew their old hatred againſt them, who daily practiſed, by all means they could, to overthrow them: The young men alſo hated them, but not with the like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners and noble race, diſſembled not their anger, but freely declared their minds. But Salome and Pheroras contrariwiſe, enviouſly and craftily prepared themſelves a way by calumniations; always provoking the magnanimous ſpirits of theſe young Princes, whoſe fierceneſs might ſoon bring them into ſuſpicion with their Father, that he might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to revenge their Mother's death; yea, even K with their own hands, foraſmuch as they were not aſhamed to be the Children of ſuch a Mother, and would contend that ſhe was unjuſtly put to death. And now all the City talked of them, every one pitying their raſhneſs: Salome not ceaſing to gather by their own ſpeeches probable arguments of ſuſpicion, that they did not only take their Mother's death impatiently, but alſo raging like furies, did both bewail her death and their own caſe, who were compelled to converſe with the murtherers of their unfortunate Mother; and as it were, contaminate themſelves with living amongſt them. And the abſence of the King greatly encreaſed their diſſenſion; who being returned, having made a ſpeech unto the people, he preſently was admoniſhed both by Pheroras and Salome his Siſter, that he was in great danger by reaſon of his L two Sons, who did openly boaſt that they would be revenged of them that killed their Mother: Feigning moreover that they were encouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus King of Cappadocia would help them to accuſe their Father unto Cæſar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and ſo much the more, that he heard the ſame alſo reported unto him by others: And hereby he was put in memory of that which was paſt, how that for the diſſenſion of his houſe he could not long enjoy his friends and deareſt wife, And as it were foreſeeing by that that was paſt what would enſue, and fearing ſome greater calamity would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And truly, as abroad he was moſt fortunate above all hope, ſo at home he was moſt unhappy and unfortunate beyond men's opinion: So that one may well doubt whether M his fortunate ſucceſs abroad, did countervail his miſfortunes at home; or whether it had been more expedient for him to have had neither the one nor the other, but to have had only a common and ordinary favour at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himſelf, he thought it good to call unto Court another Son of his, whom he begat when he was a private man; and to grace him with honours, and to oppoſe him againſt the other two Brethren, to the end to bring down and repreſs their fierce and haughty minds; (this Son of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after overcome by affection he did) to make him ſole heir of all, but thinking thereby to bridle Mariamne's Children, and to diminiſh their arrogancy, by letting them ſee that it was not needful to keep the inheritance of ſo flouriſhing a Kingdom only for them; wherefore N he introduced Antipater, one oppoſed againſt them, that thereby the other two laying their pride aſide, might ſhew themſelves more tractable to their Father: And ſo thought by this means to provide for their ſafety. But it fell out far otherwiſe than he expected; for they eſteemed this fact as an injury done unto them:
And Antipater was of that nature, that having gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeavour all ways poſſible to be in greater account with his Father than the other two, who was already, through falſe accuſations, alienated from them, and every day (as he alſo deſired) ready to believe any thing that might incenſe him againſt them.

Wherefore this was all his buſineſs: Yet he had an eſpecial care not to be thought O an accuſer of his Brethren, but he uſed others of his Complices, whom the King nothing ſuſpected; who for the truſt the King put in them, might alſo have better credit given unto

A unto their words. For this man had many followers and ſavourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his means; who with a kind of counterfeit good will, made a ſhew of love and good will towards Herod, And being many in number, and truſty one to another, the young Princes were every day entrapped more and more: For many times they ſhed tears for very grief of the contumelies and injuries that they ſuffered; and many times they mentioned their Mother, and complained unto thoſe whom they thought to be their friends, of their Father, as one that dealt not well with them; all which Antipater's Favourites maliciouſly noting, and adding thereunto ſomething of their own invention, they did preſently tell it unto Herod; and ſo did foment the diſſention of his houſe. For the King being moved hereat, and purpoſing to humble B Mariamne's Children, did daily encreaſe and augment Antipater's honour; and at his entreaties, at laſt brought his Mother into the Court; and many times writing ſecretly unto Cæſar in favour of Antipater, he eſpecially commended him in particular unto him: And being to ſail to ſalute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Aſia, having governed that Province ten years, he only took with him Antipater of all his Sons; whom he alſo committed to Agrippa with many gifts, to go with him to Rome, and to be brought into favour with Cæſar: So that now all things ſeemed to be done, as it were by this man's beck, and the other two to be already diſ-inherited.

Antipater doth ſo incenſe his Father againſt his Brothers Alexander and Ariſtobulus, that Herod bringeth them to Rome, and accuſeth them before Auguſtus, for having attempted to poyſon him.

ANtipater's Journey to Rome, with his Father's Letters of Recommendation to all his friends there, proved both very advantageous and honourable to him; yet this was a great grief to him, that he could not daily calumniate his Brothers; for he feared leſt his Father's mind ſhould change, and ſo would affect Mariamne's Children D moſt. This being his daily fear, though he were abſent, he ceaſed not by Letters to incite his Father againſt them, as having care of his ſafety; but indeed for that he thereby through his bad practiſes, hoped to obtain the Kingdom; ſo that he encreaſed Herod's wrath againſt them, that he was become a deadly enemy unto them both.
But fearing raſhly in his anger to commit any thing to prejudice them, he determined to ſail again to Rome, and there to accuſe his Sons before Cæſar; leſt he being led away through indignation and diſpleaſure againſt them, ſhould ſeem to caſt off all love and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Cæſar there, he followed him unto Aquileia; and coming to ſpeech of him, and requeſting him to take notice of his misfortunes, he preſented his two Sons; and accuſed them E before Cæſar of inſolency, and for having attempted to poyſon him; complaining their hatred to be gone ſo far, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatſoever they ſought their Father's Kingdom, notwithſtanding that Cæſar had given him full power and liberty to leave the Kingdom to him whom he found moſt dutiful unto him. And that they, though thereby they might not gain the Kingdom, yet they could be contented with their Father's death; and that they ſought it with danger of their own lives; and that this horrible and deteſtable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that he having long endured this calamity, was now forced to open it unto Cæſar, and trouble his ears with theſe complaints. And ſpake after this manner: Have I, deſerved this at their hands? what wrong have I done F them? or how can they think it reaſon, that I, who have expoſed my ſelf to ſo many dangers, and undergone ſo difficult labours for a long time, to obtain the Kingdom, ſhould not peaceably enjoy the ſame, and ſuffer me to be Lord of my own Dominions, and permit me the liberty to leave it unto him who ſhall deſerve ſuch honour in the beſt performance of a Son-like duty? So that the beholders hereof, ſeeing piety ſo rewarded, might hereby be the more incited hereunto; eſpecially ſeeing that without violating the Law of Nature, it is not lawful to think any ſuch thought: For no man can affect his Father's Kingdom, but he doth alſo deſire his Father's death, ſeeing it is not permitted men to ſucceed thoſe in the Kingdom who are yet alive. He alledged moreover, that for his part he had had a care that they ſhould want nothing convenient for a kind G Father to provide for Princely Children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: That alſo he had provided for them Wives of a Noble Race, and had married one of them unto his Siſter's Daughter, and the other unto Archelaus his Daughter

King of Cappadocia: And which was the greateſt matter of all, he had not uſed the authority of a Father againſt them after theſe enterprizes, but brought them unto Cæſar their common benefactor; and that forſaking his own right of a Father, who had been injured; or of a King, againſt whom treaſon had been wrought; he was now content to debate his matter with them before ſuch a Judge, as well knew how to decide the thing in queſtion according to right and equity; yet requeſted him that their offence might not be left unpuniſhed, nor he forced to lead the reſt of his life ſtill in perpetual fear; nor ſuffer them to be ſo miſerable, as never to enjoy themſelves, nor deſire to ſee the light of the Sun, after having violated the moſt ſacred Laws of God and nature. Herod having with a vehement voice objected theſe accuſations againſt his Sons before Cæſar, the two Princes were not able to abſtain from tears whilſt he was yet ſpeaking; and having ended his ſpeech, they wholly burſt out into tears; not that they were guilty of thoſe impieties laid unto their charge, but that they were accuſed by their Father; againſt whom it was not decent to ſpeak freely for themſelves, nor expedient to refuſe to defend their own cauſe. Wherein they remained doubtful what to do, moving the auditors to pity them by their tears and lamentations; and fearful withal, leſt it ſhould be thought that their guilty conſcience did trouble them, that they were not able to ſpeak in their own defence; ſeeing that indeed it was only for want of experience, by reaſon of their tender years. Which alſo Cæſar perceived, and all that were preſent were ſo moved to compaſſion, that neither their Father, who was their accuſer, could reſtrain from being moved with compaſſion.

Alias, chap. 9 Alexander and Ariſtobulus moved all that were preſent, even their Father and accuſer to tears and compaſſion.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Alexander's defence, and how the two Brethren were reconciled to their Father Herod.

Alexander ſpeaketh in his own, and his Brother's defence.

THen the young Princes perceiving both their Father and Cæſar to be mollified, and they that were preſent partly to pity them, partly to ſhed tears of compaſſion; the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, directing his ſpeech to his Father, began thus to clear himſelf of the Crimes objected againſt them: Father, how well and friendly minded thou art towards us, this preſent judgment declareth; for hadſt thou determined any heavy ſentence againſt us, thou wouldeſt not have brought us before him, who is the preſerver of us all: For thou mighteſt, being a King, or for thy authority over us as a Father, have puniſhed us for our offence according to thy power: But in that thou haſt brought us to Rome, and made Cæſar our Judge, it is an argument that thou ſeekeſt to ſave us; for no man brings any one to the Temple, whom he purpoſeth to deſtroy; which greatly aggravateth our cauſe, who do cenſure our ſelves unworthy to live, rather than to incur an opinion of impiety committed againſt thee ſuch a Father. How far more expedient is it to die guiltleſs, than to live ſuſpected of ſo great an ingratitude? Wherefore if God grants us ſo much ſucceſs in our defence, as to perſwade you of the truth, we ſhall not rejoyce ſo much for having eſcaped ſo great a danger, as to be found innocent by your judgment; for we do not deſire to live with the ſuſpicion of thoſe Calumnies. It is a probable accuſation to accuſe our years, as having affected the Kingdom; and our unfortunate Mother's calamity maketh it ſeem more probable. But conſider, I beſeech thee, if the ſame crime may not as well be framed againſt any one whomſoever, as againſt us. For any King having children by a Wife that is now dead, may if it pleaſe him, ſuſpect them, as practiſing treaſon againſt him their father. But ſuſpicion is not ſufficient to prove a man impious and guilty: Wherefore produce any one that can bring ſufficient proof, that may induce any moderate Judge to believe, that we ever attempted ſuch a horrid Crime. Can any man ſhew that poyſon was prepared by us for you, or that we conſpired with any, or that we corrupted any ſervants with money and gifts; or that we writ any letters againſt thee? yet calumny may feign every one of theſe upon no occaſion. It is a grievous matter, for diſcord to be in a Princes Court; and the hope of Dominion, which your Majeſty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impel mens minds unto hainous offences. But although it be moſt certain that we cannot be convicted of any crime, yet how can we clear our ſelves from accuſations forged againſt us, before them that will not hear us? But did we ſpeak ſome inſolent words? yet were they not againſt thee, O my father (for that had

A been impiety) but againſt them who traduced us. We bewailed our mother's misfortunes. It is true: But not becauſe ſhe is dead, but becauſe after her death ſhe is evil ſpoken of by thoſe who ought not to do it. We affect the Kingdom of our father, he being yet alive. Wherein? Is not that purpoſe of ours vain and frivolous, we having already been graced with Kingly honours? And ſuppoſe we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them with killing of thee, whom both earth and ſeas would diſdain after ſo execrable an offence? Or could we have expected that the loyalty of thy ſubjects, and the laws of our nation would have permitted us, having gotten the Kingdom by murthering our father; to have enjoyed the ſame, and entred into the holy Temple, which thou didſt repair? Or ſuppoſe we deſpiſed them all; yet could any one that murthered thee eſcape, Cæſar being living? B The Children by thee begotten are not ſo impious nor fooliſh, though more unfortunate, than thy eſtate requires. And ſeeing thou haſt nothing to accuſe us of, or nothing to prove any accuſation laid unto our charge, how canſt thou be perſwaded that we are guilty of ſuch inhumane acts? Is it becauſe our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to have made us more wary, than inſolent and raſh. We could ſpeak more in our own defence than this, but what need is it to excuſe that which was never done? Wherefore we beſeech Cæſar (who is Lord of all, and now our Judge) only this, that if thou canſt, O my father, put away out of thy mind all ſuſpicion of us, to ſuffer us to live hereafter, how unhappy and unfortunate ſoever: For what is more miſerable, than to be raſhly accuſed without cauſe? But if thou canſt not, we living, live without fear of us, let us die condemned by our own C cenſure. For our lives are not ſo dear unto us that we deſire to keep them to his moleſtation that beſtowed them upon us.

Cæſar with theſe words, though before not greatly crediting ſuch accuſations and ſlanders laid againſt them, was now more moved to believe that they were guiltleſs, and the rather, that fixing his eyes upon Herod, he perceived him alſo to be moved, and all that were preſent were ſorry for the young Princes: So that all who were preſent cenſured the King, for the abſurd and frivolous accuſation framed againſt them; their youth and handſomneſs made all the ſpectators ſo concerned at their misfortunes, that there was nothing wherein they were not ready to aſſiſt them: And much more, after that Alexander had ingeniouſly refuted his father's accuſations, the accuſed remaining ſtill D in the ſame poſture and place, and for grief fixing their eyes upon the ground. At laſt ſome hope appeared, ſo that the King himſelf ſeemed to need ſome excuſe, for having ſo raſhly accuſed his ſons, without any certain proof of his accuſations. At laſt, Cæſar having a while deliberated with himſelf, pronounced that the Princes were innocent of the crimes laid unto their charge: Yet herein they were too blame, that they had ſo behaved themſelves, that they gave their father occaſion to ſuſpect them. And as for Herod, he requeſted him to lay aſide all ſuſpicion, and to be reconciled to his Children. For it was unjuſtly done of him to believe ſuch forged accuſations againſt thoſe whom he had begotten; that he was fully perſwaded that they would prove ſo dutiful to him for the future, that he would not only forget that diſtaſte that they had given E him, but that he would alſo renew his former affection towards them; and both parties endeavouring thus to re-eſtabliſh the friendſhip and truſt that ought to be between ſo near Relations, their union would be greater and more ſincere than ever. Cæſar having thus admoniſhed the young men, they prepared themſelves to entreat their Father's wonted favour: He, not expecting ſo long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all thoſe that were preſent, both ſervants and others, did the like.

All men do pity the young men.

Cæſar pronounceth the young men herein to have offended, that they gave occaſion of ſuſpicion, and he exhorteth the Father to be reconciled to his Children, Herod is reconciled to his Children.

Then giving humble thanks unto Cæſar, they departed together, and Antipater with them, counterfeiting himſelf to congratulate their happineſs for being reconciled unto his Father. Within a few days after, Herod gave Cæſar three hundred Talents, who F was now beſtowing his gifts and preſents at Rome, and exerciſing his liberality upon the people. And Cæſar again beſtowed upon him half of the revenues out of the Mines of the metal in Cyprus; and the other half unto the overſeer thereof; and gracing him otherwiſe alſo, he gave him leave to chuſe which of his ſons he pleaſed for to ſucceed him in his Kingdom; or if he had rather, to diſtribute it amongſt them all: which Herod preſently would have done, but Cæſar would not permit him, affirming, that during his life he ſhould keep it all whole and undivided, and his ſons ſhould be ſubject unto him.

Antipater friendly doth congratulate his brethren returned into his Fathers favour.

Herod did give Cæſar 300. talents.

Cæſar gave Herod half his revenues out of the Mines of Cyprus.

After this, Herod returned again into Judea, in whoſe abſence the Trachonites, that were no ſmall part of his Kingdom, were revolted, yet by the induſtry of the Captains, G he left to overſee all in his abſence, they were reduced again, and forced to do as they were commanded. As Herod and his ſons were ſailing towards home, arriving at Elenſa a City of Cilicia, which is now called Sabaſte, he found Archelaus there, who was

King of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteouſly entertain Herod, and was very joyful that his ſons and he were made friends, and that Alexander his ſon in Law had ſo well cleared himſelf and his brother of the crimes laid unto their charge. And ſo each one beſtowing upon the other princely gifts, they departed taking their leave one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Judea, and calling the people together into the Temple, told them all that had paſt in his abſence from them, and the courteſy of Cæſar: And told them alſo of other affairs that he thought fit for them to know; and turning the latter end of his ſpeech unto his Sons, and exhorting the Courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his ſons ſhould reign after him, and firſt of all Antipater; and after him his ſons that he had by Mariamne, Alexander and Ariſtobulus: In the mean time every one of them ſhould honour him as King and Lord, notwithſtanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to govern, ſeeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his Subjects and Children in their obedience; and that the ſouldiers alſo, if they only reſpected him, ſhould live in all happineſs and felicity without moleſtation. Having thus ſpoken, he diſmiſſed the people; ſome thinking he had ſpoken according to equity, others thinking clean contrary: For having now as it were cauſed an emulation amongſt his Children, there was as it were already a ſhew of ſome mutation.

Cæſarea is finiſhed.

Quinquennale certamen.

ABout this time Cæſarea was finiſhed, the tenth year after it was begun to be built, the 28. year of Herod's Reign, in the 192. Olympiad. In the dedication hereof, there was great pomp and ſumptuous preparations: For all Muſicians were brought thither to ſtrive one with another, who was moſt excellent in their Art; and Champions that wraſtled being naked and anointed with oyl: There was alſo a great many that fought with ſwords, and a great number of wild Beaſts; and all things elſe that at ſuch times were uſed, and in account, either at Rome or in other Countreys. Theſe ſports were alſo conſecrated unto Cæſar, and were to be renewed every fifth year. All this proviſion the King at his own coſt and charges provided to be brought from all places whatſoever, to ſhew the greatneſs of his magnificence. Julia, Cæſar's wife alſo beſtowed much of her own to the furniſhing hereof, and ſent many precious things out of Italy; ſo that the worth of them all amounted to five hundred talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold theſe ſports, he received all Embaſſadours ſent unto him from other Nations, to thank him for the benefits he had beſtowed on them; and he lodged, feaſted and recreated them: and being all day long amongſt the people to ſee thoſe ſports, at night he received them with banquets, and ſhewing them his magnificence; and gained great praiſe and commendations for a worthy King. For, he in all things ſo provided, that the laſt was more pleaſing and grateful than the firſt, and cauſed him to be more admired. And it is reported that Cæſar himſelf and Agrippa often did ſay, that Herod's magnanimity was greater than his preſent revenues could bear, and that he well deſerved an Empire as big as all Syria and Egypt. Theſe ſports being ended, he builded another Town in a Field called Capharſaba, chuſing for it a watery ſoil fit for plants: the City was compaſſed with a River; and he alſo planted round about it a Wood full of fine Trees. This Town he called Antipatris, after his father's name, Antipater. After which he alſo builded a Caſtle about Jericho, called after his mother's name, Cypron; which was very ſtrongly fortified, and adorned within with rare and ſumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brother, he dedicated unto him moſt ſtately buildings; for firſt he built a Tower as big as Pharo in the City, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name, Phaſælus, which alſo was the ſtrongeſt Fort in all the City. After this, he builded a Town near unto the Valley of Jericho, towards the North, whereby the fields that before almoſt lay deſart, were now tilled and inhabited by the townſmen; ſo that of them it was named Phaſælus-field. It were hard to relate all his liberality in particular ſhewed, both unto the Cities of Syria and Greeia, and all other places whereſoever he came: For he helped many, either by building publick places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finiſhed for want of money, by giving them mo-

Herod built the Temple of Pythias.

A ney to finiſh them, the chiefeſt among all which were, that he builded at his own coſt and charge the Temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gave them many talents of ſilver to build their ſhips. He alſo builded the greateſt part of the publick houſes and places in the City of Actium, which Cæſar built for the Nicopolitans there inhabiting, and that with his own proper coſt and charges,. He alſo, for the Antiochians inhabiting the greateſt City of Syria, builded Arches on each ſide of the greater ſtreet, that goeth quite thorow the midſt of the City, and doth as it were part it in two; and the ſtreet it ſelf that lay open, he paved with poliſhed ſtone; which work was as great a conveniency to the inhabitants, as a beauty unto their City. He alſo helped to maintain the ſports at Olympus with yearly revenues, that for want of maintenance began to decay: B So that by his means there were more ſolemn ſacrifices, and all things more ſumptuous to pleaſe them that came to behold them: For which liberality he was declared perpetual Maſter and Maintainer of thoſe ſports. It is admirable to ſee in one man ſuch diverſity of minds: For on the one ſide, if we conſider his liberality towards all men, we muſt needs ſay, he was of a moſt free and bountiful nature; contrariwiſe, if we conſider the injuries and cruelty he ſhewed againſt his ſubjects and deareſt friends, we muſt confeſs him to have been a hard man, and intractable, and who paſſed all bounds of modeſty; ſo that we would think him to have been of two contrary diſpoſitions.
But I am otherwiſe perſwaded, and think that both theſe did proceed from one matter: For becauſe he thirſted after glory and honour, and wholly applied himſelf C thereunto, he became liberal whereſoever he was, in hope, either to reap preſent thanks for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore ſpending above his revenues for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable to his ſubjects; for it was neceſſary that he, that ſo laviſhly beſtowed ſuch huge ſumms of money upon others, ſhould ſome where get it, though with evil means. Laſtly, ſeeing himſelf for ſuch like injuries hated of his ſubjects, he thought it a hard matter to gett their good wills; which he could do no ways elſe, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abuſed the hatred of his people for his own commodity: For if any one of them did not tolerate that ſlavery wherein they lived, or did endeavour to ſhake off the yoke of his dominion, againſt ſuch he uſed a prodigious cruelty; and injured them no leſs, D than if they had been his enemies, without regarding friendſhip or kindred; for that he deſired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may gueſs by the honours he did unto Cæſar, Agrippa and others of their friends: For he deſired to be an example to his ſubjects, that as he himſelf honoured men better than himſelf, ſo they ſhould all honour him likewiſe; thereby declaring what thing he did naturally moſt deſire. But the Jews Religion doth not permit them licenſe to honour Potentates, who of neceſſity ought to have greater care and reſpect of right and equity, than of ſuch officiouſneſs towards ſuperiours: for it was diſprofit enough unto the Jews, that they could not with Statues and Temples obtain the King's favour, and with like flatteries ſatisfie the fond appetites of a vain-glorious man. And this E ſeemeth to me to be the reaſon that Herod was unjuſt, and hard towards his friends, and to thoſe whom he made partakers of his counſels and enterprizes; and free and bountiful towards ſtrangers.

Teſtimonies of the Roman Emperours Affection towards the Jews.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10.

The Jews of Aſia and Cyrene being afflicted by the inhabitants there, ſend an Embaſſage to Cæſar, and do obtain of him immunity.

THe Aſian and Cyrenian Jews were greatly afflicted by the Citizens of thoſe Countreys, F who having had the ſame privileges granted unto them by the ancient Kings that the Citizens had, were now greatly injured by the Grecians; as though they carried money out of the Countrey, and were prejudicial unto the reſt of the inhabitants.
And the Grecians making no end of their injuries, they were conſtrained by Embaſſadours to complain of them unto Cæſar: who wrote unto every Province, that it was his pleaſure, that the Jews ſhould enjoy like privileges with the other inhabitants of the countrey. The copy of which writing we have here ſet down, that it may the better appear how the Roman Emperours of ancient times were affected unto our Nation.

Cæſar Auguſtus Pont. Max. Trib. poteſtatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the Nation
G of the Jews hath always been truſty unto the Romans, not only at this day, but alſo in all former Ages, and eſpecially in the time of our father Cæſar the Emperour, under Hircanus their High Prieſt: I have ordained, that according to the common ſentence of the Senate, they

they ſhall live after their Countrey-Laws, under which they lived in the time of Hircanus H the High Prieſt of God; and that their Temple ſhall retain the right of a Sanctuary, and that it ſhall be lawful for them to ſend votive money unto Jeruſalem by certain perſons; and that they ſhall not be compelled to appear before any Judge upon their Sabbath days, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clock upon the preparation day. And if any one be known to ſteal their holy books or holy money, laid up in their places appointed for Religion, he ſhall be guilty of Sacrilege; and his goods ſhall be confiſcate unto the Treaſury of the people of Rome, I alſo decree, for the good will I bear unto all men, that their Memorial or requeſt offered unto me by C. Marcus Cenſorinus, ſhall together with this my Edict be publiſhed in the famous place, which all Aſia hath dedicated unto my name, to wit, Argyra.
And if any ſhall be ſo bold as to do contrary to our Decree, he ſhall be puniſhed extraordinarily. I
This was engraven in a pillar in Cæſar's Temple. Cæſar wiſheth health unto Norbanus Flaccus. Let it be lawful for all Jews wheresoever living, to carry their ſacred money to Jeruſalem, according to their ancient cuſtom, and that no man ſhould forbid them ſo to do:
And this did Cæſar write in favour of the Jews.

Agrippa writ unto the Rulers of Epheſus, in the Jews behalf, and to Syllanus and the Magiſtrates of Cyrenia.

Agrippa alſo wrote in the Jews behalf, as followeth; Agrippa wiſheth health unto the Magiſtrates, Senate and people of Epheſus: I will that the Jews living in Aſia keep their ſacred money, which according to the cuſtom of their Countrey, they uſually ſend unto Jeruſalem; and if any one ſhall ſteal their holy money, the ſame perſon, if he fly to a Sanctuary, ſhall be violently taken away from thence, as a ſacrilegious perſon, and delivered unto the Jews to be puniſhed. He alſo wrote unto Syllanus the Magiſtrate, that the Jews K might not be conſtrained upon their Sabbaths to appear before a Judge: M. Agrippa wiſheth health to the Cyrenian Magiſtrates and Senate. The Jews inhabiting among you, for whom Auguſtus hath already written unto Flavius the Preſident of Lybia, and unto other Magiſtrates of that Province, are not to be hindred from ſending their holy money to Jeruſalem, as their cuſtom is; and they have now complained unto me, that they are moleſted by the falſe accuſations of ſome bad people, and forbidden to do it under pretence of a certain Tribute, which notwithſtanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to live after their cuſtom, and free in all ſuch matters: And if in any of your Cities any ſacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certain perſons which you know to be fit for that purpoſe, ye make choice of them, to ſend it again unto the Jews. Item C. L Norbanus Flaccus Proconſul: Health unto the Magiſtrates of Sardinia; Cæſar hath written unto me, commanding that no man hinder the Jews, according to their cuſtom, to ſend ſacred money unto Jeruſalem; wherefore I alſo write unto you of the ſame, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæſar's alſo. Moreover Julius Antonius Proconſul, did alſo write to this effect: Health unto the Magiſtrates, Senate and people of Epheſus. The Jews of Aſia in the Ides of February, I ſitting in the judicial ſeat at Epheſus, ſignified unto me, that Cæſar Auguſtus and Agrippa have permitted them to uſe their Countrey-cuſtoms; and every one according as he thinketh good, to contribute his firſt fruits for Religion ſake, to be carried without let or hinderance unto the Temple of the moſt mighty God; and they deſired me to ratifie by my conſent, that which they had already granted them by M the above named Emperours. Wherefore I would have you to know, that I alſo, according unto Cæſar's and Agrippa's Decrees and Ordinances, do permit and grant them alſo to do all things they pleaſe, according to their Countrey-cuſtoms, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

Caius Norbanus Flaccus writeth in the Jews behalf. Julius Antonius Proconſul.

I have thought good to add theſe Decrees, becauſe I know, that theſe my writings will come into the Grecians hands, that I may ſhew them, that in former ages we were ſo eſteemed of the publick Magiſtrates, that none were permitted to hinder us from uſing our Countrey-rites aud Ceremonies, and that by their conſent we worſhipped God in our own Religion, which I do inculcate the oftner, that I may move ſtrange and forreign Nations, and take away their hatred conceived againſt us, which is without N all reaſonable cauſe. For no Nation doth always uſe the ſame cuſtoms, but almoſt whole Towns among them do ſometimes alter and differ from the reſt; yet is juſtice equally to be diſtributed unto all men; which is moſt profitable, as well to the Grecians, as to the other barbarous Nations, which is greatly obſerved in our Laws; which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all nations love us. Wherefore we requeſt all men, not to deſpiſe us, for differing from them in Religion; but favour us in that we follow virtue. For this is common to all Nations, and without this, man's life muſt needs be unhappy. But I will now return unto my Hiſtory.

Herod ſpending laviſhly many ſumms of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who reigned before him, opened David's Sepulchre, and B took out of it three thouſand Talents of Silver, and that there was left yet far more, able to defray any great charges whatſoever; he purpoſed to do the like. And at this time, in the night ſeaſon, accompanied only with his moſt truſty friends; being very wary that none of the people ſhould know of it, he entred into the Sepulchre; but he found no money there, as Hircanus did; but he took from thence a great deal of Silver and Gold Plate, whereby he was enticed to make a more diligent ſearch: And he ſent two of his company on purpoſe into the inner part of the Sepulchre, where the bodies of Solomon and David were entombed, who were loſt; and, as it is reported, fire came out of thoſe places, and conſumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it; and moved with Religion to make ſatisfaction, he C builded a moſt ſumptuous monument of White Marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre; of which building Nicholaus alſo, a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he ſpeaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of David, thinking that therein he ſhould not keep Decorum, if he ſhould make mention thereof. Wherein he followed this accuſtomed order; for his Writings were to come to the ears of the King yet living, wherein he did only curry favour, mentioning only that, that might redound unto the King's credit: So that many of his open and wicked pranks, he did either colour under ſome other pretence, or elſe all ways poſſible he endeavoured to hide them. For he doth, as it were, tell a tale of Herod's cruelty againſt Mariamne and his Sons, as though he did thereby deſerve credit and praiſe; accuſing her of A- D dultery, and them as Traitors unto their Father: and this he doth all along, too much extolling the King's good deeds, and too diligently excuſing his iniquities. But as I have ſaid, we muſt pardon him who did not ſo much write to leave a memory of things done unto after Ages, as to gratifie and pleaſe his King. But I, who come of the lineage of the Aſmonian Kings, and execute the office of a Prieſt, account it a ſhame to lie; and do intend to relate the Hiſtory of all things that were acted and done, yet with a reverence for Herod's Poſterity, who do alſo now bear ſway and rule; yet, with their pardon and leave, I muſt prefer the truth to their inclinations.

Herod loſt two of his men in David's Sepulchre.

Nicholaus the Hiſtoriographer reproved

Joſeph came of the Prieſtly Line of the Aſmonians.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herod's houſe began to decay, whether revenge lighting upon that part which was already ſcarce ſound, or whether by mere E chance, ſuch calamity at that time befel him, as might juſtly be thought the reward of impiety. For there was a diſcord in the Court not unlike to Civil Wars, every one ſtriving againſt other with hatred and forged accuſations: But eſpecially Antipater's politick practice againſt his Brethren was to be noted, who entangled them by other men's forged accuſations; himſelf oftentimes ſeemed to take upon him their defence, that making a ſhew of good will unto them, he might ſecretly oppreſs them the ſooner; and he did ſo craftily circumvent his Father, that his Father eſteemed him to be his only Conſerver. Wherefore the King commanded Ptolomeus his chief Secretary of State, to conceal nothing of the affairs of the Kingdom from Antipater, who imparted all to his Mother, ſo that all things were done according as they pleaſed; and F they made him diſpleaſed with thoſe, againſt whom they knew the King's diſpleaſure might redound unto their profit.

A diſcord in Herod's houſe Antipater's crafty plotting againſt his Brethren.

But Mariamne's Children were every day more and more provoked, diſdaining to give place unto their inferiours; their Wives did the like: and Alexander's Wife Glaphyra, who was the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly envy and diſdain Salome, and ſhe alſo her again, both for the love that ſhe bare unto her Huſband, and for that ſhe diſdained (as women are wont) that her Daughter married unto Ariſtobulus, ſhould be in equal honour with her. Pheroras alſo the King's Brother had a hand in this contention, about a private cauſe of ſuſpicion and hatred. For he fell ſo far in love with one of his maids, that he refuſed the Kings Daughter offered unto him, ra- G ther making choice of his maid. Herod took this in very ill part, ſeeing his Brother (who had received ſo many benefits at his hands, and was almoſt his fellow in his Kingdom by his means) not to ſhew the like brotherly affection to him again as he ought. And ſeeing he could not diſſwade him from that madneſs, he married his Daughter unto H Phaſælus his Son: And afterwards thinking that his Brother's mind towards his maid was ſatisfied, he complained of his injurious dealing, in repulſing his Daughter offered unto him to Wife, he offered him another of his Daughters named Cypros. Then Ptolomeus adviſed Pheroras not to contemn his Brother's offer, and perſiſt in ſuch folly ſtill; telling him it was mere madneſs to incur the King's diſpleaſure on ſuch an account. Pheroras underſtanding this counſel profitable for him, having obtained pardon at the King's hands, ſent away his maid, by whom he had a Son, and promiſed the King to marry this his other Daughter; and appointed the thirteenth day after to celebrate his Marriage; making a ſolemn Oath unto the King, never after that time to uſe the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, I he fell ſo far in love with the former woman, that he would not ſtand to his promiſe, but again accompanied with his maid.

Then Herod, not able any longer to contain himſelf, uſed many ſpeeches, whereby he evidently ſhewed his mind to be alienated from his Brother. And there were many who taking this opportunity, did by forged calumnies encreaſe his averſion; ſo that now there was no day nor hour paſt, wherein he did not ſtill hear ſome new combuſtions and ſtirs amongſt his deareſt friends. For Salome being ſo offended at Mariamne's Children, did not permit her Daughter married to Ariſtobulus, to enjoy mutual love and comfort of her Huſband, enticing her to bewray her Huſband's ſecrets; and if there happened any ſmall occaſions of offence (as often it falleth out) ſhe ſhould the more aggravate them with ſuſpicions, whereby ſhe alſo learned all their ſecrets, and K made the young Princeſs hate her Huſband. And ſhe, to pleaſe her Mother, related, how that often when her Huſband and Alexander were alone, that they were wont to talk of Mariamne their Mother, and uſe reproachful words againſt their Father; and threatning, that if they ever did obtain the Kingdom, they would make the Sons of the King, whom he had by other Wives, Notaries and Town-Clerks, and ſo they might reap profit of their Learning which they had attained to: and whenſoever they ſaw any of the Kings Wives wear any of Mariamne's apparel, that then they vowed inſtead of that attire, to cloath them with Sack-cloth, and ſhut them up where they ſhould never ſee the Sun. Salome preſently told all this to the King; who, though he were L much grieved hereat, yet he choſe rather to ſeek to amend it, than to puniſh them: and thus, notwithſtanding he was daily more and more put out of humour, believing all reports whatſoever; yet he contented himſelf with chiding of them, and ſeemed ſatisfied with their excuſes.

Herod greatly moved againſt Pheroras, for affirming that he was in love with Glaphyra

But preſently the miſchief was again ſet on foot; for Pheroras the King's Brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we have ſaid) was Glaphyra her Huſband, who was Daughter to Archelaus; he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was ſo far in love with Glaphyra, that he could not ſhake off this affection. The young Prince hearing this, became jealous, and was in a great rage; and now what honour ſoever or gifts Herod, for the love of his Son, gave her, Alexander did interpret it in the worſt ſence: and not able to put up ſuch M injuries, he went to his Father, and with tears related unto him what Pheroras had told him. Herod was never more ſurpriſed; and not enduring to be falſely accuſed of ſo ſhameful a fact, inveying againſt the great malice of his friends; who for his good offices he did them, ſo rewarded him. He preſently ſending for Pheroras, very ſharply began to chide him, ſaying; O moſt impious that liveth amongſt men! art thou become ſo ungrateful, either to ſpeak or think ſuch a matter of us? Thinkeſt thou that I do not perceive thy drift; that thou ſpakeſt not theſe words unto my Son to diſcredit me, but alſo to the intent by this means thou mighteſt work ſome treaſon againſt me, and cauſe me to be poyſoned? For who but a good Son, as this is, would ſuffer his Father, ſuſpected for ſuch a matter, to live, and not to be revenged of him for ſuch offence? Whether doſt thou think that thou didſt put N theſe ſpeeches into his mind, or by them a ſword into his hand to kill his Father withal? Or what was thy intent, ſeeing thou hateſt him and his Brother; and only counterfeiting good will towards me, to belye me, and to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought? Get thee hence, thou wretched Imp, ſeeing thou haſt thus abuſed thy Brother, who hath deſerved ſo well at thy hands. Go baſeſt of men, I will leave thee to the gnawing worm of thy own perfidious Conſcience, to be thy Executioner all thy life time: And for your greater confuſion, I will content my ſelf to confound your wickedneſs with my goodneſs, in not puniſhing you according to your deſerts; but treating you with that mercy, of which all the world knoweth you to be ſo unworthy. The King having uttered his anger againſt his Brother Pheroras, & he being taken in a manifeſt fault anſwered, that that report was firſt deviſed by Salome, O of whom he heard it: Which ſhe (being then preſent) hearing, began to exclaim, ſaying, it was not her device, and that they all laboured to make the King hate her, and put her to death

A death, being one who did eſpecially wiſh him well; and what in her lay, ſeeking his ſafety; and that now he was in danger of more Treaſon, than ever before: For (ſaid ſhe) I was the only cauſe that you did put away the woman whom you ſo doted after, perſwading you to marry the King's Daughter; and this is the cauſe that you hate me. With theſe ſpeeches, tearing her hair and ſtriking her breaſt, ſhe made a ſhew of innocency; but this geſture was a colour to hide her bad intent. So Pheroras was left in great perplexity, not knowing what to ſay or do; and could find no pretence to excuſe his fact: for on the one ſide, he confeſſed that he told it unto Alexander; and on the other, he could not make Herod believe that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while; at laſt, the King being wearied, ſent away his Brother and his Siſter; and B greatly commending his Son's moderate mind, and that he had given him intelligence of thoſe ſpeeches: it being then late, he went to ſupper.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, becauſe ſhe was judged to be the Author of this ill report; and the King's Wives hated her, becauſe they knew her to have ſtrange qualities; and ſo variable, that one while ſhe would profeſs friendſhip, and preſently after hatred. Wherefore they ſtill had ſomething to inform Herod of againſt her; taking occaſion happening by chance, which was this: There was a King of the Arabians, named Obodas, a ſlothful man, and one given to idleneſs: And there was one Syllæus that did govern all; this man was a crafty fellow, and in the prime of his youth, and very beautiful. This Syllæus coming unto Herod about C ſome buſineſs, and viewing Salome, who then ſat at ſupper with him, began to ſet his mind upon her; and finding ſhe was a Widow, he entred into talk with her: and ſhe finding her Brother now not ſo friendly unto her as before he had been, and alſo entangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him; and many Feaſts being made at that time, they ſhewed evident ſigns of their mutual conſent, and love one to another. The King's Wives told the King of this in jeſt. Herod commanded Pheroras, at ſupper time to note if he could eſpy any tokens of familiarity betwixt them; and Pheroras told him, that by ſigns and mutual viewing one another, they ſufficiently ſhewed their intents. After this, the Arabian being ſuſpected, departed into his own Countrey. But two or three months after, he came again into D Judæa only for this purpoſe, and talked with Herod touching this matter, requeſting him to let Salome be his Wife; affirming that that affinity would be profitable unto him for the traffick between his people and the Arabians, whoſe Prince he was to be; and did already enjoy a great part of the Dominion. Herod told all this unto his Siſter, and asked her if ſhe would marry him; and ſhe anſwered, ſhe would. Then they requeſted that Syllæus ſhould become a Jew in Religion, or elſe it was not lawful for him to marry her. He would not condeſcend hereunto, affirming that he ſhould be ſtoned to death by his people, if he did it; and ſo he departed without obtaining his purpoſe. From that time forth, Pheroras, and eſpecially the King's Wives, accuſed Salome of intemperancy; affirming that ſhe had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod E determined to marry his Daughter unto Salome's Son, whom Pheroras refuſed for the love of his Maid; which Son of Salome's was her eldeſt that ſhe had by Coſtabarus; to ſhew his good will towards Salome his Siſter. But he was diſſwaded by Pheroras, who told him that the young man would never love ſuch a Father in Law, becauſe of his Father's death; perſwading him rather to marry her to his eldeſt Son, who was to ſucceed him in his Tetrarchy, which he eaſily perſwaded the King unto, and ſo obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore, the match being changed, the Maid was married unto the young man, who had a hundred Talents in dowry with her, more than otherwiſe ſhould have been given with her.

Syllæus the Arabian deſiring Salome to wife, was denied.

Herod married his Daughter to Pheroras's Son.

But all this while this diſſention of Herod's houſe did not ceaſe, but rather encreaſ-F ed; it having a ſhameful beginning, and coming to a ſorrowful end. Herod had three Eunuchs, whom he greatly eſteemed for their beauty; one of them was his Butler, the other his Cook, and the third his Chamberlain; whom alſo he was wont to employ in ſerious affairs of his Kingdom. Some one or other informed the King, that theſe three Eunuchs were corrupted by his Son Alexander, with great ſumms of money; and being upon Tortures examined if they had accompanied with him, they confeſſed all; yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attempted againſt his Father. But their torments being encreaſed by Antipater's Favourites, they were forced to confeſs that Alexander ſecretly hated his Father; and he exhorted them to forſake Herod, who was now good for nothing; who diſſembled his age by painting G his face, to make himſelf ſeem younger than he was; and colouring his head and beard black, which were already grown very white through age: But rather ſet their minds upon him, who would in deſpight of his Father, enjoy his Kingdom due unto him; and

and that then he would advance them to the higheſt honours of the Kingdom : For he H had not only title unto it by his birth, but alſo was now prepared likewiſe to invade it ; and that he had many of the Captains, of the ſouldiers, and many of the King's friends on his ſide, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his ſake.

Antipater the cauſe of all miſchief.

Many were tortured and examined for Alexander's cauſe.

Herod hearing this, fear and anger did ſeize on him, by reaſon that his Son's words ſeemed both inſolent and threatning ; and being for both theſe cauſes in a rage, he feared ſome greater matter to be put in practice againſt him, which he could not ſuddenly, having ſo little warning, avoid : And not daring to make open enquiry, he ſet ſecret ſpies awork, to tell him how all matters ſtood, himſelf now miſtruſting all men, and accounting it his ſecurity to miſtruſt all, even them that deſerved it not : and not moderating his ſuſpicious mind ; now whoſoever was the neareſt to him, was the I more ſuſpected, as of moſt power to injure him. As for others, that were but only named by his ſpies, he preſently eſteemed it his ſafety to put them to death. Then they of his houſhold, every one being careful to ſave himſelf, were one turned againſt another, every one eſteeming it his own ſafety to prevent others, by accuſing them unto Herod ; which done, preſently they incited other men's envy againſt him, and every one of them to deſire ſuch meaſure as they had meaſured unto others ; and thus they alſo revenged their private Quarrels, and preſently after they themſelves were taken, and did by other mens means ſuffer the like, being entrapped in the ſame trap they ſet for their enemies. For the King did quickly repent for having put very many to death, who were not convicted ; yet for all that, he was K not hereby admoniſhed to beware of the like hereafter ; but on his repentance for their death, raged ſo far, as to cauſe him to inflict the ſame puniſhment upon the accuſers, which he had done upon them. The Court was in ſuch a lamentable condition, that he commanded many of his deareſt friends, and them eſpecially, whoſe fidelity he had formerly experienced, not to come in his ſight, nor within his Court-gates. For he did now ſhake off the friendſhip between Andromachus and Gemellus, and himſelf, who were his ancient friends ; and oftentimes had gone Ambaſſadours for him, and always been of his counſel, and had been tutors unto his Children, in whom he had always repoſed more truſt than in any others ; the one of them, for that his Son Demetrius was familiar with Alexander ; and Gemellus, for that he knew him to L be a friend to Alexander ; for he was one of them that had brought him up, and had travelled with him to Rome. And no doubt but he had cenſured them with ſome more heavy ſentence, had it not been that they were ſo eminent perſons. Wherefore at that time he was contented to have baniſhed them, and deprived them of all their authority, to the end, that having diſgraced theſe good men, he might the more freely play the Tyrant. Antipater was the cauſe of all this miſchief ; who from the firſt time that he perceived his Father to be fearful and ſuſpicious, ſtill after that, joyned with him as Counſeller ; and as it were, encreaſed his rage and cruelty ; and then he gallantly played his part, endeavouring that whoſoever would reſiſt him, ſhould be made away. Wherefore Andromachus and the reſt of his friends being now baniſhed the M Court, the King preſently tortured all that he imagined any way to favour Alexander, to ſee if they were guilty, or if they knew of any treaſon to be practiſed againſt him ; but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidſt their torments. Where he ſo much the more tortured others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not ſo much as an evil thought againſt him ; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceal the truth, than to ſhew themſelves not truſty to their maſters and friends ; wherefore many being taken, he cauſed them to be tortured to get ſomething out of ſome of them. At laſt one amongſt the reſt, not able to endure thoſe torments impoſed upon him, ſaid ; that he had often heard Alexander ſay, when any one commended his tall ſtature, or ſkilful ſhooting, and the reſt of his vertues ; that nature had N beſtowed upon him theſe qualities to his prejudice ; for his Father through envy hereat, was offended ; ſo that when he talked with him, he did on purpoſe draw his body together, leſt his Father ſhould perceive the tallneſs of his ſtature ; and that when he went a hunting with him, he on purpoſe did miſs the mark he could have hit, becauſe he knew his Father could not endure that he ſhould be commended. And whilſt theſe words were conſidered and pondred, and his torments intermitted, he accuſed Alexander again, to have conſpired with his Brother Ariſtobulus, to kill his Father when he was hunting, and then to fly with ſpeed unto Rome, and beg the Kingdom of Cæſar. There were alſo found ſome of Ariſtobulus his Letters written unto his Brother, complaining of the injurious dealing of his Father, who had given O certain Poſſeſſions to Antipater, the yearly revenues whereof amounted to two hundred Talents. Then Herod thinking himſelf to have probability enough, his former ſuſpicion

A ſuſpicion was now confirmed, and ſo he took Alexander and caſt him in priſon; and again he began to doubt, becauſe he did ſcarcely believe the informations againſt him, neither could he deviſe any cauſe wherefore they ſhould ſeek to commit Treaſon againſt him. And thoſe complaints ſeemed childiſh; neither was it probable, that having openly killed his Father, he would afterwards have gone to Rome. Wherefore endeavouring to find ſome ſtronger argument of his Son's impiety; and becauſe he would not be thought raſhly to have committed his Son to priſon, he cauſed the moſt noble and eminent of all Alexander's friends to be tortured, and they confeſſing no ſuch matter as he expected, he put them to death.

Alexander being in priſon, his friends were tortured.

Whilſt thus all the Court did reſound with fear, torments and contentions, a certain man accuſed Alexander, B to have ſent letters to his friends at Rome, to entreat them to cauſe him to be ſent for by Cæſar thither, that he might accuſe his Father of certain conſpiracies againſt Cæſar, and how he more eſteemed the friendſhip of Mithridates King of the Parthians, than the friendſhip of the Romans; affirming alſo, that he had poyſon ready prepared at Aſcalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by flatterers about him, as having not done any thing raſhly; and ſo he gave now full credit unto all: Yet the poyſon was diligently ſought for, but could not be found. Alexander being now oppreſſed with this calamity, he yet took courage; and becauſe he would more incite his Father's diſpleaſure againſt him, he did not deny it: Perhaps meaning to make his Father aſhamed of himſelf, for giving credit ſo eaſily unto forged C tales; or at leaſt, if he could not effect that, entangle all the Court and him too in calamity and miſery: Which that he might the better do, he writ four little Pamphlets, and ſent them unto his Father; telling him that it was needleſs to uſe any more torments, for indeed, treaſon was intended againſt him; and that Pheroras and his moſt truſty friends were herein conſpirators: And that in the night time Salome came ſecretly unto him, and as it were, forced him to lie with her: And that all of them aimed at this mark, to have him made away, that ſo they might enjoy their wiſhed liberty. He alſo accuſed Ptolomeus and Sapinnius of this conſpiracy, who were more faithful unto their King, than all others: So that now theſe men, who before were moſt friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one againſt another: and puniſhment ſo D haſtily purſued every one, that they had not time to ſpeak in their own defence: Neither was their puniſhment deferred till their cauſe was tried, and the truth known; ſo that ſome were bound and impriſoned, others preſently put to death, others laughed in their ſleeves to ſee that day, yet diſcontented for that any delay was uſed for their puniſhment: So that the King's Court was now greatly defaced with ſorrow and heavineſs, wherewith the uſual felicity thereof was deſtroyed. Herod himſelf amidſt theſe calamities, could not but be weary of his life; who, not daring to truſt himſelf in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a dayly and hourly fear of ſome untimely death, that would befall: And many times perſwaded himſelf, that he did ſee his Sons before him with a drawn ſword ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, E ſo that herewith he almoſt ran mad.

WHilſt Herod was thus troubled in his mind, Archelaus King of Cappadocia careful of his Daughter, and the young Prince his Son in Law, and pitying his friend Herod in ſuch calamities; he thought it his duty to make a journey unto him. And F finding him ſo affected as it was reported unto him before his coming, he thought it an unfit way to argue him of too much credulity and raſhneſs; perceiving that thereby he would be rather exaſperated, ſo much the more labouring to excuſe himſelf. Wherefore Archelaus deviſed another way to appeaſe theſe troubles; he counterfeited indignation againſt the young Prince, approving all the King's actions; affirming that he would break the band of Wedlock between his Daughter and Alexander; and that if ſhe knew of the Conſpiracy, and did not inform the King thereof, himſelf would puniſh her. Then Herod, contrary to his expectation, ſeeing Archelaus ſo angry for the offence committed againſt him, began to remit his anger: And now with juſt conſideration weighing what he had done, by little and little, G he began to have a Fatherly affection, and to be hereby moved to compaſſion; yet ſo oft as any one ſought to excuſe the young Prince, he grew very angry thereat: but when Archelaus alſo began to accuſe him, then Herod's heart relented, and he with tears

They alſo agreed amongſt themſelves, that Herod ſhould go to Rome, becauſe he had already written unto Cæſar, concerning this matter: And they both went together to Antiochia, and there Herod reconciled Titus the Preſident of Syria unto Archelaus; and ſo he returned into Judea. Alias, chap. 15.

Herod demanded the Thieves to be delivered unto him, and the money he had lent to be repayed.

WHileſt Herod being gone to Rome, was abſent from his Kingdom, the Arabian Wars began, on this occaſion: The inhabitants of Trachon, whoſe Countrey Cæſar taking from Zenodorus, gave it unto Herod; being forbidden and hindred from ſtealing, were now forced to frame themſelves to live like huſband-men, more civily L than before: But this kind of life pleaſed them not, neither did their Countrey yield fruits worth their labours; yet at firſt Herod compelling them thereunto, they abſtained from injuring the inhabitants bordering upon them, which did greatly redound unto Herod's credit, by whoſe diligence they were brought unto it. But when Herod was gone into Italy to accuſe Alexander, and to commend Antipater unto Cæſar, the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, revolted, and turned to their accuſtomed robberies: Yet they were at that time again ſubdued in the King's abſence by the Captains that he left at home; and forty of the chiefeſt of the Thieves amongſt them being taken, the reſt terrified by their example, left their own Countrey, and fled into Arabia, where Syllæus received them, in revenge that he could not obtain Salome M for his Wife; and receiving of him a ſtrong hold to dwell in, they did not only make incurſions, and rob and ſpoil the borders of Judæa, but alſo of Cæloſyria, and drove away the preys they got into the place allotted them, Syllæus protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endamaged by theſe Thieves; and ſeeing he could not ſubdue them, by reaſon the Arabians did protect them; not enduring that injury, and entring into Trachon, he killed all their Families: Whereby they were ſo much the more enraged againſt his Countrey; for they had a Law amongſt them, whereby they were commanded to revenge the death of their Families; and ſo contemning all dangers, they came and waſted all Herod's Countrey with continual incurſions. Then the King complained N hereof unto Saturninus and Volumnius then Preſidents, ſent thither by Cæſar; requeſting that he might have the Thieves to puniſh them. They hearing this news, with as much ſpeed as they might, gathered their Forces together; and making themſelves ſtronger than they were before, with ſudden incurſions waſted all where they came, deſtroying both the fields and villages, and killing all they could find; ſo that now this reſembled a War, rather than a Robbery; for they were a thouſand in number. Wherefore Herod required theſe Thieves and Robbers to be delivered unto him, and required the debt that Obodas owed him; for Herod had lent Obodas threeſcore Talents, and ſent them unto him by Syllæus; and now the time was expired wherein the money was to be repayed. But Syllæus, who had taken all the rule from O Obodas, and himſelf governed all, denied that thoſe Thieves were in Arabia, and deferred the payment of the money: So that this matter was debated before Saturninus

A and Volumnius then Preſidents of Syria. At laſt it was by them determined, that within thirty days, the money due to Herod ſhould be paid, and the runaways of both Countreys delivered each to other. But there was no one Arabian that either had fled unto Herod for any offence committed, nor for any other cauſe; but the Arabians were convicted to receive the Thieves that fled from Herod.

And a Captain of the Arabians, named Nacebus, came to ſuccour the Thieves, and ſo fought with Herod's Army; in which Battel a few of Herod's men were ſlain; but of the Arabians were killed five and twenty, with their General, and the reſt were put to flight. Which they not denying, and Cæſar not vouchſafing to hear the cauſe why, his diſpleaſure againſt Herod was greatly encreaſed, ſo that he writ threatning Letters unto him; telling him, that hitherto he had uſed him as a Friend, but hereafter he would uſe him as a Subject; which alſo Syllæus ſignified unto the Arabians. By which Letters they were made proud, and would G neither render unto him the Thieves that were eſcaped, nor reſtore the money he lent their King, nor pay him rent for the paſture-ground that they hired of him. Moreover, the Trachonites hearing this, rebelled againſt the Garriſon of the Idumæans; and joyning with the Arabian Thieves, who waſted their Countrey; not ſo much reſpecting H their own gain, as their revenge and particular profit; they did many miſchiefs, and exerciſed great cruelty againſt them. Herod did put up all injuries, and durſt not once mutter, Cæſar being offended with him; for the which cauſe he was not ſo couragious nor valiant as he was before. For firſt of all, Cæſar would not admit his Ambaſſadours, whom he ſent to plead his cauſe before Cæſar; and Herod again ſending other Ambaſſadours, Cæſar ſent them back again, their buſineſs undone.

Obodas dying, Eneas ſucceeded him in the Arabian Kingdom.

Cæſar would not give Audience to the Arabian Ambaſſadours.

Herod ſent Nicholaus Damaſcene to Cæſar.

Wherefore Herod being in this perplexity, greatly feared Syllæus; who being now at Rome, did eaſily perſwade Cæſar any thing; for Cæſar was very credulous; and Syllæus aimed at ſome greater matter. For Obodas dying, Eneas ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Arabia, changing his name, called himſelf Aretas; whom Syllæus, by I forged calumniations, did ſeek to depoſe from the Crown, and uſurp the Kingdom unto himſelf, giving great ſumms of money unto the Courtiers, and promiſing great ſumms unto Cæſar; whom he now perceived to be angry againſt Aretas, for that, without his conſent, he preſumed to take upon him the government of the Kingdom. But at laſt he alſo ſent letters and gifts unto Cæſar, and amongſt the reſt a Crown of Gold worth many Talents; and in thoſe letters he accuſed Syllæus, who as an impious and diſloyal ſervant, had poyſoned his King Obodas; in whoſe life-time he had alſo invaded the Government of the Kingdom, committing Adultery with the Arabians Wives, getting together other men's money, thereby to obtain the Kingdom. Cæſar would not permit theſe Ambaſſadours to have Audience; but refuſing their gifts, ſuffered K them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affairs of Judæa and Arabia every day became worſe and worſe, every one ſeeking to trouble the eſtate of both Kingdoms, and no man endeavouring to quiet them. For the King of Arabia was not yet eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, and therefore could not control his Subjects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himſelf, he ſhould ſo much the more incite Cæſar againſt him; and ſo was forced to put up all injuries that were done unto him: And finding no end of his miſeries, he at length determined to ſend again to Rome Ambaſſadours, to ſee if, by the help of friends, Cæſar might be perſwaded to think better of him; and ſo committed that Embaſſage unto Nicholaus of Damaſco, and ſent him to Rome. Eurycles a Lacedemonian inſinuateth himſelf into Herod's familiarity.

Eurycles inſinuated himſelf into Alexander's friendſhip.

IN the mean time the diſſention of Herod's houſe was much encreaſed, by the augmentation of hatred againſt his Sons Alexander and Ariſtobulus; and although at all other times his Court was never void of ſuſpicion, which is a pernicious evil to Kings and Princes; yet, at that time eſpecially, this miſchief was in his principal vigour and force. For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian, and a Noble man of his Countrey; but having a turbulent wit, given over to flattery and pleaſure, yet cunningly diſſembling both vices, coming unto Herod and giving him gifts, and receiving greater gifts at his hands, was by him courteouſly entertained; and familiarly converſing with him, brought it ſo to paſs, that he was eſteemed amongſt his eſpecial friends. This Eurycles N lodged at Antipater's houſe, being alſo familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: For he ſaid that Archelaus King of Cappadocia and himſelf, was great friends, and therefore he counterfeited himſelf to reverence Glaphyra very much; and all men judging him indifferent in all parties, he diligently noted whatſoever paſt, and every word that was ſpoken, ſeeking, by all means he could, matter to gratifie others carrying of tales; and with ſuch flattering fair ſpeeches he inſinuated himſelf into every man's friendſhip, that he ſeemed Alexander's only truſty friend; and that all his endeavours with others, were only for to be more ſerviceable to Alexander in his concerns. And by this his deceit, he ſo inſinuated himſelf into Alexander's favour, that the young Prince thought him to be his only friend, unto whom he O might impart his ſecrets; ſo that Alexander ſhewed him how much he was grieved for not being in his Father's favour; and related his Mother's misfortune, and that

A Antipater had now gotten all authority and dignity from him and his Brother, and was the only man that could do all; and that theſe injuries were no longer tolerable, their Father being now incited againſt them, that now he would neither admit them unto his Councils nor Banquets. And he committed his griefs (as he then thought) into his friends boſom. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but ſpeak of it for the greatneſs of the preſent danger; deſiring him to beware of Alexander, who did not ſtick openly to ſhew what mind he bare; but did, as it were, manifeſtly ſhew that he deſired to make away his Father. Which done, he received of Antipater moſt rich gifts, and pledges of his good will towards him; at length he perſwaded him to
B relate his news himſelf unto Herod. The King gave an attentive ear, whilſt he related Alexander's malice; and was ſo moved with the circumſtances, that he conceived a deadly hatred againſt his Son, which alſo without further delay, he did make manifeſt; for he rewarded Eurycles for his pains with fifty Talents. Which he having received, went unto Archelaus; and ſpeaking well of Alexander, acquainted him how inſtrumental he had been in reconciling him unto his Father: and receiving of him alſo a ſumm of money, he departed before his malice was diſcovered, and returned into his Countrey; and uſing the like ſhifts there alſo, he was at laſt by his Countreymen baniſhed from Lacedemonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before, to hear only that which was told him of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, did himſelf alſo
C conceive a proper hatred againſt them, obſerving all things, and making diligent enquiry though no man accuſed them, and permitting all men to ſpeak what they pleaſed againſt them. And amongſt the reſt, Evaratus of Cous had conſpired with Alexander; and he ſeemed now to hear no talk more willingly than this, and ſuch like. But then greater misfortunes than all the reſt befell the two Princes, falſe accuſations never ceaſing to be forged againſt them; and every one as it were, ſtriving to accuſe them of ſome crime or other unto the King, pretending the care they had of his ſafety. Herod had two Champions, Jucundus and Tyrannus; both acceptable unto him, for their ſtrength, and tall ſtature, and bigneſs of body: Theſe two for ſome offence were baniſhed the Court, and received into Alexander's ſervice, and placed amongſt
D his Guards; and for that they were very active, he beſtowed many gifts and much money upon them. Whereat the King preſently conceiving ſuſpicion, began to torture them; and after many torments, they confeſſed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod, as he was a hunting wild Beaſts: for ſo it might eaſily be bruited abroad, that he falling off his horſe, fell upon his own Lance, and ſo was killed; which once before had almoſt happened unto him. They alſo declared unto him, that certain gold was hidden and buried in the ſtable: And they alſo accuſed Herod's chief Huntſman, that at Alexander's command he had given Alexander's Servants the King's Lances and his Armour. After them the Governour of the Caſtle of Alexandrium was taken, and examined upon tortures; and it was objected againſt him, that he promiſed to re-
E ceive them into the Caſtle, and deliver unto them the King's Treaſure there. But he denying it, his own Son affirmed all to be true, and brought forth Letters to teſtifie the ſame, reſembling Alexander's hand written to this effect: So ſoon as by God's aſſiſtance we have done that which we intend to do, we will preſently come unto you; be careful therefore, that according to your promiſe you do receive us into your Caſtle. Herod having had a view of theſe Letters, did now without any doubt believe, that indeed ſome treacherous practice was plotted againſt him by his Sons. But Alexander affirmed that Diophantus the Secretary had counterfeited his hand, and that the Letter was Antipater's device. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in ſuch matters, and afterward being taken with the like, he was therefore put to death. And the King F produced them that had been tortured at Jericho before the people to accuſe his Sons, where they were ſtoned to death; and the people hereat moved, would alſo have killed Alexander and Ariſtobulus with the ſame death. But Herod, by the means of Ptolomeus and Pheroras, did reſtrain them; and commanded the young Princes to be caſt into priſon, and there to be kept ſo cloſe that no man was admitted unto them; but many ſpies were ſet, who ſhould narrowly mark all their actions and words; and now they were accounted as condemned men, both by other men's opinions, and alſo by their own. One of them, to wit, Ariſtobulus, for grief inviting his Aunt, and Mother in Law, to compaſſionate his preſent calamity, and to hate him that was the Author hereof; affirmed that ſhe alſo was in great danger, being accuſed in hope to G marry with Syllæus, to have ſignified unto him by Letters all that paſt in Herod's Court. Which words the woman preſently came and told to her Brother Herod. The King no longer able to bridle his fury, commanded them both to be bound, and kept in ſeveral places, places one from another, and each of them to write what they had plotted againſt their Father: And being thus commanded, they wrote that they neither prepared Treaſon, nor yet thought of any Treaſon againſt him; only they purpoſed to fly, becauſe they perceived that they could no longer live here, becauſe they were ſo ſuſpected, and in continual care. At that time a Prince of Cappadocia came Ambaſſadour from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greateſt Lords of the Countrey: And Herod deſiring to ſhew his Son's malice, he ſent for Alexander out of priſon; commanding him to relate how, and after what order, or whither they meant to fly: he anſwered, unto Archelaus, who had alſo promiſed them to ſend them to Rome; but that they had no further intent or purpoſe to effect any unlawful practice againſt their Father, and that all other accuſations were falſe. And that he requeſted that Tyrannus and the reſt might have been better examined, but Antipater prevented that; who, by his own forged rumours ſpred amongſt the people, did cauſe them to haſten their deaths. Which being ſaid, Herod commanded both him and Mela to be led unto Glaphyra, that ſhe might be asked whether ſhe were any way privy to the conſpiracy againſt Herod: And coming unto her, the woman ſeeing her husband bound, preſently tore her hair; and being amazed, with great compaſſion, cried out. The young man's cheeks were alſo bedewed with tears; ſo that a long time after, thoſe that were preſent amazed, and moved to compaſſion at this miſerable ſight, could neither ſpeak nor do the King's command. At laſt Ptolomeus, to whoſe charge Alexander was committed, deſiring him to ſpeak, whether his Wife was privy to his intent; he anſwered, How could it be otherwiſe, who is dearer unto me than mine own life, being Mother of my Children? then ſhe anſwered, crying out aloud, that ſhe was privy to nothing that was any harm; yet (quoth ſhe) if it will avail you any thing, or help to ſave your life, I am ready to tell any lie whatſoever, ſeeing I muſt die, and will deny nothing you would have me to ſay. Alexander anſwered, Neither did I purpoſe any impiety againſt my Father, as ſome ſuppoſe, who ought not to think ſo; neither doſt thou know of any one: this thou knoweſt, that thou and I purpoſed to fly unto Archelaus thy Father, and that he promiſed to convey us to Rome; which ſhe alſo affirmed.

Cæſar and Herod made friends.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was diſaffected towards him, delivered Letters unto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to paſs by Eleuſa a Town of Cilicia, and deliver certain Letters unto Archelaus himſelf to the ſame effect; and that from thence they ſhould go to Rome; and if ſo be when they came there, they found that Cæſar had been reconciled to him by Nicholaus his means, that then they ſhould alſo deliver certain Letters unto him; declaring all that was paſt between him and his Sons, and the proofs alledged to convince the Princes. Archelaus writ again unto Herod, that indeed he would have entertained the young men, for fear that any greater miſchance ſhould befall them or their Father, by reaſon of the ſuſpicion againſt them; yet was he not minded to ſend them to Cæſar, nor to have confirmed them in any malicious courſe. The Meſſengers coming to Rome, found Cæſar reconciled to Herod, and delivered the Letters unto him. For Nicholaus his Embaſſage was to this effect: So ſoon as he came unto Rome, and had entred the Palace, beſide the charge he had given him, he did alſo undertake to accuſe Syllæus. For he perceived the Arabians at variance among themſelves; and that ſome of them had declared all Syllæus his bad practices, and that by his means many of Obodas's Kinſmen were murthered, as his adverſaries manifeſtly proved by his Letters which they intercepted.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. 18.

Nicholaus accuſeth Syllæus, and excuſeth Herod.

Now Nicholaus deſirous to reconcile Herod unto Cæſar, omitted not this occaſion by chance offered him; for he well knew that if he began with the King's defence, he ſhould then find a hard and heavy Judge againſt him; but if he began to accuſe Syllæus, he ſhould find alſo a fit occaſion to plead his King's cauſe. Wherefore Nicholaus taking upon him to prove the accuſation againſt him at the day appointed, he converſed with King Aretas's Ambaſſadours, accuſed Syllæus as a murtherer of his Lord and King, and many other Arabians; and that he had borrowed much money, to trouble the peace of the Commonwealth; and that he had corrupted many women and honeſt Matrons, both at Rome and in Arabia. He added hereunto a moſt grievous crime, to wit, that he, by his lies and falſe reports, had deceived Cæſar; whom in all things he had miſinformed, concerning that which Herod had done. Which when he once mentioned, Cæſar commanded him to omit the reſt; and only to relate the matter concerning Herod; whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an Army, and did kill two thouſand and five hundred men, and carry away Captives, and rob and ſpoil the Countrey? Nicholaus anſwered, that to theſe demands himſelf was able to anſwer, that Herod did none of theſe; and that he did not deſerve any diſpleaſure. Cæſar, contrary

A to his expectation, hearing this, began to give diligent ear to what Nicholaus ſaid :
And hereupon Nicholaus related unto Cæſar, how Herod had lent five hundred Talents, and that he had a Writing in pawn, wherein he was permitted after the day appointed, if then it were not repayed him again, to prey upon all the whole Countrey, and ſatisfie himſelf ; and that this was no hoſtile invaſion, but according to Law and equity, a requiring of his right and debt due unto him. And that this was not raſhly done, though by the writing he was ſo permitted to do ; but by the conſent of Saturninus and Volumnius Preſidents of Syria ; in whoſe preſence Syllæus ſwore by Cæſar's good fortune at Berytum, that within thirty days after, both the debt, and alſo certain fugitives fled from the King, ſhould be reſtored unto him ; and that Syllæus performed none B of theſe : And ſo Herod went again unto the Preſidents, and they permitted him to go and take pledges for his money ; and that ſo by their permiſſion he went into Arabia.
And this is the War that his adverſaries have ſo tragically exaggerated ; and yet how can it be called a War ? ſeeing that it was done by the conſent of the Preſidents, and that by Covenant after Perjury, wherewith both God's and alſo Cæſar's name was violated.
It now remaineth that I ſpeak ſomething concerning the Captives. There were forty Thieves of Trachon, and afterward more that fled from Herod for fear of puniſhment, and fled into Arabia, whom Syllæus protected and ſuccoured to the injury of all men, and gave them ground to inhabit, and was partaker of their preys ; notwithſtanding that by his foreſaid oath, he was bound to reſtore them, together with the C borrowed money ; neither can he name any man beſide them taken in Arabia, and carried away Captive, and ſome of them alſo eſcaped. This his forged tale concerning the Captives being thus refuted, hear, O Sovereign Cæſar, the lying invention, which to provoke thee to wrath, himſelf deviſed. For I am well able to affirm this, that when the Arabian Army aſſaulted us, and one or two of our men were killed, then at laſt Herod forced to make reſiſtance, he killed Nacebus, and with him five and twenty, and no more ; for every one of which Syllæus falſely told Cæſar a hundred, and ſo told him that two thouſand and five hundred were killed. Cæſar hereat greatly moved, with an angry countenance looking upon Syllæus, he asked him how many Arabians were killed in the fight ? He amazed, and knowing not what to reply, anſwered, D that he erred in the number. Preſently Cæſar commanded the Writings to be read, containing the conditions between them ; and the Writings of the Preſidents, and the Letters of the Cities containing the complaints of the Robberies. And ſo the matter was brought to paſs, that Cæſar was reconciled unto Herod, and condemned Syllæus to die ; and repenting himſelf to have written ſo threatning Letters to Herod, he objected that alſo unto Syllæus ; affirming, that by his falſe informations he had cauſed him to paſs the limits of friendſhip, in uſing his friend ſo hardly. And ſo he ſent Syllæus into his Countrey, that after he had ſatisfied his creditors, he might be puniſhed according to the ſentence. But he ſtill continued angry with Aretas for that without his authority, he had uſurped the Crown and Kingdom : and he was minded alſo E to beſtow Arabia upon Herod ; but the Letters which Herod ſent him, changed his mind.
For Olympus and Volumnius, as ſoon as they underſtood that Cæſar's wrath towards Herod was pacified, preſently they delivered unto him the Letters as they were commanded ; wherein were contained the Arguments whereby his Sons were convicted of Treaſon againſt him. Which Cæſar having read, he thought it not convenient to trouble the old man (unfortunate with his Sons) with another Kingdom ; and ſo he admitted Aretas his Ambaſſadours ; and chiding them that their King had raſhly uſurped the Kingdom without his Authority and knowledge, not expecting his pleaſure ; he received their gifts, and confirmed him in the Kingdom by his Authority. This done, being now reconciled unto Herod, he writ unto him, that he was ſorry for him, that F he had ſuch Children ; and that he ſhould, if they had attempted any Treaſon againſt him, puniſh them as men that deſired to murther their Father, for he gave him free and full Authority ; but if they only attempted to fly, he ſhould alſo be ſatisfied with a leſs puniſhment. Wherefore he counſelled him to call a Council at Berytum, together with the Roman Preſidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the reſt of his friends, and the Nobility thereabout, according as they ſhould adviſe him, ſo to do. And this was the effect of Cæſar's Letter.

How Herod's Sons were condemned in the Council of Berytum.

Herod aſſembleth all that Cæſar willed, except Archelaus.

Herod accuſed his Sons.

Saturninus doth pronounce an indifferent ſentence. Volumnius and other of Herods friends pronounce Herod's Sons to be beheaded. Herod asked of Nicholaus what his friends at Rome thought of his Sons.

HErod receiving this Letter, rejoyced above meaſure; both for that he had again obtained Cæſar's favour, and for that Cæſar had given him full Authority to do what he pleaſed unto his Sons. And yet I know not how it came to paſs, that he who in his proſperity was a hard Father, yet did ſhew himſelf not raſh in putting his Sons to death; and though his affairs were in a very flouriſhing condition, yet he was very moderate in his revenge. Wherefore by Letters he called together all thoſe whom Cæſar appointed, only Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or elſe for that he feared he would have withſtood his purpoſe: And when they were all come together, as well the Preſidents as the reſt, who were called out of divers Cities, he would not bring his Sons into the Council, but kept them in a Village of the Sidonians, named Platan, not far diſtant from the City, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himſelf alone entring into the Council, before an hundred and fifty men there aſſembled for that purpoſe, began to accuſe his Sons before them; and uſed a ſpeech not only pitiful for his own calamities, but alſo little becoming a Father. For he was very vehement in inveighing againſt their offence; neither did he ſufficiently expreſs his mind, ſhewing many ſigns of fury and anger; neither did he deliver in writing any proofs of the Accuſations unto the Judges; but undecently himſelf alledged there, the Father againſt the Son; himſelf alſo reading before them certain Letters written by them, wherein was contained no impiety nor Treaſon, but only a conſultation to flee away, and certain hard ſpeeches whereby they ſhewed themſelves offended; which when he came unto, he exclaimed, as though hereby they confeſſed their treacherous practices; greatly exaggerating the matter, and proteſting that he had rather die than hear ſuch ſpeeches. Laſtly, affirming that both Nature and Cæſar gave him authority againſt them; and his Countrey Laws ſo commanded, that if any one being accuſed, his Father or Mother ſhould lay their hands upon his head, and the ſtanders-by muſt preſently ſtone him to death; which though he might eaſily do in his own Countrey and Kingdom, yet he thought good alſo to expect their cenſures. Yet he came unto them, not for that they were to judge his Sons, who were taken in a manifeſt crime; but that by this occaſion they might add their ſuffrages to the juſt indignation of a Father offended, and that they might leave an example unto all poſterity, that ſuch Treaſons ought not to be left unpuniſhed. The King having thus ſpoken, and not permitting the young Princes to be brought in to anſwer; all ſeeing what the King intended, and that there was no hope to reconcile them unto their Father, or ſave their lives; they all confirmed his authority. And firſt of all Saturninus one that had been Conſul, and had been adorned with many honours, pronounced an indifferent ſentence, limited with circumſtances, to wit, that he condemned Herod's Sons, yet not to die; for (quoth he) my ſelf have Sons, and I would not add this calamity to Herod's misfortune paſt. After him alſo his three Sons, who were their Father's Legates, pronounced the ſame ſentence. But Volumnius pronounced that they had deſerved death. who were ſo impious towards their Father; whoſe ſentence after him the moſt part followed; ſo that it ſeemed that they were now ordained to be put to death. Preſently Herod carried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus who was there arrived, returning from Rome; unto whom the King firſt relating what was done at Berytum, he asked him what his friends at Rome thought of his Sons? He anſwered that they judged the Princes intents impious, and that they ought to be bound and impriſoned;and then after due conſideration, if it were thought expedient, to be put to death; leſt the King might be thought to have given more way to his anger than to reaſon; yet, if it might ſo pleaſe him, they thought it beſt to acquit them, leſt otherwiſe he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of moſt of his friends at Rome. Then the King a long time pondered theſe words, and made no reply, but commanded him to go along in his company. At his arrival in Cæſarea all men were doubtful what would become of his Sons, expecting an end of that Tragedy; for they greatly feared that by reaſon of the old diſcord, he would cut them off; and notwithſtanding they were ſorry for them, yet it was dangerous either to ſpeak raſhly, or to hear any thing ſpoken freely concerning them; but in their hearts compaſſionating them, they concealed their griefs. Only one amongſt all the reſt, an old Souldier named Tyro, others diſſembling their grief, ſpake ſpake freely what he thought: This Tyro had a Son of Alexander's age, and beloved A of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidſt the multitudes exclaimed, that truth and equity were baniſhed out of the world, and that in their ſtead, malice and untruth reigned: Whereby there was ſuch a miſt and a fog cauſed over the whole world, that no man could ſee his own errors. This his free Speech, though it was not without danger, yet all men hereat were moved; for that he had ſome reaſon to ſhew his fortitude in ſo dangerous a time, and every one was willing to hear his Speech: and though themſelves for fear were ſilent, yet did they not reprehend him for ſpeaking freely. For the expectation of the event of ſo great miſchief was able to have wreſted from every one of them words of commiſeration. B Tyro with great audacity alſo came unto the King, and begged of him that he might talk with him alone: which the King granting, he uſed theſe words with great lamentation: I can no longer, O my King, ſuppreſs this my grief, which cauſeth me ſo boldly to ſpeak, though with my own peril; yet if it pleaſe thee, my King, that which I intend to ſpeak ſhall be for thine advantage.

Where now, my Lord, are thy wits? Where is thy couragious mind ever hitherto able to match all difficult buſineſſes whatever? How happeneth it that thou haſt ſo few Friends and Kindred? For I account not them Kinſmen or Friends that permit ſuch wickedneſs and hatred in thy Court, which was moſt happy and fortunate. And what art thou unto thy ſelf? Wilt thou not look and ſee what is done? Wilt thou put to death C the two young Princes born unto thee by the Queen thy Wife, who abound in all vertue, and commit thy ſelf now in thy old age unto one only Son, who nouriſheth impious Hopes and Deſigns; and to thy Kindred, who by thy own cenſure have often deſerved death? Doſt thou not perceive that the people keeping themſelves quiet and ſtill; do both condemn the errour of thy Friends, and alſo pity and compaſſionate the two Princes? Moreover, all thy Soldiers and the Captains themſelves have compaſſion on them, and curſe the Authors of this unfortunate calamity.

The King at firſt took theſe words of Tyro in good part as being admoniſhed of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his own calamity. But Tyro immodeſtly and Soldier like urging the King, and for his own ſimplicity not able to D diſcern what fitted that time, the King at laſt thought this, rather a turbulent upbraiding him, than a friendly adomonition: and asking who thoſe Captains and Soldiers were, he commanded them all, and Tyro alſo, to be bound and kept in priſon. Then one Tripho the Kings Barber, taking hereat occaſion, told the King, that Tyro had often ſollicited him, as he ſhav'd the King to cut his throat with his razor, promiſing him for recompence great rewards, and that he ſhould be one of Alexander's chief Friends. Having ſpoken theſe words, the King commanded him to be apprehended, and the Barber, and Tyro and his Son to be tortured. Tyro his Son ſeeing his Father in moſt miſerable torments, and that he ſtill perſiſted in them (and by the Kings diſpleaſure, conjecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tor- E tured his Father, that he would confeſs all the truth, conditionally that his Father and himſelf might be no more tormented: and having his requeſt granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand ſhould have killed the King: for he could get opportunity to come unto the King when no man elſe was with him, and ſo he would kill him, and for Alexander's ſake endure any torments whatſoever. This ſpoken, he delivered himſelf and his Father from further tortures: but it is uncertain whether the tale he told was true, or whether he deviſed it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aſide (if before he were in any) thought what death his Sons ſhould die, and leaving no place to repentance and mercy, he haſtened to execute his purpoſe: and producing 300 Captains, and Tyro and F his Son, and the Barber his accuſer; he accuſed them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they killed them every one. And Alexander and Ariſtobulus was carried unto Sebaſte, and there by their Fathers command were ſtrangled: and their bodies carried by night into the Caſtle Alexandrium, where there Grand-father by their Mothers ſide, and many of their Progenitors lay buried. But perhaps ſome will not marvel, that a hatred ſo long a breeding ſhould in the end ſo prevail, that it overcame natural affections. But one may juſtly doubt whether the fault were in the young Princes, who exaſperated by a hard Father ſo long time, fell into ſuch a hatred of him, or whether it is to be imputed unto his unkindneſs and immoderate deſire of Honour and Rule, who could G not abide any to be his equal, but rather chuſing to do all at his own pleaſure: Or rather unto Fortune, whoſe power the wiſeſt living is not able to reſiſt. Wherefore I am perſwaded, Fortune hath predeſtinated all humane actions, ſo that they

The cauſe of theſe calamities was Deſtiny and Gods Providence.

Herod's ſhameful errour not to be excuſed.

muſt have a neceſſary event. And this inevitable force we call Fate, or fatal Deſtiny, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it ſufficeth briefly to have touched this high matter, which of it ſelf is very difficult, which attributeth ſomething unto our actions, and examineth the cauſes of the variety of our actions, which ſpeculation is already compriſed in the two Volumes of our Law. Furthermore, touching the Princes fault, we may accuſe their youthful arrogancy, and their pride, who did give too great ear to their Father's accuſers; and for that they were unjuſt ſearchers into his life and actions; and that they maliciouſly ſuſpected him, and could not rule their tongues; but hereby gave double occaſion to their Adverſaries, and matters unto thoſe tale-bearers that ſought to get the King's favour. But their Father's ſhameful fault cannot be excuſed, who ſuffered himſelf ſo to be over-ruled with paſſion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his own body, without any proof or argument of the crimes laid unto their charge; yea, two young Princes of excellent feature of body, not only beloved of their own Nation, but alſo of ſtrangers; they were dextrous in all Exerciſes, and commendable in Military Affairs, and eloquent in Civil Diſcourſes. For, in all theſe things they were excellent, and eſpecially Alexander the eldeſt of them. It had been enough for him, ſuppoſe he had condemned them, either to have kept them in perpetual Priſon, or baniſhed them into ſome far Countrey; ſeeing that he was aſſured of the Roman Power, under whoſe protection he neither needed to have feared invaſion, nor ſecret Treaſon againſt him. For to put them to death, only to ſatisfie his own furious will, what elſe doth it argue, but only an impious liberty caſting off all Fatherly humanity and kindneſs? eſpecially ſeeing that he was aged, whoſe years could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceived. For neither was he the more excuſed by the delay he uſed; nay, it had been a leſs offence, if amazed with ſome ſudden news, he had been incited to ſo hainous an offence: But after ſo long deliberation, at laſt to effect ſuch a matter, betokens a bloody mind, and hardened in wickedneſs, as he ſhewed afterwards, not ſparing the reſt, whom before he held moſt dear: Who, though they were leſs to be pitied, in that they juſtly ſuffered; yet was it an argument of his like cruelty, in that he abſtained not from their deaths alſo: But we will ſpeak of this hereafter.

The year of the World, 3961. before Chriſt's Nativity, 3.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 1.

Antipater, after he had made away his Brothers, grew hateful both to the Souldiers and the people.

Antipater governed the Kingdom with his Father.

Antipater wiſheth his Father's death

Antipater ſpared no coſt to win his Father's friends.

Antipater could not deceive his Aunt

After that Antipater had made away his Brothers, through the extreme impiety and unbridled fury, wherewith Herod their Father was incenſed againſt them; yet he did not immediately obtain that which undoubtedly he hoped for. For being freed of K that fear he conceived, leſt his Brothers ſhould be partakers with him in the Kingdom, he found it a difficult and dangerous matter to find the means how to obtain it; ſo ſtrange and hainous a hatred had all the Nation conceived againſt him. On the other ſide, in ſhewing himſelf proud and lofty, he more and more encreaſed that hatred which the Souldiers had conceived againſt him, in whom the ſecurity of the Kingdom conſiſted, if it ſhould fortune to fall out that the people ſhould attempt any alteration. All which miſchiefs were procured by his own ſins, and the unnatural murther of his Brothers. Nevertheleſs, he governed the Kingdom with his Father, living only in leſs Authority than himſelf: Herod alſo repoſed more confidence in L him, even in thoſe things, for which he was worthy to loſe his head. For the King conceived that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accuſed his Brethren, to continue his Father in ſecurity, and not for any hatred he bore unto them more than to his Father; though indeed he hated them for his Father's ſake, being tranſported with fury. But all theſe were but as ſo many ſtratagems to inſinuate himſelf into Herod's Counſels and Favours; and theſe did he craftily make uſe of, to cut off the occaſion leſt any ſhould prevent or accuſe him of that which he pretended to do, and that Herod might be deprived of all relief, if ſo be that Antipater ſhould be[illegible] his Forces againſt him. For the Treaſon he complotted againſt his Brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare unto his Father: But at that time he was the more egged on to proſecute M his intended purpoſes without any delay. For if Herod ſhould happen to die, it was moſt ſure that the Kingdom ſhould be his; and ſhould his life continue any longer time, and the practice Antipater went about ſhould be diſcovered, ſeeing himſelf invironed with theſe dangers, he ſhould be enforced to make his Father his Enemy. For which cauſe he was very liberal to all thoſe that were about his Father; and through the great gifts he beſtowed upon them, he extinguiſhed that hatred which all of them bare unto him: and above all things he continued himſelf in credit with thoſe friends which Herod had at Rome, by ſending them divers Preſents; and namely Saturninus, who was Governour of Syria. He hoped alſo, by bribes and rewards, to draw his Father's Brother into his faction, and to corrupt the King's Siſter alſo, who was married to N one of the King's moſt eſteemed friends in Court. He was a ſubtil and politick man in entertaining thoſe men with colourable ſhew of friendſhip with whom he converſed, and to draw himſelf into credit with them: he was ſufficiently dexterous to diſſemble his malice and diſcontents, which he had conceived againſt any man. Notwithſtanding all this, he could not deceive Salome his Aunt, who of long time before had ſounded his inclinations, and who was not ſo ſimple as to ſuffer her ſelf to be deceived; but had already, by all cunning means that might be, prevented his malice, although ſhe had a Daughter married unto his Uncle by the Mother's ſide. This Daughter was firſt of all wedded to Ariſtobulus, and afterwards by Antipater's means to his Uncle: For Callæas her Huſband's Son had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the O matter ſo much, but that his malice was diſcovered; neither could that former conſanguinity extinguiſh the deſerved hatred conceived againſt him. Herod conſtrained Salome (who

A (who through amorous paſſion had thought to have married her ſelf to Syllæus the Arabian) to marry with Alexas, and that by the mediation and perſwaſion of Julia Cæſar's wife, who adviſed Salome not to refuſe that Marriage, leſt he ſhould prove her mortal enemy; for Herod had made an Oath, that if Salome condeſcended not to marry Alexas, he would never make account of her: For which cauſe ſhe followed Julia's advice, who was Cæſar's wife, and counſelled her alſo to her profit and preferment.

The year of the World, 3961, before Chriſt's Nativity. 3.

Herod compelleth Salome to marry Alexas.

At the ſame time Herod ſent his Daughter Glaphyra to King Archelaus, who had been married to Alexander, preſenting him a Dowry out of his own Treaſury, leſt there ſhould any difference ariſe between them, and he himſelf moſt carefully brought up his Sons Children. For Alexander had two Sons by Glaphyra, and Ariſtobulus begat B on Bernice, Salomes Daughter, three Sons and two Daughters. Sometimes he would recommend them unto his Friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his Sons, would beſeech God that no ſuch ill fortune might befall their children, but rather that they might increaſe in virtue, and acknowledge their education and bringing up, with all dutiful reſpects unto their Parents. He provided them alſo each of them with a wife, when they were ready for Marriage; Namely, the Daughter of Pheroras for the eldeſt of Alexander's Sons; and the Daughter of Antipater for Ariſtobulus's eldeſt Son: and one of Ariſtobulus's Daughters was married to Antipater's Son; and the other to Herod his own Son, whom he had begotten of the Daughter of the High Prieſt. For it is lawful in our Countrey, and according to our cuſtom, to have divers Wives at one C time. The King procured theſe Marriages through the compaſſion he had of thoſe Orphans, thinking by this mutual Alliance to cauſe Antipater to be their Friend. But Antipater conceived no leſs hatred toward the children, than he had done malice towards their Fathers: For the care that Herod had of them, increaſed his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greateſt among the Brethren; and he eſpecially feared leſt when they ſhould grow to mans eſtate, they would reſiſt his power, being aſſiſted by King Archelaus, as his Sons in Law; and Pheroras who was a Tetrarch ſhould do the like, for that he had married his Son to Alexander's Daughter. And ſo much the more was he incited, becauſe all the people had compaſſion of theſe Orphans, and had conceived a hatred againſt him, who never ceaſed to expreſs his malice againſt his D Brethren. He therefore deviſed all the means that were poſſible to diſanul the Decrees which his Father had reſolved upon to this effect, being very loath that they ſhould ever live to be partners with him in the Kingdom. So that at laſt Herod condeſcended to Antipater's demand, which was, that he might marry Ariſtobulus's Daughter, and his Son to Pheroras's Daughter: and thus were the forementioned Marriages wholly cut off; yea, even againſt Herod's former Decree. At that time Herod had nine Wives, namely, Antipater's Mother, the High Prieſts Daughter, by whom he had a Son that bare his name, and a Daughter of his Brothers, and a Cozen of his own, by whom he had no children. He had another Wife alſo, that by Nation was a Samaritane, by whom he had two Sons, Antipas and Archelaus, and a Daughter called Olym- E pias, who was afterward married to Joſeph the Kings Cozen. As for Archelaus and Antipas they were brought up at Rome, with a certain private Friend of his. Moreover, he married one that was called Cleopatra, that was born in Jeruſalem, by whom he had Herod and Philip, which Philip was brought up at Rome. By Pallas he had Phaſaelus: by Phedra and Helpia he had two Daughters, Roxane and Salome. As for his eldeſt Daughters, Alexander's Siſters by the Mothers ſide, whom Pheroras had refuſed to take in Marriage, he match'd the one with Antipater his Siſters Son, and the other he wedded to Phaſaelus his Brothers Son, and this was Herod's Progeny.

CHAP. II.

After this, intending to aſſure his Eſtate in the Countrey of Trachonite, he reſolved to build a Borough of the bigneſs of a City in the midſt of the Countrey, as well to ſecure his Countrey, as to be in better readineſs to repulſe his Enemies, with more expedition. And having intelligence that a certain Jew was come from Babylon with five hundred Archers on Horſeback, and about one hundred of his Kinſ- G men, and had adventured to paſs Euphrates, and was in the Countrey adjoyning to Antioch near unto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine General of the Roman Army had given him a Caſtle, called Valatha, to inhabit, he ſent for him and his followers, promiſing

H promiſing to give him both Lands and Lordſhips in the Segniory of Batanea, which bordereth on Trachonite, intending that he ſhould make head againſt thoſe that would aſſail him; and promiſing him that both his Lands and his Souldiers ſhould be exempt from all Tributes, and payments of Cuſtoms. This Babylonian Jew was induced by theſe offers to come, and take poſſeſſion of the place, where he builded a Borough, called Bathyra. This man oppoſing himſelf againſt the Trachonites, defended the Countrey, and thoſe Jews that came from Babylon to Jeruſalem to offer Sacrifice, from all Incurſions and Robberies of the Trachonites; and divers that obſerved the Religion of the Jews, reſorted unto him from all places; ſo that this Countrey was very well peopled, by reaſon of the exemption of the Tribute, which continued during Herod's life-time.

Jacim and Philip the Sons of Zamaris.

I But Philip who ſucceeded him, exacted afterward ſome ſmall Tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the Great, and his Son of the ſame name, charged them with great Taxations; yet permitted them to enjoy their Liberty; whoſe Succeſſors, the Romans impoſed many grievous Tributes upon them, yet continued their Freedom; of whom hereafter we will more particularly and largely diſcourſe in due place, and in proceſs of my Hiſtory. Now this Jew Zamaris, to whom Herod had given the Poſſeſſion of his Countrey, died, after he had lived virtuouſly, and left a virtuous Off-ſpring behind him; amongſt whom was Jacim, renowned for his dexterity on Horſeback; who, with his Troop of Horſe, was of the King of Babylon's Guard. This Jacim died when he was very old, and left his Son Philip to ſucceed him; a valiant man, K and addicted to all ſorts of Virtue, as much as any one that hath been renowned in Hiſtory; for which cauſe King Agrippa loved him, and put his truſt in him, and committed the truſt and training of his Souldiers unto him, who led them alſo forth, if occaſion of ſervice was proffered.

Pheroras deceived by women.

Salome diſcovereth to Herod the Conſpiracies of the Ladies and others.

WHilſt Herod's Affairs were thus diſpoſed, all men's eyes were fixed upon Antipater, after that Herod had given him full power; which was granted him, in hopes that his Father had, that he would behave himſelf faithfully and affectionately towards him: But he abuſed his Authority more audaciouſly than could be expected; for he treacherouſly coloured his conceived malice, and eaſily drew his Father to believe him in whatſoever he ſaid. He was feared by all men, not only for his Authority, but for his ſubtilties and policies. But above all the reſt, Pheroras reſpected him moſt, M and was in like manner, as greatly eſteemed by him. For Antipater circumvented him by the means of certain women, who favoured his Faction; for Pheroras was commanded by his Wife, his Mother, and Siſter-in-Law, notwithſtanding that he hated them, by reaſon of the abuſe they had offered to his Daughters who were unmarried; nevertheleſs he was enforced to diſſemble all things, becauſe he could do nothing but what they were always privy to, and had ſuch power of his Affairs, that they obliged him to perform whatſoever they pleaſed. Antipater was alſo very intimate with them, both on his own account and his Mother's; for theſe four women were of one mind in all things, and ſpake, as it were, by one mouth: Yet was Pheroras at odds with Antipater, upon ſome ſlight diſtaſtes; and ſhe that wrought this debate betwixt them, was N the King's Siſter Salome, who had a long time ſpied all their drifts; knowing well, that their mutual friendſhip tended to the overthrow of Herod, which ſhe was ready to acquaint him. And they knowing well that the King diſliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was privy to that which they pretended, which was his utter ruine; reſolved between themſelves to refrain their publick familiarity, and to make a ſhew that they were at odds one with another; to which intent they reproached one another, eſpecially at ſuch time as they were either in Herod's preſence, or there was any one with them, who (as they thought) would acquaint him with it. But in ſecret they intermitted not their accuſtomed friendſhip, and continued their correſpondence with more privy affability; yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they firſt deviſed O this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution; for ſhe diligently noted all things, and aggravated the ſame by report to her Brother, whom ſhe informed

A of their ſecret meetings, banquetting and ſecret conſultations, which (as we ſaid) had no other ſcope but his ruine, if he did not prevent them in time; ſhewing that for the preſent they behaved themſelves like enemies in outward ſhew, and all their ſpeeches tended to diſgrace one another; but that in ſecret they were friends, and entertained their amity, and promiſed each other their mutual aſſiſtance, to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt thoſe, to whom they were loath their friendſhip ſhould be diſcovered. But he durſt not make ſhew thereof, becauſe he knew that his Siſter was a woman too much addicted to reproachful Accuſations. There was among the Jews a Sect of people that were called Phariſees, who were too much addicted to ſelf-opinion, and boaſted themſelves to be the exacteſt obſervers of the Law in all the Countrey; to whom theſe women
B were very much addicted, as to thoſe who were much beloved of God, as in outward appearance they made ſhew for. Theſe were ſuch as durſt oppoſe themſelves againſt Kings, full of Fraud, Arrogancy and Rebellion; preſuming to raiſe War upon their motions, and to rebel and offend their Princes at their pleaſures: Whereas therefore, all the Nation of the Jews had ſworn to be faithful unto Cæſar, and to the eſtate of the King, theſe only refuſed to take oath; and of this Sect there were to the number of ſix thouſand For which cauſe the King having impoſed a penalty upon them, Pheroras's Wife paid it for them; for which cauſe they pretending to gratifie her, and being eſteemed for ſuch as were skilful in foretelling ſuch things as were to come, by reaſon of their often communication with God, foretold her, that God had decreed to bring the C Kingdom of Herod and his Poſterity to an end; and would bring to paſs, that the Crown ſhould deſcend to Pheroras and his Sons. Salome had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no leſs: And how they likewiſe corrupted every one of his Courtiers; for which cauſe he put thoſe to death amongſt the Phariſees, who were the principal Authors of this Advice, and with them alſo the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the fineſt men of that time. He afterwards cut off all thoſe amongſt his houſhold Servants, who were of the Phariſees Faction; for the Phariſees had perſwaded Bagoas, that this new King whom they prognoſticated, would not only conſider him as his Benefactor and Father; but that he himſelf ſhould alſo marry, and find himſelf capable to beget Children.

The year of the World, 3961. before Chriſt's Nativity, 3.

The Phariſees ſubtil and arrogant.

The Phariſees would not ſwear obedience, but were fined. Pheroras's Wife payeth their Fine; for which benefit, they promiſe her the Kingdom.

Bagoas, Carus and others are put to death by Herod.

D But after that Herod had puniſhed thoſe amongſt the Phariſees, who were convicted to have been of the Conſpiracy, he aſſembled a Council of his friends; before whom he accuſed Pheroras's Wife, and ripped up the injuries that were done unto his Daughters, as it hath been declared, aſcribing the ſame to the pride of this woman, objecting it for a crime againſt her, for having injured his Honour. Beſides this, he accuſed her that ſhe had of ſet purpoſe, ſtirr'd up Mutinies, and by all means poſſible, both in words and deeds, contrary to all Law of Nature, ſtirred up debate betwixt him and his Brother; and that the Fine that he had impoſed upon his Adverſaries, was ſatisfied at her charge; ſo that no jot of that Conſpiracy was contrived without her conſent. For which cauſes (ſaid he) Brother Pheroras, it ſhall not be amiſs for you of your own accord, to drive ſuch a wretched woman from you, before you be requeſted, and the Sentence
E be pronounced againſt her; otherwiſe ſhe will be the cauſe to kindle a War betwixt you and me. For if you will continue the Friendſhip and Brotherhood betwixt you and me, ſeperate your ſelf from her: In ſo doing, I will account you for my Brother; and you ſhall loſe nothing by the affection which I bear unto you. For the bond of Brotherly love cannot continue ſafe and inviolable, unleſs you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moved with the importance and weight of this diſcourſe; yet he ſaid, that for the love he bare unto his Wife, he would forget nothing of that duty which Conſanguinity required at his hands in regard of his Brother; but that he had rather die, than live without her company, whom he loved more dearly than his life. Herod, although he took this anſwer
F of his Brother's for a moſt grievous injury, yet forbare he to diſcover his diſpleaſure towards him: He only forbad Antipater and his Mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. He commanded the women likewiſe, that they ſhould give over their familiar entertainments the one with the other, which all of them promiſed to perform. Yet this notwithſtanding, upon fit opportunities and occaſions, they viſited one another; and Antipater and Pheroras feaſted one another by night. The report alſo went, that Antipater had the company of Pheroras's Wife, and that his Mother was the means and inſtrument of their privy meeting.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4. Herod accuſeth Pheroras's Wife, and commandeth him to put her away.

ANtipater ſuſpecting his Father's diſtaſtes, and fearing leſt his hatred ſhould bring him into hazard, he wrote unto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their Letters unto Herod, requeſting him to ſend Antipater unto Cæſar, with all expedition as was poſſible. Which being brought to paſs, Herod ſent him thither with divers Royal I Preſents; and gave him his Teſtament and Will with him, wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to Antipater. And if it ſhould happen that Antipater ſhould die before him, then he bequeathed the ſame to his Son Herod, whom he had by the High Prieſt's Daughter. About the ſame time Syllæus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithſtanding he had neglected thoſe things which Cæſar had commanded him. Antipater accuſed him before Cæſar, for the ſame faults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllæus alſo was accuſed by Aretas, for murthering divers of the beſt account in the City of Petra, contrary to his mind; amongſt the which was Sohemus (a man of much virtue and honour) and Probatus, Cæſar's Servant; of which Crimes Syllæus was accuſed upon this occaſion which enſueth: There was a certain man of K Corinthus, who was one of the King's Guard, and one he put very great truſt in: Syllæus perſwaded him by ſtore of money and Bribes, to kill Herod; which he promiſed to perform. Probatus made privy to Syllæus's mind, he preſently told it to the King who cauſed him to be apprehended and tortured, who confeſſed the whole matter: He laid hands alſo on two Arabians, perſwaded by this Corinthian's confeſſion; one of which was a man of Command in his Countrey, and the other was Syllæus's chief friend. They being examined, confeſſed that they came thither to ſolicite, with many exhortations, the Corinthian to execute the murther; and to aſſiſt him, if he ſtood in need of them. Which being fully proved by Herod before Saturnine, he ſent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded againſt, and ſo to be puniſhed. L Antipater accuſeth Syllæus at Rome before Cæſar. Aretas accuſeth Syllæus for killing Probatus and others.

CHAP. V.

Pheroras's death.

HErod perceiving that his Brother Pheroras did conſtantly continue his affection towards his Wife, he commanded him to retire himſelf into his own Dominions; whereupon he willingly departed to his Tetrarchy; proteſting by many ſolemn Oaths, that he would never more return into the City, unleſs he were aſſured that Herod was M dead. Not long after it hapned, that the King fell ſick, he was ſent for to receive certain ſecret inſtructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his Oath. Notwithſtanding, Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his love and affection towards him; for he came to Pheroras, as ſoon as he heard of his firſt Sickneſs, without being ſent for: And after he was deceaſed, he ſent his body to Jeruſalem, and honourably entombed him in that place, and grievouſly lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipater's miſ-haps, who at that time was gone to Rome. For it was God's pleaſure, that at laſt he ſhould be puniſhed for the murther of his Brethren. I will diſcourſe of this at large, that it may ſerve for an example to many Kings, how they ought to practice and follow Virtue in all their N actions.

An Oath ſolemnly obſerved.

Pheroras in his Sickneſs is viſited by Herod; and being dead, is honourably buried by him.

Pheroras's Wife is accuſed, and Herod is advertiſed of Antipater's Conſpiracies.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 5. Pheroras's Free-men accuſe his Wife for poyſoning him.

AFter Pheroras's death, two of his Freemen, who were Taphnites by birth; and ſuch as Pheroras in his life time, both only truſted, and dearly loved, came unto Herod; requiring him not to ſuffer his Brother's death to paſs unpuniſhed, but to O make diligent enquiry of that unfortunate and unexpected diſaſtre. Herod gave ear to their ſuit, perceiving that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible

A credible. Whereupon they told him that Pheroras, the day before his unexpected ſickneſs, had ſupt with his Wife; and that having received an unaccuſtomed Poyſon with his meat, he was dead. That this Poyſon had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her ſpeech proteſted that it was ſome Potion to encreaſe love, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongſt all others are skilful in Poyſons, and are great Sorcerers; and ſhe that was charged with this fact, was eſteemed a great friend and favourer of Syllæus's beſt beloved. That Pheroras's Mother and his Wiſe's Siſter went into thoſe Quarters, on purpoſe to buy that Poyſon; and returned back, and brought this woman with them the day before the Supper. The King moved by theſe words of theirs, tortured both thoſe Maid-ſer- B vants of theirs, who were their Bond-women; as alſo certain other of their free ſervants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reaſon that none of them confeſſed it; at length, ſhe that was laſt of all put to her tryal, overcome by the pains ſhe endured, ſaid nothing elſe, but that ſhe prayed God that Antipater's Mother might feel the like torments, ſince ſhe was the cauſe of all theſe miſchiefs which they endured.

The year of the World, 3961, before Chriſt's Nativity. 3.

Herod tortureth the Ladies Bond-women, and foundeth out Antipater's and their ſecrets.

Theſe words of hers made Herod the more eager and inquiſitive, ſo that by force of tortures he wrought out all the ſecrets of theſe women; their Banquets, their ſecret Aſſemblies, and thoſe very words that Herod had ſpoken apart betwixt his Son and himſelf, which had been reported unto the women that Pheroras entertained; namely, C that he would give him one hundred Talents provided that he would uſe no conference with Pheroras. Moreover, they reckoned up the hatred that Antipater bare unto his Father, the complaints that he made unto his Mother, of the too long life and continuance of his Father; for that in regard of himſelf, he was already grown old; ſo that although the Kingdom ſhould fall into his hands preſently, yet he could receive but very little contentment thereby. Moreover, he alledged, that divers Brothers, and Brothers Children were brought up together with him, ſo that he might not ſecurely hope for any thing; for that already, if he ſhould fortune to die, the Kingdom was to deſcend not to his Son, but to his Brother: Beſides this, he was accuſtomed to accuſe the King of divers cruelties committed by him, and of that murther which he ex- D ecuted upon the perſons of his Children. That for fear leſt he ſhould practice his Tyranny againſt thoſe that remained, Antipater had found out the device to be ſummoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himſelf into his Tetrarchy.

Theſe words, which as he knew had reference to that which his Siſter had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; ſo that being preſſed with the malice of Antipater, he ſequeſtred Doris his Mother from his preſence, robbing her before her departure of all her Jewels, which were valued at many Talents; and from that time forward he ſhewed himſelf more favourable towards thoſe women of Pheroras's houſhold. But nothing did more whet Herod's diſpleaſure againſt Antipater, than did a certain Samaritan, who was alſo called Antipater, who had the ordering of E the Affairs of Antipater the King's Son. For he being brought in queſtion, and tortured, declared among other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortal Poyſon, and delivered the ſame to Pheroras his Uncle, commanding him to practice the King's death in his abſence, and by that means leaſt ſuſpected. That this Poyſon was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipater's friend. That it was ſent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipater's Mother's Brother. That this Poyſon was kept by Pheroras's Wife, and was committed by her Huſband to her cuſtody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confeſſed no leſs; and haſting forth, as if ſhe intended to fetch the ſame, ſhe caſt her ſelf down headlong from the top of the houſe; yet ſhe did not kill her ſelf, becauſe ſhe fell upon her feet. After ſhe was recovered out of her ſwoun, and the King F had promiſed all ſecurity both to her ſelf and her Family, if ſo be ſhe would diſcover the truth; and contrariwiſe, threatned her with extreme torments, if ſhe obſtinately continued in concealing theſe Treaſons: She ſware ſhe would diſcover all things according as they were acted; and as many men thought at that time, ſhe told nothing but the truth. That Poyſon (ſaid ſhe) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, and bought there by the means of a Brother of his, who was a Phyſician. After this, Theudion brought it to our houſe; and I having received it from Pheroras's hands, kept the ſame, but bought by your Son Antipater, to poyſon you that are his Father. Now therefore, after that my Husband fell ſick, and you in kindneſs came to viſit and comfort him, he being moved with compaſſion, and conquered by your brotherly kind- G neſs, and by your good affection and loving care in giving order for his health, called me unto him, and ſaid; Oh Wiſe, Antipater hath circumvented me, whilſt by his peſtilent counſels, and poyſoning practices he deſireth to cut off his Father, and deprive me of a kind Brother. Now therefore, ſince I perceive there is no part of my Brother's love and natural affection diminiſhed towards me, wherewith he was wont to entertain me; and that my laſt hour of life approacheth, God forbid, that being ready to ſleep with my Forefathers, I ſhould preſent them with a Ghoſt ſoil'd and ſweltered in my Brother's blood: Diſpatch therefore, and burn this poyſon before mine eyes. Hereupon (ſaid ſhe) I preſently brought it forth according as my Husband commanded me, and burnt the greateſt part of the Poyſon, and the reſt I have reſerved, that if after my Husband's death, your Majeſty ſhould uſe me unkindly, it might ſerve me to eſcape thoſe extremities that would betide me.

The year of the World, 3962. before Chriſt's Nativity, 2.

The King putteth away his Wife, and blots his Son out of his Teſtament. He degradeth Simon, and inſtateth Matthias in the Prieſtood.

Archelaus & Philip are accuſed by Antipaters means

After ſhe had ſpoken thus, ſhe brought forth before them the Poyſon, and the box wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antipholus's Brothers, and the Mother to them both, confeſſed no leſs, being conſtrained thereunto by force of violence and torture, and acknowledged the Box. The King's Wife alſo, who was the Daughter of the High Prieſt, was accuſed of confederacy and concealment of all theſe Treaſons. For which cauſe Herod put her away from him, and cancelled his Sons name out of his Teſtament, wherein he had bequeathed him the Kingdom after his deceaſe. He diſplaced alſo his Father-in-law Simon the Son of Boethus from the Prieſthood, and placed Matthias the Son of Theophilus, who was born in Jeruſalem. In the mean time Bathillus, Antipater's Freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confeſſed that he brought a Poyſon with him, to deliver it to Antipater's Mother and Pheroras, to the end, that if the firſt Poyſon were not effectual enough to diſpatch the King, they might make uſe of this other, to cut him off ſpeedily. There came Letters alſo to Herod's hands from his friends at Rome, written and deviſed by Antipater's means, to accuſe Archelaus and Philip, for very often they had refreſhed the memory of Alexander and Ariſtobulus's death, contrived by their Father; and for that they lamented the miſerable fate of them, who were innocently betrayed; and that now alſo they themſelves were called back into their Countrey for no other cauſe, but upon their arrival to be made partakers of their Brother's miſerable deſtiny. Theſe things did Antipater's friends certifie Herod of, in that by many and mighty Preſents he wrought them thereunto. He himſelf alſo wrote unto his Father colourably, after a manner excuſing the young men, and imputing their words unto their indiſcretion and young years. Mean while, he buſied himſelf in accuſing Syllæus; and courted the chiefeſt Romans, buying divers Ornaments and Jewels to preſent them with, to the value of two hundred Talents. And it is to be wondred at, that ſo great matters being in agitation againſt him, ſeven months at leaſt before his return into the Countrey of Judæa, that no inkling thereof came unto his ears. But the cauſe partly was the diligent ſearch and watch that was kept upon the High-ways, and partly the hatred that all men had conceived againſt Antipater. For there was not any that would put themſelves in hazard to procure his ſecurity.

CHAP. VII.

Antipater, being returned back into Judæa from Rome, is convicted in the preſence of Varus Governour of Syria, for having endeavoured to poyſon the King his Father. Herod cauſeth him to be impriſoned; and writeth to Auguſtus on that Subject.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6.

Herod writeth friendly Letters to Antipater, and calleth him home from Rome.

HErod concealing his diſpleaſure, anſwered Antipater his Son's Letters; giving him a ſtrict charge (as ſoon as he had diſpatched his affairs) to haſten homeward, leſt his long abſence ſhould prove hurtful to him. He likewiſe, after a temperate manner, complained unto him of his Mother, promiſing notwithſtanding to remit the fault upon his return; and by all means he made ſhew to him of much kindneſs, fearing leſt he, apprehending any ſuſpicion, ſhould defer to haſten his return; and lingring too long at Rome, ſhould contrive ſome treacherous ſtratagem, to the prejudice of himſelf, and the overthrow of his Kingdom. Antipater received theſe Letters in Cilicia, and had already received others at Tarentum, by which he underſtood of Pheroras his Unkle's death, whereat he was ſore grieved; not for the love he bare to Pheroras, but for that he died before he had murthered his Father, according as he had promiſed him. As ſoon as he came to Celenderis a City of Cilicia, he grew doubtful whether he ſhould return or no, and was grievouſly troubled at his Mother's diſgraces, who was baniſhed from the Court. The opinions of his friends in his behalf were various; for ſome of them counſelled him to ſtay and expect the event of theſe troubles in

A in ſome place: others on the other ſide, adviſed him to delay no longer his return into his Countrey, for that upon his arrival he might eaſily ſatisfie all thoſe objections and accuſations that were forged againſt him, becauſe his accuſers had nothing elſe to ſtrengthen their cauſe with, but his abſence. This later advice pleaſed him beſt; ſo that he betook himſelf to Sea, and at laſt arrived in the Port of Sebaſte, ſo called, and builded by Herod to his great charge, in honour of Cæſar.

Celenderis in Cilicia, Sebaſte a Haven builded by Herod in honour of Cæſar.

Antipater upon his return is ſaluted by no man.

And now already it manifeſtly appeared that Antipater was upon his downfal: For no man came out to ſalute him, no man entertained him, as they did upon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with prayers and happy acclamations: but contrariwiſe they boldly and openly ſpake againſt him, and bitterly curſed him, B telling him that he was juſtly puniſhed for the wickedneſs that he had committed againſt his brothers.

Quintilius Varus, Governour of Syria,

About the ſame time Quintilius Varus, who was ſent to ſucceed Saturnine in the Government of Syria was at Jeruſalem, and drew thither at that inſtant upon Herods requeſt, to aſſiſt him with his Counſels in his preſent and weighty occaſions: Now whileſt theſe two ſate and couſulted together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and Royalty that he was accuſtomed to uſe, entered the Palace. The Guard of the Gates ſuffered him to enter in, but they excluded all thoſe that were with him. This firſt of all affrighted and appaled his Spitits, in that he already perceived into what calamity he was fallen; and now alſo C when he drew near his Father, he thruſt him from him, accuſing him of the murder of his Brethren, and reproaching him with that intent he had to poyſon him, telling him that the next day Varus ſhould both hear and judge all his miſdemeanours.

He altogether daunted at the greatneſs of that unexpected miſchief, which he both heard and ſaw, departed preſently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his Mother and his Wife (which was Antigonus's daughter, who had been King of the Jews before Herod) by whom he was advertiſed of all that which had happened, and for that cauſe more diligently prepared himſelf for his tryal. The next day Varus and Herod ſate in judgement, accompanied by their friends on both ſides; thither alſo D were cited the Kings kindred and his ſiſter Salome; and certain others, who could diſcover his ſecret practices; ſome of which had been tortured, and namely Antipaters mothers ſervants, who a little before his arrival, had been apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he ſhould take heed that he returned not into the Countrey, becauſe his Father was made privy to all his practices, and that for the preſent he had no other refuge but only to Cæſar, and to take care likewiſe leſt he ſhould fall into his Fathers hands.

Hereupon Antipater humbling himſelf on his knees before the King his Father, beſought him not to condemn him before his cauſe was heard, but to ſuſpend his judgment until ſuch time as he had heard his juſtifications. But Herod after he had commanded him to E withdraw himſelf into the midſt of the Court and Aſſembly, deplored his infelicity in begetting ſuch Children, and bewailed his miſhap, that in his old age he was reſerved for an Antipater. After this he reckoned up his cares in their education and inſtitution, and how bountifully he had beſtowed upon him as much riches as he required: he added that none of all theſe favours could preſerve him from falling into the hazard of loſing his life by their policy, that they might unjuſtly poſſeſs the Kingdom, before either the Law of Nature, or the will of their Father, or their own rights could challenge the ſame. But above all the reſt, he wondred at Antipater, with what hope he could poſſibly be puffed up to attempt ſo audacious and wicked an enterprize. For by his Teſtament he had made him the Heir of his Kingdom, and in his life time alſo had made him his equal in F Dignity, Glory and Power: That he received yearly fifty talents of revenue, and to furniſh his voyage for Rome had three hundred talents given him. Moreover, he accuſed him for his ſlanderous accuſations againſt his murthered and ſlaughtered Brothers: Who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? But if they were innocent, why without cauſe produced he is ſlanderous accuſations againſt thoſe, who were his natural Brethren? For in his own reſpect he had never found any thing againſt them, but by his report, neither had he given Sentence againſt them, but by Antipaters advice, who for the preſent were abſolved by him, becauſe he was become the Author of their Parricide. In uttering theſe words he began to weep, being unable to inſiſt any further; for which cauſe he beſought Nicholaus Damaſcene, who was his dear friend, and converſed G ordinarily with him, and was privy to all that which had paſſed, to proſecute the reſt of his Indictment.

But Antipater turning himſelf towards his Father, began to juſtifie himſelf, urging the ſame Teſtimonies, and Favours that his Father had ſhewed unto him, and the H honours he had received at his hands, which he would never have ſhewed him, if he had been unworthy of the ſame, and had not by his virtue deſerved theſe favours. He alledged alſo, that by his virtue he had prevented all that which might have happened; and that where the cauſe required his labour or diligence, he diſpatched all things with his own induſtry; that it was unlikely that he, who had delivered his Father from thoſe Treaſons which were intended againſt him by other men, ſhould himſelf attempt the like: And as far from probability that he ſhould go to extinguiſh that virtue (whereof even until that day he had given teſtimony) to the end that always hereafter he wight be defamed for ſuch baſeneſs. For long before this time he was named and entitled to ſucceed him, and to enjoy thoſe very honours, whereof already he enjoyed no ſmall part; whereby he proteſted I that it was unlikely, that he, who might enjoy the half of all that his Father had, in all ſecurity, vertue and honour, ſhould deſire the whole with infamy and danger; yea, and with an uncertainty to obtain the ſame; that the puniſhment which had befallen his Brothers (whom he had diſcloſed and accuſed at ſuch time as they were bidden) was procured by him, who, if he had pleaſed, might have concealed them; and whoſe wickedneſs towards their Father (after it was proved) he himſelf had revenged upon them: Neither (as he ſaid) repented he himſelf of that which he had done; for that action of his might be an argument to prove how incorruptly he loved his Father. And as touching that which he had dealt in at Rome, Cæſar himſelf was witneſs thereof, who could be no more deceived, than God himſelf; whereof thoſe Letters bore record, which were written by him; which in K equity, ſhould be of no leſs force, than the ſlanders of thoſe who ſought to ſet them at odds: The moſt part of which objections and reproaches had been complotted and deviſed by his enemies, who have had the leyſure to purſue the ſame during his abſence, which they could not have performed in his preſence. At length he pleaded, that all thoſe Confeſſions were falſe which were extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that ſuch as are put to the tryal, confeſs many things by force of torment, that are untrue, to ſatisfie them that put them thereto: Briefly, without all favour, he offered himſelf to the Rack in juſtification of his Innocency. Upon theſe Proteſtations, all the Council and Aſſiſtants were confounded. For all of them had great compaſſion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his tears; ſo that his very enemies began to pity him. And Herod himſelf L made it appear, that he ſeemed in ſome ſort to be altered in his opinion; notwithſtanding he endeavoured to conceal the ſame.

Nicholaus Damaſcene proſecuteth the King's Accuſation.

But Nicholaus, according as he was requeſted, proſecuted that Accuſation which the King had begun; urging all things to the uttermoſt, and producing all the Witneſſes, and thoſe manifeſt Proofs, that were gathered from their Examinations that were tortured. Eſpecially he diſcourſed at large of the King's Virtue, which he had fatherly expreſſed in the education and inſtruction of his Children; for which he had been ſo unkindly and unnaturally requited. Moreover, that his firſt Children's fooliſh raſhneſs was not ſo much to be wondred at; for that being young, they had been corrupted by the malice of their Counſellors, and had blotted out of their hearts all tue Laws of M Nature, rather through ambition of Rule, than deſire of Riches. But that Antipater's boldneſs was both wonderful and wicked, who, more cruel than the crueleſt Beaſts (who towards their Benefactors acknowledge each good turn) was nothing mollified by his Father's ſo great indulgence, nor terrified by his Brother's calamity; but muſt needs emulate them in their cruelty. And thou thy ſelf (ſaid he) O Antipater, wert the Judge of their attempted Treaſons, by thy inquiſition they were indicted, thou didſt execute the juſtice againſt them being convicted. Neither do we diſallow that thou didſt proſecute them with juſt indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitateſt their intemperance: And we eaſily gather, that thoſe acts of thine were not attempted for thy Father's ſecurity, but intended for thy Brother's overthrow, that by deteſting their malice, thou mighteſt inſinnate N thy ſelf into the favour of their Father and thine, that afterwards thou mighteſt more cunningly and ſecurely bring him to his end, which at length thou haſt attempted to perform. For whilſt thou adjudgeſt thy guilty Brothers to death, and ſpareſt their Confederates, thou makeſt it manifeſt in all men's eyes, that thou haſt a kindneſs for them, whoſe aſſiſtance thou mighteſt hereafter uſe in oppreſſing thy Father. Thou haſt therefore enjoyed a double pleaſure: the one openly, as if rejoycing and glorying, that by thy Brother's death thou haſt atchieved a matter of honour; the other ſecretly, with endeavouring by greater wickedneſs, but more ſecret fraud, to make an end of thy Father; the revenger of whoſe injuries thou pretendeſt to be. For if thou hadſt truly deteſted their malice, thou hadſt never eſteemed the ſame to be worthy of thy imitation; for thou hadſt not cut them off for com- O mitting ſuch Capital offences as were anſwerable unto thine, but for that they had a more juſt Title to ſucceed in the Kingdom than thou haſt. And thou haſt thought good to mix the ſuddenly convinced in thy conſpiracies againſt them, and to the end that the puniſhment that thou well deſerveſt to ſuffer, ſhould light upon thy infortunate Father, projecting with your ſelf ſuch a parricide, and ſo unuſual and hainous a murther, that to this day the like thereof hath not been heard of amongſt men. For thou being his Son haſt practiſed theſe Treaſons, not only againſt thy Father, but againſt him that loved thee above meaſure, and did thee good beyond expectation, with whom thou haſt actual participation of the Government of the Kingdom, and who had appointed thee his Heir in the ſame, being no ways hindered, either for the preſent, or in times paſt, to participate the pleaſure of Soveraignty, and being aſſured of the hope of Succeſſion, both by the will and writing of thy B Father. But you have meaſured the courſe of your affairs, not according to Herod*'s virtue,* but according to your own appetite and malice, intending to deprive ſuch a Father of his part, who granted you the whole; and ſeeking in effect to murther him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from injury. And not content your ſelf to practiſe theſe treacheries, you have infected your Mother alſo with no leſs corruption, and inſtead of love that ſhould have been amongſt Brethren, you have filled your Family with mutinies and hatreds: And beſides all theſe things, thou haſt been ſo audacious, as to call thy Father beaſt, being of thy ſelf more malignant than thoſe beaſts which are moſt venomous, uſing thine own venom againſt thy deareſt friends, and ſuch as have beſt deſerved at thy hands, ſtrengthening thy ſelf with his Guard, and divers treacheries both of men and C women againſt one old man, as if thy curſed mind alone were not ſufficient to ſatisfie thy hatred.

And now after ſo many men and women, Slaves and Freemen tortured for thy cauſe, after the open and manifeſt teſtimonies of thy parties in the conſpiracy, thou art ſo impudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedſt to deprive thy Father of his life, doeſt now as much as in thee lieth, endeavour to aboliſh that Law that was inſtituted againſt Malefactors in thy kind, and herewithal, O Varus, equity, and all whatſoever is Juſtice in the world. Doſt thou therefore accuſe them of falſhood, who were examined in torments, to the end thou mighteſt endanger their credit, who were the preſervers of thy Fathers life? Shall we believe thee more than them in their torments? Wilt thou not, O Varus, deliver the King from the injury of thoſe, who are his own fleſh and pretend a love towards his Father, and who hath at laſt been diſcovered to be the moſt mortal enemy of them all, to the intent that at one inſtant he might eſtabliſh the Kingdom

The year of the World, 3962. before Chriſt's Nativity. 2.

Parricide that publick injury of life and nature.

After theſe Speeches, he added certain points concerning Antipater's Mother, which through feminine frailty had been blabbed out by her, to wit, that ſhe had aſked counſel of Soothſayers and Conjurers, to whom the Kingdom ſhould befall: and E that ſhe had offered Sacrifices, and made Prayers for the death of the King. And moreover, he declared what laſcivious pranks Antipater had played with Pheroras's women, in banqueting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewiſe that were preſented by ſuch as were tortured, with ſundry teſtimonies of divers men; ſome ſuborned, the other found out to be immediately produced and confirmed. For each man ſeeing that Antipater was expoſed to the accuſations of thoſe men, who had the Government in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long accompanied him, had openly delivered him into the hands of his enemies, they immediately diſcovered the inſatiable hatred which they had conceived againſt him, whereas before the fear that they had of him enforced them to be ſilent: yet he F was not ſo much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his own wickedneſs; namely, his deadly hatred againſt his Father, his breach of amity amongſt his Brethren, whereby he filled the Kings Houſhold with ſeditions and murthers, of ſome complotted, and acted by others; neither giving place to hatred according to Juſtice, nor to amity according to good affection, but according as it might ſtand with his profit. Which becauſe divers men perceived long before that time, they judged of events according as they had reaſon, and the rather becauſe that being void of hatred, they ſpake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice againſt him, at ſuch time as they were ſhut up; at this time when they were deprived of their fear, they declared all things that they knew. And whereas there G were produced divers of the miſchiefs committed by him, yet there ſeemed nothing to be feigned, for that the accuſers neither ſpake in favour of the King, neither concealed any thing for fear of danger, but condemned all Antipater's wicked actions, and judged him worthy of death and puniſhment, not ſo much for his Fathers ſecurity, as for his own demerit. Neither did they only accuſe him, who were by juſtice tied thereunto, but divers voluntary witneſſes alſo brought in their evidence; ſo that although he was a very cunning diſſembler, and colourer of his lies, and moſt impudent in their aſſertions, yet he durſt not once open his mouth, or mutter againſt the ſame.

Varus giveth Antipater licence to juſtifie himſelf.

Antipater ſtriveth by his proteſtations and invocation of God, to juſtifie himſelf.

As ſoon as Nicholas had finiſhed his diſcourſe and accuſations, Varus commanded Antipater to anſwer to thoſe crimes that were objected againſt him, if he had any thing to alledge, that he was not guilty of thoſe forfeits or hainous crimes that were laid unto his charge. For of himſelf he deſired nothing more, and knew well that Herod his Father deſired no leſs, than that he ſhould juſtifie himſelf, and maintain his innocency. But he humbling himſelf upon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, beſought God, who was the ſearcher of all hearts, to approve his imocency by ſome eminent ſign, how he never had attempted any thing to his Fathers prejudice. For this is the cuſtom of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hainous act, they ingage themſelves in all wickedneſs, without any reſpect of Gods Juſtice; and when as by their miſdeeds they are fallen into danger, then they call upon God, by whoſe invocation and teſtimony they deſire to be delivered: making a ſhew that they commit all things to his determination. The like whereof in this time happened in Antipater, who, whereas before he diſpoſed all his actions ſo, as if there had been no God that had the overſway of humane affairs; at ſuch time as Juſtice overtook him, and he was deprived of the benefit of the Law, had his recourſe to Gods power, alledging that he was reſerved by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his Fathers ſafety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often queſtionings he could wreſt nothing from him, but that he only cried upon God, ſeeing that otherwiſe there would be no end of theſe debates, he commanded the poyſon to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being preſently brought unto him, and given to one that was condemned to die, it preſently killed the man. Which done, he aroſe and departed out of the Council, and the next day went unto Antioch, where for the moſt part he was wont to have his reſidence, for that it was the chief City of the Aſſyrians. But Herod preſently commanded his Son to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talk had been between him and Varus upon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the King did nothing in impriſoning him, but by his counſel. When as therefore he had faſt bound him, he ſent unto Cæſar, and wrote his Letters unto him, as touching Antipater, ſending certain appointed Meſſengers, who by word of mouth might aſſure him of his curſed treaſons.

The poyſon is miniſtred to a condemned man, and it killeth him. Hedio and Ruffinus, c. 7.

Antiphilus's Letter to Antipater.

At the very ſame time there was a Letter intercepted, ſent by Antiphilus to Antipater, which Antiphilus remained in Egypt: which Letter being opened by the King, was written to this effect: I have ſent you Acme's Letter, hazarding thereby my own life: For you know that I am in danger of the diſpleaſure of two mighty Families, if I ſhould be diſcovered. As for your ſelf, bethink you well of your affairs in this reſpect. Such were the Contents of this Letter. The King made diligent ſearch for others alſo, but he could find none, for Antiphilus's ſervant, who had brought that which was read, denyed that he had any other. But while the King was in this doubt, one of his ſervants and friends perceived that the inſide of the Meſſengers under coat was newly ſewed: for he had two garments the one upon the other: and conjecturing that the Letters might be hid in the foulds thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the ſame, and found them. The Tenour whereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I have written the Letters to your Father, according as you gave me inſtructions, and I have counterfeited the copy of my Letter, as if it had been ſent by Salome to my Miſtreſs. I aſſure my ſelf, that when he hath read the ſame, he will puniſh Salome as one that hath practiſed Treaſon againſt him. But that Letter that was ſuppoſed to have been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipater's invention, and in Acme's ſtyle. The Contents were theſe: Acme to King Herod, Health: Whereas I have an eſpecial care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy ſecurity, having found a Letter of Salomes written againſt thee unto my Lady, I have not without danger taken the copy thereof, and ſent it unto you in which ſhe required that ſhe might have licence to marry Syllæus. Tear this copy, leaſt through the knowledge of the ſame, I come in danger of my life. Now in that which ſhe had written to Antipater, ſhe diſcovered that ſhe had written theſe words to Herod, according to that order he had given her, as if Salome had conſpired to work ſome treaſon againſt him. She ſent alſo the copy of thoſe counterfeit Letters in the name of Salome, and ſent them unto her Miſtreſs to work treaſon.

Acme's Letters to Antipater.

Acme's Letter to Herod.

This

A This Acme was a Jew born, and Chamber-maid to Julia, Cæſar's Wife, and did that which is above written, for the love which ſhe bare unto Antipater, whom he had hired by great ſums of money, to the end, that ſhe ſhould aſſiſt him to execute the miſchief, which he practiſed againſt his Father and againſt his Aunt. Herod made almoſt deſperate by the great miſchiefs of Antipater, was ſtirred up on the ſudden to ſhorten his days, for that he was the only means that ſtirred up theſe great Tempeſts of Sedition in his Kingdom; and who not only practiſed againſt his Father and his Aunt, but againſt his Siſter alſo; and had in like manner corupted Cæſar's Family. Salome alſo incenſed him the more, beating her breaſts, and offering her ſelf to all deaths, if any ſuch like matter might be duly proved againſt her. For which cauſe Herod ſent for Antipater, commanding him to ſpeak freely all that which he had to ſay, without fear. But he having not one word to anſwer for his defence, Herod ſaid unto him: Since that on all ſides thou art convicted and ſurpriſed in thy wickedneſs, delay not, but diſcover thoſe that are of thy Confederacy. Whereupon he laid all the fault upon Antiphilus, and named none other. At that time Herod being B wounded with extreme grief, would have ſent Antipater to Rome unto Cæſar, that he might receive his judgment from him; but afterwards he feared, leſt, by the intereſt of his friends, he ſhould eſcape the danger; for which cauſe he kept him bound and fettered in Priſon, as he had done before: And in the mean while he ſent certain Meſſengers with Letters to Cæſar, to accuſe his Son, and to declare wherein Acme had been his Confederate, producing the Copy of the Letters. Theſe Ambaſſadours therefore repaired to Rome, inſtructed in thoſe things they were to anſwer to, thoſe Interrogatories that ſhould be offered them; and with them he ſent theſe Letters.

CHAP. VIII.

The Golden Eagle that Herod had conſecrated, and fixed on the Portal of the Temple, is pulled off: The ſevere Puniſhment that he inflicteth for it. The King's terrible Sickneſs; and the cruel Orders that he giveth to his Siſter Salome, and to her Husband.

D WHilſt Herod's Ambaſſadours were on their Journey to Rome with his Orders, he fell ſick, and made his Will, appointed his youngeſt Son to ſucceed him in the Kingdom; for through Antipater's inſtigations, he had conceived a hatred againſt Archelaus and Philip. He ſent alſo a thouſand Talents unto Cæſar, and five hundred to his Wife, and to his Children, Friends and Free-men. He beſtowed alſo Money, Rents and Lands upon his own Children: He gave his Siſter Salome an ample Poſſeſſion, becauſe ſhe had always perſevered in loving him, and had never offended him. And having loſt all hope of recovery, for that he was about 70 years old, he became very touchy and froward in whatſoever his affairs. The cauſe hereof was, that opinion he had conceived, that he grew contemptible; and that the whole Nation took pleaſure in thoſe miſ-haps which befel him: which ſome of thoſe who were favoured by the people, made him the rather believe, upon this occaſion which enſueth: Amongſt thoſe that were moſt learned among the Jews, Judas the Son of Sariphæus, and Matthias the Son of Margalothus, the E moſt excellent Interpreters of the Laws and Ordinances of the Countrey (and for this cauſe were in greateſt eſteem amongſt the people, by reaſon that they inſtructed and trained up the Youth; for all thoſe that deſired to obtain Vertue, ſpent all their time with them) underſtanding that the King's ſickneſs was dangerous, they incenſed the younger ſort, counſelling them to overthrow all thoſe works that the King had cauſed to be made, contrary to the Law and Cuſtom of the Countrey; to the end, that they fighting for Piety, might obtain the reward that attendeth the ſame. For in that the King had undertaken and done many things contrary to the Law, divers unaccuſtomed miſeries had befallen him, and namely that ſickneſs wherewith he was detained. For Herod had done divers things contrary to the ancient Law; againſt which Judas and Matthias exclaimed openly. For he had erected over the Portal of the great Temple, an Eagle of Gold of great value. Now the Law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to live according to the ſame, ſhould in any ſort erect any Image, or repreſent any Figures of living Creatures whatſoever. For this cauſe theſe Doctors counſelled them to pull down that Eagle; telling them, that F although the matter ſeemed very dangerous, yet ought they to prefer an honeſt death before a pleaſant life, if ſo be it be employed for the defence of their Countrey-laws and Religion. For in ſo doing, they ſhould obtain immortal praiſe for the preſent, and a memorable and eternal glory in time to come; neither that they ſhould protract the execution thereof for fear of danger, ſince death was a thing that could not be avoided; ſo that ſince by the general courſe of Nature, they muſt needs die, it ſhould become them bravely to forſake their lives with praiſe and honour in embracing Vertue. For to die in the execution of ſome noble exploit (which cannot be atchieved without hazard of danger) their Children ſhould be richly rewarded with the fruits thereof, and their other Parents that ſhould outlive them (of what Sex ſoever) ſhould reap the fruits of that glory which was honourably atchieved by them. In theſe or ſuch like words they encouraged the young men.

G About that time there was a rumour ſpred, that the King was dead, which gave very great furtherance to the Doctors reſolution. For at Noon they went up into the Temple, they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their Axes, in the ſight and aſſembly of a great number of people that were in the Temple. Now when the tidings hereof came unto the ears of the King's Captain, he fearing H leſt ſome further and more fatal tumult might be raiſed, drew out a ſtrong Company of Souldiers with him, to repulſe thoſe that were aſſembled to hew down the Eagle; and charging the rude and diſarmed multitude, who were gathered together, he eaſily killed and diſperſed the moſt; as for thoſe forty young men that valiantly prepared themſelves to reſiſt, he apprehended them, and with them the Authors of Sedition, Judas and Matthias, who ſcorned to ſubmit themſelves; and led them to the King; who demanding of them how they durſt deface the ſacred Image? They anſwered, that long before that time they had reſolved it; and that now, according as they had reſolved, they had like valiant men performed the ſame. For we (ſaid they) maintain the honour of God, and the Doctrine of our Law, whereof we are Diſciples; neither ought you to admire, that with contempt of your Ordinances, we have preferred the Laws of our Forefathers, which Moſes hath left us in writing, according as he was ſuggeſted and taught them by God: Neither do we refuſe any death or puniſhment which thou ſhalt inflict upon us, being aſſured in our Conſciences, that we ſuffer not for Impiety, but Piety's ſake. Thus ſpake they all I of them; continuing the like conſtant boldneſs in their anſwers, as they had ſhewed in their actions; being alſo ready, conſtantly to endure any puniſhment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the King commanded them to be bound, and ſent them to Jericho: Then calling before him thoſe principal Jews, who had the Government under him; and being brought into their Aſſembly upon his Pallat, by reaſon of his weakneſs, he recited unto them the numberleſs toils he had endured for their ſakes; in like manner, how upon his great charges, he had repaired and re-edified the Temple; whereas the Aſmoneans, for the ſpace of 125 years, wherein they reigned, could not perform ſuch a Building to the honour of God. Moreover, he ſignified unto them, how he had adorned the ſame with precious Gifts; for which he hoped that after his death his memory and glory ſhould ſurvive.

After this, he expoſtulated with them for what cauſe they abſtained not from offering him that injury during his life time? And why at Noon day, and in the ſight of all the people, they had laid hands on thoſe Preſents which he had dedicated unto God; and had taken thoſe things away violently, K which, though in words they appertained to him, yet in the effect, if they were well examined, they had taken from God? The Governours ſuſpecting his cruelty, and fearing leſt his unbridled paſſion ſhould urge him further, by which means they might be aſſured of ſome ſevere puniſhment; anſwered him; that thoſe things were not done by their conſents, and that in their opinion, the injury ought not to be let ſlip without puniſhment. At that time Herod ſhewed himſelf more favourable towards the reſt, but he cauſed Matthias to be deprived of the Prieſthood, as one who in part had been the cauſe of that which had happened; and in his place ſubſtituted Jozar, one of his Wives Brethren.
During the Prieſthood of this Matthias it happened alſo, that another High Prieſt was elected that very day wherein the Jews did uſually celebrate their Faſt. For Matthias, the night before the day of the Faſt, ſeemed in his Dream, to have the company of his Wife; and whereas for this cauſe he was unfit to offer the Divine Sacrifice, he had Joſeph the Son of Ellemus appointed him to be his Aſſiſtant, L by reaſon of his alliance. Herod therefore depoſed Matthias: And as for the other Matthias, who had moved this trouble, both he and his companions were by his order conſumed with fire.

Herod's horrible ſickneſs.

Herod beſtoweth a diſtribution among his Soldiers.

Herod commandeth that the Nobleſt of the Jews ſhould be ſlain after his death

This very night the Moon was eclipſed, and Herod's ſickneſs grew more vehement. For God puniſhed thoſe ſins which he had committed. For he was inflamed with a ſlow fire, which to the outward ſenſe ſeemed not ſo vehement, but inwardly ſearched and afflicted all his Entrails: He had alſo a ravenous and unnatural Appetite to his meat, which could no way be ſatiſfied. Beſides that, he had an Ulcer in his Bowels, with a ſtrange and furious Collick. His Feet were ſwelled, and of venomous colour; and his Stomach was no leſs affected alſo. His Members rotted, and were full of crawling Worms, with a filthy, and no leſs troubleſome Priapiſm, accompanied with an intolerable Stench: Beſides all this, he had a ſtrong Convulſion of his Nerves, and ſhortneſs of Breath. For which cauſe it was a general opinion amongſt holy men, and ſuch as had the knowledge of Prophecy, that the King was thus puniſhed for his infinite impieties and ſins committed againſt the Majeſty of M God. And although he was tormented with an unſupportable ſickneſs, yet he had hopes to eſcape; and for that cauſe he ſent for Phyſicians from all places, and refuſed none of thoſe remedies which they thought requiſite for him. He therefore paſt over Jordan, and went into the hot Baths of Calliroes; the Waters whereof are potable, beſides other vertues they have againſt all other kind of ſickneſs: this Water diſchargeth it ſelf into the Lake called Aſphaltites. Being there, it was thought good by his Phyſicians, that he ſhould refreſh himſelf in thoſe Waters: There being ſet by them into a Bathing-tub filled with Oyl, he grew ſo ſick, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his Domeſtick ſervants wept and lamented, and all his familiar friends cried out, bewailing him; and with their great noiſe cauſed him to come to himſelf: And ſeeing himſelf wholly out of hope to eſcape, he gave order that there ſhould a Diſtribution be made, to every Soldier the ſumm of fifty Drachmes; and he offered great Preſents N to their Captains, and his Friends. Afterwards he returned to Jericho, where a melancholly humour poſſeſſed him, which made him unſociable, and diſpleaſed againſt all men; ſo that ſeeing that he muſt needs die, he bethought him of this wicked action that followeth. For the Nobleſt men amongſt the Nation of the Jews, reſorting unto him from all parts (by his command, under the expreſs Penalty of loſs of life, to whoſoever ſhould neglect the ſame) the King ſhewed himſelf to be diſpleaſed, as well againſt thoſe whom he thought guilty, as againſt them who had given him no occaſion of diſcontent.
For he cauſed them to be ſhut up in a place called the Hippodrome, which was the Tilt-yard to run Horſes in; and ſent for his Siſter Salome, and Alexas her Husband, telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefs did inceſſantly torment him; which as he ſaid, he ought to bear patiently, becauſe it was an end that ſhould happen to all men. But that which moſt grieved him was, that he ſaw himſelf deprived of thoſe mournings and lamentations, which a King deſerved. For he was not ignorant of the Jews affections, neither how his death was deſired and longed for by them, ſince that in his life time they O preſumed ſo far as to revolt; and diſhonour and deface thoſe gifts, which he had beſtowed upon the

A Commonweal: It therefore behoved them to afford him ſome ſolace in that his bitter anguiſh; for that if they refuſed not to perform that which he had contrived in his mind, the lamentation of his death ſhould be magnificent, and as great as ever any King ever had; and the pleaſure and laughter that might accompany his death, ſhould be abated by their ſorrow, who ſhould unfeignedly lament for the whole Nation. He therefore commanded them, that at ſuch time as he ſhould give up the Ghoſt, they ſhould cauſe the Hippodrome to be invironed by his Souldiers, as yet unadvertiſed of his death (which he would not have publiſhed before this execution was ended) and to command them to ſhoot their Arrows at thoſe that were ſhut up therein. And that when they had killed them all after this manner, they ſhould B make him triumph and rejoyce in a double joy; firſt, for that in his death, his Commands ſhould be ratified by effect: Secondly. For that he ſhould be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he entreated his Kinsfolk, for the love they bare unto him, and for the faith they bare unto God, that they ſhould not ſuffer him to die fruſtrate of his laſt honour; and they proteſted that they would not tranſgreſs any point of his Commands. Hereby a man may conjecture what his nature was, who took pleaſure in theſe above-named impieties, and who, through the deſire he had of long life, hath after this ſort dealt with thoſe of his Blood: And it may be conjectured by theſe his laſt Commands, that he had nothing in him that ſavoured of any humanity; for that departing out of the World, he had ſuch a mind that all C the Nation, and all ſuch as were moſt affectionate towards him, ſhould be driven to ſorrow and deſolation, commanding that in every houſe one ſhould be killed; yea, ſuch as had not in any ſort offended him, and were not accuſed of one miſ-deed committed againſt any other; whereas they that have any vertue, finding themſelves at that ſtate, have been accuſtomed to lay aſide the hatred which they have before born unto their enemies.

Letters are ſent from Rome, that Acme was executed by Cæſar's Command, and that he had Authority to uſe Antipater at his pleaſure.

WHilſt he delivered theſe inſtructions to his Kindred, he received Letters from thoſe Ambaſſadours which he had ſent to Rome unto Cæſar; the effect where- E of was, that Acme was put to death by Cæſar's Command, who was diſpleaſed with her, for that ſhe had been of Antipater's Conſpiracy, who was remitted to Herod's pleaſure, like a King and Father, to uſe him as beſt pleaſed him; either to exile and baniſh him; or, if it pleaſe him, to put him to death. Herod receiving theſe News, recovered his Spirits a little, through the pleaſure he received in the Contents of thoſe Letters, both of Acme's death, and of the power that was granted him to puniſh his Son. But being aſſailed afreſh by grievous Dolours, and urged with a deſire to eat, he called for an Apple and a Knife; for he was accuſtomed to pare his Apples himſelf, and cut a little, and afterwards to eat it: When as therefore he had gotten hold of the Knife, he looked round about him, determining to give F himſelf a mortal Wound therewith; and had certainly done it, had not Achiabus his Grand-child haſtily ſtept within him, and ſtayed his hand, and called for aſſiſtance. At that time the ſorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the Palace, as if the King had been already dead: And Antipater certainly believing that his Father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no leſs in his words) that being delivered out of Priſon, he ſhould obtain the poſſeſſion of the Kingdom without any difficulty; and treated with the Jaylour concerning his deliverance, offering him great Preſents both in hand and hereafter, as if there had been no other queſtion but of that. But ſo far was the Jaylour from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that he went and acquainted the King what his intent was, and what offers he made him. Herod who had already conceiv- G ed a ſiniſter opinion of his Son, hearing what the Jaylour had ſaid, began to exclaim, and to beat his head, although he was at the uttermoſt gaſp; and lifting himſelf up upon his elbows, he commanded that one of his Guards ſhould preſently

AFter this, having changed his mind, he made a new Teſtament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and of Peræa, whereas before he had inſtituted him for his Succeſſor in the Kingdom. He created Archelaus King; he gave the Provinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea and Paneade to Philip his Son, and Archelaus's Brother by the Mother's ſide, to be Tetrarch over thoſe places. He gave his Siſter Salome, Jamnia, Azot and Phaſelis, with fifty thouſand Crowns of Gold. He provided alſo for his other Kinſ-men, all whom he left rich in money, which he gave them, and revenews which he aſſigned them. He gave Cæſar ten Millions of Drachmes in Silver, amounting to the ſumm of eleven hundred thouſand Francks; beſides a great quantity K of Gold and Silver Plate, and of precious Moveables. To Julia, Cæſar's Wife, and to certain others, he bequeathed five millions of Drachmes, amounting to five hundred and fifty thouſand Francks, or thereabout. After he had in this manner diſpoſed all things, ſome five days after he had cauſed Antipater to be executed, he departed this life; having reigned after Antigonus's death, for the ſpace of thirty and four years, and thirty and ſeven years after he was elected and approved King by the Romans: A man without reſpect, cruel and ſevere towards all men, Slave to his wrath, Lord of the Laws; yet ſo favoured by fortune, as no man more; for from a private man, he became a King; and being environed with many dangers, he always happily eſcaped; and he lived alſo a very long time. And as concerning his Family and Children, in his L own opinion he was happy, in that he overcame his enemies; but in my opinion, he was moſt unfortunate.

After the King's death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas cauſed all the Army to be aſſembled in the Amphitheatre in Jericho; and firſt of all they cauſed Herod's Letters to be read, which were addreſſed to the Souldiers, in which he gave them thanks for the fidelity and M good will which they had expreſſed towards him; praying them to continue the ſame to Archelaus his Son, whom he had appointed to be their King after him. That done, Ptolomey, to whom the King had committed the cuſtody of his Seal, recited his Teſtament, which was to take no effect, except that Cæſar approved the ſame. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their King. The Souldiers flocked about him in Troops, accompanied with their Captains; promiſing him to ſerve him with no leſs good will and affection, than they had done his Father; praying God to yield him his aſſiſtance.

He was carried out in a Gilded Litter, adorned with divers precious Stones, the Cover thereof was of Azure colour. The dead body was apparelled in a Purple Raiment, having a Diadem upon his head over which there was a Crown of Gold, and a Scepter put in his right hand. About this Litter marched a great number of his Children and Kinſfolk; and after them followed his Souldiers, diſpoſed in Bands and Troops, according to the cuſtom of every Nation: The firſt of theſe were the Archers of his Guard; after them went the Thracians; and laſtly, marched the Germans and Galatians; all of them in their Warlike Dreſs and Diſcipline. (For the Law of the Countrey ordaineth no leſs.) And after he had feaſted the people, and laid aſide his mourning Apparel, he aſcended up into the Temple. All the way as he went, all the people with Shouts and Acclamations, cried, God ſave the King; and with Prayers and Praiſes honoured him to their uttermoſt: And he being conducted up to a high Throne of Gold, which was made on purpoſe, entertained the people very graciouſly, taking pleaſure in their Acclamations and Congratulations that they beſtowed upon him. He gave them thanks alſo, “For that they had blotted out of their remembrance, the injuries that his Father had done unto them; proteſting in B his own behalf, that he would certainly take care to requite their kindneſs, with an entire affection. He likewiſe told them, that for the preſent he accepted not the Title of King, becauſe the honour was bequeathed him with this condition, that Cæſar ſhould ratifie his Father's Teſtament. For this cauſe, although the Souldiers that were in Jericho, were ſo kind to ſet the Diadem upon his head, yet he would not accept of that uncertain honour; becauſe it was not reſolved whether Cæſar, who was the principal Party in the Gift, would grant him the Government or no.

Archelaus banqueteth the people.

He proteſted likewiſe, that if his Affairs ſucceeded according to his deſire, he would not, in honour, forget their love, or leave their good affection unrequited. C And that in the mean while, he would enforce himſelf, by all means, to further thoſe things that concerned them; and entertain them with more kindneſs, than his Father had done. But they, according as it is the cuſtom of the common people, thinking that thoſe that enter into ſuch Dignities, declare and open their minds at the firſt day: The more Archelaus ſpake kindly and courteouſly unto them, the more they applauded him; and preſented him with divers Petitions, for Grants and Donations from him. Some of them cried out unto him, that he ſhould take off ſome part of their yearly Taxes: Others cryed to him, to deliver thoſe Priſoners that were committed by Herod, of whom divers had pined a long time in Priſon: Others inſtantly urged him to cut off thoſe Tributes which had been impoſed by him upon Bargains and Sales, D which was to pay the half of the Bargain. Whereunto Archelaus did not any ways contradict, ſtriving to the uttermoſt of his power to pleaſe the people; for he knew very well, that their good affection would be no ſmall advantage towards him, in the confirmation of his Kingdom. That done, he ſacrificed unto God; and afterward fell to banqueting and entertainment of his Friends.

Archelaus promiſes that with Cæſar's approbation, he will carefully intend the deſires and profits of the people.

E Some Jews (who demanded ſatisfaction for Judas and Matthias and others deaths, whom Herod cauſed to be burned, for having pulled down the Eagle off the Portal of the Temple) make an Inſurrection, which obligeth Archelaus to cauſe three thouſand of them to be put to death: He goeth afterwards to Rome, to be confirmed King by Auguſtus: His Brother Antipas, who pretends to have a right to the Crown, repaireth thither alſo; the Cauſe is pleaded before Auguſtus.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. al. 13.

MEan while, ſome amongſt the Jews who were deſirous of Revolutions, in their F private Conventicles bewailed Matthias and his Confederates, whom Herod had put to death and condemned, for defacing the Golden Eagle; becauſe that after their deceaſe, they had neither been publickly honoured, nor lamented, by reaſon of the fear that the people had conceived of Herod. For which cauſe, at that time they required with lamentations and out-cries, that their Obſequies might be ſolemnized; and as if the dead bodies had received ſome ſatisfaction by their tears and exclamations, they uttered many odious and diſgraceful expreſſions againſt Herod; and aſſembling themſelves together, they requeſted Archelaus to do them Juſtice againſt thoſe, that during Herod's life, were in Authority; and eſpecially they demanded, that the High Prieſt who was advanced by his Father, ſhould be depoſed, and that another more G lawful and upright might be placed in his ſtead, to exerciſe the High Prieſt's Function. Now, though Archelaus was ſore diſpleaſed at theſe violent proceedings, yet notwithſtanding, he conformed himſelf to their humour, in that he was with all expedition, to repair unto Rome, to underſtand and attend Cæſar's pleaſure. Therefore he called for the General of his Army, commanding him to perſwade them not to ſeek revenge for thoſe men, who were dead, notwithſtanding they were their friends; becauſe whatſoever was done, was done according to Law; and that no enquiry might be made thereof, except, to the great prejudice of his reputation, and hazard of his ſtate, in regard of the uncertainty of the time; that it was more expedient for him to ſtudy for the maintenance of peace, until ſuch time as being eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom by Cæſar's conſent, he ſhould return back again unto them, and that then he would conſult with them for the common profit, according to their demands; wiſhing them for the preſent to contain themſelves, and to take heed leſt they ſtirred up Sedition.

When he had thus inſtructed his General, he ſent him unto them. But they cried out with a loud voice, and would not ſuffer him to ſpeak; but for fear of danger and death, they put him to ſilence. And if any other were ſo forward as to ſpeak unto them, and perſwade them to ſome moderation, and to alter their ſiniſter reſolutions, he was alſo in danger: For that they had this perſwaſion, that all things ought rather to be ordered according to their pleaſures, than by the Authority of their Superiours; ſuppoſing that although, during Herod's life time, they had been deprived of their deareſt friends, it would be now a matter unworthy their courages, after his death to be cut off from their privilege to demand their revenge. For they were tranſported with their own opinions; and held all that for lawful and upright, which was in any ſort conformable to their pleaſures, without fore-ſeeing the danger that might happen thereby; they were ſo deſirous to be revenged on thoſe, whom they reputed to be their enemies. Now, whereas divers were ſent by Archelaus to adviſe them, and divers came unto them not as meſſengers from him, but as friends and lovers of peace, of their own motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to ſpeak; and through their rage there aroſe a great tumult, which had grown to a further extremity, if a great number of people had joyned with them.

At that time fell the Feaſt of Unleavened Bread, which is called Paſcha, which is a Memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt; at which time all men do moſt willingly preſent their Sacrifices; and a greater number of Beaſts are killed at that Feaſt, than at any other time. To this Solemnity alſo, an infinite number of people aſſembled from all parts, to honour God; whereby the ſeditious (ſuppoſing that they had gotten fit opportunity) lamented Judas and Matthias, who were the Expoſitors of the Law, and kept themſelves within the Temple, whither they had gathered good ſtore of Victuals, which they were not aſhamed impudently to beg for. But Archelaus, fearing leſt their rage ſhould produce ſome more grievous effect of miſchief, ſent out a Captain, with a Regiment of a thouſand men, to repreſs their fury, before the reſt of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewiſe unto him, whom they found to be the forwardeſt in that Commotion. Againſt thoſe the Seditious cried out with great clamours, and incenſed the people againſt them, ſo that all of them ruſhed in upon the Soldiers, and killed divers of them. The reſt of them eſcaped with their Captain; yet not without divers Wounds. That done, they which were within the Temple, returned again to their Divine Service.

Three thouſand Jews ſlain.

Now Archelaus ſuppoſing that his whole Fortune was endangered, except he repreſſed the rage of the multitude; he ſent out all his Foot, with a certain number of Horſe, to prevent, leſt they that were without ſhould yield aſſiſtance to thoſe who had taken up their lodging in the Temple; and to put thoſe to the ſword, who having eſcaped the violence of the Foot, ſuppoſed themſelves to be in ſecurity. Theſe Horſemen ſlew about three thouſand men, the reſt retired themſelves into the Mountains that were near adjoyning. Hereupon Archelaus made Proclamation, that each one ſhould repair unto his own houſe. For which cauſe they departed, and abandoned the Feaſt, for fear of greater miſchief; notwithſtanding they had ſpleen enough, as it is the ordinary cuſtom of the ignorant multitude.

Archelaus repairs to Rome, and many of his Faction follow him

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. al. 14.

After this, Archelaus, accompanied with his Mother, took his Voyage to Rome, with Nicholaus and Ptolomey, and with divers other his Friends; committing the Government of all his Houſhold and Kingdom to his Brother Philip: Salome, Herod's Siſter went alſo, leading with her, her Children. There went alſo divers other of his Kindred, who ſaid that they would all of them endeavour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the Kingdom; but in effect, it was to hinder him with all their Power: and eſpecially, to accuſe him unanimouſly, for what was done in the Temple. Sabinus, Cæſar's Viceroy in Syria, poſting into Jewry to take charge of Herod's Money, met with Archelaus in Cæſarea. But Varus arriving in the mean while, detained him from finiſhing that

A that Voyage; for Archelaus had ſent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to do Varus a pleaſure, would not ſeize the Fortreſs of Jewry; nether ſealed up Herod's Treaſures, but left them in Archelaus's poſſeſſion, until ſuch time as Cæſar had given order for the Eſtate; and after he had made this promiſe, he ſtayed in Cæſarea.

Sabinus repaireth to Jeruſalem, with an intent to ſeize Herod's Treaſures and Caſtles.

After Archelaus had ſet ſail towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch, Sabinus went to Jeruſalem, where he ſeized the King's Palace: and calling before him the King's Agents, and the Captains of his Garriſons, he required them to deliver up their Caſtles into his hands. But they according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the poſſeſſion in their accuſtomed manner, according to the King's direction, pretending B to keep the ſame in Cæſar's behalf. At the ſame time Antipas Herod's Son travelled to Rome likewiſe, in hopes to be elected King, in regard of Salome's promiſes; and for that he better deſerved the ſame than Archelaus, conſidering that in the firſt Teſtament, which ſhould be of more force than the later, he had been appointed King. He led his Mother alſo with him, and Ptolomey the Brother of Nicholaus, who had been one of Herod's moſt eſteemed friends, and was well affected to further his Title. But eſpecially he was ſtirred up to ſeek the Kingdom by Ireneus, a man very eloquent, and to whoſe charge, in regard of his ſufficiency, the Affairs of the Kingdom had been committed. For which cauſe, although he was perſwaded to give over the Kingdom unto his elder Brother, who was confirmed in the Kingdom by his Father's Teſtament, yet he would not C give ear thereunto. But Antipas no ſooner arrived in Rome, but all his Kinsfolk revolted from Archelaus unto him, not ſo much for the love they bare to him, as for the hatred they conceived againſt Archelaus; and above all, for the deſire they had to recover their liberty, and to draw themſelves under a Roman Governour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeavoured to procure the Royalty, ſhould be more profitable to them than Archelaus: Sabinus alſo, by his Letters, accuſed Archelaus to Cæſar; but Archelaus by Ptolomey, exhibited unto Cæſar a Supplication, containing his Right and Title unto the Kingdom, his Father's Teſtaments, and the account of the Money which Herod his Father had ſealed up, together with his Ring, and expected the iſſue.

Antipas in hope to recover the Kingdom, ſaileth to Rome,

D But when he had read theſe Letters, and thoſe which Varus and Sabinus had ſent him, and underſtood what ſumms of money he had left, and what the yearly Revenue was,
and how Antipas challenged the Kingdom, and appropriated it to himſelf, according as his Letters mention,; he aſſembled all his friends, to have their advice thereupon.
Amongſt them was Caius the Son of Agrippa, and his Daughter Julia, adopted by him, whom he cauſed to ſit in the chiefeſt place; which done, he commanded the Aſſiſtants to ſpeak what they would concerning this matter. At that Antipater, Salome's Son, a man very eloquent, and a great Adverſary to Archelaus, ſpake firſt, ſaying, That it was a mockery for him at that time to ſpeak of the Kingdom, conſidering that before Cæſar had granted it him, he had already ſeized the Forces of the State, when as upon a Feſtival day, E he had killed ſo many; who, although they had deſerved that puniſhment, yet ought the juſtice thereof to have been reſerved to a lawful Power, and not to have been uſurped by him; either being King with Cæſar's prejudice, whoſe Authority he had contemned; or by being a private man, which was a great overſight. For which cauſe, he undeſervedly at this time hoped for his approbation, whom already, as much as in him lay, he had deprived of the Title and Authority of his Allowance. Moreover, he objected againſt him, that of his own Authority he had changed certain Officers of the Army, and that he had ſeated himſelf in the Royal Throne; and like a King, had determined certain cauſes, and had granted certain demands of the people: That he had left nothing undone, which he might have performed, had Cæſar confirmed his Title. He alledged alſo, that they who were encloſed in the Hippodrome, F were diſmiſſed by him; and divers other acts, partly true, partly probable in regard of the ambition of young men, who, deſirous to govern, do ordinarily commit ſuch things: Beſides this, his neglect in mourning for his Father; and withal, his rare Banquets all night long at that very time his Father died; whereat the people began to mutiny, ſeeing the ſmall regard he had of his Father's death, from whom he had received ſo great Goods and Honours. How all the day long he made a ſhew of his ſorrow and tears in his Pavilion, but all the night he took pleaſure like a King; and being ſuch, if Cæſar ſhould grant him the Kingdom, he would behave himſelf no leſs unkindly towards him, than he had done to his moſt kind Father. That it was no leſs than an odious crime in him, to delight himſelf with Songs and Dances at his Father's death, as if he had been his enemy: That he G now came to Cæſar's Preſence, to the intent to obtain the Kingdom by his conſent, whereas already he had behaved himſelf no otherwiſe, than if he had already been eſtabliſhed King by his Authority. But moſt of all he exaggerated the Slaughter he had committed in the Temple, and the Impiety perpetrated ſo near to the Feaſt of Eaſter; at which time divers, both Strangers and Citizens had been killed after the manner of Sacrifices, and the Temple filled with Carcaſes, not by a ſtranger, but by him, who, under the colour of Religion, deſireth the Government of the Kingdom, to the end he might ſatisfie the injuſtice of his nature, in exerciſing each way his Tyranny towards all men; for which cauſe his Father never thought, nor ever dreamt to ſubſtitute him King in his place. For he knew both his life and diſpoſition, and by his former Teſtament (and that of greateſt force) had ordained his Adverſary Antipater to be King. For he had been allotted the Kingdom by his Father, not when his mind was dead before his body, but when both his Judgment was ſound, and his body in health. Yea, although at that time Archelaus*'s Father had ſuch a conceit of him, as in his later Teſtament he pretendeth; yet, that he had already declared what kind of King he was like to be, who contemned* Cæſar*'s Authority in confirming the Kingdom; and being as yet a private man, doubted not to murther the Citizens in the Temple,* This ſaid, Antipater (to give greater credit to his words, bringing divers of his Kindred as Witneſſes of that he had ſaid) ended his Oration.

Whereupon Nicholaus aroſe, and alledged in Archelaus's behalf as touching the ſlaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be reſtrained from their Tumults and Uproars, before Archelaus was enforced to appeaſe them by force; alledging, That they were ſo much the more guilty, for that they had not only exerciſed their malice, but alſo had enforced others to attempt ſo great a revenge againſt them; for their inſolency ſeemed in appearance to concern Archelaus, yet in a ſort their contumacy pertained to Cæſar*'s ruine. For thoſe that had been ſent by him to appeaſe and redreſs their ſedition, were, againſt all Law and right, charged and killed by them, without reſpect of God, or regard of the ſolemn Feaſt: Whoſe defence* Antipater was not aſhamed of, without reſpect of equity, ſo that he might ſatisfie that hatred which he bare unto Archelaus. That therefore it was their fault, who firſt of all abſtained not from injury, but whetted thoſe Swords which were drawn in maintenance of the peace, againſt their own boſoms. He enforced all other things alſo, whereof they had accuſed Archelaus, againſt themſelves, ſaying, that none of theſe things were done without their conſents; and that the offence was not ſo grievous, as they intended it ſhould be eſteemed, to the end they might diſcredit Archelaus. So great a deſire was in them to hurt their Kinſman, a man both well reſpected, and affected by his Father; as alſo kind and officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the Teſtament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect eſtate of mind and body, and of greater force than the former, becauſe the Authority and confirmation thereof was aſcribed unto Cæſar, the Sovereign of the World.

Further, that Cæſar would not imitate them in that wrong they did unto Herod, who (being, during his life-time, bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death, go about to violate his laſt and trueſt Teſtament; but that rather like a Friend and Confederate, he would confirm his Will; who, like his faithful and ſworn well-willer had committed all things to his truſt. For that there muſt needs be a geeat difference between their Malice, and Cæſar*'s Vertue and Faith, which was renowned thorough the whole world. For which cauſe he would not judge his Decree to be inconſiderately paſt, who left his Succeſſion to his well deſerving Son, and referred all things to his truſt. For that it was unlikely that he ſhould err in the choice of his Succeſſour, who had ſo diſcreetly ſubmitted all things to* Cæſar*'s judgment.* After this manner Nicholaus alſo finiſhed his diſcourſe. Hereupon Cæſar courteouſly raiſed Archelaus, who lay proſtrate and humbled before his feet, telling him that he was moſt worthy to be King, by giving an apparent Teſtimony, that he was conſtant in his reſolutions; pretending that he would do nothing but that which ſhould be anſwerable to Herod's Teſtament, and Archelaus's profit; and ſeeing the young man was confirmed in ſome good hope with this his promiſe, he determined nothing more for that time; but diſmiſſing the Council, he debated with himſelf, whether he ſhould ratifie the Kingdom to Archelaus only, or divide it amongſt Herod's Kindred, eſpecially ſince they all had need of his aſſiſtance.

Cæſar pronounceth Archelaus to be worthy of the Kingdom.

B BUt before Cæſar had determined any thing certainly in this behalf, Marthalce, Archelaus's Mother died of a Sickneſs; and Varus the Preſident of the Jews in Syria, had ſent Letters, which aſſured the Emperour of the Rebellion of the Jews. For after Archelaus's departure, all the Nation was in an Uproar. To pacifie which, Varus reſorted thither, and puniſhed the Authors of the ſame: and after he had appeaſed all things, he returned to Antioch; leaving a Regiment of Soldiers in Jeruſalem, to reſtrain the factious Innovations amongſt the Jews; yet, he prevailed nothing by his policy. For as ſoon as Varus was gone, Sabinus, who was Overſeer of Cæſar's Affairs, remaining in that place, grievouſly burthened the Jews, truſting to that power that was left him, and ſuppoſing that he was already enabled to withſtand the multitude. C For he armed divers Souldiers, and made uſe of them to oppreſs the Jews, and to provoke them to Sedition. For he took upon him to ſurpriſe their Fortreſſes, and by force to make ſearch after the King's Treaſures, for his private Lucre and Covetouſneſs ſake. When therefore, the Feaſt of Whitſuntide was come (which is one of our Feſtivals) divers thouſands from all parts repaired to Jeruſalem, not only for Religion's ſake, but alſo for deſpite and hatred they had conceived againſt thoſe Violencies and Injuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not only were thoſe of Judæa grievouſly offended, but divers alſo reſorted out of Galilee and Idumæa, from Jericho and the Cities ſituate on the other ſide Jordan, deſiring all of them to be revenged on Sabinus. And dividing their Camp into three Bands after this manner; one part of D them took up the Hippodrome; and of the other two, the one ſeized the Southern Quarter of the Temple, and the other the Eaſtern, and the third which were in the Hippodrome, were planted to the Weſtward, where the King's Palace ſtood; and thus prepared they all things that were neceſſary to ſet upon the Romans, whom they had beſieged on all ſides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number and reſolution, who were reſolved either to die or overcome; ſent preſent Letters unto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to ſend him a ſupply, becauſe the Regiment that was left by him, was in great danger; and muſt needs utterly periſh, without his ſpeedy reſcue: As for himſelf, he withdrew into the Tower and Dungeon of the Caſtle Phaſelus, which was a Fortreſs, ſo called in honour of Herod's Brother, who was killed by the Parthians; E and from the top thereof made a ſign to the Romans, that they ſhould ſalley out upon the Jews; being afraid to truſt himſelf to his own Friends, expecting that the reſt ſhould expoſe their lives to danger in maintenance of his ſafety, which his extream Covetouſneſs had endangered, and their lives alſo. The Romans having made this Sally, there aroſe a deſperate skirmiſh, wherein the Romans divers ways had the upper hand; yet the Jews were no ways diſcomforted, notwithſtanding they had loſt many men; but wheeled about ſo long, till at laſt they ſeized the outward Galleries, and thoſe that encompaſſed the Temple, and in that place there was a hot Aſſault; for they flung down ſtones with their hands and ſlings, and there were certain Archers mixed among them; who having recovered a place of advantage, grievouſly gauled the Romans which F were below, in that they had no means to avoid their ſhot, but were ſo expoſed thereunto, that their Enemies had the better. And with this diſadvantage the Romans fought a long time, till at length, being enraged to ſee their enemies have ſuch an advantage, they ſecretly fired the Galleries and Porches, without any diſcovery of thoſe that were therein; which Fire, brought thither by many, and fed with ſuch matter as would ſpeedily flame, immediately took hold of the Roof, becauſe the Roof was covered with Pitch and Wax, gilded over; ſo that theſe great and excellent Buildings were burnt down to nothing in a moment; and they that were reſorted thither, were all of them conſumed before they were aware. For ſome of them fell with the Roof of the Galleries; others ſhot at, and killed by thoſe that ſtood round about; others G deſpairing of their lives, and amazed at the miſchief, either caſt themſelves into the fire, or killed themſelves with their own Swords; and all thoſe that retired in hopes to ſave themſelves by that way they aſcended, were encountred by the Romans, who killed them Afterwards the Romans thruſting forward one another by thoſe ways where the fire was leaſt, entred the Treaſure houſe where the ſacred money was kept, by which means a great part thereof was ſtoln away by the Soldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledge carried away four hundred Talents. But the Jews being afflicted with a double calamity, firſt of all with the loſs of their Friends in that fight: and laſtly, with the ſpoil of the treaſury; yet they aſſembled a Troop of the valianteſt Soldiers, and beſieged the Palace, threatning to burn the ſame, with Sabinus and all other the Romans that were therein, except they ſpeedily departed; and in ſo doing, they promiſed both them and Sabinus all aſſurance and ſecurity: whereby it came to paſs, that divers of them that were in the Palace, iſſued out and ſubmitted themſelves unto them. But Rufus and I Gratus having three thouſand of thoſe valiant Soldiers under their command, who had ſerved Herod, joyned themſelves with the Romans. The like did thoſe Horſemen which followed Rufus, who in like manner ſubmitted themſelves to their direction: yet for all this, the Jews continued and intended their Siege, undermining their walls, and exhorting the Romans to depart, and not to deprive them of their liberty, which they had long enjoyed under their Predeceſſors. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his Soldiers; yet durſt not truſt them in regard of their former attempt, and he ſuſpected the too liberal offer his enemies had made him: but neglected it, becauſe he expected Varus. Divers tumults in Jewry.

Two thouſand of Herod's Soldiers aſſail the Kings people.

Judas, Ezechias's Son the Arch-thief.

At the ſame time infinite other troubles were raiſed in divers other places of Judæa, according as every one either was incenſed with a deſire of gain, or a will to revenge. For two thouſand Soldiers (who had formerly ſerved under Herod, and being at that time caſhier'd, lived at home) aſſembling themſelves together, aſſailed thoſe of the Kings faction, who made head againſt them, under the conduct of Herod's Nephew Aciabus, who never daring to encounter them in a place of equal advantage, in that they were old Soldiers, and well exerciſed in war, defended himſelf, in that he held and kept himſelf as near as he could in the mountains and places of advantage. Moreover, Judas the Son of Ezechias the Arch-thief, whom Herod overcame with ſo much difficulty at Sephoris a City in Galilee, gathering unto him a band of deſperate men, L made incurſions upon the King's Dominions. And having taken all thoſe Arms and Weapons, which he might recover in that place, he armed from the firſt to the laſt, all thoſe Souldiers that were with him; he took away all that money which was reſerved for the King, in that place; and affrighting the Inhabitants round about him, he ſpoiled all thoſe with whomſoever he met; aſpiring to the Kingdom, not that he thought himſelf well enough qualified for that dignity, but becauſe he had gotten ſuch freedom in wickedneſs, he took the boldneſs to do any thing.

Simon, Herod's Servant.

Whilſt theſe troubles ranged in every place, Simon alſo, who had been one of Herod's ſervants; and both for his ſhape, ſtature and ſtrength, was eſteemed amongſt all men, undertook the Kingdom: and being attended by a mighty Army, and proclaimed M King by them, who were a wicked and unbridled multitude, and perſwading himſelf that he was worthy to be King before any other; he firſt of all ſet the Palace on fire in Jericho, and ſpoiled all that was therein. He burnt alſo divers other Royal Palaces, belonging to the King, which were in divers places of the Countrey; giving them free licenſe who were his followers in the Action, to bear away the Prey that remained: And far more licentious pranks had he played, had not his practiſes been ſpeedily and wiſely prevented. For Gratus, who with the King's Soldiers, had joyned himſelf with the Romans, and gathered all the Forces that he had, went out againſt this Simon. And after a fierce Battel, they on the other ſide of Jordan, were put to flight; and fighting rather with courage than Military Diſcipline, they were overcome. N And whilſt Simon, in croſſing a Valley, ſought to ſave himſelf by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

Athronges ſtrong in body and goodly in ſtature, attempteth the Royal Dignity.

About the ſame time alſo, the Royal Palace of Amatha, that was hard by Jordan, was burnt by men of as bad diſpoſition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole Nation reigned this raging Rebellion, for that the Countrey had no King, who by his Vertue, might govern and moderate the people; for that the ſtrangers who were ſent to repreſs theſe mutinies, did rather incenſe them through their Violence and Avarice. For a certain obſcure and baſe man (neither eſteemed for Vertue, nor worthy of regard for his Riches, but being a Shepherd utterly unknown before, and only famous for his huge ſtature and ſtrength) called Athronges, was ſo audacious to aſpire to Royal O Dignity, and took pleaſure to offer violence, not valuing his life; and expoſing himſelf to all hazards for the only unbridled affection he bare to Soveraignty. He had

A had four Brothers of as goodly ſtature as himſelf, who were eſteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the means offered them to obtain the Kingdom. Each one of theſe had the Command over a Company. For a great company of people reſorted daily unto them; the charge of whom was committed unto his Brethren, at ſuch time as any occaſion of War was offered, and he in the mean while wearing the Diadem on his head, ordered, counſelled and commanded all things. The Power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called King for nothing; for he diſpoſed all things according to his own pleaſure; and both he and his Brethren were fleſh'd with the ſlaughter of the Romans, and thoſe of the King's ſide, whom he hated alike; theſe, by reaſon of the inſolence they B had uſed during Herod's life-time; the other, in regard of thoſe injuries, which lately they ſuppoſed themſelves to have received by them. This hatred of theirs daily encreaſed more and more, and there was no man that could eſcape their hands, both in reſpect of the gain ſought, and for the cuſtom they had to ſhed Blood. They therefore at that time ſet upon the Romans, and ſurpriſed them on the ſudden near to Emmaus, at ſuch time as they carried Victuals and Munition unto their Camp, and having encloſed their Centurion Arius, with forty of their moſt valiant Footmen, they ſhot him thorough with their Darts: The reſt that expected nothing leſs than death, were ſaved by Gratus, who came in upon them with the King's Souldiers; whereupon, leaving the dead bodies, they retired. Continuing their War C after this manner a long time, according as occaſion was offered, they had done much miſchief to the Romans, and far more injury to the Nation of the Jews. At laſt, they were ſurpriſed; the one in an Encounter betwixt them and Gratus, the other in fighting againſt Ptolomey. The eldeſt was taken by Archelaus; and the laſt being diſ-heartened with the Accidents, and ſeeing no means to eſcape (for beſides his other miſhaps, his Souldiers were afflicted with ſickneſs) he, with the reſt, upon Archelaus's Faith and Oath, ſubmitted himſelf unto him. But this was done ſome little while after.

At this time all Judæa was full of Robberies; and as many ſeditious Aſſemblies as drew together, ſo many Kings were there elected, who were raiſed to the utter ruine of D the Commonweal. Amongſt the reſt, the Romans were they that ſmarted leaſt; but the Murthers were executed againſt thoſe that were out of the Countrey. But Varus underſtanding by Sabinus's Letters, in what dangers they were; and fearing the utter overthrow of his third Legion, he took with him the two other (for to the uttermoſt in Syria there were but three) and with the aſſiſtance of the Kings and Tetrarchs, he haſted into Jewry, to relieve thoſe that were beſieged; commanding thoſe that were ſent out before he diſlodged, to meet him at Ptolemais; and paſſing by the City of the Berythians, he received a thouſand and five hundred Soldiers at their hands, to attend him in his War. Aretas alſo, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himſelf into Confederacy with the Romans, in regard of that hatred he bare Herod, ſent him E Horſe and Foot. When all theſe Forces were aſſembled at Ptolemais, he delivered a part thereof to his Son, and one of his Friends; commanding them to make War againſt the Galileans, who bordered upon that City; who entring that Countrey, and putting all thoſe to flight, whoſoever durſt make head againſt him, he took Sephoris; and ſelling the Inhabitants under the Spear, he conſumed the City with fire. Varus himſelf marching towards Samaria with his Army, violenced not the City, in that he knew it was free from the Contagion of the Seditious; but he pitched his Camp in a certain Village, which was Ptolomey's Poſſeſſion, called Arus. The ſame did the Arabians burn, revenging themſelves on Herod's Friend for his ſake; and marching forward, the Arabians ſpoiled alſo another Village called Sampho; and for that it was F ſtrongly fortified, burned it. Beſides, in that journey nothing eſcaped their hands, but they put all to Fire and Sword: For both Emmaus was burned by Varus's Command, and in revenge of his Soldiers that were killed in that place, it was left deſolate and void of Inhabitants. From thence, drawing near to Jeruſalem, thoſe Jews that beſieged the Legion of that ſide, upon the ſudden view and approach of the Army of the Romans, fearfully fled, giving over that Siege which they intended. But thoſe Jews of Jeruſalem, being ſharply reproved by Varus, alledged in their excuſe, that the people, in regard of the Feaſt, were aſſembled in that place; and that the War was not begun by their conſent, but undertaken by their boldneſs who reſorted thither from divers places; and that they were ſo far off from aſſailing the Romans, that they rather G ſeemed to be beſieged by them. And long before this, Joſeph, King Herod's Nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their Soldiers, were gone out to meet Varus, and thoſe Romans that had ſuſtained the Siege, had done no leſs. But as for Sabinus, he would not appear in Varus's preſence; by ſtealing away privily out of the City, he fled towards H the Sea. Then Varus ſending a part of his Army thorough the whole Countrey, ſought out thoſe Authors of this Sedition, and thoſe that were noted men in the action; ſome of which who were moſt guilty, were puniſhed; the reſt were delivered. Of thoſe that were puniſhed for this occaſion, there were about two thouſand crucified, and that done, ſeeing that this Army ſtood him in little ſtead, he diſmiſſed them. For divers diſorders and injuries, contrary to Varus's expreſs Command, were acted by his Souldiers, who ſought after nothing more than to encreaſe their means by other men's miſeries. And hearing that ten thouſand Jews were aſſembled together, he haſted to apprehend them; but they, not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiabus's advice ſubmitted themſelves. But Varus having pardoned the people for I their Rebellion, ſent all thoſe that were the Ring-leaders thereof to Cæſar, who pardoned divers of them. But he chaſtiſed certain of Herod's Allies, and ſuch as bare Arms with them; for that neither in regard of Kindred, nor reſpect of Juſtice, they had abſtained from Inſurrection. After that Varus had thus appeaſed all the troubles in Jewry, and left the firſt Legion in Garriſon in Jeruſalem, he returned to Antioch.

The Embaſſage of the Jews to Rome. Archelaus & the Ambaſſadours of the Jews appear before Cæſar. Philip Herod's Son.

But Archelaus was croſſed in Rome by another Occurrent, that aroſe upon this occaſion: Certain Ambaſſadours of the Jews reſorted thither by Varus's permiſſion, requiring that it might be lawful for them to live according to their own Laws; theſe preſented themſelves to the number of fifty, and were back'd by eight thouſand Jews K that inhabited the City. And when Cæſar had aſſembled the Council of his Friends, and chief Citizens in Apollo's Temple, which he had builded to his mighty charge, thither reſorted the Ambaſſadours, who were followed by a Troop of Jews; and Archelaus alſo, attended by his Friends. But the King's Kindred neither ſtood by Archelaus, in regard of the hate they bare him; and yet diſdained to aſſiſt the Ambaſſadours, for that they were aſhamed in Cæſar's preſence to oppoſe themſelves againſt their neareſt Friend and Kinſman. Philip alſo was preſent at that time, who by Varus's perſwaſion, reſorted thither out of Syria; eſpecially to plead for his Brother, to whom Varus wiſhed all good fortune: Beſides that, hoping not a little, that if the Jews ſhould obtain the liberty to live according to their Laws, it might come to paſs, L that the Kingdom being divided amongſt Herod's Children, he might alſo light on ſome part thereof. Therefore, after the Ambaſſadours of the Jews had obtained Licence to propoſe their demands, pretending with themſelves wholly to extinguiſh the Royalty: They began to rip up Herod's diſgraces; alledging how only in name he had been a King, whereas otherwiſe he had uſed all the Tyrannous practices, that the wickedeſt perſon could have invented, towards the deſtruction of his Nation; and that not content with theſe, he had of his own head practiſed and invented new. Neither that it needed to reckon up how many he had deprived of life, when the eſtate of thoſe that were alive was far more deſperate; whom he not only frighted with perpetual terrour and ſeverity, but alſo with injurious hands had not abſtained from their M Goods. By which means it came to paſs, that he not only builded, but beautified Foreign Cities, inhabited by Foreign Nations, to the end he might the rather utterly ſpoil thoſe by exaction, which were ſituated and ſeated in his own Countrey: And that he enforced his Nation to extream Poverty, which he received in moſt happy Eſtate; whilſt he ſpoiled thoſe Nobles of their Eſtates, who upon weak probabilities were condemned to die; or granting them Life, deprived them of their Poſſeſſions. And, whereas yearly Tributes were impoſed on every one, yet ſeverally were the ravenous and covetous deſires of his Friends and Courtiers to be ſatisfied; yea, and of his ſervants alſo, who had the Authority to exact theſe things; and by this means they might redeem their injurious wickedneſs. As for the deflouring of Virgins, and the ſhameful be- N traying of a Matron's chaſtity, they covered them under ſilence; for that it is a great comfort to thoſe that ſuffer ſuch abuſes, if their diſgraces be but known to a few. In ſhort, that Herod had no other ways governed, than as if the Government had been committed to a moſt wild Beaſt. For which cauſe, whereas in times paſt that Nation had been afflicted with many Calamities and Murthers, yet that there is no example extant amongſt their Monuments of Antiquity, that may be compared with their preſent Calamity under Herod. For which cauſe, upon juſt reſpects, they had with one conſent, named Archelaus their King; ſuppoſing that whatſoever King might befall them, he would always demean himſelf more affably than Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus, they had mourned with him for his Father, to gratifie him in O other things, to the intent they might obtain his good affection. But he without delay, and all at once, had made manifeſt to the whole Nation, what opinion they were

A to conceive of him, notwithſtanding that as yet he was not confirmed King (for that it lay in Cæſar's hands to grant it) and as if he had been afraid, leſt he ſhould aſſuredly be acknowledged for his Father's Son, he had ſhewed an example of his Vertue, Moderation and good Government, that he would uſe towards his Subjects, by the firſt Act which he had committed, not only againſt God, but alſo againſt men. For in the Temple it ſelf he hath cauſed three thouſand of his Countrey-men to be killed in ſtead of Sacrifices. And how can he chuſe but be juſtly hated, who beſides his other cruelties, objecteth againſt us the Crime of Rebellion and Mutiny? The effect of their requeſt therefore was this, that they might not any more be governed by a King, nor any ſuch like Government; but that they might be united unto Syria, and ſubmit B themſelves under their Governours that ſhould be ſent thither: That in ſo doing, it ſhould truly appear whether they were ſedicious and addicted to changes, or whether they would live in peace, when they had favourable Governours. After the Jews had ſpoken to this effect, Nicholaus diſcharged the Kings of thoſe Accuſations that were objected againſt them, and namely Herod, who (as he ſaid) had never been accuſed all his life-time; and that it was no reaſon that they who juſtly accuſing him, might have cauſed him to be puniſhed during his life-time, ſhould now addreſs their Accuſations againſt him after he was dead. And as touching thoſe things which were objected concerning Archelaus's actions, it ought to be imputed to their inſolence; for that engaging themſelves in matters contrary to Law; and having begun to murther thoſe who C ſought to appeaſe the tumult, they accuſed ſuch as had kept them in obedience. Beſides this, he objected againſt them, that they were addicted to alterations, and took pleaſure to ſtir up Seditions, for that they knew not what thing it was to obey Juſtice and the Laws, and that there was no Nation in the World ſo head-ſtrong as that of the Jews; for that they would have the upper hand over all. Thus ſpake Nicholaus.

D WHen Cæſar had heard theſe things, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. But ſome few days after, deſirous to make an end of this matter, declared Archelaus not King, but Lord of half that Government that appertained to Herod; promiſing him to beſtow a Royal Dignity upon him, if ſo be he behaved himſelf vertuouſly, according as it became him. As for the other Moyety, he divided it between two of Herod's Sons, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his Brother Archelaus for the whole Kingdom. The ſame Antipas alſo, had the Countrey on the other ſide Jordan, and Galilee, with two hundred Talents of yearly Revenue. As for Philip, he had Bathanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis, and part of the Palace that was called by Zenodorus's name, with one hundred Talents. E As for Archelaus, he had Idumæa, Judæa and Samaria, which were diſcharged of the fourth part of the Tributes by Cæſar, for that they had joyned themſelves with the reſt of the people, during the time of the Sedition. Beſides that, Archelaus had the Tower of Straton, Sebaſte, Joppe and Jeruſalem. For Gaza, Gadara and Hippon were Cities of Greece, which Cæſar had ſeparated, and adjoyned to Syria. Archelaus had five hundred Talents of yearly Rent out of his Countrey. Thus was the Patrimony divided among Herod's Sons. As for Salome, beſides that which her Brother had given her in his Will, which were the Cities of Jamnia, Azot, Phaſelis and half a Million of money, Cæſar granted her a Royal houſe in Aſcalon; ſo as ſhe received in the whole, ſixty Talents of yearly Revenue, and had her houſe allotted her within the Dominion F of Archelaus. All Herod's Kindred received that which was bequeathed unto them by his Teſtament. Two of his Daughters that were unmarried, were endowed by Cæſar with a quarter of a Million of money which he gave them, beſides their Father's Portion, and they were married to Pheroras's Sons. Moreover, he gave Herod's Sons, all which he had given him by the Teſtament, amounting to the ſumm of one thouſand and five hundred Talents; contenting himſelf only to receive ſome few movables, not ſo much for the value, as in remembrance of the King, who had given them.

The falſe Alexander cometh to Rome.

The falſe Alexander cannot deceive Cæſar.

The falſe Alexander is condemned to tug at an Oar.

A*Vguſtus* having thus ordained Herod's Succeſſion, a young man, and a Jew born, brought up in the City of Sidon, by a certain Roman Free man; intruded himſelf into Herod's Kindred; for all thoſe that beheld him, reported that he reſembled Alexander, Herod's Son, who was killed by him; and by this means he began to aſpire to the Kingdom: Whereupon, calling to him a Companion, who was his own I Countrey-man, and a long experienced Courtier, his Arts-maſter, and fit to make diſturbances; he, by his inſtructions, feigned himſelf to be that Alexander, Herod's Son, who was delivered from death by the means of a certain friend, who had the charge to ſee him executed; who executing others in their ſteads, delivered both him and his Brother Ariſtobulus, and that they were both eſcaped in this manner. Being puffed up by theſe Toys, he failed not to deceive other men; and as ſoon as he came to Creet, as many Jews as he fell in conference with, he perſwaded them no leſs; and getting much money from them, he ſailed into the Iſle of Melos; where he gathered a great Summ of Money, under pretext that he was of the Kings Blood. And now hoping that he ſhould recover his Father's Kingdom, and that he ſhould reward thoſe that K were beneficial to him, he haſted towards Rome, accompanied with his Friends in great pomp. And being arrived at Puteol, he was entertained there with no leſs favour by thoſe Jews, whom he deceived by his colourable Title; and divers others, who had been Herod's Friends and Familiars, came unto him, and entertained him as their King. The cauſe hereof was the natural diſpoſition of men, who take pleaſure in falſe reports, together with the report of his reſemblance. For they that had frequented very familiarly with Alexander, held it for a matter moſt aſſured, that he was the man, and none other; and affirmed unto others upon their Oaths, that it was he, ſo that this rumour at laſt came to Rome. And all the Jews that dwelt there came forth to meet him, ſaying, That it was God's handy-work, that he was after that manner L preſerved beyond all men's expectation: And they greatly rejoyced in his Mother Mariamne's behalf, from whom he was deſcended; he was carried in a Litter through the Streets with all the Apparel of a King, the charge whereof was defrayed by thoſe who were his Friends. He was attended by a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applauſe, as it ordinarily falleth out at ſuch time as, beyond all expectation, any one is found to have been miraculouſly preſerved. When this News was brought to Cæſar's ears, he gave ſmall credit thereunto, perſwading himſelf that it was a hard matter to deceive Herod, in a matter of ſo great importance: Notwithſtanding, conforming himſelf in ſome ſort to the opinions of men, he ſent a certain Free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly converſed with Alexander M and Ariſtobulus during their Infancy; giving him charge to bring Alexander unto him to the end he might ſee him; which he did, and was never the wiſer in diſcovering him. Notwithſtanding, Cæſar was not fully deceived. For, although he reſembled him ſomewhat; yet he was not ſo exactly like him, that he could deceive thoſe who narrowly obſerved him. For this counterfeit Alexander had hard hands, in that he had been accuſtomed to labour, which the true Alexander could not have, in regard of his tender and delicate education; and likewiſe, this man was of a rough skin, and hard fleſh. Cæſar therefore, diſcovering the treachery both of the counterfeit Scholar, and lying Maſter, and how they agreed in their confident Juſtifications, he enquired of them, what was become of Ariſtobulus, who was ſecretly hidden with him; N and for what cauſe he preſented not himſelf, to enjoy the honour that appertained to thoſe who were ſo Nobly deſcended? It was anſwered him, that he remained in the Iſle of Cyprus, for fear of dangers, to which they are expoſed who ſail by Sea, to the end, that if any miſ-fortune ſhould befal him, all Mariamne's Race ſhould not be extinguiſhed, but that at leaſt, Ariſtobulus might be left alive. Whilſt he owned theſe things, and the Author of the Fable juſtified no leſs, Cæſar drawing the young man aſide, ſaid unto him: My friend, if thou wilt not deceive me, thou ſhalt have this recompence, that thou ſhalt not be puniſhed. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who hath emboldned thee to practice this fraud; for this malice is ſo great, that it ſurpaſſeth thine age. Whereupon, being unable to conceal the truth, he diſcovered the treachery O to Cæſar, how and by whom it was contrived. At that time Cæſar being loath to falſifie his promiſe that he had paſt to this falſe Alexander, and ſeeing that in times paſt he had laboured

A laboured with his hands, he cauſed him to be enrolled among the number of his Galley-ſlaves; and cauſed the other that induced him to this cheat, to be put to death; contenting himſelf that the Inhabitants of Melos had loſt their charges, which they had employed upon this falſe Alexander, who had a ſhameful end, as it hath been heretofore declared.

After that Archelaus had taken poſſeſſion of that Sovereignty that was allotted him, he came into Judea, where he depoſed Joazar the Son of Boethus from the High Prieſthood; accuſing him to have favoured the Seditious, and eſtabliſhed Eleazar his Brother in his place. After this, he re-edified the Palace in Jericho, and ſumptuouſly adorned it; drawing away the half of thoſe Waters which ſerved the Borough of Neara, and conveying them thorough a field which he had planted with Palm Trees; he C built a Borough in that place, which he named Archelais; and contrary to the Laws of his Countrey, he married Glaphyra, Archelaus's Daughter, who had been his Brother Alexander's Wife, by whom he alſo had divers Children; notwithſtanding, the Law of the Jews forbiddeth a man to marry his Brother's Wife. Neither did Eleazar enjoy the Prieſthood any long time; but during his life time, Jeſus the Son of Sias was ſubſtituted in his place.

The tenth year of Archelaus's Government, the chiefeſt Governours among the Jews and Samaritans, unable any longer to endure his cruelty and Tyranny, accuſed him before Cæſar; and eſpecially after they had underſtood that he had tranſgreſſed Cæſar's Command, who had charged him to behave himſelf graciouſly towards them. Which D when Cæſar underſtood, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and cauſed Archelaus's Agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome, and ſent for Archelaus alſo; and eſteeming it too baſe an indignity for him to write unto him, Go (ſaid he) unto him with all expedition, and bring him unto me without delay. He poſting forward with all diligence, at length arrived in Judæa, where he found Archelaus banqueting with his friends; and having acquainted him with Cæſar's Commands, he haſtened him away. As ſoon as he came to Rome, after that Cæſar had heard his Accuſers and his juſtification, he baniſhed him, and confined him in the City of Vienna in France, and confiſcated all his Goods.

Archelaus baniſhed and confined.

But before Archelaus was ſent for to Rome, he reported unto his friends this Dream which enſueth: He thought that he ſaw ten Ears full of Wheat, and very ripe, which E the Oxen were eating; and as ſoon as he awaked, he conceived an opinion that his Viſion preſaged ſome great matter. For which cauſe he ſent for certain Sooth-ſayers, who made it their profeſſion to interpret Dreams. Now, whilſt they were debating one with another (for they differed for the moſt part in their expoſition) a certain man called Simon, an Eſſean, having firſt of all obtained ſecurity and licence to ſpeak, ſaid, that the Viſion prognoſticated, that a great alteration ſhould befal in Archelaus's Eſtate, to his prejudice. For the Oxen ſignified Afflictions, in reſpect that thoſe kind of creatures do ordinarily labour; and as for the change of Eſtate, it was ſignified by this, in that the earth being laboured by the Oxen, altered its condition and ſhape; and as touching the ten Ears of Corn, they ſignified the like number of years: F And therefore, when as one Summer ſhould be overpaſt, that then the time of Archelaus's Sovereignty ſhould be at an end. Thus interpreted he this Dream. And the fifth day after the Viſion thereof, Archelaus's Agent, by Cæſar's Command, came into Jewry to ſummon him to Rome. Some ſuch like matter happened to Glaphyra, his Wife alſo, the Daughter of King Archelaus: She (as we have ſaid) married Alexander, Herod's Son, when ſhe was a Maid, and Brother to this Archelaus; who being put to death by his Father, ſhe was married the ſecond time to Juba King of Mauritania; and he alſo being dead, ſhe living with her Father in Cappadocia, was married to Archelaus; who put away Mariamne his Wife, for the love he bare unto Glaphyra. She living with Archelaus, had ſuch a Dream: She thought ſhe ſaw Alexander by her, ſhe cheriſhing and G embracing him, he checked her, ſaying, Glaphyra, Thou verifieſt that Proverb, which ſaith, Women have no Loyalty. For having given me thy faith, and married with me at ſuch time as thou wert a Virgin, and born Children by me, thou haſt forgotten and neglected my love, thorough the deſire thou haſt had to be married the ſecond time. H Neither waſt thou contented to have done me this wrong, but haſt taken unto thee likewiſe a third Huſband, lewdly intruding thy ſelf into my Family; and being married to Archelaus, thou art content to admit my Brother for thy Huſband. Notwithſtanding this, I will not forget the love that I have born thee, but will deliver thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine own, as heretofore thou haſt been. After that ſhe had told this Viſion to ſome women that were her Familiars, ſhe died very ſhortly after. Which accident I have thought good to regiſter in this place, in that I was to treat of thoſe things; and otherwiſe the matter ſeemeth to be a notable example, containing a moſt certain argument of the Immortality of Souls, and God's Providence. And if any one think theſe things incredible, let I him keep his opinion to himſelf, and no ways contradict thoſe, who by ſuch events are incited to the ſtudy of Virtue. Now when the Government of Archelaus was united to Syria, Cyrenius who had been Conſul, was ſent by Cæſar to tax Syria, and to diſpoſe of Archelaus's houſe.

Cyrenius the Roman Senator having paſſed through all Degrees, Offices and Dignities, until ſuch time as he obtained the Conſulſhip, (a man of great account) was ſent into Syria by Cæſar's order, to do juſtice among the people, and to ſeſs and tax every man's goods: Coponius a Captain of Horſe was ſent with him, who was appointed to be Governour of all Jewry. Cyrenius therefore came into Judea, which was already united to Syria, to tax the Goods of the Inhabitants thereof, and to confiſcate Archelaus's Subſtance. And although at the firſt the Jews thought this Tax very unreaſonable, yet notwithſtanding K without contradiction they ſubmitted themſelves, being perſwaded thereunto by the counſel of the High Prieſt Joazar the Son of Boethus. But after this there aroſe a certain Jew called Judas the Gaulanite, born in the Town of Gamala; who having a certain man called Sadoc the Phariſee, Confederate with him, laboured to ſtir up the people to Rebellion: alledging that the Seſs was no other thing, but a confeſſion of their ſervitude; exhorting all the Nation to maintain their liberty, and putting them in hope that they thereby ſhould happily eſtabliſh their eſtates, and enjoy their goods with ſecurity; and beſides this, obtain both honour and glory in proſecution of ſuch an enterpriſe. Moreover, that God would not afford them a more aſſured way to ſettle their Fortunes, than by this means; namely, if they would employ themſelves L in the execution of their deſigns; and if having conceived in their minds high and noble attempts, they forbore not to accompliſh the ſame, notwithſtanding the execution coſt them their lives. Theſe ſpeeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleaſure, and by the ſame they were the more confirmed and heartened to Rebellion. So that there was no kind of evil which theſe men ſet not abroach; yea, the whole Nation was ſo full of miſeries, that it was impoſſible to relate them: For the Wars went on with ſuch fury, that it was impoſſible to reſtrain the violence thereof; ſo that they neither ſpared friends nor enemies, but were wholly given over to the ſpoil. There was nothing but Robberies and Murthers of the Nobility, under pretence to eſtabliſh the ſtate of the Commonweal, but in effect for their private profit ſake; M whereby the Cities were ruined with Seditions and Murthers, in which the Inhabitants killed one another, after a ſtrange manner of fury, and deſire they had not to ſpare any that was not of their Faction. They were afflicted with Forreign Enemies and Famine; yet none of theſe could pacifie their fury, nor make them forbear to deſtroy Cities, and ſhed innocent Blood; till at length the horrible miſchief took ſuch a head, that they conſumed the Temple of God, and burned all the ſtately buildings. So dangerous a thing it is to change the Cuſtoms and Manners of a Countrey. For Judas and Sadoc having introduced and raiſed a fourth Sect, and tying the Sectaries to their command, filled the whole Commonweal with many troubles; and planted the roots of thoſe miſchiefs, which afterwards ſpred abroad from this unaccuſtomed Sect. N For which cauſe I think it not amiſs to diſcourſe briefly of theſe Sectaries opinions, whereby ſo many evils have fallen upon our Nation.

CHAP. II.

Of the four ſorts of Sectaries that were among the Jews.

The year of the World, 3973. after Christ's Nativity, 11.

THere were three Sects among the Jews of long continuance and Antiquity; that of the Eſſeans, that of the Saducees, and that of thoſe who were called Phariſees.
Of theſe we have ſpoken in our ſecond Book, of the Wars of the Jews; and yet now I think it not amiſs to ſpeak ſomewhat of them in this place alſo. The Phariſees uſe a very auſtere and ſtrict kind of life, and addict not themſelves to any delicacy, but diligently B follow that which their reaſon induceth them unto. They honour their Elders; neither dare they reply, or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things unto fate, and yet they take not an aſſent of will from man; ſuppoſing that God tempereth all things in ſuch ſort, that by his Ordinance and man's will all things are performed, good or evil. They believe alſo, that the Souls of men are immortal; and that after death they receive their reward, according as they have addicted themſelves to virtue or vice in their life times; the one to lie in perpetual Priſon, the other to riſe again very ſhortly. For which cauſe they are in great eſteem among the people; and all that which appertaineth to the ſervice of God, whether they be Prayers or Sacrifices, all things are done according as they give direction. So ample a Teſtimony C do the Cities yield of their wiſdom, temperance and honeſt life. But the Saducees are of that opinion, that the Souls of men periſh with their Bodies. They obſerve no other thing but that which is in the Law; and hold it a Virtue to diſpute with their Maſters, concerning the Decrees of their Sect. Their opinion is entertained by very few; yet ſuch, who for the moſt part are men of the beſt account; there is hardly any thing done without their advice: And when they are advanced to any honours, they are enforced to allow of that which the Phariſees ſhall propoſe; otherwiſe the common people will not endure them. The Eſſeans attribute unto God the Government and diſpoſition of all things. They ſay that the Souls of men are immortal; and all the uttermoſt of their endeavour and delight is, to maintain Juſtice and Equity. They ſend their Offerings D unto the Temple, yet ſacrifice they not with other men, by reaſon they uſe more ſacred and different Ceremonies; for which cauſe they are ſecluded out of the common Temple, and ſacrifice a-part. Otherwiſe, they are men of moſt reconciled behaviour, and ſuch as are wholly addicted to cultivate their Land. They have one cuſtom which is worthy admiration, and ſuch a one as is not to be found amongſt any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make account of virtue, which they have practiſed from all Antiquity; which is, that they poſſeſs their goods in common; neither doth the richeſt among them make more uſe of his poſſeſſions, than he that hath leaſt of all. They are at leaſt four thouſand in number, who have neither Wives nor Slaves; ſuppoſing that Women are the occaſion of injuſtice, and Slaves do cauſe inſurrections; E and living apart by themſelves, they ſerve one another; and chuſe out certain upright men among the Prieſts to gather the Fruits and Revenues of the Lands, to the end they may be maintained and nouriſhed thereby: In a word, they follow the ſame courſe of life that they do, who are called Pliſti among the Danes. The fourth Sect was founded by Judas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Phariſees, but they are extremely zealous of their liberty, acknowledging but one only God, Lord and Maſter of all things; and had rather both themſelves with their deareſt Children and Kindred, ſhould endure the moſt grievous and bitter torments that may be imagined than call any mortal man their Lord. Of which conſtancy of theirs I forbear to diſcourſe any further at this time, for it is ſufficiently known unto divers, who have been F eye-witneſſes thereof; neither do I fear leſt any one ſhould ſuppoſe thoſe things to be incredible, which I have ſaid of them; but rather, that I have ſpoken leſs than they themſelves make evident, in contemning their grievous tortures and puniſhments; which courage and magnanimity of theirs encreaſed very mightily amongſt our Nation, being kindled by the moſt grievous injuries which were offered us by Geſſius Florus our Governour, by which means at length it came to paſs, that they revolted and rebelled againſt the people of Rome. Thus much concerning the Sects among the Jews.

AFter that Cyrenius had confiſcated Archelaus's Goods, and finiſhed the valuation of I every man's Eſtate (which happened thirty ſeven years after Antonies overthrow by Cæſar in the Actian Battel) he depoſed Joazar from the Prieſtly Dignity, by reaſon of that Sedition which the people ſtirred up againſt him, and eſtabliſhed Ananus the Son of Seth in his place. But Herod and Philip took each of them the poſſeſſion of their Tetrarchy, and diſpoſed of the Affairs thereof. Herod incloſed Sephoris with a ſtrong Wall, and made it the chiefeſt City and Ornament of Galilee: He fortified alſo another City called Bataramphtha, and named it Julias, in honour of Julia the Emperour Cæſar's Wife. Philip repaired Paneada, ſituated near nnto the head of Jordan, and called it Cæſarea; he repaired alſo the Borough of Bethſaida, near unto the Lake of Genezareth, and gave it the dignity of a City, both for the number of the Inhabitants, as for K other pre-eminencies, and called it Julia, by Cæſars Wives name. As for Coponius the Governour in Judæa, who (as we have ſaid) was ſent with Cyrenius, in his time there hapned that which followeth. At the Feaſt of Unlevened Bread, which we call Paſcha, the cuſtom was that the Prieſts opened the Temple Gates about midnight, at which time certain Samaritans, who ſecretly entred into Jeruſalem, as ſoon as the Gates were open, ſpred men's bones amidſt the Porches, and over all the Temple; whereby it came to paſs, that the Prieſts began to keep a more diligent watch, than they had done before.

Tyberias builded.

After Cæſar ſucceeded Tiberius Nero, the Son of Julia his Wife, who was the third Roman Emperour. He it was that ſent the fifth Governour into Judæa, whoſe name was Valerius Gratus, who ſucceeded Annius Rufus. This Gratus depoſed Ananus, and appointed Iſmael the Son of Fabius High Prieſt; and after his deceaſe (for he lived but a M little while after) Eleazar the Son of Ananus was made High Prieſt. A year after, this Eleazar was alſo depoſed, and the Prieſthood was given to Simon the Son of Camithus; who continuing in this dignity for a year's ſpace and no longer, Joſeph called Caiphas ſucceeded him. After Gratus had behaved himſelf thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Judæa for the ſpace of eleven years. After him came Pontius Pilate, and ſucceeded him in the Government. But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius's Friendſhip, builded a City in honour of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfulleſt part of Galilee, hard by the Lake Genezareth, and near unto the natural Baths in the Borough called Emmaus. This City was peopled by ſtrangers, who reſorted thither from all parts, and by divers of the Countreys N of Galilee; ſome of which were conſtrained to inhabit the ſame. Some of thoſe likewiſe, who were in authority repaired thither; and from all Countreys, many flocked thither, who were not all aſſuredly held to be Free-men; all which he made free, and gave them great gifts, on that condition, that they ſhould not abandon the City. To ſome of them he gave houſes already builded, to others Lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the inhabiting of ſuch a place was contrary to the Laws and Cuſtoms of his Countrey, and the Ordinances of the Jews; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of Sepulchres; and our Law ſaith, he that converſeth in thoſe places, is held unclean and defiled for the ſpace of ſeven days.

Phraates King of the Parthians, ſlain by the Treaſon of Phraataces his Son.

At that very time Phraates King of Parthia died, being treacherouſly killed by his Son O Phraataces, for this cauſe: After that Phraates had begotten many lawful Children, he took an Italian woman to be his Concubine, called Thermuſa; whom with other

A Preſents Julius Cæſar had ſent unto him. After he had begotten on her his Son Phraataces, he was ſo much beſotted with her beauty, that he took her to his Wife, and held her in high eſteme. She that might perſwade him unto all that ſhe pleaſed, enforced her ſelf to the uttermoſt, to make her Son King of Parthia; and ſeeing that ſhe might not attain thereunto, except ſhe had firſt found out the means to deliver her ſelf of Phraates's lawful Children, ſhe perſwaded him to ſend them Hoſtages to Rome. In a word, they were preſently ſent away, becauſe Phraates had not the power to contradict Thermuſa's Will, and only Phraataces was brought up in State Affairs; who thinking the time too tedious and long, if he ſhould expect the Kingdom till his Father was dead, conſpired againſt him by the inſtigation and furtherance of his Mother, with whom B (as it was thought) he committed Inceſt. In effect, being equally attainted of thoſe two enormous Crimes, both for the murther of his Father, and Inceſt committed with his Mother, he was generally hated by his Subjects, who rebelled againſt him before he was ſetled in his Kingdom. By this means his Fortune was overthrown, and he died. The Noble men among the Parthians, perceiving that it was impoſſible for them to maintain their State without a King, and that their King ought lineally to be deſcended of the Race of the Arſacians (becauſe by cuſtom they might not chuſe any out of another ſtock) and ſuppoſing that their Ordinances had too much already been broken, and that it would redound to their great diſhonour, if the Kingdom ſhould be continued in the hands of ſuch a man, who was deſcended from an Italian Concubine, they ſent C Ambaſſadours to require Herod to come and be their King; who otherwiſe was hated of all the people, and accuſed of extreme cruelty: In a word, he was an unſociable man, and extreamly cholerick, notwithſtanding he was of the Blood of the Arſacides; they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a Banquet made at a certain Sacrifice (for the cuſtom of the Parthians was, that every one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was killed when he was a hunting. For this cauſe they ſent Ambaſſadours to Rome, requiring that one of thoſe that were Hoſtages there might be their King; and one Vonones was ſent unto them, who was preferred above all his Brethren. For he ſeemed to be capable of that high Degree of honour, as to command two of the greateſt Sovereignties that were under the Sun; the one of his own Nation, D the other of a Foreign Dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature inconſtant, and moſt inſolent, ſhortly after repented themſelves; for they diſdained to execute the Command of a Slave (for ſo called they a Pledg) ſaying, that the Parthians had not a King given them by right of War, but that which was the greateſt abuſe that could befall them, by an injury offered them in the time of a ſhameful Peace. For which cauſe they ſpeedily ſent for Artabanus King of Media, who was of the Race of the Arſacides. To this requeſt of theirs he willingly condeſcended, and came unto them with his Army, and Vonones marched forward againſt him. At the firſt encounter, although the common ſort among the Parthians favoured Artabanus, yet he was overcome, and fled to the Mountains of Media. But not long after, having aſſembled a E greater Army, he once more ſet upon Vonones, and defeated him; at which time Vonones retired himſelf with ſome Horſe-men of his, into Seleucia. But Artabanus having made a great ſlaughter of thoſe that fled, and wholly abaſhed the minds of the Barbarians, he retired to the City of Cteſiphon, with thoſe people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made King of Parthia. Vonones arrived in Armenia, and at the firſt, ſought to make himſelf King over that Nation, ſending to this effect certain Ambaſſadours to Rome; but Tiberius repulſed his ſuit in reſpect of his Cowardice; but the rather becauſe Artabanus, by an expreſs Embaſſage, had threatned him with War. For thoſe of the greateſt power among the Armenians (who are thoſe that dwell about the Flood Niphates) maintained Artabanus's Title; and Vonones, deſtitute of all hope to obtain the F Kingdom, yielded himſelf to Syllanus, who was Governour of Syria; and in regard that he had been brought up at Rome, he was kept in Syria; and Artabanus gave Armenia to Orodes, one of his Sons. Antiochus King of the Comagenes died alſo at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the Commons and the Nobility; ſo that both parties ſent their Ambaſſadours to Rome. The Nobles demanded that the Kingdom might be reduced into divers Provinces; and the people requeſted that they might be honoured by a King, as they had been accuſtomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus ſhould be ſent to ſettle the affairs of the Eaſt, Fortune thereby preſenting him with the occaſion of his ruine. For, when he arrived in the Eaſt, and orderly diſpoſed all things he was poyſoned by Piſo, whereof he died; as is declared in another place.

The year of the World, 3997. after Chriſt's Nativity, 35.

Pilate Governour of Judæa led his Army from Cæſarea to Jeruſalem, where he wintered them with an intent to bring in Cæſar's Standards into the City, in contempt I of our Law, which forbiddeth us to make images. For which cauſe, thoſe Governours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the City without ſuch Pictures or Paintings. Pilate was the firſt, who unawares, and by night entred Jeruſalem, bringing with him his Images. Which when the people underſtood, in great multitudes they reſorted to Cæſarea, beſeeching him for many days, that he would tranſport thoſe Images into ſome other place. But when Pilate denied them to perform their requeſt, becauſe the matter would redound to Cæſar's diſhonour, and the Jews alſo ceaſed not to ſollicite him; ſome ſix days after commanding his Soldiers to lie in Ambuſh in a readineſs, he ſate him down in the Tribunal within the Hippodrome; making uſe of the opportunity of the place, for that it was moſt fit for a Stratagem. K There being urged once more about the ſame buſineſs, he gave a ſign to his Souldiers to beſet them; threatning them with death, except they would preſently give over their ſuit, and repair every one of them with all ſpeed to their own houſes. But they proſtrating themſelves upon the earth, and offering their naked throats, told him that they rather deſired to die, than to ſee their Laws violated. Pilate amazed at the conſtancy they ſhewed in the conſervation of their Laws, ſuddenly cauſed Cæſar's Images to be tranſported out of Jeruſalem, into Cæſarea: And not long after he intended to take Money out of the Sacred Treaſury, to cauſe water to be brought into the City through Conduits, from a Fountain more than two hundred Furlongs off; which the people took ſo ill, that divers thouſands of men aſſembled themſelves, exclaiming against L Pilate; endeavouring thereby to make him give over his Enterpriſe. Some of them alſo uttered divers injurious ſpeeches againſt him, as it ordinarily falleth out amongſt an unbridled multitude. But he cauſed them to be encompaſſed by a great number of his Soldiers, attired in popular habit, with cudgels, as ſoon as they began to exclaim againſt him, he gave a ſign to his Soldiers; they, as it was before commanded them, made uſe of their cudgels; and without diſtinction of perſons, fell on all thoſe whom they had encompaſſed; and ſo unmercifully laid on them, who were naked and diſarmed, that ſome of them were killed, others grievouſly hurt; and after this manner was the Tumult and Sedition appeaſed.

At that time was JESUS, a wiſe man, if it be lawful to call him a man. For he was M the performer of divers admirable works, and the inſtructer of thoſe who willingly entertain the truth; and he drew unto him divers Jews and Greeks to be his followers. This was CHRIST, who being accuſed by the Princes of our Nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the Croſs by him; yet did not thoſe who followed him from the beginning, forbear to love him for the Ignominy of his death. For he appeared alive to them the third day after, according as the Divine Prophets had before teſtified the ſame, and divers other wonderful things of him: And from that time forward the Race of the Chriſtians, who have derived their name from him, hath never ceaſed.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 7. alias, chap. 10.

At that time alſo there fell out another accident, which very ſorely troubled the N Jews; and in the Temple of Iſis at Rome, there were many ſhameful acts committed. But I will firſt of all relate the accident in the Temple of Iſis; and then will I declare that which befell the Jews. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowned both for the Nobility of her houſe, as alſo through her ſtudy and exerciſe of Virtue. Beſides this, ſhe was very rich, and with her Riches beautiful, and in her flouriſhing years; and notwithſtanding, a very Mirrour of chaſtity. She was married to a certain Noble man called Saturnine, that equalled her in all thoſe her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the Knights of greateſt account at that time, fell in love with her. But ſhe was of that diſpoſition, that it was impoſſible for him to corrupt her by Preſents; and the more ſhe refuſed thoſe infinite O Preſents which he ſent unto her, the more was Mundus's heart enflamed with ardent affection; ſo that to enjoy her but one only night, he offered her two hundred thouſand

Drachmes,

The year of the World, 3998. after Christ's Nativity, 36.

A Drachmes, amounting in our Engliſh money to ſome ſix thouſand pound; yet, for all this, he could not overcome her. For which cauſe, being unable to endure this violent paſſion, he thought beſt to pine himſelf away for want of food, thereby to deliver himſelf from the Tyranny of that Paſſion, wherewith he was afflicted. But there was a certain Free-woman that belonged to Mundus's Father, whoſe name was Ida, expert in all ſorts of ſubtilties; who being ſore grieved to behold the young man's reſolution, whom ſhe ſaw wholly addicted to a deſperate death; ſhe addreſſed her ſelf unto him, and encouraged him with hope; promiſing him to bring him to Paulina's ſpeech, by the means of a certain Bribe which ſhe intended to offer. He rejoycing very much at her motion, demanded what ſumm ſhould ſerve her: who, requiring nothing more B than fifty thouſand Drachmes, to obtain Paulina; he furniſhed her preſently. When by this means ſhe had quickened the young man's ſpirit, and received all that which ſhe demanded, ſhe ſteered not the ſame courſe which others had kept, that had the ſolicitation of the matter before, ſeeing ſhe ſaw that money would not tempt her; but knowing that ſhe was deeply devoted to the ſervice of Iſis, ſhe practiſed this ſubtil and unexpected policy. She addreſſed her ſelf to certain Prieſts of the Temple; and upon great hopes, and offer of great Preſents, and paying them down at preſent twenty and five thouſand Drachmes, and promiſing them as much more upon the performance of the bargain; ſhe diſcloſed unto them the paſſionate love which the young man bare unto Paulina, exhorting them to work ſo wiſely that he might enjoy her. They C bewitched with this huge Preſent they had, and hoped to receive, promiſed her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldeſt among them reſorted to Paulina; and having free acceſs unto her preſence, he required that he might have conference with her in ſecret; which when he had obtained, he told her that he was ſent unto her by God Anubis, in that the God was ſurpriſed with her love, and deſired that ſhe would come unto him. Paulina took great pleaſure in this his diſcourſe, and told her Familiars how ſhe had been honoured with the amorous ſolicitation of a God, and certified her Huſband, how God Anubis would lie with her: Whereunto he conſented, knowing how great his Wife's chaſtity was. She therefore repaired to the Temple; and after ſhe had ſupt, and the time was come wherein ſhe was uſually accuſtomed to lay her down to D reſt, and the Gates were lockt up by the Prieſts that were within, and the lights likewiſe were taken away; Mundus, who lay hid within, failed not to accoſt her: who, thinking that it was God Anubis, ſatisfied his deſires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the Prieſts, who were privy to this Treachery, were ſtirring, he retired himſelf: Paulina alſo, early in the morning repaired to her Huſband, and acquainted him how Anubis appeared unto her; and boaſting among her Familiars, what conference he had uſed with her: But ſome of them believed her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the reſt were altogether amazed, ſuppoſing thoſe things to be no ways incredible, when they bethought themſelves of the Ladies chaſtity.
Some three days after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, ſaid E unto her: You have ſaved me two hundred thouſand Drachmes, wherewith you might have augmented your Treaſure; and this notwithſtanding, you have not failed to ſatisfie my requeſt: Neither am I grieved that you have contemned me under the name of Mundus; ſince that undertaking Anubis*'s name, I have accompliſhed my deſire*; and this ſaid, he departed. But ſhe, preſently amazed with the man's audacious impudence, tore her Garments; and having told her Huſband of all this ſubtil circumvention, ſhe requeſted earneſtly his aſſiſtance, and that he would not forſake her in the proſecution of her revenge; who preſently acquainted the Emperour with every particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently underſtood how all things had happened, by the inquiſition and examination of the Prieſts, he condemned them and Ida, who had been the F inventer and complotter of this Treaſon againſt Paulina, to be hanged: He pulled down the Temple alſo, and caſt Anubis's Statue into Tyber, and baniſhed Mundus; ſuppoſing that he ought not to be more grievouſly puniſhed, conſidering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extream love: Behold here the inſolence committed in the Temple of Iſis, by the Prieſts that appertained to that Temple.
Now I intend to declare that which happened to the Jews that were at that time in Rome, according as I both purpoſed and promiſed.

Tiberius cauſeth Iſis's Prieſts, and Ida to be hanged, and baniſhed Mundus.

Tiberius cauſeth all the Jews to be baniſhed from Rome. Pilate puniſheth the Samaritans, for having drawn themſelves together in Arms: They accuſe him to Vitellius Governour of Syria, who ſends him to Rome to clear himſelf.

Fulvia, Saturnine's Wife delivereth Gold and Purple to be ſent to the Temple in Jeruſalem, they convert it to their own uſes; which, when Tiberius knew, he commanded all the Jews to be thruſt out of Rome.

There was a certain Jew, that having been accuſed for the breach of the Laws of his Countrey, and fearing to be puniſhed for the ſame, fled from thence, being a man of a moſt miſchievous behaviour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, profeſſed himſelf to be an expounder of Moſes's Law; and drawing to him three other, no I leſs Reprobates than himſelf, he followed his ordinary Profeſſion. Fulvia, a Lady of much honour, became their Scholar, and had embraced the Religion of the Jews; whom they had perſwaded to ſend certain Purple and Gold to the Temple of Jeruſalem; which after they had received, they converted it to their own uſe, as before they had determined to do. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar Friend, and Fulvia's Huſband, who had diſcovered the ſame unto him; commanded all Jews whatſoever to depart out of Rome. Of theſe the Conſuls choſe out and enrolled to the number of four thouſand men, whom they ſent into Sardinia; and puniſhed divers of them that refuſed to bear Arms, for fear they ſhould tranſgreſs the Ordinances of their Countrey. K So that by reaſon of the looſe behaviour of four wicked perſons, all thoſe of our Nation were driven out of the City of Rome.

The Samaritans aſſemble at Tirathaba, to aſcend the Mountain Garazim: Pilate chargeth, and overcometh them, and putteth them to flight.

Neither was the Nation of the Samaritans exempt from this trouble: for a certain ſubtil Companion, who ſought by all the means he might, to encroach upon the peoples favour, perſwaded them to withdraw themſelves with him to the Mount Gerazim (which they ſuppoſed to be the holieſt amongſt all their Mountains) in which place, he promiſed he would ſhew them the Sacred Veſſels buried in a certain place, where Moſes had laid them: And at that time they being gathered together in Arms, by his perſwaſion, encamped themſelves in a Borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained thoſe that repaired thither, to joyn themſelves with them, to the end, they might aſcend the Mountain with the greater Company: But Pilate prevented them, L and got up before them with Horſe and Foot; who, charging thoſe that were aſſembled in the Borough, put them to flight; and ſlaying ſome, and putting the reſt to flight, led away a great number of them Priſoners with him: Pilate executed the chiefeſt Ring-leaders amongſt them. The tumult of theſe Jews being publiſhed abroad, and their miſfortune made known, the Senate of Samaria addreſſed themſelves to Vitellius, who had been Conſul, and who at that time governed Syria; before whom they accuſed Pilate, for the murther of thoſe whom he had killed, ſaying, that they aſſembled not in Tirathaba to rebel againſt the Romans, but to ſecure themſelves againſt Pilate's Tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius ſent Marcus his Friend to take charge of Judæa, commanding Pilate to return to Rome, and to ſatisfie the Emperour of M thoſe things whereof the people had accuſed him. Hereupon Pilate, after he had remained ten years in Jewry, repaired to Rome, having no means to contradict that Command that Vitellius had given him. But before he arrived there, Tiberius was dead.

N

Vitellius reſtoreth the High Prieſt's Veſtments to the Jews, to keep as they did formerly: He treateth in Tiberius's behalf, with Artobanus King of the Parthians: The cauſe of his hatred againſt Herod the Tetrarch. Philip, Tetrarch of Trachonitis, of Gaulanitis, and of Bathanæa, dieth without Children; his Dominions are reunited to Syria.

As ſoon as Vitellius came into Judæa, he went up to Jeruſalem, and celebrated there the Feaſt of the Paſſover; and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgave the Citizens all the Tribute of thoſe Fruits which were ſold. He delivered them alſo the Ornaments of the High Prieſts, with all the O reſt of the Prieſtly Furniture within the Temple, committing the charge thereof unto the Prieſts, according as in times paſt they had the ſame. But at that time they were

A were laid up in the Caſtle of Antonia, for this cauſe which followeth: Hircanus the High Prieſt, the firſt of that name, having builded a Tower near unto the Temple, did for the moſt part make his Reſidence therein, and there kept his Veſtments that were committed to his charge, the rather for that he only had the Authority to put them on, and return them into their place at ſuch time as he came down into the City, and put on his accuſtomed Raiment. His Succeſſors did the ſame, till Herod being exalted to the Kingdom; and ſeeing this Tower to be ſtrongly ſituated, builded the ſame moſt magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Antony his great friend. And having found theſe Veſtments in the place, he retained them with him, aſſuring himſelf, the people would attempt nothing againſt him. Archelaus his Son, and Succeſſor B in the Kingdom, kept the ſame courſe that Herod had done. But after that the Romans had obtained the Sovereignty thereof, they kept the High Prieſt's Ornaments in their hands, and reſerved them in a place builded for that purpoſe, under the Seal of the Prieſts; and the Governour of thoſe that kept the Sacred Treaſure, lighted the Lamp every day in that place: Every ſeventh day before the Feaſt, the Governour delivered them into the HighPrieſt's hands; and after they were purified, he put them on to do Divine Service, and the next day after the Feaſt he returned them again to the ſame place where they were kept before; which cuſtom was obſerved thrice every year, in the time of a Faſt. But Vitellius returned thoſe Ornaments into the hands of the Prieſts, according to the ancient Orders; leaving them to be uſed when need required; commanding the C Governour, to trouble himſelf no more about the place where they ſhould be kept.
After he had done this favour to the Nation of the Jews, he depoſed the High Prieſt, Joſeph, ſirnamed Caiaphas; and advanced Jonathan, the Son of Ananus, to that Dignity, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

The year of the World, 3999. after Chriſt's Nativity. 37.

Vitellius advanced Jonathan the Son of Ananus to the Prieſthood, and degradeth Joſeph ſirnamed Caiaphas.

At that time he received Letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a Friendſhip with Artabanus, the King of the Parthians (whoſe hatred he ſuſpected and feared, leſt, ſeizing on Armenia, he ſhould work farther miſchief againſt the State of Rome) deſiring him to aſſure the League by Hoſtages, and namely, with Artabanus's Son. After Tiberius had written theſe Letters above mentioned unto Vitellius, he perſwaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great ſtore of D money, that with all expedition they ſhould make War againſt Artabanus: But the Iberians would not be drawn thereunto; yet they ſuffered the Alanes to march thorough their Countrey, and opened them their Gates of the Mount Caſpius, to give them paſſage to invade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the Countrey of the Parthians was invaded, whereby the chiefeſt among them were killed. The King's Son alſo was killed in thoſe Conflicts, with divers Thouſands of his Army. Moreover, Vitellius having ſent money to a Kinſman and Friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him, to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiving the Plot that was intended againſt him; and ſeeing that he could not eſcape, becauſe it was attempted by a great number of the beſt accounted Nobles within his E Court, ceaſed to paſs any further: And ſeeing himſelf moſt apparently environed, and thinking that under the colour of Friendſhip, he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himſelf into the Provinces of the higher Countrey, and there to ſave himſelf, rather than to put himſelf in hazard, and reſort unto them who had already betrayed and forſaken him. Arriving in that place he aſſembled a a great number of Soldiers of the Countreys of Danes and Swedes; and having fought againſt them who had oppoſed themſelves againſt him, he recovered his Kingdom.
When Tiberius had tidings hereof, he endeavoured to draw Artabanus into Friendſhip with him; which when Artabanus had notice of, he willingly admitted; ſo that Artabanus and Vitellius met together near Euphrates, and, by the means of a F Bridge that was builded upon the River, they debated the matter together; being each of them attended by their Guards. After that they had concluded the Peace, Herod the Tetrarch feaſted them in a very magnificent Pavilion, erected in the midſt of the River, with great coſt. And not long after, Vitellius ſent Darius, Artabanus's Son, in Hoſtage to Rome, with divers Preſents, amongſt which there was a man ſeven Cubits high, a Jew born, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Giant, by reaſon of his ſtature. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon. But Herod, deſirous to be the firſt that ſhould advertiſe Cæſar of the receipt of theſe Hoſtages, ſent an expreſs with Letters, by which he fully ſatisfied him of all that which had hapned, omitting nothing for the Conſul to acquaint him; ſo that after Vitellius's Letters G were brought unto him, and that Cæſar had already aſſured him of the true information that Herod had given him, Vitellius was much troubled: and ſuſpecting, leſt he had received a greater injury, than the matter made ſhew for; he conceived in his heart

At that time alſo Philip, Herod's Brother died, in the twentieth year of Tiberius's Reign, after he had reigned himſelf for the ſpace of ſeven and thirty years, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis and Bathanæa. During all the time of his Government, he behaved himſelf very peaceably; for he made his abode within his own Dominion. He walked, being accompanied with a ſmall number of his choſen ſervants, and had that ſeat carried after him, wherein he was accuſtomed to ſit and do juſtice; to the end, that if any one preſented himſelf, and required his aſſiſtance, he might, without delay, do him right. For upon the firſt motion, the ſeat was placed in that part wherein the Plaintiff met him; and being ſeated therein, he examined the cauſe, puniſhing thoſe that I were guilty, and abſolving the innocent. He died in Juliade, and was buried in the Sepulchre which he himſelf had cauſed to be built; and his Obſequies were performed with great Solemnity and Majeſty. And for that he left no Heirs Males behind him, Tiberius ſeized on his Eſtate, which he united to the Government of Syria; ordaining that the Tributes that were gained in his Tetrarchy, ſhould be kept within the bounds of the ſame Countrey.

A War between Aretas King of Petra, and Herod the Tetrarch; who having married his Daughter, would repudiate her, to marry Herodias, Ariſtobulus*'s Daughter, and his Brother* Herod*'s Wife.* Herod*'s Army is totally routed, and the Jews impute it to* John the Baptiſt's Impriſonment. Herod the Great's Poſterity.

MEan while Aretas, King of Arabia Petræa, and Herod, fell at ſtrife, the one with the other, for this cauſe that enſueth: Herod the Tetrarch married Aretas's Daughter, with whom he had lived married a very long time. Afterwards, taking his journey towards Rome, he lodged with Herod his half Brother by the L Father's ſide (for Herod was the Son of Simon's Daughter, which Simon was the High Prieſt) and there being ſurpriſed with the love of Herodias, his Brother's Wife, which was the Daughter of Ariſtobulus their Brother, and Siſter to the Great Agrippa; he was ſo bold as to propoſe Marriage to her, which was to be performed as ſoon as he returned back from Rome; and to repudiate Aretas's Daughter. After he had ratified thoſe Covenants, he continued his Voyage to Rome; from whence he no ſooner returned, and performed that for which he went, but his Wife (who had ſome privy notice of the Conventions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before he ſuſpected that ſhe knew thereof, required him to ſend her to the Caſtle of Macheron, which was the Frontier Town M betwixt Herod's and Aretas's Countreys; without acquainting him any ways with her intent. Herod condeſcended unto her requeſt, thinking ſhe was ignorant of his drift: But ſhe, long before that time, had taken order with the Governour of Macheron (which at that time was under her Father's Government) to prepare all things for her journey; where being arrived, ſhe ſpeedily poſted into Arabia, under the Convoy of thoſe Governours, who received and conducted her, the one after the other. As ſoon as ſhe arrived in her Father's Court, ſhe preſently acquainted him with Herod's reſolution; whence aroſe the beginning of this diſcord between them. Therefore they both of them aſſembled their Armies upon the Confines of the Countrey of Gamalite, and fought under the Conduct of the two Generals, to whom they had com- N mitted their Armies: In this Battel Herod's Army was wholly defeated, through the Treaſon that was plotted againſt him by certain baniſhed men of Philip's Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herod. Tiberius got notice of all this, by thoſe Letters which Herod had written unto him; and being very much diſpleaſed with Aretas, for his proud attempt, he commanded Vitellius to make War againſt him; deſiring him, that if he could take him alive, he ſhould ſend him bound unto him; but if dead, he ſhould ſend him his head.

Herod's Army diſcomfited by the Arabians. Tiberius commandeth Vitellius to make War againſt Aretas.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 10. alias, cap. 14.

Divers Jews were of the opinion, that Herod's Army was overthrown by the juſt vengeance of God, who puniſhed him moſt juſtly, because of the Execution which he O cauſed to be done on John ſirnamed Baptiſt: For he had put this man to death, who was endued with all Virtue, and who exhorted the Jews to addict themſelves thereto, and to practice Juſtice towards men, and Piety towards God; exhorting them to be baptized

A baptized; and telling them, that Baptiſm ſhould at that time be agreeable unto God, if they ſhould renounce not only their ſins, but if to the purity of their bodies, they ſhould add the cleanneſs of their Souls, re-purified by Juſtice. And whereas it came to paſs, that divers flocked and followed him to hear his Doctrine; Herod feared, leſt his Subjects allured by his Doctrine and Perſwaſions, ſhould be drawn to revolt. For it ſeemed that they would ſubſcribe in all things to his advice; he therefore thought it better to prevent a miſchief by putting him to death, than to expect ſome ſuddain Commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Upon this ſuſpicion, Herod cauſed him to be bound, and ſent to the Caſtle of Macheron, whereof we have ſpoken heretofore; and there he was put to death. The Jews were of opinion, that in revenge of B this ſo grievous a ſin, Herod's Army, againſt whom God was diſpleaſed, had been ſubject to their utter ruine and overthrow. But Vitellius being reſolved to make War againſt Aretas, gathered together two Legions, and all thoſe Horſe or Foot, that he could aſſemble amongſt thoſe Kings, who were the Romans Allies; and marching towards Petra, he ſtayed at Ptolemais, becauſe he pretended to paſs by Judæa. Which when the principal Nobles amongſt the Jews had notice of, they went out to meet him; beſeeching him that he would not paſs thorough that Countrey, becauſe it was a cuſtom amongſt them not to ſee any Images born, ſuch as he had of divers colours in his Army. Whereunto he condeſcended; and having changed his purpoſe, he cauſed his Army to march thorough the great Plain: As for himſelf, he came to Jeruſalem C accompanied with Herod the Tetrarch and his Friends, to offer Sacrifice to God upon the next Feſtival day; where he was moſt magnificently received by all the people of the Jews. He ſtayed for the ſpace of three days, during which time, he depoſed Jonathan from the High Prieſthood, and gave it to Theophilus his Brother. The fourth day Letters came to him, that advertiſed him of Tiberius's death; for which cauſe he commanded the Oath of Fidelity ſhould be miniſtred to the people, in the new Emperour Caius's behalf. He called back his Army alſo, and ſent them to their Winter Quarters; becauſe it was not lawful for him to proſecute the War, by reaſon the Empire was fallen unto Caius.

Caius Caligula ſucceedeth after Tiberius.

It is ſaid, that Aretas hearing news of Vitellius's Expedition or Voyage, and after he D had taken counſel of the Augurs, ſaid, that the Army ſhould not advance as far as Petra; becauſe he that had the command of the Expedition, or he that obeyed his Ordinance in conducting the ſame, or he againſt whom the Army was conducted, ſhould die. Vitellius therefore, retired to Antioch. A year before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa, Ariſtobulus's Son, came to Rome, to treat with the Emperour about certain Affairs. But before I ſpeak any thing hereof, I will relate Herod's Progeny, both for that it is pertinent to this preſent Narration, and alſo, that the greatneſs of God's Providence may appear; to the end that a man may know, that neither the number of Children, nor any other humane force whatſoever it be, can be available without the fear of God; conſidering that within the ſpace of one hundred years, or ſome- E what leſs, it fell out, that all Herod's Line, which was very populous and fruitful, was extinguiſhed, a very few excepted. Whereby we are given to underſtand what the miſery of Mankind is, and learn to moderate our ſelves. It is alſo expedient to ſpeak ſomething of Agrippa; who, amongſt all other, deſerveth admiration; that being a man wholly in Obſcurity, and baſe in Birth, he was exalted to ſuch greatneſs, as no one of thoſe that knew him, would ever have thought his Fortune ſhould have ſuch ſucceſs and power. And although heretofore I have ſpoken ſomewhat of this matter, yet it is requiſite that I ſpeak ſomething more expreſly thereof in this place. Herod the Great had two Daughters born by by Mariamne, Hircanus's Daughter: The one of them which was called Salampſo, was married by Herod to Phaſælus, the Son of F Phaſælus, Herod's Brother: The other called Cypros, was married to Antipater her Couſin, who was Salome's Son, who was Herod's Siſter. Phaſælus had five Children by Salampſo; three Sons, Antipater, Herod and Alexander; and two Daughters, Alexandria and Cypros, whom Agrippa the Son of Ariſtobulus married; and Alexandria was married to Timæus of Cyprus, who was a man of great dignity, and with whom ſhe died without Iſſue. Cypros had by Agrippa her Huſband, two Sons, and three Daughters; Bernice, Mariamne and Druſilla; their two Sons were called Agrippa and Druſus: Druſus died very young; but Agrippa was Brought up by his Grandfather amongſt his other Brethren, Herod, Ariſtobulus and Bernice. Theſe were Herod's Children, Son unto him who was ſurnamed the Great: Bernice was Coſtobarus's Daughter, begotten G on Salome, Herod's Siſter: Ariſtobulus died, leaving his Children under age, under his Father's charge, with Alexander his Brother, as we have already related. Theſe attaining their full age, were thus married; Herod, Brother to Agrippa, was matched with Aretas gathereth by Auguries, that it was impoſſible for the Army to come to Petra.

Mariamne, Olympias's Daughter, who was Herod the Great his Daughter, and of Joſeph, Herod's Brother; by her he had his Son Ariſtobulus: Ariſtobulus, Agrippa's third H Brother married Jotape, the Daughter of Sampſigeram, King of the Emeſenians: They had a Daughter which likewiſe was called Jotape, which was deaf. Theſe were the Children begotten by Herod's three Sons. But Herodias their Siſter married Herod, the Son of Herod the Great, whom he begot on Mariamne, the Daughter of Simon the High Prieſt, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias, in contempt of the Laws of the Countrey, married her ſelf with Herod, her Huſband's Brother, begotten of the ſame Father, being ſeparated from him during his life time, who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His Daughter Salome was married to Philip, the Tetrarch of Trachonitis, Herod's Son: Who dying without Children, Ariſtobulus married her, who was I Herod's Son, and Agrippa's Brother: They had three Sons, Herod, Agrippa and Ariſtobulus. See here the Poſterity of Phaſelus and Salampſon. Antipater, by Cypros, had a Daughter that likewiſe was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius, the Son of Alexas; of whom he begat a Daughter called likewiſe Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I ſaid) were Antipater's Brothers, they died without Iſſue. Alexander, Herod's Son, who was killed by his Father, begat Alexander and Tigranes on the Daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia: Tigranes being King of Armenia, died without Iſſue, after he had been accuſed at Rome: Alexander had a Son called Tigranes, after his Brother's name, who was ſent by Nero, to reign in Armenia, who had a Son called Alexander, who married Jotape, the Daughter of Antiochus, King of Comagena: K This Alexander, by Veſpaſian, was elected King in Leſis, a City of Cilicia. As ſoon as Alexander's Poſterity began to multiply, they fell from their Countrey-Religion, to follow the cuſtoms of the Greeks. All the reſt of King Herod's Daughters died without Iſſue. Having after this manner reckoned up Herod's Poſterity, which continued until ſuch time that Agrippa the Great began to reign: It remaineth at this time to declare what adventures befel this Agrippa; and how he eſcaping his dangers, obtained at laſt ſo great Power ad Dignity.

CHAP. VIII. L

By what ſeveral Accidents of Fortune, Agrippa, ſurnamed the Great, who was Ariſtobulus*'s Son, and* Herod the Great's Grand-child and Mariamne*'s, was made King of the Jews by the Emperour* Caius Caligula, as ſoon as he had ſucceeded Tyberius.

Agrippa living at Rome, through his laviſh Liberality groweth into Neceſſity.

SOme little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa was gone to Rome; where he came very well acquainted with Druſus, Tyberius the Emperour's Son; and was beloved of Antonia, the Wife of Druſus the Elder, by the means of his Mother Bernice, whom Antonia held in great eſteem, and to whom ſhe had recommended M her Son. And whereas by nature he was of a liberal and generous ſpirit, as long as his Mother lived, he would not diſcover his inclination, leſt he ſhould provoke her diſpleaſure againſt him. But immediately after Bernice was dead, and he became his own Maſter, partly by his daily and bountiful entertainment and living, partly by his immoderate Liberalities, but eſpecially by his laviſh Prodigality towards Cæſar's Free-men, whoſe favour he hunted after, he was brought into extream Poverty, and could no more live at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius having loſt his Son, forbad his friends to come into his ſight, leſt their preſence ſhould refreſh and encreaſe the ſorrow he conceived for the loſs of his Son. For theſe cauſes he returned back into Judæa, having but badly ordered his Affairs, ſpent his money, and left himſelf no means to ſatiſ- N fie his importunate and many Creditors: For which cauſe, uncertain how to diſpoſe of himſelf, and aſhamed of his preſent eſtate, he withdrew himſelf into a Caſtle called Malatha in Idumæa, to paſs away obſcurely and miſerably the reſt of his time. Which purpoſe of his, when Cypros his Wife perceived, ſhe endeavoured by all means to prevent his reſolution: She wrote to Herodias his Siſter, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, acquainted her both what Agrippa had decreed, as alſo by what neceſſity he was enforced thereunto; and ſhe exhorted her, that in regard of affinity ſhe would aſſiſt him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, relieved his miſery, although her Fortunes were far weaker than hers. Being therefore ſent for by his Siſter and Wife, he was commanded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certain Summ of Money O aſſigned him for his maintenance; and for his greater honour, was appointed Magiſtrate of that City. Yet Herod did not continue long time in that mind, although by the means means he had given him, he had not ſatisfied his Kinſman's neceſſities. For being in the City of Tyre in a certain company, where he drank immoderately, Agrippa eſteemed it for an extream injury, that Herod had upbraided him with his poverty, and hit him in the teeth, that he maintained him at his charge. For which cauſe he withdrew himſelf to Flaccus, who had been ſometimes Conſul at Rome, and for the preſent was Preſident of Syria, with whom he had been very familiar at Rome: Flaccus received him very kindly, and had alſo done the like a good while before to Ariſtobulus, Agrippa's Brother, who were both at variance between themſelves; yet, notwithſtanding this Diſſention between them, Flaccus entertained them both with equal favour. But Ariſtobulus remitted nothing of his hatred he bare his Brother, and never reſted till he had drawn Flaccus into diſlike with his Brother, upon this occaſion: The Inhabitants of Damaſco, contending with the Sidonians about their limits, and being to debate their cauſe before Flaccus; knowing what intereſt Agrippa had in him, they beſought him that he would further their Cauſe, promiſing him a great Summ of money: whereupon he addreſſed himſelf in what he could, to further thoſe of Damaſco. But Ariſtobulus, who had an inkling of this concluſion and promiſe, accuſed his Brother to Flaccus; and after enquiry was made, and he found guilty of the Fact, Agrippa grew out of the Preſidents favour; and falling again into extream poverty, he came to Ptolemais; and having no way to ſubſiſt, he reſolved to go into Italy. And ſeeing he wanted Money, he commanded Marſyas his Free-man, that by all means whatſoever, he ſhould ſeek to take up Money upon Intereſt. He ſpake unto Protus (who was Agrippa's Mother's Free-man, who, by the Teſtament of his deceaſed Miſtreſs, was left unto Antonius's protection) that upon his Maſter's Bill and Promiſe, he would lend him ſome Money. But he alledging that Agrippa before that time owed him money, extorted from Marſyas a Bill of his hand for twenty thouſand Attick Drachmes; deducting out of that Summ two thouſand and five hundred, which Marſyas took for himſelf; which he might the more eaſily do, for that Agrippa could not otherwiſe chuſe. Having therefore received this money, he went to Anthedon, where getting Shipping, he prepared himſelf for the journey.

But when Herennius Capito, who was Treaſurer of Jamnia, underſtood of his being there, he ſent his Souldiers to him, to exact three hundred thouſand ſilver Drachmes at his hands, for which he ſtood indebted to Cæſar's Treaſurer, during his being at Rome; by which means he was enforced to ſtay. Whereupon he made a ſhew that he would obey their demand; but as ſoon as it was night, he cauſed the Cables of the Ship to be cut, and caſt off, and ſailed to Alexandria; there he requeſted Alexander Alabarcha, to lend him two hundred thouſand Drachmes in Silver; he proteſted that he would truſt him with nothing: But admiring Cypros, his Wife's conſtant love toward her Huſband, and her many other Virtues; he, upon her promiſe, condeſcended to do him a kindneſs: Whereupon, in preſent money he payed him five Talents in Alexandria, and promiſed to deliver him the reſt of the money at Puteol, fearing Agrippa's unthriftineſs. Thus Cypros having furniſhed her Huſband for his Journey into Italy, returned her ſelf and her Children into Judæa by Land. But Agrippa, as ſoon as he arrived at Puteol, wrote unto Tiberius Cæſar, who lived in Capreas, ſignifying unto him that he came to do his duty; beſeeching him that he would grant him free and favourable acceſs. Tiberius, with all expedition, returned him a very kind anſwer; aſſuring him, that he would be very glad to ſee him ſafely arrived in Capreas. In a word, as ſoon as he was arrived, Cæſar expreſſed and made it known, that his affection was anſwerable to his Letters; and both embraced him, and lodged him. The next day Cæſar received Letters from Herennius Capito, who advertiſed him that Agrippa owed three hundred thouſand Drachmes of Silver, which he borrowed, and payed not at the time prefixed; and that when the appointed time of payment was come, he was fled out of the Countrey, and by this occaſion he had deprived him of the means to conſtrain him to make ſatisfaction. When Cæſar had read theſe Letters, he was highly diſpleaſed, and commanded thoſe of hi[illegible]mber that they ſhould not admit Agrippa to his preſence, until ſuch time as he had diſcharged that debt.

But he, nothing daunted at Cæſar's diſpleaſure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius's Mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the ſumm of three hundred thouſand Drachmes, to the end he might not loſe Cæſar's friendſhip. Who remembring her Bernice, Agrippa's Mother, and with what familiarity they had converſed together, and how Agrippa likewiſe had been brought up with Claudius her Son, lent him that money: Whereupon, he paying the debt, without any contradiction, enjoyed the Princes favour; and was ſo reconciled to Cæſar, that he committed his Nephew to Agrippa's charge; commanding him to attend him always, whitherſoever he went.

Being by this benefit bound and tied to Antonia, he began to reverence her Nephew H Caius, who was gracious in all mens eyes, and honoured in memory of his Parents. At that time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritan, Cæſar's Free-man, of whom he borrowed ten hundred thouſand Drachmes of Silver; and payed Antonia her due, and kept the reſt, the more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with moſt inward familiarity, it happened one day, that riding in the ſame Coach with him, Agrippa wiſht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might ſhortly ſurrender the Kingdom and Empire unto Caius, who was each way more worthy than he. Theſe words of his were overheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippa's Free-man, who for the time, ſpoke not a word thereof. But being afterwards accuſed for ſtealing Agrippa's garment (as he indeed had done) and brought I back again, after he had fled away to Piſo (who was the Governour of the City) he asked him why he fled; who anſwered, that he had certain ſecrets which he deſired to reveal unto Cæſar, that appertained to his profit and ſafety; for which cauſe he was ſent by him in Bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatory manner, wherein no King or Tyrant ever equalled him, held him Priſoner. For neither did he preſently admit any Ambaſſadours, neither ſent he Succeſſors to thoſe, who were Governours of his Provinces, when the former were dead; and was no leſs negligent in yielding audience to his Priſoners. But when his friends at any time queſtioned him, why he uſed theſe accuſtomed delays; he anſwered them, that he deferred the Ambaſſadours after that manner, leſt, if he ſhould ſuddenly diſpatch them, they ſhould inſtantly re- K turn with new, whereby it ſhould come to paſs, that he ſhould be continually troubled in entertaining and diſmiſſing them.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. Eutychus, Agrippa's Free-man bethinks him to accuſe Agrippa to the Emperour.

For what cauſe Tiberius changed not his Governors

And as for his Offices, he left them in their hands to whom he had committed them, in regard of his Subjects welfare. For naturally all Magiſtracy is ſubject to Avarice; but eſpecially ſtrangers induce thoſe who exerciſe the ſame, to gather and ingroſs the more eagerly, when as the time of their Authority is ſhort, and of ſmall aſſurance; whereas, if they ſhould continue in the ſame for a long time, in regard of the gain they had made, and the much profit they had raiſed, they would be afterwards leſs greedy to extort further. Now, if he ſhould ſend others to ſucceed them on a ſudden, it were impoſſible for him to content them, notwithſtanding their many Bribes: whereas, in L giving them time to fill their purſes, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious deſire of Lucre which they affected before. And to this purpoſe, he told them an example of a poor man that was a Lazar, to whoſe wounds a great number of Flies aſſembled themſelves, and covered the ſame; at ſight whereof, ſome by fortune arriving there, and having compaſſion of his miſery, and ſuppoſing that the cauſe why he repulſed them not, proceeded from his diſability, approached near to help him, but he prayed them to let him alone. Whereupon, they demanding the cauſe wherefore he that was hurt, refuſed to be delivered from ſo irkſome an evil; he anſwered them, for that they ſhould do him more wrong, if thoſe flies were driven away; for that being already full of blood, they prick me not, (ſaid he) neither ſuck me ſo earneſtly, M but give me ſome eaſe, whereas if new ſhould light on my wound which were hungry, and ſhould ſeize my fleſh in that deſperate eſtate that I am, they would procure my death. For theſe cauſes he ſaid; that ſeeing his Subjects already conſumed by ſo many exactions, he thought it a good policy in him, and a better proviſion for them, not to ſend them new Governours continually, who might, after the manner of flies, ſuck them to the quick; eſpecially, if to their innate covetouſneſs, he ſhould add the fear of their ſudden diſplacing. Now, to prove that to be true, which I have declared of Tiberius's diſpoſition, this action of his may ſuffice to juſtifie me: For having been Emperour for the ſpace of twenty two years, all thoſe Governours which he ſent into Jewry were two, namely Gratus, and Pilat his Succeſſor; neither carried he himſelf otherwiſe towards N the reſt of his Subjects of the Empire.

Why Cæſar would not give Audience to his Priſoners.

Agrippa ſollıciteth Antonia to bring Eutichus to his Anſwer.

Antonia very much honoured by Tiberius.

Antonia diſcovereth Sejanus's Conſpiracy to Cæſar.

And as for his Priſoners, the reaſon why he delayed ſo much to give them Audience, was, to the end that they who had been condemned to death, ſhould not ſpeedily be delivered from thoſe torments, wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deſerved by their wickedneſs. For whilſt he kept them in that pain, their miſery encreaſed the more. For this cauſe Eutychus could not obtain Audience at his hands, but was a long time detained Priſoner. Afterwards, in proceſs of time, Tiberius tranſported himſelf from Capreas, to Tuſculanum, which was diſtant from Rome ſome hundred Furlongs: There did Agrippa ſollicite Anto nia, to cauſe Eutychus to be called to his anſwer, concerning the accuſation which he pretended againſt him. Now, O Antonia was in great favour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was between them (in that ſhe was Druſus's Wife, who was Tiberius's Brother) as in reſpect of her

A her Modeſty. For ſhe being young, continued in her Widowhood, and would not Marry with any other, notwithſtanding Auguſtus importuned her to wed; but lived always in honour, without blame. Beſides that, ſhe had done Tiberius a great pleaſure; for at ſuch time as Sejanus his Friend, and a man of great account in thoſe days (by reaſon he had the Government of the Army) practiſed a Conſpiracy againſt him; whereunto divers of the Senate, and of his Free-men, and of his Souldiers likewiſe, were acceſſary: yet, ſhe brought all their intents to nothing. This Attempt had taken a great head, and Sejanus had finiſhed his purpoſe, had not Antonia uſed more adviſed courage, than Sejanus did in executing his Treaſon. For having diſcovered the danger that threatned Tiberius, ſhe wrote, and ſent her expreſs Letters by Pallas, one of B her truſty Servants, unto him to Capreas, to aſſure him in particular of the whole Contrivance of the Conſpiracy. Cæſar having true underſtanding thereof, cauſed Sejanus and his Confederates to be executed. Therefore, though before that time he honoured Antonia greatly, yet he did afterwards honour her far more, ſo that he truſted her in all things. When therefore, ſhe entreated him to give Eutychus Audience; Tiberius anſwered, If, ſaid he, Eutychus hath falſly objected any thing againſt Agrippa, it ſufficeth that he endure that Puniſhment that I have enjoyned him: But if in the Torture he maintain that which he hath ſpoken to be true, it is to be feared leſt Agrippa, intending to puniſh his Free-man, do rather heap the Puniſhment upon his own head. When Antonia had reported this anſwer of his to Agrippa, he did the more inſtantly ſollicite her, requiring her C that the matter might be brought to tryal: And for that Agrippa ceaſed not to importune her, Antonia took the occaſion, which was this: Tiberius being after Dinner time carried in his Litter, and having Caius and Agrippa before him, ſhe walking by the Litter, beſought him to call Eutychus to his Tryal: Whereunto he replyed; The Gods (ſaid he) know, that that which I do, I do it not of mine own will, but for the neceſſity I am preſſed with upon your requeſt: And having ſpoken thus, he commanded Macron, Sejanus's Succeſſor, to bring Eutychus before him; which was performed with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to ſay againſt him, who had made a Free-man of him? My Sovereign (ſaid he) Caius that is here preſent, and Agrippa rode one day together in the ſame Coach, and I ſat at their feet; after divers diſcourſes D held between them, Agrippa began to ſpeak after this manner unto Caius; O, ſaid he, would God the day were come, wherein the old man, departing out of this world, would make you Governour thereof: For his Son Tiberius would be no hindrance unto you, for you might diſpatch him: Then ſhould the World be happy, and I likewiſe have my ſhare in the Felicity. Tiberius eſteeming this his Accuſation to be true, and having of long time conceived a grudge againſt Agrippa, for that notwithſtanding he had commanded him to honour Tiberius, who was his Nephew, and Druſus's Son; Agrippa had given ſmall regard to his Commandment, and had not honoured him, but was wholly addicted unto Caius. For which cauſe he ſaid to Macron, bind me this fellow. He ſcarcely underſtanding that which he ſpake, and no ways ſuſpecting that he ſhould give that Command againſt Agrippa, deferred the performance, until ſuch time as he might more exactly E underſtand his mind. When therefore Cæſar turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance, met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (ſaid he) Macron, whom I have commanded to be bound: And demanding of him once more, of whom he ſpake; It is Agrippa, ſaid he. Then had Agrippa recourſe to ſubmiſſive and humble Prayers, refreſhing the memory of his Son, with whom he had been brought up; alledging the education he had uſed towards his Nephew Tiberius: but he prevailed nothing, but was led away bound in thoſe Purple Ornaments which he then wore.

Agrippa urgeth Eutychus trial, and for certain ſpeeches he is caſt into Bonds.

Thaumaſtus Caius's Servant giveth Agrippa drink, whom he promiſeth to procure his Freedom.

At that time it was very hot weather, and he was extreamly thirſty: Whereupon, eſpying Thaumaſtus one of Caius's Servants, who carried Water in a Pitcher, he requir F ed him to give him drink; which, when he had willingly beſtowed on him, he drank, and afterwards ſaid unto him, This ſervice thou haſt done me in giving me drink, ſhall do thee good one day: For as ſoon as I eſcape out of theſe Bonds, it ſhall not be long before I obtain thy liberty at Caius*'s hands, for that thou haſt not neglected to do me ſervice in this my Impriſonment, more than whilſt I was in my Proſperity.* Neither deceived he the man's expectation of his promiſe, but rewarded and gratified him: For afterwards, when he had obtained the Kingdom, he begged Thaumaſtus's liberty at Caius's hands, and made him his Steward; and after his deceaſe, he gave order that he ſhould ſerve in the ſame place, with his Son Agrippa, and his Daughter Bernice; ſo that he died very old, and much honoured. But this happened afterward. But at that time Agrippa ſtood before G the place bound with other Companions, who likewiſe were in Bonds; and through the grief he conceived, he leaned againſt a certain Tree, on which there ſat an Owl. One of thoſe Priſoners, who was by Nation a German, beholding that Bird, asked the Souldier that was fettered with him, who he was that was apparelled in Purple; and H underſtanding that his name was Agrippa, and that he was a Jew, and one of the Nobility of that Nation, he deſired the Soldier, who, to the end to guard him, was chained with him, to ſuffer him to draw near unto Agrippa, and to have a little conference with him, for that he had a great deſire to ask him certain things concerning the Cuſtoms of his Countrey. Which when he had obtained, and having got near him, he told him by an Interpreter of that which followeth: Young man (ſaid he) the ſudden change that hath befallen thee at this preſent, afflicteth and oppreſſeth thee with great and grievous Torment, neither wilt thou eaſily believe that thou ſhalt eſcape from thy miſery; yet ſo doth the Divine Providence diſpoſe of all things, that thou ſhalt ſhortly be delivered. Know therefore, and I ſwear unto thee by the Gods, both thoſe of mine Anceſtors, and thoſe alſo, who have reſidence and preſidence in this place, and who have procured us this Iron Chain, that I I will tell thee all; not to yield thee pleaſure by my vain diſcourſe, or to entertain thee with fruitleſs Conſolation; knowing well, that when theſe Predictions ſhall happen to fail, they will breed thee more ſorrow, than if thou hadſt never heard of them. But I have thought it good, yea, although it were with mine own danger, to declare unto thee the Predictions of the Gods. It cannot otherwiſe be, but that ſhortly thou ſhalt be delivered from theſe Bonds, and ſhalt be advanced to great honour and power; ſo that thoſe, who at this day have compaſſion on thy Calamity, ſhall envy thy Glory; and thou ſhalt depart this life in great felicity, and ſhalt leave thy Children mighty Poſſeſſions. But bear this in thy remembrance, that when thou ſhalt ſee this Bird once more, thou muſt needs die within five days after. Theſe are thoſe things which the Gods think meet to foretell thee by this Bird. As for my ſelf, I K have ſuppoſed I ſhould do thee wrong, if I ſhould conceal this Prediction from thee, having the fore-knowledg thereof. I have therefore thought good to impart this joy unto thee; whereby, thorough hope of thy future profit, thou mayeſt more eaſily endure thy preſent misfortune: for which cauſe I beſeech thee, that as ſoon as thou ſhalt be partaker of this thy felicity, thou wilt endeavour thy ſelf to deliver us alſo from theſe Adverſities.

Agrippa lived ſix months in Priſon.

Tiberius falleth ſick, and ſendeth for his Sons.

Tiberius Gemellus, the Son of Druſus. Caius the Gracious, Germanicus's Son.

This Preſage of the German's ſeemed as ridiculous to Agrippa, as admirable afterwards. But Antonia being ſore grieved at the young man's Calamity, thought it not only a difficult matter for her to entreat Tiberius for him, but altogether unprofitable, in regard ſhe ſhould be repulſed; yet, ſhe prevailed ſo much with Macron, that he was L committed to the cuſtody of ſuch Soldiers, who were of a more mild behaviour, and had a Centurion appointed to keep him, that ſuffered him to uſe his daily Bathings, and gave his Friends and Servants leave to viſit him, by whoſe ſervice and kindneſs, his neceſſities might be relieved. His Friend Silas alſo, was admitted to ſpeak with him; and amongſt his Free-men, Marſyas and Stichus, who brought him in ſuch meats as he was delighted withal, and Coverings under colour to ſell them; which, by the permiſſion of the Soldiers, who had no leſs direction from Macron, they ſpread by night for him to take his reſt upon. See here the eſtate wherein Agrippa lived in Priſon for the ſpace of ſix Months. But Tiberius being returned to Capreas, began at firſt to be attainted with a certain lingring diſeaſe; and for that his Sickneſs encreaſed more and M more, he began to conceive a ſiniſter hope of himſelf; and commanded Euodus, whom he moſt honoured amongſt all his Free-men, to bring him his Sons, becauſe he intended to talk with them before he died. But the truth is, that he had not any Children of his own, but had adopted them: For Druſus, who was his only Child, was already dead, and had left behind him a Son called Tiberius, ſirnamed Gemellus. He had Caius alſo, his Brother Germanicus's Son; who was in the flower of his Age, and had been very well bred. To him alſo the people aſcribed very much, in remembrance of the Virtue of his deceaſed Father; and as for himſelf, he was of a ſweet converſation, and ſo modeſt, that he was familiar and affable to all men. Whereby it came to paſs, that not only the people, but the Senate alſo, held him in great eſtimation; as alſo all the N Subjects in every ſeveral Province: For they that ſpake with him, were drawn, partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they ſaw in him; ſo that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitly lamenting his loſs, but with unfeigned ſorrow; for that there was not any one, that ſuppoſed not his death to be every man's particular loſs. He therefore demeaned himſelf ſo modeſtly towards all men, that his Son after his death, was highly advanced thereby: For, amongſt the reſt, the Soldiers made their reckoning, that although it ſhould coſt them their lives, to get him the Empire, they would not refuſe the hazard.

After that Tiberius had charged Euodus, to bring him the two young men the next morrow, by break of day; he beſought the Gods of that place, to give him an evident O ſign, whereby he might know who ſhould ſucceed him: For although he deſired to leave the Empire to his Grand-child, yet he made more account of that which God ſhould

A ſhould make manifeſt unto him. Therefore he conceived a preſage, that he, who the next day ſhould enter firſt to ſalute him, it ſhould be he, who in the Empire ſhould neceſſarily ſucceed him. And having ſetled this thing in his fanſie, he ſent unto his little Son's Maſter, charging him to bring him unto him by break of day, ſuppoſing that God had ordained that the Empire ſhould be his; but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, he commanded Euodus, that as ſoon as he could, in the morning, he ſhould ſuffer him, of the two young Princes, to enter in unto him, who ſhould arrive the firſt. He walking out, met with Caius before the Chamber door (for Tiberius was not there; who being ignorant of that which his Grand-father thought, was buſie about his Breakfaſt) and ſaid unto him, that the Emperour his Father B called for him; and withal, ſuffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, he ſuddenly began to conſider the Power of God, who deprived him of the means to diſpoſe of the Empire, according as he had determined with himſelf, for that it lay not in his power; and he lamented greatly, not ſo much for that he ſaw his deſign could not be brought to effect, as that his Son Tiberius was in danger of his life; ſeeing that in all appearance, Caius would be Maſter; who being ſo near a Relation, would prove the more dangerous to young Tiberius, becauſe Sovereignty deſireth no ſharer: And Caius would be always jealous, and never think himſelf ſure, ſo long as young Tiberius was alive. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Aſtrological Predictions; ſo that the greater part of thoſe things which he executed all his life time, was ordered C thereby.

Tiberius addicted to the Mathematicks

He ſeeing Galba one day coming towards him, ſpoke this of him to his Familiars, Behold the man that ſhall be one day honoured with the Roman Empire. And amongſt all the Emperours, he gave greateſt credit to Divination, for that in certain things, he had found the Conjectures correſpondent to truth. But at that time he was grievouſly diſquieted by reaſon of the misfortune that had happened; yea, he was ſo grieved, as if his Grand-child had been already loſt; and he blamed himſelf, becauſe he had ſought theſe Preſages; for that he might have died, without falling into that diſaſter, in being ignorant of that which was to come; whereas, now he ſhould die in the knowledge of their miſ-fortunes, whom he loved moſt entirely. Being thus troubled D to ſee that the Sovereignty of the Empire ſhould, contrary to his intention, fall into their hands, who by his will ſhould not enjoy the ſame; although it were with hearts grief, and contrary to his will, yet he ſpake to Caius after this manner which enſueth: My Son, although Tiberius be more nearly allied unto me, than you are; yet, notwithſtanding, both by mine own advice, as alſo by the will of the Immortal Gods, I commit unto your hands the Empire of the Romans: I require you therefore, that when you ſhall enjoy the ſame, you forget not the good will I have born towards you, who have eſtabliſhed you in ſo high and worthy a dignity; and I charge you likewiſe, that you forget not your Couſin Tiberius;
but knowing that, by the will of the Gods, I am he, who after them, am the Author of ſo much happineſs which hath befallen you, you return me the like good will and affection: E And that you likewiſe take care of Tiberius, by reaſon of your mutual relation; for you ought to know, that Tiberius *ſerveth you for a Bulwark to maintain your Empire, and your own life; and if he die, it will be the beginning of your miſ-fortune. For it is a dangerous matter for thoſe who are raiſed to high Dignities, to be ſole, and without Allies.
Moreover, the Gods do never leave them unpuniſhed, who attempt and act any thing againſt the Laws of Conſanguinity.* Theſe were the laſt words which Tiberius ſpake to Caius; who promiſed him to perform all that which he required, notwithſtanding he meant nothing leſs: For immediately after he was enſtalled in the Empire, he cauſed Tiberius to be killed, according to his Grand-father's Predictions; as alſo the ſame Caius died ſoon after by a Conſpiracy that was practiſed againſt him. When that Tiberius F had declared Caius his Succeſſor in the Empire, he lived not many days after, and died after he had governed twenty years, five months, and three days. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

The Romans having intelligence of Tiberius's death, greatly rejoyced at the good yet they feared, leſt the news ſhould be falſe; and leſt, if they ſhewed themſelves too diligent in expreſſing their ſigns of joy, they ſhould afterwards be accuſed for it, and loſe their lives thereby. For Tiberius had done much miſchief to the Noble Families in Rome, being of himſelf a cholerick man, implacable towards all men without any occaſion; having a natural inclination ſo cruel, that the eaſieſt pain whereunto he adjudged G those whom he condemned, was death. Notwithſtanding therefore, that every man took pleaſure to hear the news, yet did all conceal it, until ſuch time as they might be more fully aſſured, through the fear of thoſe miſeries they foreſaw, if the matter ſhould fall out otherways. But Marſyas, Agrippa's Free-man, having certain H notice of Tiberius's death, ran ſpeedily to comfort his Maſter Agrippa, with theſe good news; and meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a ſign unto him, and told him in the Hebrew Tongue, the Lyon was dead: Agrippa conceiving that which he meant, was raviſhed with joy, and ſaid unto him; I will requite thee for all thoſe benefits I have received at thy hands, and eſpecially for this good news, provided that it prove true. The Centurion who had the keeping of Agrippa, conſidering what expedition Marſyas had uſed in running, and the pleaſure that Agrippa had conceived in his report, he began to ſuſpect ſome alteration, and asked him what had happened; and whereas he delayed to give him an anſwer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainly what he had heard, in that he had grown already inti- I mately familiar with him. The Centurion rejoyced at this news, as well as Agrippa, hoping to ſpeed the better thereby, and made Agrippa good cheer: But whilſt they were in the midſt of their Banquetting, and drunk freely, there came one unto them, who told them that Tiberius was alive, and that within few days he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this news, for that he had committed a Capital crime in eating in the company of a Priſoner, upon the news of Cæſar's death, and by rejoycing with him; he drave Agrippa out of the place where he ſate, and reproachfully ſaid unto him; Thinkeſt thou (ſaid he) that I know not how falſely thou ſpreadeſt the rumour of Cæſar*'s death? yes, be aſſured thou ſhalt anſwer thy lie with the loſs of thy head.* This ſaid, he cauſed Agrippa to be bound, whom before-time he had ſuffered to go at K liberty; and ſhut him up in more cloſe Priſon, than he had been before: ſo that Agrippa was all that night long in this extream miſery. The next day the rumour was ſpread thorough the whole City, that confirmed Tiberius's death; and at that time, every one boldly proteſted it: There were ſome alſo, who offered Sacrifices for this cauſe: And there came Letters alſo from Caius, which were addreſſed to the Senate, by which he aſſured them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. He writ another alſo to Piſo, who had the Guard of the City, containing the like report; and beſides that, commanding him to transfer Agrippa from the company of thoſe Souldiers, by whom he was kept, to the ſame place where he was lodged before; ſo that from that time forwards, he grew confident. For although he was L as yet a Priſoner, yet lived he at his own diſcretion. Caius arriving in Rome, brought with him Tiberius's body, which he burned moſt magnificently, according to the cuſtom of the Countrey: And although he were very willing to ſet Agrippa at liberty the ſame day, yet he was diſſwaded from it by Antonia; not for any ill will ſhe bare the Priſoner, but in regard of Caius's honour; leſt thereby he ſhould ſhew himſelf to be glad of Tiberius's death, in ſetting him at liberty ſo ſpeedily, whom he had committed to Priſon. When, therefore, ſome few days were over, he ſent for him to his houſe, and cauſed his hair to be cut, and his garments changed; and that done, he ſet a Diadem upon his head, and made him King of Philip's Tetrarchy; to which he added Lyſanias's Tetrarchy; and changed his Chain of Iron, into a Chain of Gold of the ſame M weight; and ſent Marullus into Judæa, to govern there. The ſecond year of Caius's Reign, Agrippa asked leave to repair into Judæa, to diſpoſe of his Kingdom, purpoſing to return again when he had diſpatched thoſe Affairs. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Judæa, and was ſeen and ſaluted for a King, beyond all men's expectation; ſerving thereby for a moſt notable example unto men, to expreſs unto them how great the power of Deſtiny is in humane Affairs, conſidering the poor eſtate wherein he had been before, and the happineſs which he enjoyed at that time. Some termed him happy, in that he reſolutely followed his hopes; others could ſcarcely believe that he was thus advanced.

The rumour was ſpread in Rome, that Tiberius was alive.

A turned in great Honour and State. This alteration ſeemed unſufferable to her, eſpecially, to ſee him apparelled like a King, and environed with a great multitude of people, ſo that it was impoſſible for her to hide her grief; for which cauſe ſhe incited her Huſband, and perſwaded him to make a Voyage to Rome, and to purchaſe as much as he poſſeſſed. For, ſaid ſhe, I cannot endure to live, if Agrippa, Ariſtobulus's Son, condemned to die by the ſentence of his own Father (ſo poor and indigent, that to redreſs his neceſſities wherewith he was daily preſſed by his Creditors, he was conſtrained at laſt to flee to Rome) ſhould return with ſuch Titles of Honour; and that her Husband, who was a King's Son, and was called to the Kingdom by his Father, ſhould live obſcure, and paſs his life like a private man: Husband (ſaid ſhe) if heretofore it hath been no prejudice to thee, to live in leſs B Dignity than thy Father hath done; now at, leaſt, deſire that due honour which belongeth to thy Family; neither think it ſufferable to be inferiour to him, who in times paſt hath been maintained by thy Bounty: Neither ſuffer it to be thought (through thine own ſloth) that he in his neceſſity, had more induſtry to obtain an ample Fortune, than you amidſt your abundance; as if it redounded not to thy ſhame, to be thought inferiour to him at this time, who not long ſince, except by thy pity, had no means to live. Let us therefore haſtily repair to Rome, and neither ſpare Gold, Silver, or any other expence, for that it availeth us not ſo much to keep the ſame, as to employ it in the purchaſe of a Kingdom. But Herod diſſwaded her as much as he could, for he contented himſelf to live in quiet, and ſuſpected the Confuſion that was at Rome; which he endeavoured, as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias: C But the more negligent ſhe ſaw him, the more inſtantly ſhe incited him to ſeek out for the Kingdom; and never gave over, until ſhe had conformed him to her deſire; which ſhe forced him to, rather than obtained. Having therefore furniſhed himſelf after the moſt magnificent manner, and ſpared no coſt, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his Wife with him. Agrippa ſmelling their intent, and the preparation they made, he beſtirred himſelf too: And having notice that they were put to Sea, he ſent Fortunatus, one of his Free-men, to Rome, with Preſents to the Emperour, and Letters againſt Herod; with Commiſſion to acquaint Caius with every particular, according as the occaſion ſhould ſerve. He embarking himſelf after Herod, had a quick paſſage, and was only prevented by him, but for the ſpace that Herod preſented himſelf to Caius; for he preſently followed D him, and delivered his Letters. For they arrived at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a Village of Campania, diſtant from Puteol ſome five Stades, adorned with moſt Royal and ſumptuous Palaces; for that every Emperour enforced himſelf to exceed the honour of his Predeceſſor, by reaſon of the hot Baths that naturally iſſued out of the earth, ſerving both for the health of the body, and recreation of the ſpirits. Whileſt Caius talked with Herod, having viſited him firſt, he received Agrippa's Letters, containing Herod's Accuſations; for they accuſed him of a Conſpiracy plotted betwixt him and Sejanus, ſince the beginning of Tiberius's Empire: And how for the preſent he favoured Artabanus, King of the Parthians, to the prejudice of the Emperour Caius; of which the preparations Herod had ſtored up in his Arcenals, gave evident teſtimony, which were E ſufficient to arm ſeventy thouſand men. Caius was much moved with theſe informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him, touching his warlike preparation, was true: He unable to contradict the ſame in any thing, for fear he ſhould be convicted of falſhood: confeſſed no leſs. Whereupon Caius ſuppoſing the Accuſation of his revolt to be ſufficiently proved, deprived him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippa's Kingdom; beſtowing Herod's Subſtance alſo upon him. He baniſhed him likewiſe for ever, and confined him in the City of Lions, in France; and underſtanding that Herodias was Agrippa's Siſter, he gave her all that which in right appertained to her. And ſuppoſing that ſhe would not willingly accompany her Huſband in his calamity, he told her that he pardoned her for her Brother's ſake: But ſhe gave him this reply; F Mighty Emperour, you ſpeak magnificently, and as it well becometh ſo great a Majeſty; but there is a cauſe that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bounty which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I bear unto my Husband; whom if I ſhould forſake in his miſery, it would very ill beſeem me, in that I have been a partner with him in his felicity. Caius diſpleaſed with her reſolute anſwer, baniſhed her likewiſe with her Huſband, and gave her Eſtate alſo to Agrippa. God did after this manner puniſh Herodias, in regard of that envy which ſhe had conceived againſt her Brother; and plagued Herod, in that he had ſo eaſily liſtned to the fooliſh perſwaſions of a woman. But Caius governed the Empire the firſt and ſecond year of his Reign with great applauſe, behaving himſelf graciouſly towards all men, whereby he obtained the good liking of the Romans, and the favour of G his other Subjects: But in proceſs of time, the greatneſs of his Eſtate made him ſurpaſs the limits of humane condition, and challenge to himſelf the Title of Divinity, whereby he governed all things in contempt of God.

Herod with Herodias repair to Rome. Agrippa ſendeth Fortunatus with Letters and Preſents after him.

Baiæ are certain Baths in Campania, not far from Puteol.

Herod is perpetually baniſhed, and confined in Lions in France; and Agrippa is made Lord of his Lands and Goods: and Herodias deſpiſing Cæſar's bounty, accompanieth him in exile.

The Sedition of the Jews and Grecians, in the City of Alexandria.

WHereas there aroſe a Sedition betwixt the Jews and Grecians that inhabited Alexandria, three choſen Ambaſſadours on either ſide were ſent unto Caius: One of theſe Ambaſſadours of Alexandria was Appion, who accuſed the Jews of many failings; and amongſt other things, he alledged, that they made no account of honouring Cæſar: And that, whereas all other Subjects of the Roman Empire had erected Altars and Temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had received him as I a God; the Jews ſuppoſed it to be a diſhonour for them to honour his Statues, or ſwear by his name. After that Appion had urged many things, and inveighed grievouſly againſt the Jews; hoping that Caius would be provoked againſt them, as in all likelihood and appearance it ſhould have fallen out: Philo, the chiefeſt among the Ambaſſadours of the Jews, a man of great worth, and Brother to Alexander Alabarcha; being experienced in Philoſophy, addreſſed himſelf to anſwer thoſe Accuſations which were urged againſt the Jews; but Caius commanded him ſilence, and willed him inſtantly to withdraw himſelf; and was ſo diſpleaſed, that it appeared very manifeſtly, that he intended ſome cruel revenge againſt them. Whereupon Philo departed after he had been grievouſly threatned, and ſpake thus unto the Jews that flocked about him; K We muſt be of good courage, ſince Caius in words ſeemeth to be diſpleaſed with us; for in effect, he will arm God in our behalf, againſt himſelf.

Caius commands Petronius Governour of Syria, to compel the Jews by force of Arms, to receive his Statue in the Temple; but Petronius mollified by their Prayers, writeth to Caius in the Jews behalf. L alias, chap. 17. Cæſar ſendeth Petronius into Syria, and commandeth him in ſpight of the Jews, to plant his Statue in God's Temple. The Jews repair to Ptolemais, beſeeching him that he would not bring his Statue into the Holy City.

BUt Caius, being ſore diſpleaſed that the Jews only deſpiſed his Ordinances, ſent Petronius into Syria, to ſucceed Vitellius, charging him with a ſtrong Army to invade Judæa; and if they willingly admitted his Statue, that then he ſhould place it in the Temple of God; but if they denied it, then, that overcoming them by force, he ſhould compel them to condiſcend thereunto. As ſoon as Petronius came into Syria, he endeavoured to ſatisfie Cæſar's Command; and having aſſembled as great an Army as he could poſſibly levy, and leading forth with him two Legions of Roman Soldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending at Spring to invade Judæa: All which he ſignified to Cæſar by his Letters; who commending him for his induſtry, adviſed him to uſe all expedition therein, and to make War againſt thoſe who ſhould diſobey his Commands. M Mean while divers thouſands of the Jews reſorted to Petronius, who was quartered at Ptolemais; beſeeching him not to conſtrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their Laws, or to tranſgreſs the Ordinances of their Fore-fathers. For if (ſaid they) you have wholly decreed to bring and erect this Statue in our Temple, firſt deprive us of our lives, and afterwards do that which ſhall ſeem good in your eyes: For it is impoſſible for us, ſo long as our Souls remain within our Bodies, to permit that which is forbidden by our Laws; or to ſuffer ſuch Impiety, in regard of that honour which we owe unto our Law-maker, and our Predeceſſors, who have ratified our Laws, to the intent we ſhould encreaſe in Virtue. Petronius anſwered thus, If I were Emperour, or if the Emperour would be ruled by my advice, your reaſons might prevail with me; but I am enforced to obey him, otherwiſe my Life and Fortune is at Stake. N Hereunto the Jews anſwered; My Lord (ſaid they) ſince you are reſolved, not to tranſgreſs, by any means, the Commands and Contents of Cæſar's Letters, neither will we any ways violate or infringe the Preſcript of our Law, under hope of Divine Aſſiſtance, and in imitation of the Virtue of our Anceſtors: For we are not ſo faint-hearted, that for the hope of a vain and untimely deſire of life, we ſhould break the Laws which Almighty God hath propoſed unto us, under the reward of Eternal Felicity: For which cauſe, we will endure all Fortunes whatſoever, ſo that our Countrey Law and Religion may remain inviolate; and we are ready to encounter any miſ-fortune, under hope that God will aſſiſt us; for whoſe honour, we fear not to adventure on any danger. This had we rather do, than by obeying thee through Cowardice, to incurr perpetual Ignominy; and that O which is more, God's wrath in neglect of his Laws, whoſe Authority, even in thine own judgment, is more to be regarded than Caius's Commiſſion.

Petronius

The year of the World, 4003. after Christ's Nativity 40.

The Jews met Petronius at Tiberias, beſeeching him not to violate the Sacred City with his Images.

Ariſtobulus, King Agrippa's Brother, and Elcias the High Prieſt, entreat Petronius in the Jews behalf.

A Petronius conjecturing by theſe their anſwers, how hard a matter it was to force them from their opinion; and perceiving he could not do for Caius what he expected, in the erection of his Statue, without great Blood-ſhed, whereby much murther and inconvenience might follow; he took ſome of his neareſt and deareſt friends with him, and poſted to Tiberias, that he might more conveniently and circumſpectly look into the Jews Actions. They fearing ſome imminent danger through the Wars they expected from the Romans, and greater miſchief through the breach of their Laws; aſſembled once more many thouſands of them, and met with Petronius at Tiberias; beſeeching him that he would not enforce them to that neceſſity, nor defile their Sacred City with forbidden Images. Whereunto Petronius anſwered: Therefore (ſaith he) will you fight with Cæſar, without regard, either of B his ability, or your own weakneſs? We will not fight (ſaid they) but we will rather die, than depart from our Laws. Whereupon, proſtrating themſelves, and laying open their naked throats, they ſaid they were ready to die. In theſe terms they continued for the ſpace of forty days, neglecting their Huſbandry, though that was the chiefeſt Seed-time: For it was moſt reſolutely concluded among them, rather to ſuffer death, than to admit the Statue. Whilſt the matter ſtood upon theſe terms, Ariſtobulus, Agrippa's Brother, and Elcias, accompanied with divers of their Train, and ſome of the chiefeſt among the Jews came unto Petronius, beſeeching him that he would conſider the obſtinacy of the people, neither give them occaſion to draw them into deſperate actions; but rather, that he would write unto Caius, with what obſtinacy the people refuſed C the Dedication of his Image in the Temple: And how, giving over the care of their Huſbandry, they prepared themſelves for War, without any truſt or confidence in their own ſtrength; being rather reſolved to die, than to ſuffer ſo great an indignity to be offered to their Religion. Beſides, how giving over their Tillage, there was nothing to be expected but Robbery, whereas they ſhould want means to pay their Cuſtoms; by which means, they hoped that Cæſar would be moved to moderate his ſeverity towards that Nation, and not to give them cauſe of Rebellion: And that if he might not be moved from the proſecution of the War, that then he might go forward with his buſineſs. This was the effect of Ariſtobulus's requeſt.

Petronius promiſeth the Jews to write unto Caius in their behalf, and exhorteth them to follow their Huſbandry.

But Petronius, partly in reſpect of their Prayers who inſtantly urged him, and the D weightineſs of the affair; partly in regard of the contentious reſolution of the Jews, ſuppoſing that it was a matter unworthy a man, to put ſo many thouſands of men to death, to ſatisfie Caius's fooliſh ambition; and touched with the fear of God, and remorſe of his own Conſcience, he had rather to his own danger, inform the Emperour of the abſurdity of the matter by his Letters, being no ways ignorant of his cholerick ſpirit, and forwardneſs in revenge, except his furious paſſion and expectation were anſwered. For this thought he, that although it altered not his reſolution, but haply enforc'd his diſpleaſure againſt him, in that he ſpeedily executed not his Command; yet, that it was the duty of a good man, not to refuſe an aſſured death, if ſo be it might ſave ſo guiltleſs and huge a multitude. When therefore, he had aſſembled the Jews together E in Tiberias (when many thouſands of them reſorted thither) and diſpoſed all thoſe warlike Forces, that at that time gave attendance on him, round about him; he told the Jews firſt of all, not his own, but the Emperour's intent, who would ſhortly have them taſte his diſpleaſure, and enforce them to bear the burthen of his indignation, who were ſo bold as to contradict him: For himſelf, it neceſſarily concerned him, that ſince, by the Emperour's favour he had received ſo great honour, he ſhould not commit any thing contrary to his Command. I hold it (ſaid he) a matter moſt juſt to employ my life and honour for you, to the end, that ſo huge a number of men ſhould not be drawn into the danger of death: and I will reſpect the excellency of the Laws of your Fathers, for which you think you ought to undergo a War and danger: neither is it lawful to ſuffer the Temple of God to be defiled F by the Authority of Princes. I will therefore write to Cæſar, and acquaint him with your minds; and in all that I may, I will aſſiſt you to obtain your Requeſt. God (whoſe power ſurpaſſeth all induſtry and humane force) vouchſafe to conduct you, and make you conſtant in the obſervation of your Laws; and grant, that he, through exceſſive deſire of humane glory, commit not any thing that may offend God. And if Caius be diſpleaſed, and enforce his inevitable diſpleaſure againſt me, I will undertake all danger, and endure all torments, both in body and ſpirit, to the end, that I may not behold ſo many vertuous men, as you are, periſh in your good and juſt actions. Go therefore each of you, and ply your work, and till your Lands; I will ſend to Rome, and will employ both my Friends, and my ſelf for you.

After he had ſpoken this, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly, praying the chiefeſt amongſt G them to encourage the Huſbandmen to ply their buſineſs, and to confirm the reſt of the people in their good hope; he himſelf alſo ceaſed not to encourage them. And truly God ſhewed his aſſiſtance to Petronius, and aſſiſted him in all his affairs: For as ſoon

After a long and continual Drought, there fell a ſudden ſhower

as he had finiſhed his diſcourſe to the Jews, there ſuddenly fell a great rain beyond all H humane expectation; for the day was very fair, neither was there any appearance of rain in the Air, and all that year long there was an extream Drought; ſo that men were paſt hope to have any moiſture, notwithſtanding, that ſometime there appeared certain Clouds in the Heavens. At that time therefore the water fell in great abundance, and beſides the expectation and opinion of men; the Jews conceived hope, that Petronius ſoliciting their cauſe, ſhould not be repulſed. But Petronius was more amazed than all the reſt, ſeeing evidently that God undertook the affairs of the Jews, and gave them teſtimony of his manifeſt aſſurance; ſo that they that were their profeſſed Adverſaries, had no power to contradict them, as he himſelf wrote to Caius at large, I with inductions and exhortations, to the end he ſhould not draw ſo many thouſand men into a deſperate reſolution and unhappy death; for without War it was impoſſible for him, ever to make them forſake their Religion. Moreover, that he would not cut off and loſe the Revenue which he received of that Nation; and would not erect a Trophy of an everlaſting Curſe and Malediction againſt himſelf. Adding moreover, what the power of their God was; which he had ſo clearly declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his merciful hand was over them. This is the Contents of Petronius's Letters.

Agrippa honoureth Caius in Rome, & in reward thereof Caius willeth him to demand ſomewhat; who deſireth nothing elſe, than that Petronius's Commiſſion to erect the Statue, be revoked.

On the other ſide, King Agrippa, who at that time was at Rome, grew more and more in favour with Caius; having entertained him at a Banquet, wherein he was very deſirous to exceed all others as well in ſumptuouſneſs, as in all other ſorts of delights K and pleaſures; yea, he entertained him ſo nobly, that not only others, but alſo the Emperour himſelf, could not attain to ſuch magnificence; ſo much he endeavoured to ſurpaſs all others, through the great deſire he had to content and ſatisfie Cæſar in all things. Caius was amazed at his courage and magnificence, ſeeing Agrippa ſo willing to conſtrain himſelf, above his power and means, to abound in Silver; and all this to the intent to pleaſe him. For which cauſe Cæſar, in requital of his kindneſs, intending to honour Agrippa to his uttermoſt power, in granting him that which he moſt deſired; being one day warm with Wine, invited him to drink a Carouſe: adding theſe words;

Agrippa, I have heretofore known the honour thou haſt ſhewed towards me, and thou L haſt expreſſed the earneſt affection that thou beareſt me, in hazarding thy ſelf in divers dangers, into which thou haſt been drawn during Tiberius*'s life time; and haſt omitted nothing, no not in that which exceedeth thy power, to ſhew thy affection towards me: For which cauſe, I think it ſhould be a great ſhame for me, if I ſhould ſuffer my ſelf to be overcome by thee in kindneſs, without ſome anſwerable correſpondence: I will therefore put that in practice, which I have heretofore omitted; for all thoſe things that hitherto I have beſtowed on thee, are of no reckoning. My will is, that thy merits ſhould at this time be requited, by ſuch means as might for ever make thee happy.* Now he ſpake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg ſome great Province at his hands, or the Revenues of ſome Cities. M

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet he did not diſcover his intent, but gave Caius this anſwer; that whereas he had ſerved him to the diſlike of Tiberius, it was not for the gain he expected heretofore; and for the preſent alſo, he did nothing under hope to be rich; contenting himſelf that he was in the Emperour's good favour. That the benefits he had received of him were great, yea, exceeding all that which he durſt ever have hoped: For (ſaid he) although they be but ſmall in compariſon of your Greatneſs, yet in reſpect of my ſelf who have received them, and in my conceit, they are very great. Caius admiring his generoſity, inſiſted to preſs him to ask whatſoever he had a mind to, being ready to grant it. Whereupon Agrippa ſaid, Dread Prince, ſince it is your good pleaſure to think me worthy to be honoured by your Preſents, I N will not requeſt any thing at your hands, that may tend to enrich me; for that by thoſe goods you have already given me, I am greatly honoured: But I beſeech and requeſt one thing at your hands, which will purchaſe you the reputation of Piety, and will procure God to be propitious unto you in all your actions; and which alſo, will breed me much glory among thoſe who ſhall hear that I have not been refuſed in my demand, which concerneth me more than the neceſſities of this life: I therefore beſeech you, that it will pleaſe you to give order that that Statue, which you have charged Petronius to erect in the Temple of the Jews, may never be put there. This was Agrippa's requeſt to the Emperour, knowing very well how dangerous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life, to demand any ſuch thing at Caius's hands, that was not anſwerable to his humour. Caius, on the one ſide, moved O with the ſervice Agrippa had done him; and on the other ſide, ſeeing how great an indignity it ſhould be for him, if before ſuch an Aſſembly of Witneſſes, he ſhould deny

A that which he had ſo inſtantly preſſed Agrippa to requeſt, as if ſuddenly he had repented himſelf; and admiring Agrippa's virtue (who having an opportunity in a moment to augment his particular Eſtate, either by Revenues, or other Commodities; had preferred the Common Cauſe, the Laws of his Countrey, and Piety, before all theſe) he granted him his Supplication; and wrote to Petronius, praiſing him for that he had uſed ſuch diligence in aſſembling his Army, as alſo for all that whereof he had given him notice: adding theſe words; If (ſaid he) you have already erected the Statue which I commanded you, let it remain in the place; but if it be not done, be thou no more troubleſome to the Jews, but diſmiſs thine Army, and repair thou in perſon to that place whither I have ſent thee: For I urge no more the erection of the Statue, for the deſire that I have to B gratifie Agrippa, whom I entirely honour, and in ſuch ſort, as it is impoſſible for me to contradict any thing whatſoever, that either he hath need of, or ſhall require. Theſe were the Contents of thoſe Letters which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he underſtood that the Jews were like to revolt; for they made it known, that rather than they would endure the Statue, they would hazard a War againſt the Romans: Which, when Caius underſtood, he was extreamly troubled; and being a man addicted to all villany, and averſe to all honeſty, and who gave place to no good counſel, after he had conceived a diſpleaſure againſt any man; and who likewiſe thought it a great happineſs for him to accompliſh all that whatſoever he pleaſed; he wrote again to Petronius, to this effect; Since the Preſents which the Jews have given thee, have more pre- C vailed with thee than my Commands have done; ſo that to pleaſe them, thou haſt deſpiſed that which I have enjoyned thee; I make thy ſelf the Judge, how much thou haſt deſerved to incurr my diſpleaſure, to the end, that thou mayeſt ſerve for an example to all thoſe, who ſhall come after thee, that an Emperour's Commands ought not in any ſort to be neglected. Although this Epiſtle was both written and ſent, yet Petronius received it not during Caius's life time, for they that carried it, were ſtayed with croſs Winds; ſo that Petronius received thoſe Letters that aſſured him of Caius's death, before he received the other: For God would not forget Petronius, who expoſed himſelf to great dangers for the love of the Jews, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by God's wrath, being kindled againſt him, by reaſon that he affected Divine D honour, received his reward; and Petronius obtained favour both at Rome, and through all the whole Government, and eſpecially among the principal Senators, againſt whom Caius was accuſtomed to vomit up his cholerick Revenges. He died a little after he had written the Letter to Petronius, by which he threatned and denounced him death. Hereafter I will declare the cauſe why he was taken out of this world, and the manner how Treaſon was plotted againſt him. The Letter that brought the tidings of Caius's death, was delivered to Petronius firſt; and preſently after, he received that wherein he enjoyned him to kill himſelf: He highly rejoyced at this his good luck, and Caius's death; and admired God's Providence, who ſpeedily and happily had rewarded him, both for the honour that he bare unto his Temple, and alſo for having E aſſiſted the Jews. Behold, how Petronius eſcaped from death, by an unexpected Providence.

Caius writeth to Petronius, charging him to murther himſelf, for neglecting his Command.

Petronius receives Letters of Caius death before thoſe, whereby he was commanded to kill himſelf.

Two Jews called Aſinæus and Anilæus, both Brothers, and of a mean extraction, become ſo powerful near Babylon, that they give enough to do to the Parthians: Their Actions; their Death. The Grecians and Syrians who lived in Seleucia, F unite againſt the Jews, and kill fity thouſand of them unawares.

IN thoſe days there happened a grievous Commotion amongſt thoſe Jews that inhabited Meſopotamia and Babylon, and ſuch Slaughters and Calamities as never the like hath been declared in our former Narrations; which in regard I intend to report both particularly and ſeriouſly, I will rip up the whole cauſe thereof from its firſt Original. There was a City called Nearda, belonging to Babylon, ſtored with Inhabitants, and enriched with many fruitful Poſſeſſions, ſufficient to ſuſtain ſo great a multitude: Moreover, it was ſuch as might be hardly invaded by the Enemy; both for that the River Euphrates ſurrounded it, and alſo for that it was fortified with G very ſtrong Walls. Upon the ſame River alſo, there ſtood another City, called Niſibis; in which the Jews, in reſpect of the ſtrength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accuſtomed to offer unto God, and the reſt of their Votive money.

Aſinæus and Anilæus, born in Nearda, retire into a certain place, and great Companies flock unto them.

Theſe two Cities therefore ſerved them for two Store-houſes; and from thence, according as time required, they ſent the money they had gathered, to Jeruſalem, and committed the Convoy thereof to divers thouſands of men, for fear it ſhould be taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the Soveraignty in Babylon. Among theſe Jews lived Aſinæus and Anilæus, two Brothers, born in Nearda; whoſe Father being dead, their Mother bound them to the Weavers trade, for amongſt thoſe Nations it was accounted no indignity to follow that trade: for both men and women exerciſe themſelves therein. It happened, that their Maſter with whom they learn'd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came ſomewhat late unto their work. They taking this chaſtiſement of his as if a great injury had been done unto them, betook themſelves to their weapons, whereof there were great ſtore in that houſe, and retired themſelves into a place where the River divideth it ſelf into two parts, which naturally aboundeth with excellent paſtures, and ſuch fruits as were reſerved for the winter. To theſe men there flocked a number of needy perſons, whom they armed, and became their Captains, and no man oppoſed himſelf againſt their inſolent proceedings. Being by this means grown abſolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themſelves a ſtrong Fortreſs, they ſent unto the Inhabitants, commanding them to pay them Tribute for their Cattle which they paſtured; ſo that this Tribute was ſufficient to entertain them, promiſing to thoſe who obeyed them, all friendſhip, and that they would maintain them againſt all thoſe that ſhould wrong them, of what place ſoever they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatned them that they would kill all their Cattel. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, knowing themſelves unable to oppoſe them, obeyed them, and ſent them the number of Cattel which they required; ſo that greater Forces daily joyned themſelves with them, and they grew to that power, that they could make their excurſions againſt thoſe whom they intended to hurt. Every one reſpected them, and they were feared by all men, ſo that their renown came at laſt to the ears of the King of Parthia.

Aſinæus and his Companions beſet by the Governors and Princes of Babylon.

The Governour of Babylon likewiſe intending to cut off this miſchief before it grew to greater head, aſſembled as many men as he could poſſible, both Parthians and Babylonians, and marched forth againſt them; with an intent to root them out, before they ſhould have any inkling thereof to prepare themſelves for their defence. Having therefore prepared his Army, he lay in ambuſh neer unto a Mariſh, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Jews forbear all kind of work, he making his account that the Enemy durſt not make head againſt him, but without fight he ſhould lead them away captives) he march'd eaſily, thinking to charge them unaware. Aſinæus, who at that time ſat idly with his fellows, having his Arms by him: Ye men (ſaid he) methinks I hear the neighing of Horſes, not ſuch as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreover, I hear the noiſe of their Bridles, and I fear leſt the Enemies ſecretly ſtealing upon us, ſhould circumvent us: let therefore ſome one of us go and diſcover what the matter is, and bring us word: I would I were found a lyar in that which I have told you. This ſaid, one of them went out to eſpie what the noiſe intended; who running haſtily back again, told him, that he had not falſly conjectured as touching the intent of the Enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not ſuffer themſelves any longer to be out-braved by them. He alſo declared, that there was a mighty number of Horſemen, who were aſſembled like a drove of Beaſts, ſufficient and able utterly to overcome Aſinæus and all his Company, foraſmuch as they were not in a readineſs to defend themſelves: and our Law forbiddeth us to do any manner of work on the Sabbath. Aſinæus reſolved with himſelf not to do that which the Spy had ſaid, but thought that it was better for them to behave themſelves valiantly in their neceſſity wherein they were plunged, and that if they muſt needs die, it better became them to make breach of their Law, than to hearten their Enemies by their ſubmiſſion. He therefore preſently betook himſelf to his weapons, and encouraged all thoſe that were about him, to make it known in effect what their valour was. Whereupon all of them at once marched forth againſt the Enemy, and ſlaughtered a great many of them, for that they, deſpiſing Aſinæus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hold on men already vanquiſhed; but in the end they were conſtrained to betake them to flight.

Aſinæus, after he had encouraged his ſouldiers, putteth his Enemies to flight.

Aſinæus and Anilæus are ſought unto by Artabanus for friendſhip.

When the news of this skirmiſh was brought to the King of Parthia, he was wholly aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of theſe two Brethren, and had a great deſire to ſee them and to ſpeak with them. He therefore ſent one of the truſtieſt of his Guard, to let them underſtand, that although King Artabanus had been injured by them, in that they had invaded his Countrey; notwithſtanding, ſaid this Ambaſſadour, he making

leſs

A leſs account of the diſpleaſure he hath conceived againſt you, than of your Virtue, hath ſent me unto you, to give you my hand and troth in his name, for a ſafe conduct and ſecurity in your Voyage, requiring you to be his friends; he treateth therefore with you without any Deceit or Fraud, promiſing you Gifts and Honours, and reſolveth to encreaſe your Dignity by his Power. Aſinæus refuſed to enterprize this Voyage, but ſent his Brother Anilæus with certain Preſents, ſuch as he could poſſibly find. He therefore departed with the Meſſenger, and preſented himſelf before Artabanus; who ſeeing Anilæus come alone, asked him how it happened that Aſinæus came not with him: And underſtanding that he ſtayed in his Mariſh, through the fear that he had of him; he ſwore by the Gods of his Anceſtors, that he would do him no wrong, wiſhing them to give credit to his pro- B miſe, and he ſtretched out his hand, which is the greateſt ſign with which the Kings of that Countrey uſe to aſſure thoſe that parley with them. For after they have mutually given one another their hands, there is no ſiniſter practice to be feared, and they, from whom a man expecteth any harm, are no more to be feared, at ſuch time as they have given this teſtimony of aſſurance. This done, Artabanus ſent back Anilæus, to perſwade his Brother Aſinæus to come to Court, Artabanus did this, ſuppoſing that this his Amity with the two Brothers, would be a bridle for the Jews, who otherwiſe might encroach upon his Governments. For he feared, leſt if any Rebellion ſhould happen, and he ſhould be troubled in that War, Aſinæus and they of Babylon ſhould grow more ſtrong, as well by the voluntary ſubmiſſion of the Jews, as by force; and C thereby ſhould do him the more miſchief. Upon this deliberation he ſent Anilæus, who eaſily perſwaded his Brother, giving him to underſtand among other things, what good will the King bare him, and the Oath that he had ſworn; ſo that both of them reſorted to Artabanus, who received them very graciouſly, admiring Aſinæus's Virtue, who had ſo great a courage in all his Enterpriſes; conſidering eſpecially, that he was a man of low ſtature, and who, to look on, ſeemed to be contemptible: and he told his Friends, that without compariſon, he had a greater heart, than his body.

And when in banqueting he had named Aſinæus, and ſhewed him to Abdagaſis the General of his Army, ſignifying unto him, with what valour theſe Brethren were en- D dowed in Feats of Arms: Abdagaſis required that it might be lawful for him to kill Aſinæus, to the end he might puniſh the wrongs he had done to the Eſtate of the Parthians. Never (ſaid the King) will I give my conſent to betray a man, who hath committed himſelf to my protection, and hath given me his hand, and who buildeth upon the Oath I have paſt unto him in the name of the Gods: But if thou be a valiant man in feats of Arms, thou haſt no need to make me forſwear my ſelf; but when his Brother and he ſhall depart from hence, aſſail him, and overcome him by thy valour, provided that I be not privy to thy attempt. And afterwards, calling Aſinæus to him in the morning; It is time (ſaid he) that thou return homeward, for fear thou provoke divers of the Captains of my Court, which, contrary to my will, will endeavour to kill thee. I commit the Countrey of Babylon E to thy protection and guard; which by thy care and vigilancy, ſhall remain exempt from all Robberies, and other ſuch Calamities. Reaſon it is, that I procure thy good, becauſe I have engaged mine Honour and Faith irrevocably unto thee; not upon any light matter, but for things that importune thee as nearly as thy life. This ſaid, he gave him certain Preſents, and preſently diſmiſſed him. Now, as ſoon as he returned home to his own Fortreſs, he fortified the places, both thoſe which were already ſecured, and the other, which as yet no man had attempted to fortifie: And in ſhort time he grew to that greatneſs, that no man, of ſo obſcure Fortune and beginning, attained before him. Neither contented with the Honours of the Babylonians, he was alſo held in great account by the Captains of the Parthians, who were ſent to govern in the neighbouring Pro- F vinces; yea, ſo much encreaſed his Authority with his Power, that all Meſopotamia was at his Command. In this Felicity and encreaſing Glory of his, he continued for the ſpace of fifteen years; which never began to decay, until ſuch time as neglecting the ancient Study of Virtue, and contemning the Laws of his Fore-fathers, both he and his factious followers being drowned in pleaſure, yielded themſelves Captive to Foreign Luſt. It fortuned that a certain Governour of thoſe Parthians came into that Countrey, accompanied with his Wife, not only endowed with other Perfections, but alſo admired for her incomparable Comlineſs and Beauty; whom, without ever ſeeing her, only by report of her Beauty, Anilæus, Aſinæus's Brother, loved entirely; and when as by no one of his allurements he could ob- G tain her favour, neither had any other hope to enjoy the Lady, he could not bridle his unruly Luſt, but he made War againſt her Huſband; and killing the Parthian in their firſt Conflict, his Wife became his, both in ſubjection and Bed-ſervice; Abdagaſis would have ſlain Aſinæus, but Artabanus will not permit him.

Artabanus committeth the Territories of Babylon to Aſinæus's charge, and diſmiſſeth him with Gifts

which thing was the Original of many mighty Calamities, both to himſelf, and to H his Brother. For when, having loſt her former Husband, ſhe was led away Captive, ſhe carried with her the Images of the Gods of her Countrey, which ſhe highly eſteemed, according as it was the cuſtom of thoſe that inhabited that place, to have their Gods whom they adore in their houſes, whom, when they travel into a Foreign Countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and uſed them according to the faſhion of her Countrey, at the firſt ſecretly; but after ſhe was known for Anilæus's Wife, then ſhe adored them according to the cuſtom, and with the ſame ſervice which ſhe uſed during her firſt Husband's days, ſacrificing to her Gods.

Anilæus being reproved for his Wife's Idolatry, killeth one of his Friends.

Their chiefeſt friends ſeeing this, firſt of all reproved them, for that Anilæus committed I ſuch things that were no ways uſed among the Hebrews, and altogether repugnant to their Laws, for that he had married a woman of a Foreign Nation, that contradicted and violated their accuſtomed Religion; for which cauſe they adviſed him to beware, leſt, in ſubmitting themſelves too much to their unbridled pleaſures, they ſhould loſe the honour and power they had received from God, even until that preſent. But ſeeing their perſwaſions profited nothing, and that Anilæus likewiſe had villanouſly killed one of his deareſt Friends, who had ſomewhat too freely reproved him (who, at ſuch time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeal of the Laws of his Anceſtors, and with grief againſt his Murtherer, wiſhed that Aſinæus and Anilæus, and all their Aſſociates might die the like death; they, for that they were tranſgreſſors of the Law; the other K, for that they ſuccoured not themſelves in that oppreſſion, which they ſuffered for the maintenance of their Laws.) They were ſore diſpleaſed; yet notwithſtanding they contained themſelves, calling to their remembrance that their felicity proceeded from no other cauſe, but from the valour of thoſe Brethren.

But when they underſtood that the Parthian Gods were adored by this woman, they bethought them that it behoved them not any more to bear with Anilæus in contempt of their Laws; for which cauſe, addreſſing themſelves to Aſinæus in great Aſſemblies, they exclaimed againſt Anilæus; ſaying, that he ought, although at firſt he had no power to diſpoſe of himſelf; yet now at laſt, to correct this errour before it ſhould redound to their publick Plague: For that both the Marriage was diſallowed L in all men's eyes, as altogether contrary to their Laws; and that the ſuperſtitious obſervance of the Gods, which the woman preſumed to uſe, was an apparent injury offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his Brother's fault would breed ſome great inconvenience, both to himſelf and his followers; yet, being overcome with Brotherly affection, he eaſily pardoned his Brother, aſcribing his errour to the violence of his unbridled paſſion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations and greater reproofs, at length he admoniſhed his Brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was paſt, and deſiring him to amend the errour hereafter, by ſending home the woman unto her Kindred. Yet this admonition of his took no effect with him; for the woman perceiving that the rumour that was M raiſed among the people was for her ſake; and being afraid leſt for her love ſake, Anilæus ſhould incurr ſome danger, ſhe poyſoned Aſinæus, to the end that her love being in Authority, ſhe might more freely practiſe her impiety. Now when Anilæus had gotten the Government into his own hands, he drew out his Forces againſt certain Villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the chiefeſt among the Parthians, and Artabanus's Son in Law; which Villages he ſpoiled, and carried away men, ſheep, and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was reſident in thoſe Quarters, underſtood of the ſpoil of his Villages, he was very much diſpleaſed, and the rather, for that without any occaſion or proffer of injury, Anilæus had aſſailed him N in contempt of his Eſtate, who was a chief Peer of the Countrey: For which cauſe he immediately aſſembled the greateſt power of Horſe and Foot he could gather, to ſet upon Anilæus and his Aſſociates. Leading his Forces therefore againſt one of the Villages, he kept himſelf in covert, to the end he might fight the next day, which was the Sabbath day; on which the Jews attempted not any thing. Whereof when Anilæus was advertiſed by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in another Village, who had exactly told him all Mithridates's intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his Souldiers; after he had made his Soldiers take their refreſhment, marched out by night, to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be advertiſed of his coming. He therefore ruſhed in upon them about the fourth Watch of the night, and ſlew thoſe whom he found aſleep; and the reſt being aſtoniſhed thereat, O were forced to ſave themſelves by flight: He alſo took Mithridates Priſoner, and cauſed him to be carried away naked on an Aſs, which is one of the greateſt diſgraces Aſinæus poyſoned by the Parthian woman.

A ces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Having after this diſgraceful manner carried him into a Forreſt, ſome of his familiars perſwaded him to kill him: but Anilæus told them, that they ought to deal with him far otherwiſe; for that it behoved them not to kill a man, who was one of the chief among the Nobility of the Parthians, and one that was moſt honoured in regard of that affinity and alliance he had with the King: that although all that which heretofore had been offered to Mithridates, were inſupportable; yet if they ſhould be inſtrumental to ſave his life, he would pardon the injuries, and reward them for their Mercy in ſaving his life; whereas if they ſhould deal ſeverely with him, the King would ſeek his revenge, and make a horrible ſlaughter of thoſe Jews that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to have B compaſſion of, both for that they were of their blood, and for that if any miſchief ſhould befal them they knew not whither to retire themſelves; whereas they might be aſſiſted with the flower and ſelect men of their nation. Having thus diſcuſſed and debated the matter to his Soldiers, his opinion was approved, and they were perſwaded; and ſo Mithridates was ſent back again.

Anilæus diſmiſſeth Mithridates.

But he no ſooner returned home unto his houſe, but his wife hit him in the teeth, that he lived but by the mercy of his enemies, notwithſtanding he were the Kings Son-in-law; that he had made no reckoning to puniſh thoſe, who had ſo much injured him; that he likewiſe contented himſelf to have his life ſaved, after he had been priſoner to the Jews: For which cauſe (ſaid ſhe) recover thou thy former virtue and honour, which thou haſt heretofore loſt, or I ſwear by the Gods of the King my Father, that the bond C of Marriage which is betwixt me and thee ſhall be diſſolved.

Mithridates, unable to endure theſe uſual reproaches, and on the other ſide apprehending his wives haughty courage, from whom he feared to be ſeparated, he aſſembled the greateſt power of men that he could poſſible, notwithſtanding it were againſt his will, and led them forth; ſuppoſing himſelf to be unworthy of life, if he, who by Nation was a Parthian, ſhould be put to the worſt by the Jews. When Anilæus underſtood that Mithridates came forth againſt him with a great force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignity, if he ſhould lie lurking amidſt his Marſhes, and hoping that he ſhould have no worſe fortune againſt his enemies, than he had at firſt, and D building much upon his Soldiers, who were ever wont to get the upper hand in their encounters, he likewiſe drew forth his Army: to them alſo others adjoyned themſelves, who ſought nothing elſe but pillage, and hoped that with their only preſence they might diſcourage their enemy.

But after they had marched about ninety ſtades, and paſſed thorow a County that was ſcant of water, and were about the heat of the mid day burned up with thirſt; Mithridates Army came in ſight, and charged them even at that time, when they fainted for want of drink, and through the extremity of heat, ſo as they could ſcarcely handle their weapons. At that time Anilæus's Soldiers encountring with Mithridates's freſh men, were ſhamefully put to flight: whereby it came to paſs that a great number E of them were killed. But Anilæus himſelf, and all thoſe of his Company, retired themſelves in great haſte into a Forreſt, leaving Mithridates Lord and Maſter of the Field, whereof he was very joyful. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, an infinite number of lawleſs men reſorted to Anilæus, who ſet little by their lives, provided there might no limit be propoſed to their unbridled licentiouſneſs; ſo that he gathered a greater number of men than thoſe he had loſt; yet they were far different in valour from the former: for they were wholly ignorant of warlike diſcipline. Notwithſtanding, he being accompanied with theſe men, went and ſet upon divers Burroughs of the Babylonians, which were totally deſtroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cauſe the Babylonians and his other enemies, ſent unto Nearda to the Jews that were there, F requiring that Anilæus might be delivered into their hands; whereunto condeſcending not (for although they had a will to perform their requeſt, yet it lay not in their power to deliver him) they required that they might live in peace. And to treat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians ſent certain men to confer with Anilæus. They having ſurveyed the place wherein Anilæus kept, aſſailed both himſelf and his followers by night, and ſlew all thoſe they encountred with, without reſiſtance, and amongſt the reſt Anilæus. When the Babylonians ſaw that they were delivered from the oppreſſion of Anilæus, who till that time had been as it were a bridle unto them, to reſtrain and curb the hatred they conceived againſt the Jews, with whom they had oftentimes been at odds, by reaſon of the contrariety of their Religi- G ons, whereby it happened that they oftentimes fell at debate upon every opportunity when they met.

A great number of diſſolute perſons flock to Anilæus, with whom he ſpoileth certain Burroughs of the Babylonians.

The Babylonians require Anilæus, that they may puniſh him: they aſſail and ſlay him.

Now when Anilæus's men were defeated, the Babylonians ſet upon the Jews on all and a great number of Syrians. The Jews fled thither, and continued there about five years, without any moleſtation: But in the ſixth year, when the Plague encreaſed in Babylon, the Jews that remained there, were enforced to ſeek them ſome new habitation; and that removing of theirs into the City of Seleucia, was the cauſe likewiſe, of their further miſchief, as I will make manifeſt. The Greeks who dwelt in Seleucia, are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians, and have always the upper hand; but after that the Jews came to inhabit that place, in a certain Sedition that aroſe among them, the I Syrians had the upper hand, by the means of the Jews, who joyned their Forces with they ſhould joyn in hatred againſt the Jews: So that altogether charging them at unawares, they killed more than fifty thouſand of them; they were all put to the Sword, K were ſuffered to eſcape. Theſe retired themſelves to Cteſiphon a City of Greece, that was not far from Seleucia, where the King reſideth every year, and keepeth the King, they might remain in more ſafety and ſecurity. All the Nation of the Jews that were in theſe Quarters, ſtood in great fear: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Aſſyrians of that Countrey, agreed amongſt themſelves to make a general at Nearda and Niſibis, truſting themſelves to the ſtrength of theſe Fortreſſes, which were inhabited alſo by men who were expert in Arms. See here what the condition of the L Jews was, who remained in Babylon.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 1. Caius's Tyranny towards the Jews.

G Caius did not only expreſs and manifeſt his fury towards thoſe Jews that dwelt in Jeruſalem, and in other neighbouring places; but alſo thorough all the Countreys both by Land and Sea, which were ſubject to the Roman Empire, filling the whole World with an infinite number of miſchiefs; yea, ſuch, and ſo odious, that the like hitherto have never been heard of. But Rome eſpecially, felt the force of his fury; but eſpecially the Senators, Patricians and Noblemen were plagued. They alſo that were called Roman Knights, who, in Wealth and Dignity, were next unto the Senators; for that out of their number, ſuch men were choſen, who were to ſupply the Senate, were moſt perſecuted. For with ig- H nominies they were abuſed, with baniſhments and confiſcations weakned, and by ſlaughters wholly exterminated. He likewiſe uſurped the name of God, commanding his Subjects to dignifie him with more than humane honours; and aſcending the Capitol. which amongſt all the Temples in Rome is moſt religiouſly honoured, he was ſo bold as to ſalute Jupiter, and to call him Brother. Many ſuch impieties were committed by him, which ſhews that his unbridled and extravagant madneſs did never forſake him. Amongſt other his mad pranks that he played, this is worthy of memory: for on a time, thinking it to be too much trouble for him to croſs the Sea between Puteol a City in Campania, and Miſenum another Town ſeated by the Sea-ſhore in a Gally; and otherwiſe eſteeming it a thing correſpondent to his greatneſs, who was Emperor, to exact that ſuperiority on the Sea, which was anſwerable to his ſove- I raignty on the Land, betwixt one Cape of the Sea unto another, for the ſpace of thirty furlongs or ſtades, betwixt which the Gulf had his courſe, he cauſed a Bridge to be built, on which he commanded himſelf to be drawn in a Charriot, as if that way were anſwerable to the dignity of his deity. He left not one Temple in Greece whatſoever, that he ſpoiled not of thoſe excellent pictures that were in them; Giving a Comiſſion that all Statues, and whatſoever ornaments or gifts, and preſents that were dedicated in any Temple, ſhould be brought unto him; ſaying, that ſuch things as were admirable, ſhould be reſerved for a place of admiration, ſuch as was the City of Rome: with theſe ſpoils of the Temples he adorned his Palace and Gardens, and generally K all his houſes and Palaces that he had in Italy. He was ſo impudent alſo, as to give direction, that Jupiter Olympius Statue, which the Greeks had in great eſtimation, and which Phidias the Athenian Satuarian had made, ſhould be tranſported to Rome. But Mem-mius Regulus, to whom he directed this commiſſion, executed it not, becauſe the Maſons informed him, that without ſpoiling it they could not remove it from the place.

It is reported alſo, that he was hindred from this execution by ſuch prodigies that are almoſt incredible: which he aſſured Cajus of, giving him to underſtand, what the occaſion was, that had moved him to diſobey him therein: and whilſt he was in danger of death for his delay, the ſudden and ſucceſsful death of Cajus warranted him from the ſame. Yea, ſo far ſtretched his unbridled fury, that having a daughter new- L ly born, he cauſed her to be carried into the Capitol, and laid at the feet of the Image of Jupiter; ſaying, that the child was common betwixt him and Jupiter, leaving the judgment to all men, which of the two parents was the greateſt. And notwithſtanding all theſe his miſdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

Cajus gave ſlaves free liberty to accuſe their Maſters, and countenanced Pollux to accuſe his Maſter Claudius. Many conſpiracies againſt Cajus.

Three conſpiracies againſt Cajus. Æmilius Regulus. Caſſius Chæreas. Annius Minucius.

He gave liberty to ſlaves alſo to accuſe their Maſters of whatſoever crimes they would: which was ſo much the more hateful, becauſe all things were done by Cæſars authority, and to his good liking: ſo that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durſt accuſe him, and Cajus the Emperour was contented among the Judges to hear his Uncle brought in queſtion for his life, hoping (although it fell out otherwiſe) to pick out an occaſion to put him to death. For having filled all the Countries of his Empire M with falſe accuſations, and all ſorts of miſchiefs, and giving ſlaves a prerogative above their Maſters; their Lords deviſed many conſpiracies againſt him, ſome for ſpite, and with an intent to be revenged of thoſe injuries they had received: others pretending by his death to prevent thoſe inconveniences that threatned them. In a word, his death concerned the ſecurity of the Laws, and the ſafety of all men: and had he not been ſpeedily cut off, our nation had almoſt been utterly exterminated. For which cauſe I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of every occurrent; namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifeſtation of Gods power and will, which brings conſolation unto thoſe who are in adverſity, and keep them within the bounds of modeſty, who ſuppoſe that their proſperity ſhould N continue always firm, and although they neglect virtue, think that no evil may befal them. Three ſeveral Conſpiracies were intended againſt him, to eaſe the world of this burthenſome Tyrant, All of them were attempted by men of great account. For, Æmilius Regulus, who was born in Corduba in Spain, was fully reſolved to kill him himſelf, or to make him away by the means of his Confederates. Chæreas Caſſius, Colonel over a thouſand men was the conductor of another Band; and Annius Minucia-nus was in no leſs readineſs to do his uttermoſt herein. The cauſe that moved them to combine thus altogether in hatred againſt Cajus, was, that in reſpect of Regulus, he was by nature a deteſter of all iniquity: for he was a very generous man, and ſo free; that he O diſſembled not any of his deſigns, but communicated them with many, who were either his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus, he was induced to ſeek his revenge, through the deſire he had to do juſtice to Lepidus, who had been

A been one of his eſpecial friends, and one of the rareſt men that were ever found among the Roman Citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the fear he had conceived of him) knowing well that all they, againſt whom Caius was incenſed, could not eſcape with leſs puniſhment than loſs of life. As for the third man Chæreas, he could not endure the ſhame and reproach of cowardiſe that Caius had objected againſt him, but feared beſides, that his friendſhip and inward familiarity with Caius would draw him into manifeſt dangers: for which cauſe, and his own ſecurity and honours ſake, he reſolved to diſpach him. Generally all of them were reſolved to rid the world of Caius, and bring an end to his pride and tyrannical power, for their hope was that their attempt having good ſucceſs: their Countrey and Common-weal ſhould reap the B fruits thereof, for whoſe ſecurity and ſafety, it became them to hazard themſelves, though it were with loſs of their lives. But above all the reſt, Chæreas was egged on with a deſire he had to grow famous, and through the facility and convenient means he had to do it, becauſe his Colonels room gave him moſt ſecure acceſs unto him. About that time the Circenſian Games were ſolemnized, which is a kind of Paſtime which the Romans very willingly behold, and to this intent they reſort to the place of theſe exerciſes, and the common people is wont to demand ſomewhat from the Emperour, which they deſire to obtain; and after having examined their requeſts, do never refuſe them. Now they required with inſtant and importunate ſupplications, that Caius would diſcharge them of their taxations, and moderate the exceſſive tri- C butes which they payed: but he would give no ear unto them, and cauſed thoſe to be apprehended, who called upon the matter moſt earneſtly; ſending his Guard, ſome of them one way, ſome of them another, to put them to the ſword. After he had given this order, and they who received it had fully executed it, a great number of men were killed. The people ſeeing this, ceaſed to exclaim any more, preferring their lives to their goods. This horrid ſight incited Chæreas the more to execute his enterprize, to the end he might finiſh his furious and tyrannical life, whoſe pleaſure was all mens deſtruction. He had often reſolved to kill him at Table, yet he deferred to do it, not that he fainted in his reſolution, but becauſe he expected ſome better opportunity. He had been Captain of Caius Guard a long D time.

The Circenſian Games. Caius cauſeth divers to be murthered, who requeſt mitigation of their exactions.

Chæreas for many cauſes is incited againſt Caius.

Caius having appointed him to gather in his Tributes, in the execution whereof he followed his own nature, rather than Cæſars command, and ſpared thoſe of whom he ought to have compaſſion for their poverty ſake. Caius was ſo diſpleaſed herewith, that he objected againſt him, that the cauſe why he delayed the bringing in of his money, was his cowardiſe and negligence: And among other injuries that he offered him, as oft as he gave him the Watch-word, as he uſually went to fetch it once a day upon his watch-day, he gave him the names of women, and others that were ignominious perſons, notwithſtanding that he himſelf was no leſs remarkable, for his effeminate daintineſs. In thoſe Ceremonies which he himſelf had eſtabliſhed, he attired E himſelf like a woman, and was diſguiſed with certain veils, whereby he might the better counterfeit that ſex, and yet notwithſtanding he could object this diſhonour to Chæreas. whom he vexed conſtantly when he gave him the watchword, and ſo much the more becauſe his companions jeared him with it. For when it was his turn to receive the word from Cæſars mouth, he ordinarily fitted him with ſuch an one as might move laughter, which made him the bolder to conſpire with his Confederates, in that he had juſt occaſion to be diſpleaſed: among theſe was a Senator, called Popedius, and one that had paſt through all honours and offices, otherwiſe an Epicure and lover of delights. Timidius accuſed him (in that he was his enemy) that he had uttered certain injurious ſpeeches againſt Caius: and for proof hereof, he alledged Quintilia for his witneſs, a F woman among all Stage-players dearly beloved of many, but in eſpecial, by Popedius, by reaſon of her incomparable beauty: and for that ſhe refuſed to bear witneſs in a matter falſely objected againſt him, whom ſhe entirely loved, Timidius required, that ſhe might be examined by torture. Caius importuned herewith, commanded Chæreas with all expedition and diligence to ſee Quintilia tortured: and the rather gave he Chæreas theſe Commiſſions to kill and torment thoſe whom he pleaſed, for that he had conceived this opinion, that be would acquit himſelf with more cruelty, to the end he might exempt himſelf of that reproach of faint-heartedneſs which was wrongfully objected againſt him.

Popedius is accuſed of a crime by Timidius unto Cæſar.

Whileſt thus Quintilia was led forth to be tortured, ſhe trod upon the foot of one G of thoſe who were of the Confederacie, giving him to underſtand that he ſhould be of good courage, for that there was no fear that ſhe would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with conſtancy: notwithſtanding, Chæreas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by conſtraint, than of his own free will. And ſeeing he could enforce nothing out of her, he brought her back to Caius in ſo pitiful an eſtate, that all they that beheld her, had compaſſion on her. Caius likewiſe himſelf was moved, and bethinking him of thoſe pains ſhe had endured he deſiſted from the inqueſt and accuſation which was proſecuted againſt Popedius and Quintilia and gave her a certain ſum of money, to comfort her againſt the indiſpoſition that might follow by reaſon of her torments, which ſhe had ſo couragiouſly endured.

This diſpleaſed Chæreas very much, as if he had been the cauſe of all thoſe evils that had hapned to thoſe two perſons, whom the crueleſt of men did bemoan. He conſulted therefore with Clement, who was Captain of the foot, and Papinius who had the command of the Guard, and ſpake unto them to this effect. "We have (ſaid he) O Clement, employed our ſelves to the uttermoſt for the Emperours ſafety: for by our diligence and care we have done ſo much, that of all thoſe, who have conſpired againſt him, ſome of them have been killed: the reſt in ſuch ſort tormented and martyred, that Caius himſelf had compaſſion on them. But what reward or honour receive we for all theſe ſervices? Clement hearing theſe words, held his peace, giving manifeſt teſtimony by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly aſhamed he had ſo long time obeyed the Emperours commands: and whilſt he thought with himſelf that it was no policy for him to open his mouth againſt Caius cruelty, Chæreas emboldned himſelf to diſcover the calamities and dangers wherein both the City and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him, that the common report was, that Caius was the cauſe of them:

But (ſaid he) thoſe that will narrowly examine the truth, will judge that I and Papinius that ſtandeth by me, and you, Clement, more than we, have cauſed the Romans torment, and the World's miſery, for that of our own will we have been Miniſters of Caius's Commands; and although the means lieth in us to make an end of thoſe Violences that are committed againſt the Citizens, and injuries to the whole World; yet we ſerve him for his Guard and Hang-men, in ſtead of Soldiers. And we bear Arms, not to maintain our Liberty, and the Roman Empire, but to preſerve him who keeps their bodies and minds in ſlavery: And every day are we ſoiled in their blood who are killed and tortured, until ſuch time as ſome one ſerve us with the ſame ſauce, to ſatisfie Caius's Cruelty. For it is not for the good will he beareth us, that he maketh uſe of us; but that which is more, we are ſuſpected by him, and he will cauſe us to be put to death, as he hath done others. For his diſpleaſure is not limited by juſtice, but by his will: We alſo ſhall ſerve him for a mark to aim at. For which cauſe, it behoveth us to provide for the ſecurity and liberty of all men; and eſpecially, to warrant our ſelves againſt all thoſe dangers that threaten us.

Cornelius Sabinus.

Clement declared by apparent ſigns, that he thought well of Chareas reſolution, but he counſelled him to make no words of it, for fear the rumour thereof ſhould be ſpread among the people, and the ſecret ſhould be diſcovered before the execution: and leſt that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they ſhould all of them be drawn into danger of death; and in the mean while, it behoved them to hope that ſome good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himſelf, his age had taken from him the neceſſary courage that belonged to ſuch enterprizes. "It may be (ſaid he) that I may furniſh you with ſome advice more ſecure than yours is, Chæreas, for a more honeſter than it is, who is he that can propoſe? This ſaid, Clement returned to his houſe, ruminating with himſelf upon thoſe words which he had both heard and ſpoken. But Chæreas grew fearful, and conferred with the Colonel Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a lover of liberty, and greatly diſcontented with the eſtate for the miſeries of the Common-weal; and ſeeing it was neceſſary to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, he thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing leſt Clement ſhould diſcover all the Conſpiracy, conſidering that delay and procraſtination would be but an occaſion to hinder the action. When therefore he perceiv'd him to give ear to all that which he intended, and that already he was confirmed with no leſs reſolution than himſelf was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly communicate the ſame, he ſaid nothing: whereas otherwiſe he was ready, not only to conceal that which he had heard, but alſo declared that which he had in his heart, he was ſo much the more encouraged. For which cauſe, without further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable unto them in virtue, good affection, and great courage; and who beſides that, was ſuſpected by Caius by reaſon of Lepidus death. For, Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, and had been aſſociates in the ſame dangers. For Caius was feared by all thoſe who had any publick Office,, ſparing none of them in particular or general, but made them all groan under the burthen of his fury.

Annius Minucianus.

A Now they knew well one another, that all of them were diſpleaſed to ſee the Common-weal in that eſtate: but the apprehenſion of the danger ſuffered them not to manifeſt the hatred that each of them bare to Caius, although their ſecret conceit ingendred among them a certain Amity. For, before that time, as often as they met together, they were accuſtomed to eſteem Minucianus for the moſt honourable man of the Company, as in truth, among all the Citizens of Rome he was the moſt famous, valiant and beſt eſteemed among them: being therefore aſſembled at that time, he was firſt of all requeſted to ſpeak his opinion. For which cauſe he asked Chæreas what the watch-word was he had received that day (for all the City knew very well what mockery Caius uſually uſed in giving Chæreas the Watch-word:) Chæreas, notwithſtanding this diſgrace, B failed not to anſwer him, relying on the wiſdom of Minucianus, and ſaid unto him;

But give you me for the Watch-word, Liberty; mean while I give you thanks for that you have awakened me more ſpeedily, than of my ſelf I have accuſtomed to be. You need not now any further enforce your ſelf to incite me by your words, ſith both you and I have undertaken the ſame reſolution. Before we were aſſembled in this place, our thoughts were united. Behold here my ſword that is girt unto my ſide; this ſhall ſuffice for us both. And if you pleaſe you ſhall be my Captain, and I will march under your Command, and will follow you under aſſurance of your aſſiſtance and wiſdom. They, who have valiant hearts, never want Arms: for it is a confident courage that makes the weapon do execution. That C which kindleth me thus to this action, is not the conſideration of my particular intereſt: for I have not the leyſure to think on thoſe dangers that threaten me, through the grief that I conceive, to ſee the Liberty of my Countrey changed into ſlavery, and the force of the Laws wholly aboliſhed, and all ſorts of men condemned to death by Caius cruelty. It is I that deſerve to be truſted in this execution, and I make you my Judge, ſince you have the like intention that I have.

Chæreas with certain others intend to kill Caius.

Minucianus, perceiving with what affection Chæreas ſpake, embraced him with all love; and after he had praiſed him, he exhorted him to continue his conſtancy: then departed they one from the other, with prayers and wiſhes; and at that time there hapned a preſage that confirmed them the more. For as Chæreas entred into D the Senate, ſome one among the people caſt out a word, that redoubled his courage. Diſpatch (ſaid he) that which thou haſt to do; for God will aſſiſt thee. Chæreas was ſomewhat afraid, leſt ſome one of his Aſſociates had betrai'd him. But at laſt, he thought it was ſome one of thoſe, who, being privy to his reſolution, gave him a Watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, governing and obſerving humane affairs, puſhed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to divers; ſundry Senators, Knights, and Souldiers being advertiſed hereof were in Arms. For, there was not any one that ſuppoſed not that Caius death was the greateſt good hap the Common-wealth could expect. For which cauſe, all of them enforced themſelves as much as they could, to aſſiſt the execution with courageous and virtuous reſolution: and as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in E effect, deſiring each of them to be partakers in the diſpatch of a Tyrant. For Caliſthus alſo, who was Caius freeman, and raiſed by him to great Authority, yea, ſuch as almoſt equal'd him, adjoyned himſelf to them for the fear he apprehended of all men, and for thoſe great riches which he had gathered together, for that he was a man of a corrupt conſcience, and eaſily won by bribes and preſents, doing wrong to all men, and abuſing the power he had, againſt whomſoever he pleas'd, contrary to all right and reaſon. Beſides, for that he knew the unbridled nature of Caius, who having once conceived an ill opinion of any man, could never afterwards be diſſwaded or reconciled. Amongſt divers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatneſs of the danger F of his riches was not the leaſt, which was the cauſe that made him ſerve Claudius, and ſecretly to follow him, under hope, that after Caius death, he ſhould be his Succeſſour in the Empire, and that at that time he ſhould by him be maintained in the ſame eſtate, which he enjoyed: and by this means he thought to obtain his amity and good liking, by giving him to underſtand how Caius had commanded him to poyſon him, and how he had invented infinite delays to defer this execution. As for mine own part, I think that Caliſthus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been diſſwaded by Caliſthus allegations, who had preſently received his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Maſters command, with all expedition in a matter ſo acceptable to him. So it is, that the Providence of God G would not permit Caius to execute that rage againſt Claudius; and Caliſthus was thereby thanked for a benefit which he no ways deſerved.

Caliſthus, Caius freeman, certifies Claudius that Caius commanded him to poyſon him.

Thoſe that were about Chæreas day by day, followed the action very ſlowly, notwith-

Chæreas expecteth the occaſion to aſſail Caius.

ſtanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought on all occaſions fit to finiſh his purpoſe in, for that he might aſſail him at ſuch time at he aſcended up into the Capitol, or even then when he ſolemnized thoſe Ceremonies, which he had inſtituted in honour of his Daughter, or at ſuch time as he ſtood in the Palace to ſcatter Gold, and Silver among the people, by caſting him from the top of the Palace into the Market place, or at ſuch time as he celebrated thoſe Myſteries, that were introduced by him. For, no man ſuſpected Chæreas, ſo diſcreetly had he behaved himſelf in all things: and he perſwaded himſelf that no man would have thought that he ſhould lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet ſo it is, that the power of the Gods was ſufficient to give him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chæreas was ſore diſpleaſed againſt his companions, in reſpect that he feared that they would let ſlip their occaſion; and although they perfectly knew that he intended it for the maintenance of the Laws, and for the good of them all: yet did they requeſt him to delay a little, for fear leſt in the execution he ſhould in ſome ſort miſcarry, and for that cauſe the City might be brought in trouble by the informations that would be made of that act; and that at length when Caius ſhould be ſo much the better provided againſt them, they ſhould not know how to ſhew their virtue, when the time required that they ſhould aſſault and ſet upon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunity to ſet forward this buſineſs, ſhould be the time in which the Games of the Palace were celebrated, which were ſolemnized in honour of Cæſar, who firſt of all diſanulled the Peoples Authority, and appropriated it to himſelf. This Solemnity is celebrated in a Tent before the Palace, where the noble Citizens, with their wives and children remained to behold the ſport, and Cæſar himſelf likewiſe. At that time they concluded that it would be an eaſie matter for them, when ſo many thouſands of people ſhould be ſhut up in ſo narrow a place; ſo that he, who would ſtep formoſt to give the ſtroke, might very eaſily be ſuccoured, for that he could have no aſſiſtance, although his Guard ſhould have the courage and deſire to defend him. Chæreas reſolved upon this, and it was concluded that the firſt day of thoſe ſports that were next at hand, the deed ſhould be done: but their adventure was greater than their concluſion. For the delay was ſuch, as the third day was almoſt paſt, and hardly could they be drawn to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chæreas aſſembled all the Confederates, and told them that the opportunity of time had overſlipt them, accuſed and reproached them of ſlackneſs in that execution, which had been ſo virtuouſly reſolved among them: and that it was to be feared, leſt if any ſhould be diſcovered, the whole matter ſhould be fruſtrate: by which means Caius might grow more cruel than he was before. See we not (ſaid he) that by how much liberty we take from our ſelves, by ſo much we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought firſt of all to obtain ſecurity for our ſelves, and afterwards purchaſe perpetual felicity to others, the greateſt glory whereof ſhall redound unto our ſelves. Now they having nothing to reply againſt ſo honourable a reſolution, and yet notwithſtanding no ways enforcing themſelves towards the action, but remaining altogether amazed without one word ſpeaking, Chæreas ſpake thus:

The final concluſion of the Confederates as touching Caius death

Moſt noble and generous Gentlemen, what is the cauſe that we linger and delay in this manner? See you not that this day is the laſt day of the Games, and that Caius is ready to go to Sea? for he hath determined to ſail into Alexandria, and to ſee Egypt: truly it will be a ſmall honour for us, if we ſuffer him to eſcape out of our hands, to the end that both by land and Sea, he may triumph over the Romans negligence. How can we chuſe but condemn our ſelves juſtly, and challenge nothing but diſhonour, if ſome Egyptian ſuppoſing that men of free condition could not any longer endure his inſolence, ſhould put the matter in execution? For mine own part, I will dream no longer upon your conſultations, but this very day will I hazard my ſelf; and betide me what can, I will ſuſtain all fortunes with pleaſure and courage. For I am a man of that mind, that no danger can be ſo great or grievous to daunt me, or draw me from ſo worthy an enterprize which ſome other will put in execution if I delay, depriving me of the greateſt honour and glory that the world can afford for its deliverance. This ſaid he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the reſt to do the like; ſo that all of them were deſirous to ſet hand to the enterprize, without any further delay. The cuſtom was, that the Captains of the Guard entred the Palace with their ſwords by their ſides, and in ſuch equipage they asked the Emperor the Watch-word. At that time it fortuned that it was Chæreas turn to fetch the Watch-word, a great number of people had flocked to the Palace, to take up their places to behold the Games with great preſs and noiſe; wherein Caius was greatly

A greatly delighted: for there was no diſtinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one ſate together confuſedly, men and women, ſlaves and freemen. Caius, arriving there firſt, had offered ſacrifice in honour of Cæſar Auguſtus, in whoſe honour likewiſe thoſe ſports were ſolemnized. It came to paſs that whileſt thoſe Beaſts were embowelled, that were appointed for ſacrifice, Aſprenas Gown, who at that time was Senator, was beſprinkled with blood: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithſtanding, this was a preſage for Aſprenas. For he was ſlain that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaved himſelf moſt affably towards all men, ſo that all the aſſiſtance were aſtoniſhed to behold the courteſie that he uſed. After the ſacrifice was done, he ſate him B down to behold the Paſtimes, and had about him the moſt noble of his friends and familiars. Now was there every year a Theatre builded, according to this form and faſhion that enſueth: It had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening upon the porch, by which the actors had their egreſs and regreſs, without diſturbance of thoſe who ſate to behold the paſtime. There was within the ſame a certain room, ſeparated from the reſt, where the Players and Muſicians kept. When the people were ſeated, and Chæreas, with the Captains were near about Cæſar, who ſate on the right ſide of the Theatre: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Arms, asked Cluvitus privily in his ear, who ſate by him and had in like ſort been Conſul, whether he heard any news? who anſwering C him, that he had heard nothing. On this day (ſaid Batibius) ſhall the tragedy be plaid of a Tyrants death. Cluvitus made him this reply in Homers words.

Whiſt: leſt ſome Greek ſhould liſten to our talk.

Now whileſt ſome one darted certain apples and rare and precious Birds at the people, Caius took great pleaſure to behold how they ſtrove one with another round about him, buffeting one another to ſee who ſhould get the ſame: but at that preſent there chanced two preſages: for the ſport that was repreſented, was of a Judge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the Dance they repreſented Cynera, who D was killed with Myrrha her Daughter: and there was a great quantity of blood gathered to counterfeit both the murther of the Judge that was crucified, as alſo of Cynera. It is affirmed likewiſe, that the day was the very ſame, whereon Philip the Son of Amyntas King of Macedon, had been killed by Pauſanias one of his familiars, at ſuch time as he entred the Theatre. Whilſt Caius was incertain with himſelf whether he ſhould remain until the ſports were finiſhed, for that it was the laſt day of them, or rather ſhould reſort to the Bath, and after he had refreſhed himſelf, return back again thither as he had done before; Minucianus ſitting next unto him, fearing leſt the occaſion ſhould be overſlipt, becauſe he had ſeen Chæreas go out of doors, with an intent to go and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the E Gown, ſaying, Whither go you, my friend? At which time for the reverence ſake that he bare unto Cæſar, he ſat him down again: but the fear that he had, grew ſo forcible, that he aroſe again; ſo that Caius could not detain him, ſuppoſing that he had gone thence to diſpatch ſome important buſineſs. At that time did Aſprenas counſel Cæſar to repair to the Bath, telling him that after his refreſhment he might return thither again; all which he did, being deſirous that the reſolution might take effect. They that were with Chæreas were ready diſpoſed to take advantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to ſtand prepared and in a readineſs, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the Tragedy: and the delay ſeemed very tedious to them, for it was already three a clock afternoon. So that Chæreas ſeeing that Caius F lingred ſo long, intended to go in unto him and aſſail him in his ſeat: but he conceived that he could not bring that to paſs without great loſs and murther of the Senators, and Knights that were preſent. Now although he had this apprehenſion, yet addreſſed he himſelf to the execution thereof, ſuppoſing that the loſs that might happen by the death of ſome one, would be well recompenſed by the ſecurity and liberty, that would redound unto all men. When as therefore they were in a readineſs to enter the Theatre, news was brought them, that Caius was riſen to come forth; by means whereof there aroſe ſome noiſe. For which cauſe the Confedeſates turned back into the Theatre, and appeaſed the people, telling them that they diſpleaſed and annoyed the Emperor: but the effect was, to draw him aſide from all thoſe, G who might yield him any aſſiſtance; and ſo to ſet upon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his Uncle, and M. Minucianus his Siſters Husband and Valerius who at that time was Proconſul, who might not by any means be drawn from their place, although they had the will, by reaſon of the Place and Dignity which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Aruntius. Now when he was entred into the Palace, he left the ready way where his Officers were, and Claudius and his Aſſociates held : and turned aſide by an unfrequented way to the Baths, on purpoſe to ſee certain young Boys, who were come out of Aſia, and were ſent him out of that Countrey, partly to ſing in thoſe Ceremonies that were inſtituted by him, and partly to dance in Arms about the Theater; and in that place Chæreas came and encountred him, asking him the Watch-word: which Caius gave him very reproachfully according to his cuſtom. For which cauſe without any further delay, Chæreas aſſailing him both in word and act, drew his ſword and gave him a great wound, which notwithſtanding was not mortal: ſome ſay that Chæreas purpoſely wounded him after that manner, becauſe he would not kill him at once, but to his greater torment increaſe the number of his wounds: but I connot believe it, for that in ſuch executions a man hath no leyſure to determine how to ſtrike. And if Chæreas had ſuch an intention, I account him the verieſt fool that might be, for he rather took pleaſure to content his deſpite, than readily to deliver both himſelf and others, who, by his delay, in being of his Confederacy might be drawn into hazard. For, if Caius had not been ſuddenly killed, he could not have wanted reſcue, and it ſhould ſeem that Chæreas had not pretended to do ſo much miſchief to Caius, as to himſelf and his Fellow-confederates. And being in this uncertainty, whether his enterprize ſhould have fallen out happily or no, he had without reaſon both undone himſelf and loſt the occaſion, whereas having happily hit home, he might without a word ſpeaking ſecure himſelf againſt thoſe who would offend him But let every man think what beſt pleaſeth him. Caius feeling the grief of the wound (for he was ſtricken between the ſhoulder and the neck, and his ſword could not pierce further, by reaſon that it hit upon the firſt bone of the breaſt) he cried not at all, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he diſtruſted them all, or that he had ſome other thoughts; and in lamenting himſelf he paſſed forward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus who was already prepared to encounter him, who thruſt him down upon his knees: whereupon all of them environed him round about, and with mutual exhortations encouraged one another to do their utmoſt in murthering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gave him the deadly wound, that ſevered his ſoul from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chæreas: For though divers ſet to their hands in the action, yet was he the firſt who had bethought him of the action, having a long time before any of them premeditated the ſame, after what ſort it ſhould be attempted: and he alſo was the firſt that durſt boldly impart it unto others, and who after they had allowed of his reſolution, aſſembled them: and when every one was to ſpeak his opinion, he concluded the ſame very diſcreetly, and had always done far more than the reſt; ſo that by his earneſt and honourable perſwaſions, he encouraged thoſe that were faint-hearted, ſince at ſuch time as the opportunity preſented it ſelf, to ſet hand to the execution, he was the firſt that attempted it, and who valiantly ſtruck and made an eaſie way to the reſt, who found Caius calm enough, for he was almoſt dead. For which cauſe, it is neceſſary that all which others have done, ſhould be aſcribed to Chæreas advice, vertue and diligence.

Aquila gave Caius his deaths wound: but Chæreas was the author and chief actor of the tragedy.

Chæreas with his Confederates retireth into Germanicus houſe.

The Germans Cæſars Guard.

Thus died Caius, being ſtruck with many mortal wounds. Now when Chæreas and his Companions had diſpatched him, they perceived well that it would be impoſſible for them to ſave themſelves, if ſo be they ſhould return by the way that they came; ſo much were they raviſhed with that which they had done: For they drew themſelves into no ſmall danger by murthering an Emperour, who was cheriſhed and beloved through the folly of the common people, and whoſe death the Soldiers would not leave unpuniſhed. Now in that the ways were narrow where the murther was done, and they themſelves alſo were hindred by reaſon of the great number of people, and Officers and Soldiers that gave their attendance that day in guarding the Emperour; they took another way, and retired themſelves into Germanicus's lodging, who was Caius's Father, whom they had lately killed. This houſe adjoyned unto the Palace. For although the Palace was but one, yet conſiſted it of divers lodgings which were builded by ſeveral Emperours; whoſe names, whether they had begun or finiſhed the works, were impoſed upon the ſame Buildings. When therefore they had eſcaped from the preſs, they were in ſafety as long as the inconvenience that had befallen the Emperour was yet hidden. The firſt report of his death came to the Germans who were of his Guard, being a Company choſen out of that Nation named the Celtique Band, for the preſervation of the Emperours Perſon. Theſe men are

A are very prone unto wrath, and amongſt all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the cauſes of their execution : otherwiſe they are men ſtrong in body, and who in the Wars always give the firſt onſet, yielding great advantage to thoſe on whoſe ſide they fight. They having notice of Caius murther, were vehemently grieved thereat, for that it is their manner to cenſure all things not according to right, but as they were anſwerable to their own profits : Caius eſpecially was dearly beloved by them, for he had obtained their favour by beſtowing much money upon them. Their Captain was one called Sabinus, who was not advanced to that dignity, either for his virtue or for the Nobility of his Anceſtors (for he was but a Fencer) but for his mighty ſtrength and huge body. They therefore ran about with B their naked ſwords ſearching for Cæſars murtherers from houſe to houſe ; and meeting with Aſprenas at firſt, whoſe Gown (as we have ſaid) was bebloodied with the blood of the ſacrifice, which was a preſage that boded him but little good fortune, they hewed him in pieces. The ſecond was Norbanus (who for his Nobility and Anceſtors might derive his Titles from the nobleſt Citizens, amongſt whom were divers Generals of Armies) who ſeeing they made no reckoning of his Dignity, and being of himſelf endowed with great force and ſtrength, he took a ſword from one of them which firſt aſſailed him ; with whom he grapled , and made them know that he intended they ſhould buy his blood very dearly ; nnd indeed ſo had he done, but that, being environed by divers, who aſſailed him at once, he was beaten C down, and ſtruck with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with ſome others met not with theſe men by chance, as the two other had done ; but to ſhew the hatred that he bare unto Caius, and the pleaſure that he took to ſee him lye dead, was come out of his houſe, being egged on with envy to feed his eyes with that ſpectacle. For Caius had baniſhed Anteius Father, whoſe name likewiſe was Anteius, and not content therewith, he had ſent his Souldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleaſure beheld the carcaſe of this Tyrant ; but hearing the uproar that was raiſed in every part of the houſe, he thought good to hide himſelf : yet could he not avoid the narrow ſearch of the Germans, who were ſo diſpleaſed, that they killed all they met, whether they were D guilty or guiltleſs of the fact : Thus were theſe three made away.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theatre, every one was amazed, and could ſcarcely believe it. For although divers of them were very glad that he was taken out of the world, perſwading themſelves that it would highly profit them ; yet did their fear hinder their belief. On the other ſide, there were ſome, who deſiring not that any ſuch miſhap ſhould befal Cæſar, and conceiving in their thoughts, that it was impoſſible to be done, for that there was no men ſo bold, as to attempt it ; they ſuppoſed the report to be altogether falſe. Of this mind were certain women and children, ſlaves and ſouldiers. Theſe by reaſon they received wages at his hand, tyrannized with him, being his miniſters in all thoſe abuſes that he E offered to many good Citizens, in partaking the booty, and other advantages that Caius drew unto him. As for the Women and Children, they were of that opinion, by reaſon that ſuch kind of people take delight in Plays, Jeſts, Donations of fleſh, and other ſuch Paſtimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to have means to ſatisfie his rage and cruelty. He was alſo gracious among the ſervants and ſlaves, for that by him they had liberty to accuſe and contemn their Maſters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falſly accuſed their Maſters, they were eaſily believed ; and when they diſcovered their Maſters treaſures, in recompenſe of their diſcovery they were not only made free by him, but alſo ſent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that F was aſſigned them, was the eighth part of thoſe goods that were confiſcated. As for certain of the Nobility, although the matter ſeemed true to ſome of them, for that before they were privy to that which the reſt intended, and notwithſtanding they deſired that the enterprize ſhould be effected ; yet kept they all things cloſe, and gave no ſign of joy, nor made any ſhew that they heard that which was reported.
For ſome of them feared leſt if they ſhould be fruſtrated of their hope, they ſhould bring themſelves in danger of puniſhment, for having diſcovered their intent ſooner than they ſhould have done. They likewiſe who knew the enterprize and were Confederates with the Actors ; yet did they more cloſely conceal it the one from the other, fearing leſt if they ſhould diſcover the matter to any one of G thoſe, who drew any commodity from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them : whereby if Caius ſhould be yet alive, they might incur the danger of puniſhment.
For the report was, that he had been wounded in certain places ; yet that he was not killed ;

killed ; but as yet alive, and among his Phyſicians hands, who dreſſed his wounds. H No man therefore durſt freely diſcover the ſecrets of his heart to his Neighbour ; for they that ſpread thoſe reports, were either friends (and for that cauſe were ſuſpected as favourers of his Tyranny) or enemies, and by that means, in that they were but ſiniſterly affected towards Caius, there was no certainty to be gathered of that which they ſaid. There aroſe alſo another report, which daunted and beat down the hearts and hopes of the Nobility ; namely, that Caius ſetting light by the danger wherein he was, and as little alſo by the wounds he had received, was come into the Market-place all bloody as he was, and after this manner declaimed before the people : See here, how they that ſpread theſe rumours, preferred their conjectures, which were void of all reaſon : which diſtracted thoſe that heard it, according as they were affected. Notwithſtanding I all this, no man removed from his place, for fear leſt they ſhould be ſuddenly accuſed ; knowing well that they ſhould be accuſed, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the diſpoſition of their Judges and Accuſers.

The German Soldiers reſort to the Theatre.

But after that the Germans had environed the Theatre with their naked Swords, all that were preſent expected nothing but death ; and as ſoon as any man entred, they were ſeized with ſuch an amazement, as if they had already felt the ſtrokes ; ſo that they knew not what to do, having no heart to depart from thence ; and otherwiſe perſwading themſelves, that if they ſtayed there any longer, it would breed them further danger. At length, when the Soldiers were entred into the Theatre by force, all the Aſſembly cried out, proteſting that whatſoever was done, it was beſides their K knowledg, whether it were either attempted by Conſpiracy, or any other means. They therefore moſt humbly entreated them, that they would ſpare them, and not inflict the penalty of the guilty on thoſe that were innocent : For their own parts, they prayed them to ſearch out thoſe who had committed the act, if any ſuch thing were committed. And thus ſpake they with tears, beating their breaſts, and calling the Gods to witneſs ; alledging that which the preſent danger ſuggeſted them with, and as much as ſuch as pleaded for their lives could ſay. By theſe perſwaſions of theirs the Soldiers fury was abated, ſo that they began to repent for what they had executed in the Theatre ; for this alſo was a cruelty, as they themſelves (notwithſtanding their barbarous incivility) ſuppoſed it to be, which was, that the heads of Aſprenas and others that were L killed, were carried and ſet upon an Altar. Whereat all the Aſſiſtants were moſt grievouſly diſcontented, remembring themſelves of the dignity of the men, and having compaſſion of that which had befallen them ; conſidering alſo, that they themſelves were not far off from dangers, being uncertain whether they ſhould ſave themſelves : whereby it came to paſs, that ſome of thoſe who had cauſe to hate Caius, durſt not freely rejoyce at his death, becauſe they were upon the point to loſe their own lives, having as yet no appearance of any ſafety.

Auruntius entreth the Theatre, and ſignifieth the Emperour's death.

At length Auruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common Criers, who had a ſtrong voice ; and by crying ſuch goods as were to be ſold, had gathered ſo great ſubſtance, as that he was accounted one of the richeſt men in M Rome, and in great eſteem amongſt all men in that behalf, entred the Theatre in a mourning Habit, and after a lamentable manner : And although he inwardly hated Caius, yet for the fear he conceived leſt he ſhould loſe his goods, and in conſideration of the preſent danger, he diſſembled his joy ; wearing all thoſe Garments of mourning, and uſing no leſs lamentation, than if he had bemoaned the death of his deareſt friend. After this manner he came into the Theatre, publiſhing Caius's death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned : After this, he began to repreſs the rage of the Germans, and commanded their Captains and Tribunes to put up their Swords, aſſuring them of the Emperour's death ; which act of his did manifeſtly ſave the lives of all thoſe who were aſſembled in the Theatre, and all them likewiſe, N whom they could have met with. For if they had had but the leaſt ſurmiſe, that Caius had as yet been alive, there was not any ſort of cruelty which they had not committed : For they bare him ſo great love and affection, that to ſecure him from that miſfortune, they would have redeemed him with the loſs of their own lives. But as ſoon as they underſtood he was dead, they repreſſed their furious rage, which egged them forward to revenge ; knowing that it availed them nothing, to diſcover their affections towards him, in that he could yield them no requital. Beſides, the fear they had, leſt, that in purſuit of their Tyrannous Murthers, the Senate ſhould be incenſed againſt them, if ſo be the Government of the Eſtate ſhould be returned into their hands, made them contain themſelves. Thus was the fury of thoſe Germans appeaſed for the death O of Caius.

The Germans fury, awakened by the death of Caius, is pacified.

Whereupon Minucianus and Clement were brought unto him, who in his preſence commended Chæreas's exploit, and gave him thanks in the name of the whole Senate; who witneſſed that it was to the general benefit, and good of the Commonweal; and that the greateſt perſons were beholding to him, for that he had neither wanted good advice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his reſolution; alledging that the nature of Tyranny was ſuch, that being puffed up with a ſhort pleaſure of unjuſt and intolerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in miſery, as manifeſtly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who, before any thing was B either deviſed, practiſed or executed againſt him, was already hateful to all men; and had in ſuch ſort violated all Laws, that his greateſt friends were reſolved to take Arms againſt him, who in appearance had deprived him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himſelf, who was the Author of his own ruine.

Hereupon all they aroſe who were in the Theatre, and raiſed great noiſe and trouble in ſeeking to ſave themſelves. The occaſion was, that a certain Phyſician called Arcion, being called out to go and dreſs cerain men that were wounded; making a ſhew as if he went to go and prepare ſuch things as were neceſſary for thoſe that were wounded, made thoſe iſſue out with him who ſate neareſt unto him; but the truth was, he did it to the end to draw them out of the preſent danger. Mean-while the Senate aſſembled C themſelves in the Palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after thoſe who had murthered Caius: The people with an entire and ſimple intent, the Senate only to uſe ſome formal proceeding. For Valerius Aſiaticus, who had formerly been Conſul, came forth among the people, who were in an uproar; and ſuppoſing it a ſtrange matter that no man knew who had killed the Emperour, whilſt every one enquired who it was that had done the deed; O, ſaid he, would it had been I that had done it. But the Conſuls publiſhed an Edict, containing the Accuſations that were preſented againſt Caius; commanding the people and Soldiers, who were as yet in the Theatre, to retire themſelves to their Lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they ſhould be eaſed of thoſe Taxations, wherewith they had been burthened: And the D Soldiers were promiſed Honours and Dignities, if they would contain themſelves in their accuſtomed order, and ſtir up no further trouble. For it was to be feared, leſt if they had been further fleſhed in Murthers, the City ſhould have fallen into ſome great danger, through Rapines and Spoils both of Houſes and Temples. But by this time all the whole Senate was aſſembled, eſpecially thoſe who were Confederates in Caius's murther; who ſeemed to gather courage, and to ſpeak boldly, as if the Government of the Eſtate had been fallen into their hands.

WHilſt the Eſtate of the Empire was thus diſtracted, Claudius was ſuddenly fetcht out of his houſe: for the Soldiers aſſembling themſelves together, and conferring among themſelves what was requiſite to be done, perceived that it was impoſſible F that ſo many, and ſo weighty affairs of the Commonweal, ſhould be well managed by a Popular Government; and grant it could be poſſible, that it would yield them little or no profit: On the other ſide, if it ſhould happen that one of the chiefeſt of the Senate were choſen, that he would prove their enemy, for not having contributed to his Election. Whilſt therefore, the Sovereign Authority remained as yet undiſpoſed of, they thought fit to elect Claudius, who was Caius's Unkle, for their Emperour; who was a man of that reputation, that none of thoſe who were aſſembled in the Senate, was more capable than he was, both in regard of his Birth, and alſo of his good Education; who likewiſe being by them exalted to the Dignity of the Empire, would honour them and with all anſwerable bounty acknowledg their good deſerts. Cnaius Sentius Saturninus declaimeth in the Senate.
Liberty a precious thing.

You Lords of Rome, although it be incredible, that the Liberty which hath ſo long time been unexpected, ſhould return and viſit us; yet ſo it is, that we ſee the excellency thereof, although it be uncertain how long time the Gods will beſtow it on us; which is ſuch, that it may rejoyce us for the preſent, what iſſue ſoever it may have hereafter. For to them that know what Virtue is, it is no ſmall felicity to live one hour in freedom of mind, and in a free Countrey, and governed by ſuch Laws, which in times paſt have made our Commonweal to flouriſh. For mine own part, I cannot remember our ancient Liberty, for that I was born after the ſubverſion thereof: But I infinitely deſire to have the happy fruition of that which we enjoy at this preſent. And I think them alſo very happy, who are born and I brought up in virtuous Studies. I likewiſe ſuppoſe that a ſecond honour next to the immortal Gods, is to be aſcribed to them, by whoſe Virtue at laſt, though very late, even in this our Age, we have obtained the felicity to enjoy the ſame; which happineſs would God, with our Inheritances, we might bequeath to our Poſterity. For in regard of our ſelves, this day ſufficeth us both, as well all thoſe that are young, as they alſo who are old. For the Aged ſhall forſake this life with more pleaſure, in that they have had the knowledge of that Bleſſing, which is joyned to their Liberty: And the younger ſhall be furniſhed with a Royal Example, in admiring and knowing their Virtues, by whom we enjoy this benefit of Freedom.
For in regard of the preſent time, there is not any thing that we ought more earneſtly to affect, than to live virtuouſly; for only Virtue is the thing that confirmeth men in their Li- K berty. I cannot ſpeak of the time paſt, but only by hear-ſay; but for what I have ſeen with mine eyes, and perceived by my obſervation, I know how great miſchiefs Tyrannies do ordinarily breed in a Politick Eſtate: For they utterly exſtinguiſh all Virtue, and deprive Free men of all that perfect magnanimity that may be in them; and teach both to flatter, and to fear, for that the Commonweal is abandoned, not to the wiſdom of the Laws, but to the fury of intemperate Governours. For ſince Julius Cæſar bent his thoughts to overthrow the Popular Government in Rome. and violated the happy courſe of Law, whereby our State flouriſhed, the Commonweal hath been overthrown. For in ſubjecting the Law to his good liking, and himſelf to his particular deſires, there is not any kind of miſery and miſchief, that hath not overthrown our City; ſo that his Succeſſors have employed themſelves to the uttermoſt, and with a certain emulation, to aboliſh the Laws of our Countrey; ſtriving L which of them might diprive our Commonweal of her Nobleſt Citizens: For that they have made their account, that their ſecurity conſiſted in communicating their ſecrets with ſuch as were baſe and abject; abaſing, not only the great Courages of thoſe men, who were famous for their Nobility and Virtue; but alſo by murthering a great number of them by all ſorts of Puniſhments: And whilſt all of them endeavoured to be abſolute in their Command, they made it their buſineſs to oppreſs the Commonwealth.

Liberty purchaſed by Virtue.
Tyrannies breed many miſchiefs in Commonweals.

Julius Cæſar.

But amongſt all the reſt, Caius, who this day hath loſt the benefit of life, hath wrought greater miſchiefs himſelf alone, than any other, by diſcharging his bruitiſh and beaſtly wrath, not only againſt the common Citizens, but alſo againſt his own Parents and Friends; demeaning himſelf alike towards all men; and manifeſting his injuſtice, in that he purſued M them moſt, who were moſt innocent; and by this means grew hateful, not only to men, but alſo to the Immortal Gods. For it is not enough for Tyrants to ſatisfie their Concupiſcence, to uſe all ſorts of Injuries, to raviſh both men's Wealth and their Wives; but alſo, they glory, when they may utterly ruine both their Fortunes and Families, who are their enemies.
For all Liberty is oppoſed againſt Tyranny, and it is impoſſible (notwithſtanding all the miſeries that may be imagined or offered) that Free-men ſhould agree with Tyrants, how little time ſoever it be that they have exerciſed their Tyranny. They alſo know too well, with how many miſchiefs they have entangled their Subjects (although they have not the ſpirits to revenge themſelves of thoſe wrongs that are done unto them) and being well aſſured into N what incumbrances they have drawn them, perſwade themſelves, that they have but one only means left them to ſecure themſelves from ſuſpitions, and to procure their own ſecurity; which is, to put them to death, if they may poſſibly do it. Since therefore at this time you are delivered from ſo many miſchiefs, and are no more ſubject, except to one another (which is a Pledge of Concord for the preſent, and of ſecurity in time to come, and Glory unto him that hath redreſſed the Eſtate) you ſhall deal very well and wiſely in my opinion, to provide for the Commonweal; foreſeeing very diligently, all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to ſpeak his opinion of that which diſpleaſeth him, for that there is no Superiour to countermand their ſayings, or that is exempt from reproof, if he offend againſt the Commonweal, or that may threaten with the Authority of O an Emperour, for that ſhall be ſaid. For what elſe, in theſe later times, hath encreaſed and furthered our over-topping Tyranny, than their ſlothful fear, who durſt in no wiſe oppoſe

An Exhortation to maintain Liberty.

A themſelves againſt his Luſt? For being entangled by a certain kind of pleaſure of a quiet life, and accuſtomed to live after the manner of Slaves, and being afraid alſo to die virtuouſly, and deſirous to live with ſhame, we are fallen into theſe ſcarce ſufferable Calamities, and into ſuch miſchiefs as have concerned us too nearly. Firſt of all therefore, you ought to honour thoſe who have killed the Tyrant, by dignifying them with as great honours as may be imagined, and eſpecially Chæreas. For he only hath been the man, who by the power of the Gods, and through his great wiſdom and valour, hath given you your Liberty. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heap Honours on his head; yea, ſpecial favours, as to the man who firſt of all conſulted, and firſt of all hazarded himſelf againſt a Tyrant, for your liberty. It is an honeſt, and well-beſeeming action of men of free hearts, to B reſtore and repay ſuitable kindneſs for the benefits they have received: Such is this man in your behalf; not like to Brutus and Caſſius, who murthered Cæſar; for they were the Originals of Seditions and Civil Wars in this City: And this man, by the death of a Tyrant, hath not only at once delivered you of him, but alſo hath cut off thoſe miſchiefs that aroſe by him.

Chæreas to be honoured for his Noble Attempt.

Thus ſpake Sentius, and his advice was entertained with great applauſe, not only by the Senators, but the Knights alſo that were there preſent. Whereupon, a Senator, called Trebellius Maximus, aroſe; and ſtepping to him, pulled off the Ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inchaſed a Stone with Caius's Picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off; ſo intent was he about that which he both ſaid and did; C and by this means the engraved Image was broken. Now, in regard it was late, Chæreas demanded the Watch-word from the Conſul; who gave him the word, Liberty. They were all aſtoniſhed at this change, and could ſcarcely believe that which hapned. For ſince the Popular Government had been aboliſhed, the Conſuls had never given the Watch-word, until that preſent time: For before the City was oppreſſed by Tyranny, the Conſuls commanded the Soldiers. After that Chæreas had received the Word, he gave it his Soldiers, who ſubſcribed to the Senate's Authority: Of theſe there were about four Companies, which preferred the Lawful Government before a Tyranny; who alſo retired themſelves to their Officers. As for the people, they returned to their reſpective homes, full of joy, hope and courage, for that they had D regained the Government of the State, which belonged unto them, and not to any particular Governour. In a word, Chæreas was their only hope: He foreſeeing that there would ſome miſchief follow, if Caius's Wife and Daughter ſhould remain alive; and that if all his Friends and Family ſhould not be utterly extinguiſhed, all thoſe who ſhould be ſpared, would ſerve to no other end, but to the ruine of the Commonweal, and the Laws: And on the other ſide, deſiring to ſee an end of that which he had begun, and to ſatisfie that hatred he had conceived againſt Caius; he ſent Julius Lupus, one of the Captains of the Guard, to kill both his Wife and Daughter; which he did. And the cauſe why he gave this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clement's Kinſman, who was a Confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end, that E partaking after this manner in the death of the Tyrant, he might be known to have dealt as forwardly for the Commonweal, as if, from the beginning, he had been a Counſeller and Agent in the Conſpiracy. Notwithſtanding there were ſome of his Companions of that opinion, that it ſhould be but a cruelty to deal with a woman in that ſort, for that Caius had offended through the corruption of his own Nature, and not by the counſel of his Wife; and that all thoſe evils which he committed in the Commonweal, by deſolating the Flower thereof, was his own offence, not hers.

Chæreas requireth a Watchword at the Conſuls hands.

Chæreas ſendeth Julius Lupus to kill Caius's Wife and Daughter.

There were others that accuſed her to be the cauſe of all that which Caius had committed; alledging that ſhe had given him an Amorous Drink, by which he was tied and entangled in ſuch ſort unto her, and ſo led and tranſported by her love, that F ſhe governed all that which concerned the Eſtate of Rome, and the World ſubject to Rome: But her Defenders prevailed nothing. For at length it was reſolved ſhe ſhould loſe her life.

To finiſh this Tragedy Lupus was diſpatcht, who loſt no time in the accompliſhment of their intent who had ſent him, for fear he might have been blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the Commonweal. Therefore, as ſoon as he came into the Palace, he found Cæſonia, Caius's Widow, lying by the body of her murthered Huſband, deſtitute of all that which the Law gratifieth thoſe that are dead with; altogether bloody, and greatly afflicted; having her Daughter lying by her: being in this condition, ſhe was heard to utter no other words, but that ſhe blamed G Caius, for that he had not given credit to that counſel which ſhe had given him ſo often; which words of hers, were by ſome interpreted two ways; for ſome thought that ſhe meant, that ſhe had counſelled her Huſband to give over his Cruelty, and murthers which he exerciſed againſt his Citizens; and that in his Government, he ſhould uſe a tempered meaſure with virtue, for fear, leſt his Subjects miſliking of his manners, ſhould ſeek his deſtruction. Others took it, as if ſhe had encouraged Caius to ſet upon the Conſpirators, and kill them without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that means provide for his ſecurity. They therefore ſaid, that Cæſonia blamed Caius, for that he had behaved himſelf too careleſly, in that wherein ſhe had counſelled him. Such were the words which Cæſonia ſpake, and ſuch was the expoſition, as divers men interpreted them.

She ſeeing Lupus coming, ſhewed him Caius's body, and prayed him with tears and complaints to come nearer: But perceiving that he made no anſwer, then ſhe knew the cauſe of his arrival, and offered her naked throat unto him with a great courage, uſing ſuch expreſſions as they ordinarily do, who deſpair of their lives; ſhe deſired him to defer no longer to finiſh that Tragedy which his Companions had begun; and ſo died couragiouſly, by the hand of Lupus: and after her, was her Daughter killed, which was very young. This did Lupus aſſure Chæreas of with all expedition. This was Caius's end, after he had reigned four years wanting four months. Before ſuch time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate and wicked man, and addicted to his pleaſure, a favourer of Tale-bearers, exceeding fearful; and for that cauſe, when he got the upper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He eſteemed this the only fruit of his power, to abuſe it againſt Innocents; and to gather and heap up great ſpoils and Booties, by wicked and unjuſt Murthers, Rapines and Oppreſſions; lifting himſelf above all Humane Authority, and affecting to be eſteemed as a God, ſuffering himſelf to be tranſported by the people's Praiſes; All that which the Law condemned and puniſhed, as a thing moſt deteſtable, that made he uſe of to puniſh Virtue with. He never remembred any friendſhip that had been done him, how great ſoever it either was or had been, when he was in his paſſion; and was apt to inflict puniſhments in his rage, on juſt and upright men. All that which was anſwerable to Virtue, was odious in his eyes. In all things that pleaſed him, he had ſo violent Appetites, that it was impoſſible to contradict him; ſo that he was not aſhamed to uſe the unlawful company of his own Siſter: Whereby it came to paſs, that the Citizens of Rome began to hate him extreamly, for that the like had not been ſeen or heard of; of a long time men could not believe it, notwithſtanding they ſufficiently expreſſed the hatred they bare againſt the fact he had committed. It cannot be ſaid of him, that he builded any work beſeeming his Royal Magnificence, worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the preſent or future world; except ſome Ports that he made near to Rhegium and Sicilia, for Harbour of ſuch Ships as came and went into Egypt for Corn; which doubtleſs, is a ſtately work, and very profitable for ſuch as travel by Sea. True it is, that it was not brought to perfection, but only half finiſhed, becauſe the Work-men wrought ſlowly. But the chief cauſe thereof was, that he ſpent his ſtudy in unprofitable matters, and loved rather to conſume his Subſtance, to feed his own private Luſts, wherein he took great delight, than to erect and build any goodly and famous Work, which might have redounded to the profit of the Common-weal. Otherwiſe, he was an eloquent man, and very expert in the Greek and Vulgar Roman Tongues, apprehending preſently that which others ſaid; and although they had been tedious in their expreſſions, yet he anſwered them in an inſtant; and in Affairs of Conſequence, he had ſuch a moving perſwaſion and power, that no man could exceed him, both in regard of his quick Wit, and eaſie apprehenſion, becauſe he had taken pains, and had exerciſed himſelf in Learning. For being Tiberius's Brother's Son, whoſe Succeſſor he alſo was, he was enforced to be ſtudious; ſeeing that Tiberius, who was of the ſame years, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therefore enforced himſelf to imitate the Emperour Tiberius, whoſe near Kinſ-man he was; and ſurpaſſed all thoſe that were in Rome at that time: Yet, notwithſtanding all theſe great advantages, which his good inſtruction had bred in him, could not hinder the misfortune that befell him, by the abuſe of his Authority. So rare a thing it is to ſee them who have liberty, to do what they liſt without puniſhment, to govern themſelves with modeſty. In the beginning he took delight in the friendſhip of very honeſt men, to get credit and reputation, thinking to outſtrip the moſt excellent: But after he was given over to licentiouſneſs, the affection that he bare them was changed; and inſtead thereof, he grew more averſe from them daily; whereby they were enforced to conſpire againſt him, and ſeek his ruine.

A his danger, except his Nobility. For during the time that he lived a private man, he behaved himſelf modeſtly, kindly, and favourably unto all men, being well ſeen in the Sciences, and principally in the Greek tongue, ſhunning as much as in him lay, all tumult and train that might breed trouble. When as therefore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the Palace was full of fury and fear, and nothing reigned more in general than confuſion and diſorder; the Souldiers of the Guard, who were the moſt experienced and bold, conſulted amongſt themſelves what courſe they were to take. Neither were they much diſcontented with Caius death, in that they ſuppoſed that upon juſt occaſion, he was put to death, for which cauſe they rather bethought themſelves on that which concerned their fortunes, and how they B might aſſure themſelves in thoſe dangers, ſeeing the Germans were wholly bent againſt thoſe, who had killed Caius; rather incited thereunto of their own cruel natures, than of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the Common-weal. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in fear of his life, the rather for that he ſaw Aſprenas head and the reſt of the Nobility that were maſſacred, carried about to be ſeen: for this cauſe he kept himſelf in a certain place, which was only acceſſible by certain ſteps or ſtairs, and hid himſelf therein, becauſe it was obſcure. In that place one of the Souldiers of the Palace called Gratus, being unable to diſcern who he was, in regard of the obſcurity of the place, and ſuppoſing him to be ſome one that deſired to be concealed, he drew near unto him to the intent he might the C better know him: and when Claudius beſought him, that he would depart and leave him, he paſſed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to thoſe that followed him: This is Germanicus, let us take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiving that he was ready to be attached, and fearing leſt they ſhould put him to death as they had done Caius, beſought them that they would pardon him, proteſting unto them his innocency, and how he had no ways been either acceſſary or agent in that which had been done. Whereupon Gratus beginning to ſmile, took him by the hand, ſaying, that he had no cauſe to ſuſpect his life: “For (ſaid he) it behoveth thee to rouſe up thy “ſpirits, and to bethink thee how to govern an Empire, of which the gods (who D “have the care of the whole world) have deprived Caius, to reward thy virtue with. “Ariſe therefore, and take poſſeſſion of the Throne of thine Anceſtors. This ſaid, he lifted him on his ſhoulders, for that Claudius could not walk on foot, through the fear and joy that he had conceived of that which had been told him.

Upon theſe ſpeeches divers of the Souldiers of the Guard aſſembled about Gratus and perceiving that it was Claudius, whom they ſuppoſed to be dragged to his death, they had compaſſion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of a milde nature, who all the time of his life intermedled with nothing, and who in like ſort had been often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that ſaid, that the judgment of this matter belonged to the Conſuls: whereupon, E although a great number of Souldiers flocked about him, and the ſimple people that were unarmed fled from them; yet could not Claudius go on his way; ſo weak and feeble felt he himſelf in his whole body. It fortuned likewiſe, that they who carried his litter, perceiving his plight, fled away for fear, and left him, ſo little hope had they that their Maſter ſhould eſcape with his life, whom they ſaw to be thus drawn by the Souldiers. Now when Gratus and his Aſſociates were arrived in the Court of the Palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was firſt of all inhabited in Rome, they began to think upon that which was to be done: thither alſo there flocked a great number of other Souldiers unto them, who took pleaſure to behold Claudius, enforcing themſelves to place him in the Imperial Dignity, in regard of F that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his Brother, whoſe memory was much honoured among all thoſe, who had converſed with him. Moreover, they ripped up how many avaritious acts the Senate had committed, and how great errors the chiefeſt Senators had been guilty of, before the Publick Government was changed. Moreover, they conſidered the danger and difficulty of their actions then in hand, for that the Government being adminiſtred by one only man, would be dangerous for them, if he ſhould obtain the ſame by any other means; whereas if Claudius ſhould enjoy the ſame by their permiſſion and good will, he woud have them in remembrance who had favoured him, and would recompence them according to their merits. This was the effect of their diſcourſe, which they held among themſelves, or when they met G with one another. All of them at length concluded upon this advice, and environed Claudius, and lifting him up upon their ſhoulders, they carried him into the Army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finiſh that which they intended.

Difference betwixt the Citizens and Senators.

H There fell a debate alſo betwixt the Senators and Citizens: For, the Senate deſirous to recover their former Dignity, and enforcing themſelves to avoid the ſlavery that had befallen them by the wickedneſs of Tyrants, intending the maintenance of their preſent good fortune. Contrariwiſe, the people envied them that Dignity. And knowing that their Emperours ſhould be as it were bridles, to reſtrain the avarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to ſee that Claudius was advanced, making their account that if he were created Emperour, they ſhould avoid a Civil war, like unto that which hapned in Pompeius time.

The Senate perſwade Claudius to reſign the Dignity offered him.

“The Senate knowing that Claudius was carried into the Army by the Souldiers, choſe out ſome of their order, and ſent them as Embaſſadours in their behalfs, to ſignifie unto him that he ought to uſe no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather I to remit the charge of the Common-weal to the Senate. That he both was and ſhould be one of the Senators, and have the conduct of the Common-weal, and diſpoſe it according to Law, perſwading him to call unto his remembrance thoſe grievous miſchiefs, which the former Tyrants had wrought in the Common-weal, and what dangers he himſelf had alſo ſuffered with them, during the reign of Caius their late Emperour. That it ſhould ill become him, who had deteſted the fury of others tyranny, now willingly to be drawn to oppoſe himſelf againſt his Countrey. That if he would obey them, and continue to expreſs the virtue and conſtancy of his life, which in times paſt he led with commendation, he ſhould obtain thoſe Honors which free Citizens could afford him, and in ſuffering himſelf to be governed by Laws, to K the end he might have part in the command, and to be commanded in his turn, he ſhould obtain the praiſe of virtue. That if he would not be diſſwaded by the death of Caius, which was freſh in memory, for their own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They alſo alledged, that they were provided with Souldiers, and ſtore of Armour, and a great number of domeſtick ſervants, all which they would employ againſt him: But over and above theſe things, they had far greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who are wont to fight for thoſe who maintain virtue and goodneſs. They ſolemnly proteſted alſo for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honeſt and juſt, than to fight for their liberty and Countrey. L

The Embaſſadours that brought this meſſage were Veranius and Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They proſtrating themſelves on their knees before him, humbly beſought him that he would not engage the Common-weal in a Civil war. And ſeeing that Claudius was incloſed with a great number of Souldiers, in reſpect of whom the Conſuls were of no force, they beſought him that it would pleaſe him to demand the Government at the Senates hands, and receive it from them if he were reſolved to be Emperour; for that it would be an act more holy, and juſt, if he ſhould obtain the ſame with their good will, and not in deſpight of thoſe, who would vouchſafe it him willingly.

But ſuppoſing that it ſtood very little with his ſecurity to commit himſelf to their truſt, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the Souldiers, who promiſed him their utmoſt endeavour, and by the incitation of King Agrippa, he determined by no means to let the Soveraignty ſlip out of his hands, in that it was ſo willingly and freely beſtowed on him when he thought leaſt on it. After that Agrippa had performed all thoſe duties unto Caius which were requiſite for ſuch an one as had been by him advanced to Honour, and having taken his body and laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the Souldiers of his Guard, and aſſured them that Caius was yet alive, and for O that he found himſelf ſick of thoſe wounds that he had received, he ſent to ſeek for Phyſicians. A and ready to ſurrender all things into the Senates hands; and encouraged him, to take upon him the Government of the Empire, which the Soldiers had offered him.
Which done he departed, and was ſuddenly ſent for by the Senate, whither he reſorted altogether perfumed, as if he were returned from ſome Banquet, and had known nothing of that which had happened: He therefore asked the Senators, what was become of Claudius, who told him of the truth; and beſides that, required him to give them his opinion and counſel, touching the preſent Affairs: “His anſwer was, that he “was ready to adventure his life in the behalf of the Senate: Yet, by the way he told “them, that they ought to have an eſpecial regard of the Commonweal, rather than “all the pleaſure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords of an Empire, B “had need of Arms and men to maintain themſelves, leſt being weak and unprovided, “they ſhould be deceived in their expectations. The Senate replied, that “they had great ſtore of Furniture, and that they would contribute money; that “they had good ſtore of Soldiers, to whom they would add their Slaves, and give “them liberty. But Agrippa replied, Would God, Grave Fathers, that you were able “to perform the matters you intend; yet will I not fear to diſcover that unto “you, which concerneth you nearly. You know well, that the Army that is with “Claudius, conſiſteth of ſuch men, who have been long time trained up in Feats of “Arms; and that thoſe that are to fight on your ſide, are but men gathered together;
“and ſuch as you joyn them with, are the very ſcum of your Slaves, who are both C “untractable and untrained. We ſhall therefore enter fight againſt expert Soldiers, and “commit our Fortunes to ſuch men as ſcarcely know how to draw their Swords: I rather “think it fit that we ſend unto Claudius ſuch men, as may perſwade him to give “over the Empire. And to perform this Meſſage, behold my ſelf in a readineſs to be “commanded by you.

Claudius confirmed in his reſolutions by Agrippa.

Agrippa telleth the Senate his opinion.

To this effect ſpake Agrippa; and hereunto the Senators agreed, and ſent him to Claudius, appointing him others to accompany him. As ſoon as he came to Claudius, he ſecretly diſcovered unto him in what perplexity the Senate was, and gave him inſtructions to anſwer and carry himſelf like an Emperour, and to ſhew his Dignity and Power. Whereupon Claudius gave the Ambaſſadours this anſwer; “That he wondred D “not that the Senate were ſo unwilling to be commanded by a Sovereign, in “regard of that cruelty which the fore-paſſed Emperours had uſed to their deſtruction.
“But for the preſent they ſhould taſte of his mercy, and feel his moderate “Rule; and they ſhould live under the Government of ſuch an one, who although in “name he had the Imperial Authority, yet that in effect he would govern all things “by their diſpoſition. For which cauſe, he wiſhed them in no ſort to diſtruſt him, “whom, as they themſelves could witneſs, they had ſeen and known to have dealt “virtuouſly and juſtly in many Affairs, although the ſtate of times had been far “different. Thoſe that were ſent from the Senate hearing theſe words, returned back again. But Claudius inſtantly aſſembled his Army, and exacted an Oath of Fidelity E from them; beſtowing on every one of them who were of his Guard in way of Largeſs, five thouſand Drachma's, amounting to ſome twenty five Pound a man, of our ſterling money. He preſented their Captains alſo with Preſents anſwerable to their Qualities, promiſing to perform no leſs bounty to all the reſt, in what place ſoever they were.
Hereupon the Conſuls aſſembled the Senate in the Temple of Jupiter the Victorious, before day, and ſome of them hid themſelves through the fear they had of that which ſhould be ſpoken: Others departed out of the City, and reſorted to their Countrey Farms, foreſeeing with themſelves the iſſue of all theſe things; and perceiving that their hope of Liberty was loſt, they thought it far better for them to be exempt from danger, and to paſs their life in quietneſs, though it were with Subjection, than to be F altogether uncertain of their ſecurity and ſafety, by maintaining the Dignity of the Senators: Yet, about a hundred of them drew themſelves together, and no more. Now whilſt they were conſulting upon that which they were to do, they ſuddenly heard a ſhout of Soldiers that were aſſembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuſe them an Emperour, and not to ſuffer their State to be loſt through a multitude of Governours; and to this effect ſpake they, leſt the Government ſhould be given to divers, and not to one. This courſe of theirs gave little content to the Senators, both in regard of the loſs of that Liberty which they expected, as through the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithſtanding, there were ſome that pretended ſome hope to be advanced, both in reſpect of the Nobility of their Race, as in regard of their Alliance G that they had by Marriage with the Caeſars. For, Marcus Minucianus, a man of himſelf of Noble deſcent, and who had married Julia, Caius's Siſter, ſtood up to demand the Sovereign Government; but the Conſuls reſtrained him, alledging excuſe upon excuſe.

Another, Minutiananus alſo, one of Caius's Tutors, withdrew Valerius Aſiaticus from thinking on thoſe things: And there had happened as great a ſlaughter as had ever been heard of, had any of theſe had the liberty to deſire the Empire, or oppoſe themſelves againſt Claudius. For amongſt others, the Fencers, who were of no ſmall number, they of the Watch, and the Saylers, joyned themſelves together with the Army. They therefore, that pretended to demand the Empire, gave over their Suit, partly in the Cities behalf, partly for their own private ſecurity.

Thoſe that murthered Caius are executed.

About break of day Chæreas and his Companions went forth to debate the matter with the Soldiers; and made ſigns to them, that he would ſpeak with them, but they made a great noiſe to cut them off from proceeding any farther, for all of them were earneſtly bent to have an Emperour and Sovereign Lord; and required with all expedition, that they might have one proclaimed and known. So the Senate underſtood, by the Soldiers diſdaining its Authority, that it was impoſſible to re-eſtabliſh the Republick; and on the other ſide, the Soldiers miſ-regarding ſo worthy an Aſſembly, was unſufferable to Chæreas and his Confederates againſt Caius. At length, Chæreas being unable to conceal his Paſſion, and hearing that they asked for a Monarch, promiſed that he would give them one, if they would bring him a Token from Eutychus, who was the Wagoner to the Green Band, whom Caius had loved extreamly; in ſo much as he employed his Soldiers in ſervile Labours, as to build him Stables for his Horſes, beſides ſeveral other reproaches, threatning them that he would bring them Claudius's head; and told them that it was a ſhame, after having taken the Empire from a Fool and a Mad man, to give it to a Block-head. Yet none of theſe words could divert them from their purpoſe; but all of them drew their Swords, and with diſplayed Colours, marched towards Claudius, to unite themſelves with thoſe, who had already bound themſelves by an Oath, to ſerve him faithfully. So that the Senate was abandoned, and deſtitute of all defence; and there was no difference betwixt private men and Conſuls. All of them were aſtoniſhed and confuſed, not knowing what to do, becauſe they had thus provoked Claudius's diſpleaſure againſt them. And now fell they to reviling one another, in teſtimony of the repentance they conceived for their proceedings. Whereupon Sabinus, one of thoſe who had murthered Caius, aroſe, and proteſted, that he would ſooner cut his own throat, than conſent to the eſtabliſhment of Claudius, or behold with his eyes, the miſery and thraldom of his Countrey: He likewiſe encouraged Chæreas; telling him that he deſerved very little by cutting off Caius, if he thought to live without the Liberty of his Countrey. To which he anſwered, that he made no account of his life; yet that he intended to ſound Claudius's mind, and with this reſolution they concluded. Mean while ſome of the Senators thought on every ſide to break through the midſt and thickeſt of the Soldiers, to go and do reverence and homage to Claudius: amongſt whom was Q. Pompeius one of the Conſuls, whom the Soldiers accuſed to be one of the principal Actors to incite the Senate to recover their Liberty; and they drew their Swords againſt him; and if Claudius had not reſtrained them, they had ſurely diſpatched him: But he made him ſit down by him, and by that means delivered him from the danger. The other Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honourably; but ſome of them were wounded, even then when they preſſed forth to ſalute Claudius: Apomus retired himſelf ſore wounded, and the reſt were in great danger to loſe their lives. But King Agrippa drawing near unto Claudius, deſired him to uſe as much lenity as was poſſible in him towards the Senators; for that if any miſchief ſhould betide them, he ſhould have no other perſons to command. To the which Counſel of his Claudius gave place, and aſſembled the Senate in the Palace, cauſing himſelf to be carried thorough the City in the company of his Soldiers, who marched before him, keeping back the common people. But amongſt thoſe that killed Caius, Chæreas and Sabinus were come out into the ſtreets, notwithſtanding, they were forbidden by Pollio, whom not long before, Claudius had made Captain of his Guard. And as ſoon as Claudius came into the Palace, whither he aſſembled his friends, he pronounced ſentence againſt Chæreas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble, yet he was condemned for this, becauſe he was perfidious; whereupon he was adjudged to die, to give example to others, to the end that Princes and Emperours may hereafter live in ſafety. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and divers other Romans. It is ſaid of Chæreas, that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expreſſed, not only in that he changed not his countenance, but alſo by the reproaches which he gave Lupus, who wept. For when Lupus was putting off his Cloaths, and complained of the cold that he felt, he taunted him thus, alluding to his name, which was Lupus; That never any cold did

Furthermore, when he came to the place of Execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the ſpectacle, he asked the Soldier that was appointed to behead him, if he were a cunning headſ-man, and whether he had a new Sword; wiſhing him to uſe that wherewith he murthered Caius. His death was happy, for he received but one ſtroke; whereas Lupus was faint-hearted and received divers, becauſe he ſtretched not out his neck freely. Some few days after, at ſuch time as the Romans ſolemnized their Expiations, and that every one honoured the memory of his dear Friend, they gave Chæreas a part of that honour, and caſt his portion into the fire; ſaying, That was to deface and purge their ingratitude whereof they were guilty towards him. Thus ended Chæreas his Life. But for Sabinus, B although Claudius had not only abſolved him, but alſo ſuffered him to exerciſe his Office, as he had done before; yet he thought that he ſhould do amiſs, and againſt Juſtice, if he falſified his Faith to his Aſſociates and Confederates; for which cauſe he ſhortned his own days, thruſting his Sword through his own body, to the very hilts.

C Claudius the Emperour confirmeth Agrippa in his Kingdom, adding Judæa and Samaria thereunto: He giveth the Kingdom of Chalcis to Herod, Agrippa's Brother; and maketh Edicts in favour of the Jews.

ONe of the firſt things that Claudius did after his eſtabliſhment in the Empire, was to diſband thoſe Soldiers whom he ſuſpected; and publiſhed an Edict, by which he confirmed the Kingdom to Agrippa, that Caius had given him, accompanying his bounty with many Praiſes; adding moreover unto his Government all that which his Grandfather had poſſeſſed; towit, Judæa and Samaria, which in that they were as one Lawful Inheritance, appertained unto him. He gave him alſo out of his own Dominions, Abela, and all the Countrey about Libanus, that in times paſt appertained to Lyſanias. And D he cauſed the Alliance that was paſt betwixt them, to be engraven and regiſtred in an open place of the City of Rome. He took from Antiochus the Kingdom that he had, and gave him in exchange a portion of Cilicia and Comagena. He ſet Alexander Lyſimachus Alebarcha at liberty, who had been his old Friend, and ſometimes Governour in Arabia, and once his Mother Antonia's Steward; who had been committed Priſoner through Caius's diſpleaſure, and eſpouſed Bernice, Agrippa's Daughter, to his Son Marcus; which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was married, was afterwards married with her Father Agrippa's allowance, to Herod his Brother, for whom Agrippa begg'd of Claudius the Kingdom of Chalcis. At that very time, the Jews that were in the City of Alexandria, mutined againſt the Greeks: For after Caius's death, E the Nation of the Jews which had been oppreſſed during his Reign, and injuriouſly dealt withal by the Alexandrines, recovered their former courage. For which cauſe Claudius gave Commiſſion to the Governour of Egypt, to pacifie and appeaſe that Uproar. He ſent alſo his Letters Patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the requeſt of the two Kings, Agrippa and Herod, to this effect:

Claudius's Edict in favour of the Jews in Alexandria.

Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, Father of the people, ſignifieth this that followeth: Underſtanding that the Jews Inhabitants in Alexandria, and for that cauſe called Alexandrines, have at all times enjoyed the ſelf ſame Privileges of the City, which the ancient and firſt Alexandrines have had: Which Favours they have obtained by the Leave of thoſe Princes that were our Predeceſſors, as it hath been plainly made known F unto us, as well by Letters which have been written unto us, as by confirmed Decrees: And that ſince Alexandria hath been united to our Empire by Cæſar Auguſtus, their Privileges have continued in force during the ſeveral Succeſſions of many of our Governours; which Rights of theirs have never been called in queſtion, no not in that time when Aquila was Governour in Alexandria: Since in like ſort Cæſar Auguſtus hath not letted them, but when the Governour of their Nation was dead, they might eſtabliſh other Subſtitutes and Governours in his place; commanding that all of them ſhould yield him obedience in obſervation of their Laws and Cuſtoms, without conſtraint or impulſion to do any thing contrary to their Religion. Yet notwithſtanding, the Alexandrines have mutined againſt the Jews, being in the City of Alexandria, in the time of the Emperour Caius, by reaſon of the G folly and frenzy of Caius, who diſgraced and oppreſſed the Nation of the Jews, becauſe they would not violate their Religion, nor acknowledge the ſaid Caius *for a God. reaſon of Caius's frenzy ; but my mind is to maintain thoſe which heretofore have been H given them, to the end they may continue and live according to their ancient Laws and Cuſtoms : Commanding you and every one of you very carefully to provide, that after the publication of this our Ordinance, they be in no ways troubled. This was the Tenour of that Ordinance which was made in favour of the Jews in Alexandria.

Claudius's Edict in the behalf of the Jews ſcattered thorough the whole Empire.

But that which was generally made in favour of thoſe, who were diſperſed thorough the whole World, was to this effect : Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, High Prieſt, Father of the people, elected Conſul the ſecond time, ſignifieth that which enſueth. Our well-beloved Friends, the Kings, Agrippa and Herod, have required us, that we will permit all thoſe Jews that live under the Roman Empire, to uſe the ſame Laws and Privileges which they have uſed heretofore, as we have granted to the Jews that dwell in Alexandria. I Which Suit of theirs we have willingly granted ; not only in favour of thoſe that require the ſame, but alſo for that I think them worthy of ſuch a favour ; for whom I have been entreated, in regard of the fidelity and friendſhip they have always expreſſed towards the Romans. My pleaſure therefore is, that no City, either Grecian or otherwiſe, ſhall deny any privilege, from whence they ſhall be excluded ; for that ſince the Emperour Auguſtus, they have never been exempted from them. It ſtandeth with reaſon therefore, that henceforth the Jews that live under our Empire, of what place ſoever they be, may obſerve their ancient Cuſtoms without any contradiction : Giving them to underſtand, that hereafter they uſe our Clemency ſo much the more moderately, without neglecting the Religion of other Nations, in retaining their own. And our will is, that this preſent Ordinance be publiſhed by the Magiſtrates of Cities, Colonies and Countreys of Italy, K and be ſent unto Kings and Foreign Princes, by fit Ambaſſadours, within thirty days at the leaſt to the end that they ſhould be in ſuch ſort ſet up, that they may be ſeen and read by all thoſe that paſs by.

CHAP. V.

King Agrippa goeth to his Kingdom, and putteth his Chain, being a token of his Impriſonment, into the Sacred Treaſury of the Temple of Jeruſalem. He provideth for L the Dignity of the High Prieſthood : He is highly diſpleaſed at the Dorites inſolence, who had cauſed Cæſar's Statue to be erected in the Jews Synagogue.

Claudius ſendeth Agrippa into his Kingdom.

BY theſe Edicts of Claudius Cæſar, which he ſent both to Alexandria, and other parts of the World, it plainly appeareth how well affected he was towards the Nation of the Jews. And preſently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of Honour, he ſent him back into his Kingdom, to govern the ſame ; commanding all his Preſidents and Lieutenants in his Provinces, thorough which he was to paſs, to give him a friendly and honourable Convoy. But he, having wiſely and happily diſpatched his Affairs, returned in all haſte. As ſoon as he came to Jeruſalem, he of- M fered his Sacrifices of Thankſgiving which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the Law. He cauſed alſo divers Nazarites to cut off their hair, and offered in Gift that Chain of Gold that Caius had given him ; which was of the ſame weight the Iron Chain was of, wherewith his Royal hands were manacled, in memory of the Adverſity he had paſt, and the Teſtimony of the exchange thereof into better Fortune ; commanding that it ſhould be hanged up in the Temple, and over the Chamber of the Treaſury, to teſtifie unto thoſe that ſhould behold it, that the higheſt Eſtates are ſubject to alterations ; and that God can raiſe men again, from Obſcurity, to happy Fortune. For this Chain that hanged in the Temple, being conſecrated to God, manifeſtly expreſſed unto all men, that King Agrippa was upon a very N ſmall occaſion, deprived of his former Dignity, and made Priſoner ; and then a little while after that, he being delivered from his Bonds, was raiſed and exalted to a famous Kingdom ; to ſignifie thereby, that Humane Affairs are of that nature, that that which is the greateſt, may be eaſily overthrown ; and that which is declining, may recover again its ancient Honour and Dignity. When therefore Agrippa had duely and devoutly acknowledged God's mercies, he depoſed the High Prieſt Theophilus the Son of Ananus ; and beſtowed that Honour on Simon ſurnamed Canthara, the Son of Boethus. This Simon had two Brothers, and Boethus was their Father, whoſe Daughter had been married to King Herod, as heretofore it hath been mentioned. Simon held the Prieſthood with his Brethren and his Father, as the three Sons of Simon, O High Prieſt, Son of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as we have declared in our former Books. After the King had given order for the Prieſthood, he

A he thought good to recompence the good affection that they of Jeruſalem had born unto him; for which cauſe, he acquitted them of thoſe Tributes that every Family paid, knowing that it became him to ſhew kindneſs unto them, who had been faithful and well affected towards him. He created Silas, who had been his Companion in many dangers, General of all his Army. Not long after, certain young men that were Dorites, under the colour of conſtancy in caſe of Religion; who alſo had daily expreſſed the ſame in their actions and unbridled raſhneſs, brought the Image of Cæſar into the Temple of the Jews, and erected it in that place; which inſolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who conſtrued it as an Act that tended to the abolition of the Religion of their Countrey: For which cauſe, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was B Governour of Syria; and complained againſt thoſe Dorites, who was no leſs diſpleaſed with the action, than he himſelf. For he ſuppoſed that ſuch breach of Religion, was the means to further Impiety, and for that cauſe he wrote to thoſe which had attempted this Innovation, ſomewhat ſharply to this effect following.

For theſe cauſes I command you, that they who have been ſo bold as to contemn* Auguſtus's Decree (againſt whom their own Magiſtrates have been diſpleaſed; excuſing themſelves that this accident happened not by their motion, but by the fury of the common people) be brought before me by the Captain Proculus Vitellius, to yield a reaſon of that which they have done; exhorting the Magiſtrates, that if they E will not be accounted Parties in this Contempt, they endeavour to diſcover thoſe that are guilty to Proculus, and give order that no Sedition or Violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithſtanding it ſeemeth that they effect, although we and the moſt honoured King Agrippa, whom I take for my good and ſpecial Friend, endeavour nothing more, than that the Nation of the Jews ſhould not aſſemble, and take Arms, under colour of their defence. And to the end, that whatſoever Auguſtus hath ordained concerning this matter, may be the better known unto all men, I have added his Edict which he publiſhed in Alexandria: And although they are ſufficiently known unto all men, yet hath the moſt honoured King Agrippa read them unto me, when I ſate in my Tribunal Seat; concluding, according to right, that the Jews ought not to be excluded nor hindred from enjoying thoſe benefits, F which are granted unto them by Cæſar: I therefore charge all men, that henceforward they take heed leſt they ſeek any occaſion of Mutiny or Sedition, and that every one live according to his Religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was paſt, and alſo to prevent that which was to come, that none ſhould be ſo bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa took the Prieſthood from Simon Canthara, and gave it again to Jonathan the Son of Ananus, whom he eſteemed to be more worthy than the other. But Jonathan declared that he was not deſirous of this Dignity, for in effect he refuſed it; ſaying, O King, I moſt willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaſeth you to beſtow upon me; and know well that it is a Dignity, which of your own free will you beſtow upon me; notwithſtanding that, God judgeth me unworthy. It G ſufficeth me, that I have once been inveſted with the Sacred Habit: For at that time I wore it with more holineſs, than I can now receive it at this preſent; yet notwithſtanding, if it pleaſe you to know one that is more worthy of this honour than my ſelf, Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 7. Silas, by too much reviving the King's miſeries and miſfortunes, and ripping up his own deſerts, groweth into the Kings hatred, and is ſent Priſoner into his Countrey.

Silas being made General over the King's Army, and for that he had always been faithful unto him, and had never forſaken him in any danger that was offered, K without partaking the utmoſt extremity; but had always adventured on the greateſt dangers, in reſpect of his entire and conſtant reſolution; he made this account, that being ſo firm a friend to the King, he ſhould alſo be partaker and Companion with him in the Honour: Therefore he ſubmitted not himſelf to the King, but challenged to himſelf a liberty to ſpeak what he pleaſed. For this cauſe he grew hateful in the King's ſight, for that in particular he boaſted of himſelf beyond meaſure, and oftentimes refreſhed the memory of thoſe Adverſities the King had paſt, the rather to expreſs how affectionate he had been towards him; and his continual talk was nothing elſe, but of the hardſhips he had endured. Now, for that he obſerved no meaſure in this his diſcourſe, the King took it as an injury done to his Honour, and was offended with the L unbridled Licence of this man's prattle: For nothing ſoundeth more harſh in a man's ear, than the memory of his fore-paſſed miſery; and it is but the part of a fool to rip up the courteſies he hath employed on another man. At length, Silas grievouſly provoked the King's diſpleaſure againſt himſelf, that rather ſubſcribing to his wrath, than his wit, he not only diſpoſſeſſed Silas of his General's place, but alſo ſent him bound into his Countrey, there to be held Priſoner. Yet notwithſtanding, time aſſwaged this diſpleaſure; and the King taking it into better conſideration, and remembring what Silas had endured in his behalf, he revoked the Sentence that he pronounced.

And as he was ready to celebrate the Feſtival day of his Birth, and all his Subjects were to take their pleaſure; he ſpeedily ſent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker there- M of, and feaſt with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, ſuppoſing that he had juſt cauſe to be diſpleaſed, concealed it not from thoſe who were ſent unto him, but ſpake unto them after this manner: "To what honour doth the King invite me at this "preſent, purpoſely to deprive me of it again? For he hath not only deprived me of "thoſe Honours which he beſtowed upon me, in acknowledgment of the affection I "have always ſhewed unto him: but he hath altogether abuſed me, if he thinks that "he can reſtrain me from ſpeaking freely, he deceiveth himſelf. For my Conſcience "knoweth how many hazards I have delivered him from, and as long as I breath, I "will ring in all men's ears, how much I have endured for his Conſervation and Honour, in recompence whereof I am this day in Bonds, and ſhut up in an obſcure Pri- N "ſon, which I will never forget. Yea, and when my ſoul ſhall depart out of this bo"dy, ſhe ſhall bear with her the remembrance of thoſe benefits I have employed on "him. Theſe words ſpake he with a loud voice, deſiring them to relate the ſame unto King Agrippa; who ſeeing that he was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in Priſon.

Agrippa fortifieth the Walls of Jeruſalem. Claudius commandeth Agrippa to deſiſt from building the Walls

After this, the King began to fortifie the Walls of Jeruſalem, on the ſide of the new Town, upon the common charge; encreaſing them both in length and breadth: which if he might have thoroughly finiſhed, it had been an invincible Fort. But Marſus the Governour of Syria, acquainted Cæſar what the work was; and Claudius ſuſpecting ſome Commotion, wrote expreſly to Agrippa, commanding him thence-forward to deſiſt from O further building of the Walls, according to that form wherein he began; whereunto he would not diſobey. A and took ſo great pleaſure to uſe his magnificence towards all ſorts of Nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleaſure and delight was, to ſhew courteſie unto all men, and to purchaſe good eſteem, being every way different in nature and diſpoſition from King Herod his Predeceſſor.
For Herod was naturally malicious, extream in puniſhing, and irreconcileable to thoſe with whom he was diſpleaſed, manifeſtly expreſſing that he loved the Grecians better than the Jews. For he beautified thoſe Cities that belonged to ſtrangers, and gave them money, and erected them Baths, and ſumptuous Theatres, and Temples, and in ſome of them Galleries: but as for the Cities of the Jews, he beſtowed not this bounty on any of them, no not the leaſt reparation or gift that was worthy the ſpeaking B of. Contrariwiſe King Agripga was very courteous and affable, and equally imparted his bounty unto all men. He was courteous unto ſtrangers, any teſtified no leſs by the bounty he beſtowed on them. To his Countrey-men he behaved himſelf affably, and eſpecially he was merciful to all thoſe that were in miſery. For which cauſe his ordinary Court, and the place he took moſt pleaſure in, was Jeruſalem. He was a diligent obſerver of the Laws of his Countrey, and lived religiouſly, and with as great piety as was poſſible: Neither paſſed there one day, wherein he offered not Sacrifice.
It happened at one time, that a certain cunning Lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Jeruſalem; had aſſembled the people by reaſon of the King's abſence, who for the preſent was in Cæſarea: In which Aſſembly he alledged many things againſt C him, that he was a prophane man, and that upon juſt cauſe he was forbidden to enter the Temple, in that it was not lawful nor decent for thoſe that were unclean to enter thereinto. Theſe words of Simon's, thus wrongfully ſpoke againſt him, were ſignified to the King by Letters ſent by the Governour of the City: When therefore, he ſate him down in the Theatre, he commanded that very Simon to ſit next him; and in peaceable and kind manner, he ſpake thus unto him: Tell me, I pray thee, what ſeeſt thou worthy of reprehenſion, or done contrary to Law, in that which is done here? Simon having not any thing to reply, beſought him to pardon him. The King grew friends with him far ſooner than it could be imagined; reſolving with himſelf, that mercy doth far better become a King than wrath; and that moderation is more requiſite, D than cruelty; ſo that after he had beſtowed certain Preſents on Simon, he diſmiſſed him. Now, although he had many reparations in divers places, yet he honoured thoſe of Berith above all the reſt, and builded them a Theatre ſurpaſſing all other in ſumptuouſneſs and beauty: And beſides that, he made them a ſumptuous Amphitheatre, and Baths, and Porches no ways inferiour. The Dedication alſo, of theſe things were celebrated with great pomp and magnificence; he alſo made great Shews and Plays in the Theatre, in which there were all ſorts of Muſick and Recreations; expreſſing in all things the greatneſs of his Magnificence; and being deſirous to delight the people with a Combat, he gathered all the Malefactors that he could get, and made two ſeveral Companies of ſeven hundred a piece, and brought them together to fight, to the end E that in skirmiſhing they might receive their puniſhment; and beſides, that by this Warlike Exerciſe, he might preſent the people with a Paſt-time, concluded with the puniſhment of wicked men; for they fought ſo deſperately, that not one of them came off alive.

After that he had finiſhed theſe above-named Buildings in Berith, he reſorted to Tiberias, Princes were with him, Marſus the Governour of Syria viſited him likewiſe, whom, to the end he might expreſs the reverence he bare to the Romans, he met with, ſeven furlongs

On the ſecond day H of this Solemnity, he being apparelled in a Robe of Silver, made with admirable Workmanſhip; came into the Theatre in the morning: Where at the firſt reflex of the riſing Sun beating upon his Robe, he ſhined ſo bright, that all thoſe that beheld him were ſeized with reverence and fear. Whereupon, a company of baſe Sycophants (whoſe flatteries do uſually poyſon the hearts of Princes) cried out thus: Be merciful unto us; hitherto we have feared thee as a man, but hence-forward we will confeſs and acknowledge thee to be of a Nature more excellent than Mortal Frailty can attain unto. Agrippa reproved them not for uſing theſe words; neither rejected he their palpable and deteſtable Flattery, as he ought to have done. But not long after, he looking upwards, perceived an Owl over his head, pearched upon a cord, and knew preſently, that he was but I a meſſenger of his misfortune; whereas formerly he had denounced unto him his felicity, and conceived thereupon a moſt hearty and inward grief: And ſuddenly he was ſeized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with very great vehemency: For which cauſe, turning his eyes towards his friends, he ſpake unto them after this manner: Behold him (ſaid he) whom you eſteem for a God, condemned to die; and deſtiny ſhall apparently convince you of thoſe flattering and falſe ſpeeches, which you have lately uſed in my behalf: For I, who by you have been adored as one immortal, am under the hands of death. But I muſt willingly entertain that which God pleaſeth to ſend me: For I have not lived in obſcurity, but in ſo great and wonderful felicity, that each one of you have held me happy. K

Whilſt he ſpake thus, his griefs augmented in ſuch ſort, that he was brought almoſt to his laſt; for which cauſe, he was with all expedition conveyed into his Royal Palace, and the rumour was ſpread in every place, that very ſhortly he would be dead. For which cauſe the people, with their Wives and Children, put on Sack-cloth, according to the cuſtom of the Countrey, to the end they might ſolicit God's Mercy on the King's behalf; and all the City was filled with tears and lamentations. The King that lay in an upper Chamber, and looking down into the Court, ſaw them lying thus on the earth, could not refrain from tears. And after he had, for the ſpace of five days without ceaſing, been tormented with griping in his belly, he gave up the Ghoſt, in the fifty fourth year of his Age, and the ſeventh year of his Reign: for he had reigned four years under the Empire of Caius Cæſar (having firſt of all governed Philip's Te- L trarchy three years, to which was added the Segniory of Herod in the fourth year) and three years under the Empire of Claudius Cæſar; during which time he governed over the above-named Countreys; and moreover, over Judæa, Samaria and Cæſarea. His Revenue amounted to twelve hundred Myriades; beſides which, he made many Loans. For in regard he was very liberal in giving, he ſpent far more than his Revenue; and ſpared not any thing to ſhew himſelf magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his Brother Prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the King's Lieutenant and Friend, agreed between themſelves to ſend Ariſto, one of their truſtieſt Servants, to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had been commanded by the King.

Agrippa's Children alive.

The Cæſareans and Sebaſtians revile Agrippa being dead.

Thus died King Agrippa, leaving behind him a Son called Agrippa, ſeventeen years M old; and three Daughters, one of which, that was called Bernice, was married to Herod, his Father's Brother, when ſhe was ſixteen years old: The two other were Mariamne and Druſilla; this Mariamne being of the age of ten years, was promiſed in marriage by her Father, to Julius Archelaus, Chelcias's Son; and Druſilla, which was ſix years old, was promiſed alſo to Epiphanes, Son to the King of Comagena.

After Agrippa's death, they of Cæſarea and Sebaſte forgot thoſe benefits they had received from him; and uſed him no leſs deſpightfully, than as if he had been their utter enemy: For they reproachfully abuſed him after his death, and reviled him in ſuch ſort, that it is unſeemly to report the ſame. Moreover, all the Soldiers, who were at N that time many in number; went into the King's Lodging, and with one accord ſeized the Statues of the King's Daughters, and carried them to the Brothel-houſe; where, after they had placed them, they uttered all the indignities they could poſſibly; practiſing ſuch ſhameful matters, as they may not be expreſſed. Beſides this, reſting themſelves in the publick places, they banquetted in the open Street, wearing Chaplets of Flowers on their heads, and perfuming themſelves with Odours, to ſacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for joy that the King was dead. Thus they expreſſed their ingratitude, not only towards their King Agrippa, who had beſtowed ſo many Liberalities on them; but alſo towards Herod, his Grand-father, who had builded their Cities, and to his extream charge, erected their Ports and Temples. At that time Agrippa, the O deceaſed Agrippa's Son, was at Rome, and was brought up under the Emperour Claudius. When Cæſar underſtood how thoſe of Cæſarea and Sebaſte had injuriouſly dealt with

Agrippa, Agrippa's Son

A Agrippa, he was highly diſpleaſed, and moved with their ingratitude: And his purpoſe was, to ſend the younger Agrippa with all expedition, to take Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of his Father, and therewithal to diſcharge him of his Oath; but divers of his Free-men and Friends, who were in great credit with him, diſſwaded him from it; alledging that it would be a dangerous thing to commit the greatneſs of ſuch a Kingdom to a young man, who ſcarcely had as yet attained to the age of eighteen years; and for whom it was impoſſible to ſupport the care of ſo great a Kingdom, conſidering that if he were at man's eſtate, he ſhould find himſelf over-burthened with the charge of a Kingdom. This advice of theirs was approved by Cæſar, and for this cauſe he ſent Cuſpius Fadus to govern Judæa, and the whole Realm; honouring his dead Friend in B this, in that he would not ſuffer Marſus, who had been his Enemy, to enter into his Kingdom. He gave eſpecial Commiſſion alſo, that Fadus ſhould ſharply puniſh thoſe of Cæſarea and Sebaſte, for the injuries they offered to his deceaſed Friend, and the exceſs that was committed againſt his Daughters who were yet living; commanding him to tranſport the Companies of the Cæſarians and Sebaſtens, and the five Roman Legions into the Countrey of Pontus to ſerve in that place, and to take thoſe Roman Soldiers that bare Arms in Syria, to ſerve there: Yet, notwithſtanding this Command, they were not diſplaced; for they ſent Ambaſſadours to Claudius to appeaſe him, and by this means they obtained the favour to remain in Judæa. After this, they gave beginning to thoſe moſt grievous miſchiefs and calamities that beſell the Jews; for they C ſpred the Seed of the War which was awakened under Florus's Government. And for that cauſe, after that Veſpaſian had obtained the Victory, as it ſhall be hereafter declared, he cauſed them to depart out of that Province, and made them ſeek their Habitation elſewhere.

The Emperour Claudius taketh the Government of Syria from Marſus, and giveth it B to Longinus. After King Agrippa's deceaſe (as we have heretofore declared in our former Book) the Emperour Claudius ſent Caſſius Longinus to ſucceed Marſus in the Government of Syria, whom he deprived of that Honour in memory of Agrippa; who, during his C life time, had oftentimes required by Letters, that he ſhould not ſuffer Marſus to govern the State of Syria. As ſoon as Cuſpius Fadus came into Jewry, to take charge of that Countrey, which he was to govern under Cæſar; he found the Jews that dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan in an uproar, who had taken Arms againſt the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certain Village, called Mia, which was ſtored with valiant men. Thoſe who inhabit beyond Jordan, had armed themſelves in this manner, without the conſent of their Governours; and had killed a great numper of the Philadelphians: Which when Fadus underſtood, he was much diſpleaſed, for that they had not reſerved the cauſe to his hearing, and complained to him of the D Philadelphians; but were ſo bold of their own Authority, and without fear, as to take up Arms. Having therefore apprehended ſome three of them, who had been Authors of the Sedition, he commanded them to Priſon, and executed one of them called Annibas; and baniſhed the other two, whoſe names were Amram and Eleazar.

Tholomæus the Arch-thief.

Not long after this, Tholomæus the Captain of the Thieves was alſo taken, and brought unto him, who commanded him to be executed, for having committed many Robberies in Idumæa and Arabia; and by this means all the Countrey of Judæa was cleared of all Thieves, by the care and providence of Fadus. After this, he ſent for the High Prieſts, and the Governours of Jeruſalem, commanding them, according to the Emperour's direction, to deliver up into the Caſtle of Antonia the Sacred Robe, E which the High Prieſt only was accuſtomed to wear; to the end, that it might be at the Romans diſpoſal, as in times paſt it had been. They durſt not contradict his Command, yet notwithſtanding, they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Jeruſalem with a great power, for fear the Jews, by reaſon of this Injunction, ſhould raiſe a Rebellion) firſt, that it may be lawful for them to ſend their Ambaſſadours unto Cæſar, to beſeech him that the Sacred Robe might remain in their cuſtody. Secondly, that it might pleaſe them to expect the anſwer which Cæſar would return to their requeſt. Fadus gave them this anſwer, that he permitted them to ſend their Ambaſſadours to Rome, provided, that before-hand they delivered him their Children for Hoſtages; which when they had readily performed, the Ambaſſadours were ſent a- F way. Now, when they came to Rome, the younger Agrippa (who was his Son that lately died) knowing the cauſe of their coming, and being ordinarily accuſtomed to attend upon Cæſar (according as we have heretofore declared) beſought Cæſar that he would grant the Jews their requeſt, concerning the Sacred Robe; and that it might pleaſe him to ſignifie no leſs unto Fadus. On this his Petition Claudius gave the Ambaſſadours Audience, and told them that he favoured their ſuit; deſiring them to be thankful to Agrippa, upon whoſe ſuit he reſpected them, and granted their Demands: And beſides this Anſwer, he delivered them a Letter to this effect.

L AT that time Helena Queen of Adiabena, and her Son Izates conformed themſelves to the Religion of the Jews, upon this occaſion that enſueth : Monobazus King of Adiabena, who was alſo called Bazeos, having fallen deeply in love with his Siſter Helena, married her, and got her with Child. Upon a time it happened, that ſleeping with her, he laid his hand on her belly, whilſt ſhe lay aſleep ; and he thought that he heard a voice that commanded him to take away his hand from off her belly, leſt he ſhould cruſh the Fruit that was therein, which by God's Providence ſhould have a happy beginning, and no leſs fortunate ending. Monobazus was much troubled at this voice, and as ſoon as he awoke, he told it to his Wife ; and afterwards, when the Child was born, he called him Izates. M Beſides, he had another elder Son by the ſame Wife, who was called Monobazus, according to his own name. And he had alſo other Sons by his other Wives ; yet notwithſtanding, Izates was moſt manifeſtly his beſt beloved, and ſo cheriſhed by him, as if he had been his only begotten Son ; for which cauſe, his other Brothers envied him. The Father manifeſtly perceived all this, yet he pardoned them ; knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the deſire that every one of them had to be beſt eſteemed by his Father. Notwithſtanding, being afraid leſt ſome miſ-hap ſhould betide Izates, by reaſon of the hatred his Brethren bare unto him, he gave him many great Gifts, and ſent him to Abemerigus, who reigned at that time in a Fort called Spaſinus ; committing his Son's life into his hands. N Abemerigus alſo, entertained him very kindly ; and loved him ſo, that in proceſs of time he gave him Samacha his Daughter to Wife ; and for her Dowry, he gave him a Countrey of great Revenue.

Monobazus being old, and ſeeing he had not long time to live, deſired before his death, that his Son might come and viſit him ; he therefore ſent for him, and received him very lovingly, giving him a Countrey which he called Caron, which bringeth forth great abundance of Odoriferous Plants. In this place was the remainder of the Ark, in which Noah was ſaved, during the Deluge ; which remnants are to be ſeen at this day, if any man have a deſire to behold the ſame. Izates remained in that place, until his Father's deceaſe. But on the very day of his death, Helena ſent for all the O Lords and Governours of the Kingdom, and Captains of all the Army, and upon their aſſembly, ſhe ſpake unto them after this manner :

I ſuppoſe (ſaid ſhe) that you are not ignorant of my Husband's mind, who hath deſired that

A Izates might be King in his ſtead, and hath eſteemed him moſt worthy of ſuch an honour: yet I expect your judgment in this point. For he that receiveth the Sovereignty, not from one mans hand, but from many, and hath the ſame confirmed unto him by their conſent, is happy. She uſed this diſcourſe unto them to try what their intent was, who were there aſſembled. They underſtanding her mind, proſtrated themſelves firſt of all upon the earth before the Queen, according to the cuſtom of their Country, and afterwards anſwered her, that they approved the Kings election, and took pleaſure to obey Izates, whom his Father deſervedly, and to all their contents and the deſire of the common people had preferred above the reſt of his Brethren: alledging moreover, that they would put his Brethren and Kinſmen to death before his coming, to the end that he might enjoy the Kingdom B with all ſecurity: for by their deaths all the fear that might grow by their hatred and envie might be extinguiſhed. Hereunto the Queen anſwered; that ſhe gave them thanks, for the favour they bare unto her and her Son Izates: notwithſtanding ſhe required them to ſuſpend their judgments touching the death of his Brethren, until ſuch time as Izates himſelf ſhould give his conſent thereunto.

The year of the World, 4009. after Chriſt's Nativity, 47.

Izates was made King by his Mother Helena and the Nobility, and Monobazus governeth the Kingdom till his coming.

They ſeeing they might not obtain the liberty to put them to death, were of opinion that they ſhould be kept priſoners until his coming, to the end that they might do him no harm in his abſence; and that moreover, until his coming there might one be appointed to govern the State, whom ſhe ſhould eſteem moſt truſty and faithful unto him. Whereunto Helena condeſcended, and made his elder Brother Monobazus C King, and ſet the Diadem on his head, and gave him his Fathers Seal-ring, with that Robe which they call Sampſera; exhorting him to govern the Kingdom until his Brothers arrival. Izates having certain notice of his Fathers death, reſorted thither ſpeedily, and receiving his Brother Monobazus willing ſurrender, took upon him the Government of the Kingdom.

Whileſt Izates was in the Fortreſs of Spaſinus, a certain Merchant who was a Jew, called Ananias, having acceſs to the Kings wives, taught them the manner how to ſerve God according to the Religion of the Jews: and Ananias by their means growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena; being drawn thereunto by his earneſt intreaties, when Izates reſorted thither upon his D Fathers ſending for. It chanced alſo that Helena was in like manner inſtructed by another Jew, and retained the Rites and Religion of the Jews.

Izates and his mother Helena learn the true ſervice of God according to the manner of the Jews.

After that Izates came into his Kingdom, and knew that his Brethren and Kinsfolk were impriſoned, he was much grieved, Conceiving therefore with himſelf that it would be a great impiety in him to ſuffer them to be put to death, or kept in priſon; and that on the other ſide, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at liberty they ſhould remember the evil they had endured: for this cauſe he ſent ſome of them to Rome for Hoſtages with their Children unto the Emperour Claudius, and the reſt unto Artabanus King of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thoroughly aſſured that his Mother was wholly addicted to the Religion of the Jews, he endeavoured the more to E ſhew himſelf zealous therein: and ſuppoſing that he could not be a perfect Jew, except he were circumciſed, he prepared himſelf to be circumciſed. Which when his Mother underſtood, ſhe endeavoured to her uttermoſt to hinder his reſolution, aſſuring him that in ſo doing he ſhould bring himſelf in great danger; for that in being King, he would draw himſelf into the diſlike of his Subjects, if they ſhould have notice that he was addicted to a new Religion, and to ſtrange Ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that being a Jew, he ſhould be their King: ſo ſhe for a while by her diſſwaſion reſtrained him from his deſire. But the King required of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the courſe of her diſlike, threatned Izates, that if he would not obey his Mother, he would forſake him, and depart from him, for that he feared, F leſt if the matter ſhould be publickly known, he ſhould ſuffer ſome puniſhment, as being the only Author and Inſtructer of the King in undecent matters; that otherwiſe he might ſerve God, although he were not circumciſed; ſince he had reſolved to live according to the inſtitution and Laws of the Jews, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true Religion conſiſteth more, than in circumciſion of the body, though he were not actually circumciſed, ſince the neceſſity and fear of his Subjects over-ruled him. By which words the King for that time was perſwaded to proceed no further. But a little after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Jew called Eleazar, coming from Galilee, and accounted a Learned man in the Doctrine of our Religion, perſwaded him to be circumciſed. For coming G one day unto him, to ſalute him, he found him reading of the Books of Moſes, and ſaid unto him; O King, contrary to your knowledge you offend the Law, and God likewiſe; for it ſufficeth you not, that you underſtand the ſame, but the chiefeſt matter you are tied unto, is to do that which the Law commandeth; how long therefore H will you remain uncircumciſed? And if as yet you have not peruſed the Law as touching this point, read it now, to the end you may know what great impiety it is to omit it.

They that rely on God, and put their confidence in him, do always reap the reward of their Piety.

After the King had heard this, he would no longer defer his Circumciſion: for which cauſe withdrawing himſelf into another chamber, he called a Surgeon unto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his Mother and Maſter Ananias unto him, he told them what had paſt: whereupon they grew ſtrangely amazed, fearing the King ſhould be in danger to loſe his Kingdom, if this action of his ſhould come to light; for that his Subjects would not endure, that ſuch a man that followed a contrary Religion ſhould be their King: They feared alſo, leſt they themſelves ſhould be in danger, foraſmuch as the cauſe of all this matter would be imputed I to them. But God by his Providence prevented leſt any of thoſe things which they feared ſhould come to paſs: for he delivered Izates himſelf and his Children likewiſe out of many dangers, yielding them his aſſiſtance in their doubtful and deſperate conditions, declaring in effect that thoſe that only put their truſt in him, and depend upon his Providence, are never deprived of the fruit of their Piety. But of theſe things we will ſpeak hereafter.

When Helena the Kings Mother perceived that the ſtate of the Kingdom was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and ſtrangers, her Son was reputed happy by the good will of God, ſhe was ſeized with a deſire to go and viſit the City of Jeruſalem, and adore God in the Temple, which was ſo much renowned K through the whole world, and offer Sacrifice of Thankſgiving therein; for which cauſe ſhe beſought her Son that he would ſuffer her to perform her Vows; who willingly condeſcended to her deſire, and furniſhed her royally with all things that were neceſſary for ſuch a Voyage; giving her a great Sum of Money with her, and bringing her on her way many days journey: ſo that at length ſhe arrived in Jeruſalem, to the great advantage of the Inhabitants of that City. For at that time the City was oppreſſed with a grievous famine, ſo that many died for want of food; for which cauſe Queen Helena ſent her ſervants, ſome into Alexandria to buy a great quantity of Corn, the reſt into Cyprus to buy dried Figs, who returned with all expedition they might; whereupon Helena diſtributed the Victuals amongſt the L poor, leaving a ſingular memory of her Liberality to the whole Nation. Her Son Izates alſo underſtanding of this Famine, ſent a great ſum of Money to the Governour of Jeruſalem. But hereafter I will declare what other benefits the King and Queen have beſtowed upon our Nation.

Artabanus retireth himſelf to Izates and requireth his aſſiſtance.

Now Artabanus King of Parthia, perceiving that the Princes of the Kingdom had conſpired againſt him, reſolved with himſelf to go unto Izates, for the ſecurity of his perſon, hoping by that means, if it were poſſible to recover his Kingdom. He therefore retired thither, and brought with him about one thouſand men of his Kinsfolk and domeſtick ſervants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew very well by his Royal Train, notwithſtanding he was unknown unto him by countenance. M Drawing therefore near unto him, he firſt of all humbled himſelf on his knees, according to the cuſtom of the Country, and afterwards ſpake unto him after this manner:

Dread King, forſake me not who am thy ſervant, neither reject thou my prayers. For being dejected by means of my misfortunes, and of a King become a private man, I have need of thy ſuccour. Conſider therefore the inconſtancy of fortune, and think with thy ſelf, that by providing for me, thou ſhalt provide for thy ſelf. For if thou makeſt no reckoning of the wrong that is done unto me, divers men will grow audacious to enterprize upon other Kings.

Izates comforteth Artabanus, and promiſeth him his aſſiſtance.

Theſe words he pronounced with tears, and with looks fixed upon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus's name, and ſaw his humble and ſubmiſſive condition, N he leapt immediatly from his Horſe, and ſaid unto him, King, be of good courage, and let not thy preſent and perplexed condition diſhearten thee, as if thy misfortunes were irrecoverable. For this ſorrow of thine ſhall be ſuddenly changed, and thou ſhalt find a better friend and ally, than thou hopeſt for at this time: For either I will repoſſeſs thee of thy Kingdom of Parthia, or I will loſe mine own. This ſaid, he cauſed Artabanus to get on Horſback, and walked by him on foot, yielding him this honour, as to a greater King than himſelf. Which when Artabanus ſaw, he was diſcontented, and ſware by his Honour and Fortune to come, that he would ſet foot on ground, if he would not get up on horſback and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting upon his Horſe again, he conducted him to his Palace; yielding him all the O honor that was poſſible, both in his Banquets and in his Aſſemblies, not regarding his preſent condition, but his former Dignity: conſidering with himſelf, that ſuch caſual misfortunes

A misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Moreover he wrote unto the Parthians, perſwading them to receive their King Artabanus, aſſuring them on his Faith and Oath, that he would obtain a free pardon for all that which was paſt, and to that intent he offered himſelf to be an Arbitrator between them. The Parthians gave him this anſwer, that they would not refuſe to entertain him, but that they could not: for that one who was called Cinnamus was advanced in his place and Dignity, and that they feared leſt a Sedition ſhould happen amongſt them. Cinnamus who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was ſuch, wrote himſelf unto Artabanus, who had nouriſhed and brought him up, exhorting him to return upon his Faith, and to receive again his own Kingdom. Artabanus B upon this Motion gave credit to his words, and returned back again. Whereupon Cinnamus came forth and met him, and proſtrating himſelf before his feet, called him King; and afterwards taking the Diadem from off his own head, he ſet it upon Artabanus head; who by this means was reſtored to his former eſtate by Izates mediation, after he had been driven out of his Kingdom by his chiefeſt Nobility. And he did not forget the favours which he had received at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that poſſibly he could imagine: for he permitted him to wear the ſtraight Tiara, and to ſleep upon a gilded Bed, which is a Privilege which belongeth only to the Kings of Parthia. He gave him alſo a plentiful and great Country which he had taken from the King of Armenia. This Country was called Niſibis, where in times paſt C the Macedonians had builded the City of Antioch, by them called Mygdonia.

Preſently after Izates was thus honoured, Artabanus died, leaving his Kingdom to his Son Vardanes; who repaired to Izates, praying him to joyn with him in that War which he intended to make againſt the Romans; but he prevailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Romans force and good fortune, imagined that he undertook a matter beyond his power. Beſides, he had ſent five of his young Sons to Jeruſalem to learn our tongue and diſcipline, and his Mother likewiſe to adore in the Temple, for which cauſe he the rather held back and diſſwaded Vardanes from going againſt the Romans, whoſe power and conqueſts he ordinarily reckoned up unto him, to the end he might diſcourage him, and by theſe aſſertions cauſe him to give over his purD poſed intent of war againſt them. But the Parthian was diſpleaſed with his perſwaſion, and for that cauſe denounced a preſent War againſt Izates. But his enterprize had but a fruitleſs iſſue; for God cut off all his hopes. For the Parthians underſtanding what Vardanes intent was, and how he was reſolved to make a War againſt the Romans killed him, and gave the Kingdom to his Brother Gotarza, whom not long after this, his Brother Vologeſus killed by treaſon, reſtoring to his two Brothers by the Mothers ſide theſe Provinces, that is to ſay, the Kingdom of Media to Pacorus who was the eldeſt, and Armenia to Tiridates who was the younger.

Vologeſus King of Parthia.

When Monobazus King Izates's Brother and the reſt of his Kinsfolk ſaw how happily all things ſucceeded to Izates, and how in reſpect of his Piety towards God, he was E honoured and reverenced by all men, they alſo reſolved themſelves to forſake their Religion, and to ſerve God after the manner of the Jews. But this intent of theirs was diſcovered. Whereupon the chiefeſt among them grew diſpleaſed; yet they did not manifeſt their deſpight, but kept it hidden in their hearts, expecting ſome fit occaſion to revenge themſelves as ſoon as they might. They wrote alſo to Abias King of Arabia, and promiſed him great ſums of money, if he would take Arms againſt their King, promiſing him upon the firſt charge, they would forſake him, for that they deſired to be revenged on him, for having forſaken their Religion. Having therefore confirmed their promiſe with an Oath, they incited him to make haſte. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth againſt Izates with a F great power. And when the firſt charge was ready to be given, and before they came to blows, all Izates Soldiers forſook him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great diſorder, as if they had been ſurprized with a Panick fear; yet was Izates no ways daunted; but having diſcovered that it was treaſon and conſpiracy of his greateſt Peers, he retired alſo into his Camp, where he enquired of the Cauſe that they pretended. After he knew that they had plotted with the Arabian, he cauſed the Conſpirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and killed a great number of his enemies, and conſtrained the reſt to betake them to flight. He purſued their King alſo into a Fort called Arſam, which he battered and aſſaulted with ſuch vigour and diligence, that he took the ſame with G a great quantity of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but he took not Abias alive, for he himſelf had prevented his captivity with his death. that by God's hand they were delivered into the hands of their King, could not contain their diſpleaſure, but practiſed further miſchief: for they wrote their Letters to H Vologeſus King of Parthia, deſiring him to kill Izates, and to beſtow another King upon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their King who had aboliſhed their Religion, and had embraced a ſtrange Law. The Parthian underſtanding hereof, prepared himſelf for War; and having no juſt colour or pretext to authorize it, he ſent a meſſenger unto him to redemand thoſe honours which his father had given him, which if he refuſed, he denounced War againſt him. Izates was not a little troubled in his mind, when he underſtood this meſſage: For he thought that if he ſhould reſtore the gifts, he ſhould do himſelf great prejudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for fear; knowing on the other ſide that if the Parthian ſhould recover I that which he redemanded, yet he would not be quiet, he therefore commended his cauſe to God, truſting that he would take care of him. And building upon this, that the greateſt good he might have was to have God to help, he ſhut his wives and children in a ſtrong Caſtle, and his corn in his ſtrongeſt Tower: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage: and having after this manner provided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemy. The Parthian came forward ſooner than he was expected, with a great power of Horſe and Foot. For he marched forward in all haſte, and encamped near unto the river that ſeparateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewiſe encamped not far from thence, having with him about ſix thouſand Horſe. To whom the Parthian ſent a meſſenger to give him to underſtand how great his power K was, which extended from the River Euphrates as far as Bactria, ſhewing him what Kings he had under his ſubjection, threatning him to puniſh him very ſeverely, in that he behaved himſelf ſo ungratefully towards his Benefactors; yea, that the God whom he adored, could not deliver him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates anſwered, that he knew well that the Parthian far exceeded him in power, but that he was far better aſſured that God's power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And having returned them this anſwer, he betook himſelf to his prayers, and proſtrating himſelf upon the earth, and caſting aſhes on his head, and faſting himſelf his wives and children, he called upon God and prayed after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I have not vainly ſubmitted my ſelf to thy protection, but have intirely choſen thee L for my only and true God, be thou my help and aſſiſtance, and not only deliver me from mine enemies, but alſo abate and controul their pride, who have not been afraid in their blaſphemous language, to prophane thy holy and ſacred Name, and utter blaſphemous ſpeeches againſt thy power. Thus prayed he with ſighs and tears, and God heard him: For the very ſame night, Vologeſus received Letters by which he was certified that a great number of Dahans and Sacans, taking opportunity by his abſence, were entred into the Kingdom of Parthia, and ſpoiled the whole Country.
For which cauſe he returned back into his Country without any further trouble. And thus Izates by Gods Providence was delivered from the Parthian threats.

Izates calleth upon God, who ſendeth the Dahans and Sacans into Parthia, upon whoſe arrival Vologeſus returneth.

Not long after this, after he had lived fifty five years and reigned four and twenty, M and left behind him four and tweny ſons, he died, and appointed his Brother Monobazus to ſucceed him in the Kingdom, requiting hereby his faith and Loyalty, in that during the time of his abſence, and after the death of his Father, he had faithfully ruled and governed the Kingdom to his uſe. His Mother Helena hearing news of his death, lamented very grievouſly that ſhe being his Mother was deprived of a Son that ſo zealouſly honoured and feared God, yet notwithſtanding ſhe was comforted, when ſhe underſtood that her eldeſt Son was to ſucceed him in the Kingdom, and haſted with all diligence to go and meet him. As ſoon as ſhe arrived in Adiabena, ſhe lived not long time after her Son Izates. Whereupon Monobazus took both her body and his Brothers bones, and ſent them to Jeruſalem, commanding that they ſhould be buried N in three Pyramids which Helena had builded, ſome three ſtades or furlongs from Jeruſalem. But hereafter we will recite the acts and geſts of Monobazus during his reign.

The horrid Inſolence of a Roman Soldier, cauſeth the death of twenty thouſand Jews: Another Soldier's Inſolence.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 9. Alias, 10.

AT the time of the Feaſt of Paſcha (during which time the Jews are accuſtomed to feed on unleavened bread) a great number of people aſſembled themſelves from all parts, to the City of Jeruſalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing leſt, by this occaſion, there ſhould ariſe ſome Commotion, he gave order that a Company of his Souldiers ſhould be armed, and ſhould keep their Guard in the Porches of the Temple, to the end, if any trouble ſhould happen, they might repreſs it. Thoſe Governours, who had been his Predeceſſors, had done the like in ſuch manner of Aſſemblies. It came to paſs, on the fourth day of the Feaſt, that a certain Soldier diſcovering thoſe Privi-
E ties which were undecent to be ſeen, ſhewed them before the people; wherewith they that beheld the ſame were much diſpleaſed, and provoked, ſaying, that the diſhonour was not done to them, but to God. And ſome of the boldeſt of them uttered certain ſpeeches againſt Cumanus, ſaying, that the Soldier was ſet on by him; which when Cumanus underſtood, he was in like manner grievouſly offended, in regard of thoſe injuries; yet exhorted thoſe, whom he ſaw too forward, to keep the Peace, for fear leſt a Sedition ſhould ariſe during the time of the Feaſt: And ſeeing they would no ways obey him, but contrariwiſe, they ceaſed not to injure and revile him, he commanded that all the Forces he had ſhould be in Arms, and retire themſelves into the Fort of Antonia that was near unto the Temple, as we have heretofore declared.
F The people ſeeing the armed Soldiers, were afraid, and began to fly; and becauſe the places thorough which they iſſued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were purſued by their enemies; ſo that they thruſt on one another in their flight, and divers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thouſand men: and after this, inſtead of a Feaſt, there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themſelves of their Prayers and Sacrifices, all of them began to weep and lament. So great a miſchief ſprung from the inſolence of one Soldier. This firſt lamentation was ſcarcely finiſhed, before a ſecond ſucceeded the ſame. For ſome of thoſe who had a part in this Mutiny, being about a hundred ſtades from the City, robbed one Stephen, that was Cæſar's Servant, in the High way, and took from him all that Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. Alias, 12. Certain Samaritans kill divers Galileans in their way to Jeruſalem.

The year of the World, 4014. after Chriſt's Nativity, 52.

There happened alſo a quarrel betwixt the Samaritans and the Jews, upon this occaſion: They of Galilee, who reſorted to the City of Jeruſalem at the times of our ſolemn Feaſts, were accuſtomed to paſs thorough the Contrey of the Samaritans And at that time it happened, that their way lay thorough a Burrough called Nais, ſcituate in a great Champain Field: where a Quarrel ariſing betwixt divers Inhabitants L of that place, and ſome Paſſengers, a great number of the Galileans were murthered.
Which when the Magiſtrates of Galilee underſtood, they reſorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute Juſtice on thoſe that had murthered their Countrey-men; but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritans, made no account of their complaint.
The Galileans being provoked by this Contempt of his, perſwaded the common people of the Jews to betake them to their Weapons, and maintain their Liberty; telling them, that ſlavery is of it ſelf very harſh; but that when it is accompanied with injuries, it is intolerable. But their Magiſtrates endeavoured to pacifie them, promiſing them to deal ſo effectually with Cumanus, that he ſhould puniſh the Murtherers; but they gave them no Audience, but fell to Arms, requiring Eleazar the Son of Dinæus M to be their Leader.. This Eleazar was a Thief, who for many years made his abode in the Mountains; they therefore ſpoiled and burnt certain Villages of the Samaritans.
After that the report of all that which had paſſed, came to Cumanus's ears, he took ſome Troops out of Sebaſte, with four Companies of Foot, and armed the Samaritans likewiſe, to go and fight againſt the Jews; whereof they killed many, and led more of them away Priſoners. When the chiefeſt Magiſtrates of Jeruſalem ſaw into what a number of miſeries they were fallen, they clothed themſelves in Sack-cloth, and caſt aſhes on their heads, exhorting thoſe that were mutinous, to conſider, that if they did not lay down Arms, and return peaceably to their own homes, they would be the cauſe of their Countrey's utter ruine; that they ſhould ſee the Temple burnt N before their eyes, and themſelves, their Wives and Children, made Slaves. By which words, in the end, they being perſwaded, returned home, and betook them to their buſineſs. The Thieves alſo retired again into their ſtrong Holds, and from that time, all Judæa was full of Robberies. The Governours of Samaria reſorted to Numidius Quadratus, Governour of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre; to accuſe the Jews, for that they had fired their Villages, and plundered them; telling him, that their loſs did not ſo much trouble them, as for that they ſaw the Romans were contemned by the Jews; who notwithſtanding, ought to appear before them as their competent Judges; yet, nevertheleſs, that they aſſembled themſelves, as if the Romans were not their Superiors. For which cauſe they addreſſed themſelves to him, O to the end, they might have redreſs of thoſe wrongs which they had received by them.
This is that wherewith the Samaritans charged the Jews, who anſwered to the contrary,

The Galileans in revenge of their injuries, burn certain Villages of the Samaritans, and ſpoil the ſame.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8. Alias, 12. The Samaritans accuſe the Jews before Numidius Quadratus.

A trary, alledging that the Samaritans themſelves had been the Authors of that mutiny and uproar; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money had ſmothered the matter, and done no juſtice on the Murtherers. When Quadratus heard this, he reſerved the judgment till another time, telling them that he would give ſentence in the matter when he came into Judea, and had examined the truth on both ſides; ſo that they returned without doing any thing.

The year of the World, 4014. after Chriſt's Nativity. 52.

The Jews lay the burthen of the Wars on the Samaritans and Cumanus.

Shortly after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritans had been the Authors of the trouble, and on the other ſide knowing that ſome Jews likewiſe intended ſome inſurrection, he cauſed them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in priſon. From thence he tranſported himſelf to Lydda, which is a Burrough of B no leſs bigneſs than a City: in which place he ſitting on his Tribunal Seat, heard the Samaritans the ſecond time, and diſcovered by the report of a certain Samaritan, that one Dortus one of the chiefeſt among the Jews, and four other his Confederates induced the people to rebel againſt the Romans. Quadratus cauſed them to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the High Prieſt, and the Captain Ananus, he ſent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperor Claudius of that which they had done. Moreover, he commanded the chief Governours both of the Samaritans and Jews, that they ſhould ſpeedily repair to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captain Celer ſhould conduct them, to the end they might be judged by Cæſar himſelf, upon the information taken on both ſides. And fearing leſt the common people of the Jews C ſhould break out into ſome Rebellion, he repaired to the City of Jeruſalem, to give order that the Jews ſhould attempt to raiſe no new ſtirs; but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and buſied in the celebration of the Feaſt, and offering Sacrifices to God, according to their accuſtomed Ceremonies. Being therefore aſſured that no man would rebel in that place, he left them to their ſolemnites, and repaired to Antioch.

Dortus with four other are crucified.

Ananias, Ananus, Cumanus, Celer, and ſome other are ſent to Rome.

Aliàs cap.13.

But the Jews that were ſent to Rome with Cumanus and the principal Samaritans had a day aſſigned them by the Emperor to decide the differences that were between them. Cumanus and the Samaritans endeavoured all that they might by the mediation of Cæſar's friends and freemen, to have the upper hand of the Jews; and indeed D the day had been theirs if young Agrippa had not been at Rome. For he ſeeing that the matter was handled to the diſadvantage of the Jews, beſought Agrippina the Emperors Wife, that ſhe would prevail ſo with her Huſband, that he would be pleaſed to take full knowledge of that which was done; and that afterwards he ſhould execute due juſtice on thoſe whom he found guilty of that ſedition. Claudius favourably gave ear to this requeſt: and hearing the whole matter, he found that the Samaritans were the firſt Authors of all thoſe miſchiefs, and cauſed them to be put to death who came before him to plead, and baniſhed Cumanus: he gave order alſo that Captain Celer ſhould be ſent back to Jeruſalem, and that there in ſight of all the people he ſhould be dragged about the City, until he died. He ſent Claudius E Fœlix, Pallas Brother, to govern Judæa.

Agrippa moveth Agrippina to intreat Cæſar to hear the cauſe of the Jews.

Claudius Felix Governour of Judea.

Druſilla.

In the twelfth year of his Reign, he gave Agrippa, Philip's Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and beſides that, added thereunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in time paſt appertained to Lyſanias Tetrarchy, taking from this the Province of Chalcis, which he had governed for the ſpace of four years. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cæſar's hands, he married his ſiſter Druſilla to Azizus King of the Emeſſenians, who conſented to be circumciſed, becauſe Epiphanes, King Antiochus Son would not give ear unto the marriage, for that he refuſed to entertain the Religion of the Jews, although in times paſt he had promiſed his Father no leſs. He gave Mariamne to Archelaus, Chelcias Son, who by her Fathers conſent was formerly promiſed him, on whom he begat a F Daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the Marriage of Azizus and Druſilla was broken off on this occaſion following: When Felix governed Jewry, he ſaw Druſilla and fell in love with her, ſhe ſurpaſſing all other women in Beauty. He therefore ſent a certain Magician called Simon, who was born in Cyprus, and one of his greateſt friends among the Jews, who perſwaded her to forſake her firſt Huſband, and to marry Felix, giving her to underſtand that ſhe ſhould be happy, if ſhe refuſed not this match. She unadviſed, and reſolved to rid her ſelf from the hatred which her Siſter Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this cauſe ceaſed not to injure her) condeſcended to forſake the Religion of the Jews, and to marry Felix, by whom ſhe had a Son called Agrippa; whoſe death hereafter I will G declare, and how in the Emperour Titus's his time he died, and was burned in the fire of the Mountain Veſuvius with his Wife. Bernice remained a Widow, very long after Herod's death, who was both her Uncle and her Huſband, and the report that by God's hand they were delivered into the hands of their King, could not contain their diſpleaſure, but practiſed further miſchief: for they wrote their Letters to Vologeſus King of Parthia, deſiring him to kill Izates, and to beſtow another King upon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their King who had aboliſhed their Religion, and had embraced a ſtrange Law. The Parthian underſtanding hereof, prepared himſelf for War; and having no juſt colour or pretext to authorize it, he ſent a meſſenger unto him to redemand thoſe honours which his father had given him, which if he refuſed, he denounced War againſt him. Izates was not a little troubled in his mind, when he underſtood this meſſage: For he thought that if he ſhould reſtore the gifts, he ſhould do himſelf great prejudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for fear; knowing on the other ſide that if the Parthian ſhould recover that which he redemanded, yet he would not be quiet, he therefore commended his cauſe to God, truſting that he would take care of him. And building upon this, that the greateſt good he might have was to have God to help, he ſhut his wives and children in a ſtrong Caſtle, and his corn in his ſtrongeſt Tower: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage: and having after this manner provided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemy. The Parthian came forward ſooner than he was expected, with a great power of Horſe and Foot. For he marched forward in all haſte, and encamped near unto the river that ſeparateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewiſe encamped not far from thence, having with him about ſix thouſand Horſe. To whom the Parthian ſent a meſſenger to give him to underſtand how great his power was, which extended from the River Euphrates as far as Bactria, ſhewing him what Kings he had under his ſubjection, threatning him to puniſh him very ſeverely, in that he behaved himſelf ſo ungratefully towards his Benefactors; yea, that the God whom he adored, could not deliver him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates anſwered, that he knew well that the Parthian far exceeded him in power, but that he was far better aſſured that God's power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And having returned them this anſwer, he betook himſelf to his prayers, and proſtrating himſelf upon the earth, and caſting aſhes on his head, and faſting himſelf his wives and children, he called upon God and prayed after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I have not vainly ſubmitted my ſelf to thy protection, but have intirely choſen thee for my only and true God, be thou my help and aſſiſtance, and not only deliver me from mine enemies, but alſo abate and controul their pride, who have not been afraid in their blaſphemous language, to prophane thy holy and ſacred Name, and utter blaſphemous ſpeeches againſt thy power. Thus prayed he with ſighs and tears, and God heard him: For the very ſame night, Vologeſus received Letters by which he was certified that a great number of Dahans and Sacans, taking opportunity by his abſence, were entred into the Kingdom of Parthia, and ſpoiled the whole Country. For which cauſe he returned back into his Country without any further trouble. And thus Izates by Gods Providence was delivered from the Parthian threats.

Izates calleth upon God, who ſendeth the Dahans and Sacans into Parthia, upon whoſe arrival Vologeſus returneth.

Izates delivereth up the Kingdom to his Brother Monobazus and dieth.

Not long after this, after he had lived fifty five years and reigned four and twenty, and left behind him four and tweny ſons, he died, and appointed his Brother Monobazus to ſucceed him in the Kingdom, requiting hereby his faith and Loyalty, in that during the time of his abſence, and after the death of his Father, he had faithfully ruled and governed the Kingdom to his uſe. His Mother Helena hearing news of his death, lamented very grievouſly that ſhe being his Mother was deprived of a Son that ſo zealouſly honoured and feared God, yet notwithſtanding ſhe was comforted, when ſhe underſtood that her eldeſt Son was to ſucceed him in the Kingdom, and haſted with all diligence to go and meet him. As ſoon as ſhe arrived in Adiabena, ſhe lived not long time after her Son Izates. Whereupon Monobazus took both her body and his Brothers bones, and ſent them to Jeruſalem, commanding that they ſhould be buried in three Pyramids which Helena had builded, ſome three ſtades or furlongs from Jeruſalem. But hereafter we will recite the acts and geſts of Monobazus during his reign.

Theudas perſwadeth the people, that with a word he will cauſe Jordan to divide it ſelf, & yield them paſſage: he with his followers are ſlain.

But during Fadus Government in Judæa, a certain Magician called Theudas perſwaded a great number of the people to take all their goods and ſubſtance, and to follow him to the River of Jordan; for he ſaid he was a Prophet, and told them that the River ſhould divide it ſelf into two parts upon his commandment, and yield them free paſſage. By theſe words of his, he deceived divers of them. But Fadus ſent ſome troops of Horſe, who charged them on the ſudden, and killed a great number of them, and took divers of them Priſoners alive; amongſt whom was Theudas, whoſe head was ſtricken off, and was afterwards carried to Jeruſalem. This is that which befel the Jews under Fadus's Government.

At that time there hapned a great Famine in Jewry, during which, Queen Helena ſent huge ſumms of money into Egypt, and bought Corn, and diſtributed the ſame to thoſe that were in want, according as I have ſaid before. At the ſame time James and Simon, the Sons of Judas of Galilee, who had buſied themſelves to incite the people to reſiſt the Government of the Romans, were put to death at ſuch time as Cyrenius valued each man's Goods, as we have heretofore declared. After Tiberius Alexander, ſucceeded Cumanus. Then died Herod, who was Brother to King Agrippa the Great, in the eighth year of Claudius Cæſar. He left behind

The horrid Inſolence of a Roman Soldier, cauſeth the death of twenty thouſand Jews: D Another Soldier's Inſolence.

AT the time of the Feaſt of Paſcha (during which time the Jews are accuſtomed to feed on unleavened bread) a great number of people aſſembled themſelves from all parts, to the City of Jeruſalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing leſt, by this occaſion, there ſhould ariſe ſome Commotion, he gave order that a Company of his Souldiers ſhould be armed, and ſhould keep their Guard in the Porches of the Temple, to the end, if any trouble ſhould happen, they might repreſs it. Thoſe Governours, who had been his Predeceſſors, had done the like in ſuch manner of Aſſemblies. It came to paſs, on the fourth day of the Feaſt, that a certain Soldier diſcovering thoſe Privities
E which were undecent to be ſeen, ſhewed them before the people; wherewith they that beheld the ſame were much diſpleaſed, and provoked, ſaying, that the diſhonour was not done to them, but to God. And ſome of the boldeſt of them uttered certain ſpeeches againſt Cumanus, ſaying, that the Soldier was ſet on by him; which when Cumanus underſtood, he was in like manner grievouſly offended, in regard of thoſe injuries; yet exhorted thoſe, whom he ſaw too forward, to keep the Peace, for fear leſt a Sedition ſhould ariſe during the time of the Feaſt: And ſeeing they would no ways obey him, but contrariwiſe, they ceaſed not to injure and revile him, he commanded that all the Forces he had ſhould be in Arms, and retire themſelves into the Fort of Antonia that was near unto the Temple, as we have heretofore declared.
F The people ſeeing the armed Soldiers, were afraid, and began to fly; and becauſe the places thorough which they iſſued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were purſued by their enemies; ſo that they thruſt on one another in their flight, and divers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thouſand men: and after this, inſtead of a Feaſt, there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themſelves of their Prayers and Sacrifices, all of them began to weep and lament. So great a miſchief ſprung from the inſolence of one Soldier. This firſt lamentation was ſcarcely finiſhed, before a ſecond ſucceeded the ſame. For ſome of thoſe who had a part in this Mutiny, being about a hundred ſtades from the City, robbed one Stephen, that was Cæſar's Servant, in the High way, and took from him all that

The year of the World, 4014. after Christ's Nativity, 52.

THere happened alſo a quarrel betwixt the Samaritans and the Jews, upon this occaſion: They of Galilee, who reſorted to the City of Jeruſalem at the times of our ſolemn Feaſts, were accuſtomed to paſs thorough the Contrey of the Samaritans And at that time it happened, that their way lay thorough a Burrough called Nais, ſcituate in a great Champain Field: where a Quarrel ariſing betwixt divers Inhabitants L of that place, and ſome Paſſengers, a great number of the Galileans were murthered. Which when the Magiſtrates of Galilee underſtood, they reſorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute Juſtice on thoſe that had murthered their Countrey-men; but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritans, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being provoked by this Contempt of his, perſwaded the common people of the Jews to betake them to their Weapons, and maintain their Liberty; telling them, that ſlavery is of it ſelf very harſh; but that when it is accompanied with injuries, it is intolerable. But their Magiſtrates endeavoured to pacifie them, promiſing them to deal ſo effectually with Cumanus, that he ſhould puniſh the Murtherers; but they gave them no Audience, but fell to Arms, requiring Eleazar the Son of Dinæus M to be their Leader.. This Eleazar was a Thief, who for many years made his abode in the Mountains; they therefore ſpoiled and burnt certain Villages of the Samaritans. After that the report of all that which had paſſed, came to Cumanus's ears, he took ſome Troops out of Sebaſte, with four Companies of Foot, and armed the Samaritans likewiſe, to go and fight againſt the Jews; whereof they killed many, and led more of them away Priſoners. When the chiefeſt Magiſtrates of Jeruſalem ſaw into what a number of miſeries they were fallen, they clothed themſelves in Sack-cloth, and caſt aſhes on their heads, exhorting thoſe that were mutinous, to conſider, that if they did not lay down Arms, and return peaceably to their own homes, they would be the cauſe of their Countrey's utter ruine; that they ſhould ſee the Temple burnt N before their eyes, and themſelves, their Wives and Children, made Slaves. By which words, in the end, they being perſwaded, returned home, and betook them to their buſineſs. The Thieves alſo retired again into their ſtrong Holds, and from that time, all Judæa was full of Robberies. The Governours of Samaria reſorted to Numidius Quadratus, Governour of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre; to accuſe the Jews, for that they had fired their Villages, and plundered them; telling him, that their loſs did not ſo much trouble them, as for that they ſaw the Romans were contemned by the Jews; who notwithſtanding, ought to appear before them as their competent Judges; yet, nevertheleſs, that they aſſembled themſelves, as if the Romans were not their Superiors. For which cauſe they addreſſed themſelves to him, O to the end, they might have redreſs of thoſe wrongs which they had received by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritans charged the Jews, who anſwered to the contrary,

The Galileans in revenge of their injuries, burn certain Villages of the Samaritans, and ſpoil the ſame.

When Quadratus heard this, he reſerved the judgment till another time, telling them that he would give ſentence in the matter when he came into Judea, and had examined the truth on both ſides; ſo that they returned without doing any thing.

The year of the World, 4014. after Chriſt's Nativity. 52.

The Jews lay the burthen of the Wars on the Samaritans and Cumanus.

Shortly after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritans had been the Authors of the trouble, and on the other ſide knowing that ſome Jews likewiſe intended ſome inſurrection, he cauſed them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in priſon. From thence he tranſported himſelf to Lydda, which is a Burrough of B no leſs bigneſs than a City: in which place he ſitting on his Tribunal Seat, heard the Samaritans the ſecond time, and diſcovered by the report of a certain Samaritan, that one Dortus one of the chiefeſt among the Jews, and four other his Confederates induced the people to rebel againſt the Romans. Quadratus cauſed them to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the High Prieſt, and the Captain Ananus, he ſent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperor Claudius of that which they had done. Moreover, he commanded the chief Governours both of the Samaritans and Jews, that they ſhould ſpeedily repair to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captain Celer ſhould conduct them, to the end they might be judged by Cæſar himſelf, upon the information taken on both ſides. And fearing leſt the common people of the Jews C ſhould break out into ſome Rebellion, he repaired to the City of Jeruſalem, to give order that the Jews ſhould attempt to raiſe no new ſtirs; but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and buſied in the celebration of the Feaſt, and offering Sacrifices to God, according to their accuſtomed Ceremonies. Being therefore aſſured that no man would rebel in that place, he left them to their ſolemnites, and repaired to Antioch.

Dortus with four other are crucified.

Ananias, Ananus, Cumanus, Celer, and ſome other are ſent to Rome.

But the Jews that were ſent to Rome with Cumanus and the principal Samaritans had a day aſſigned them by the Emperor to decide the differences that were between them. Cumanus and the Samaritans endeavoured all that they might by the mediation of Cæſar's friends and freemen, to have the upper hand of the Jews; and indeed D the day had been theirs if young Agrippa had not been at Rome. For he ſeeing that the matter was handled to the diſadvantage of the Jews, beſought Agrippina the Emperors Wife, that ſhe would prevail ſo with her Huſband, that he would be pleaſed to take full knowledge of that which was done; and that afterwards he ſhould execute due juſtice on thoſe whom he found guilty of that ſedition. Claudius favourably gave ear to this requeſt: and hearing the whole matter, he found that the Samaritans were the firſt Authors of all thoſe miſchiefs, and cauſed them to be put to death who came before him to plead, and baniſhed Cumanus: he gave order alſo that Captain Celer ſhould be ſent back to Jeruſalem, and that there in ſight of all the people he ſhould be dragged about the City, until he died. He ſent Claudius E Fœlix, Pallas Brother, to govern Judæa.

Aliàs cap.13.

Agrippa moveth Agrippina to intreat Cæſar to hear the cauſe of the Jews.

In the twelfth year of his Reign, he gave Agrippa, Philip's Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and beſides that, added thereunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in time paſt appertained to Lyſanias Tetrarchy, taking from this the Province of Chalcis, which he had governed for the ſpace of four years. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cæſar's hands, he married his ſiſter Druſilla to Azizus King of the Emeſſenians, who conſented to be circumciſed, becauſe Epiphanes, King Antiochus Son would not give ear unto the marriage, for that he refuſed to entertain the Religion of the Jews, although in times paſt he had promiſed his Father no leſs. He gave Mariamne to Archelaus, Chelcias Son, who by her Fathers conſent was formerly promiſed him, on whom he begat a F Daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the Marriage of Azizus and Druſilla was broken off on this occaſion following: When Felix governed Jewry, he ſaw Druſilla and fell in love with her, ſhe ſurpaſſing all other women in Beauty. He therefore ſent a certain Magician called Simon, who was born in Cyprus, and one of his greateſt friends among the Jews, who perſwaded her to forſake her firſt Huſband, and to marry Felix, giving her to underſtand that ſhe ſhould be happy, if ſhe refuſed not this match. She unadviſed, and reſolved to rid her ſelf from the hatred which her Siſter Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this cauſe ceaſed not to injure her) condeſcended to forſake the Religion of the Jews, and to marry Felix, by whom ſhe had a Son called Agrippa; whoſe death hereafter I will G declare, and how in the Emperour Titus's his time he died, and was burned in the fire of the Mountain Veſuvius with his Wife. Bernice remained a Widow, very long after Herod's death, who was both her Uncle and her Huſband, and the report Whereunto Polemon gave ear becauſe ſhe was rich. But this Marriage continued not any long time: For Bernice through her impudency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giving over that Marriage forſook alſo the Religion of the Jews. At the ſame time Mariamne having forſaken Archelaus her Husband, married Demetrius, one of the chiefeſt Jews that were in Alexandria, both in regard of his deſcent, as alſo his riches; who at that time alſo exerciſed the office of Alubarcha, that is to ſay, the Governour of Arabia. Nero a tyrant. Nero's tyranny.

The Emperor Claudius died after he had reigned thirteen years, eight moneths, and twenty days. Some ſay that he was poyſoned by Agrippina his wife the daughter of Germanicus, Claudius's Brother. She was firſt married to Domitius Ænobarbus, one of the greateſt men of Rome; after whoſe death and long Widowhood, ſhe was at length married to Claudius, into whoſe houſe ſhe brought her Son called Domitius, by his own Fathers name. Claudius had put Meſſalina his wife to death, for the jealouſie he had of her; although he had had children by her, namely Britannicus and Octavia: And for his daughter Antonia, who was the eldeſt of all his children and begotten on Pætina one of his former Wives, ſhe was married to Nero, whom Claudius ſo named, and adopted for his Son. Agrippina, fearing leſt Britanicus, growing to mans eſtate, ſhould ſucceed his Father in the Empire, and deſirous to make her own Son Emperour, as is reported; ſhe left nothing unattempted that might bring her Husband to his death; and preſently ſent Burrus, who was General of the Army, with ſome other Captains, and thoſe of the greateſt power among his free-men, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaim him Emperour. He being thus eſtabliſhed in the Empire, cauſed Britannicus to be ſecretly poyſoned; and not long after this, he openly cauſed his Mother to be put to death, yielding her this recompence, not only for that ſhe had born him in her womb, but alſo becauſe by her means he had obtained the Empire. He likewiſe murthered Octavia his wife, the Emperor Claudius's daughter, and divers other Noble men, under colour of ſome Conſpiracy intended againſt him. But I will not proſecute this matter, for that there are divers who have writ Nero's Hiſtory; of whom ſome have no regard of the truth, but have ſpoken at their pleaſure, for that he had been their Benefactor: others tranſported with hatred and deſpite againſt him, having not been aſhamed to publiſh ſuch impudent lies againſt his renown, that they deſerve to be condemned. Neither do I wonder that they have invented ſo many lyes againſt Nero, conſidering that in thoſe Hiſtories which they wrote of the former Emperours, they have not ſtudied to ſpeak truth, although they had not any occaſion to hate them, conſidering that they lived a long time after their death. For my own part I am reſolved never to deviate from the truth, contenting my ſelf to touch only by the way thoſe things that concern my purpoſe; neither will I treat in particular but of what relateth to my Country, without diſſembling our own faults any more than the afflictions that they brought upon us. I will therefore return to the diſcovery of our affairs. Azizus King of Emeſene being dead the firſt year of the Emperour Nero's reign, his Brother obtained the Kingdom: Ariſtobulus the ſon of Herod King of Chalcis, had the Government of the leſſer Armenia from Nero, who gave Agrippa a certain portion of Galilee, commanding thoſe of Tiberias and Tarichæa to live under him. Beſides this, he gave him Julias ſituate beyond Jordan, with fourteen Burroughs near adjoyning thereunto.

becauſe he uſed to find fault with him for his miſ-behaviours, leſt he ſhould be blamed for him, becauſe it was through his means, that the Emperour had made him Governour; he reſolved to make an end of him; there being nothing more unſufferable to boldly to ſolemn Feaſts, having their weapons hidden under their garments, and thronging in among the people, killed ſome of thoſe who were their Adverſaries and others, to pleaſure thoſe who had hired them with ready money to rid them of thoſe they miſ-liked. And they did ſo, not only up and down the City, but in the Temple likewiſe; where they killed ſome who little ſuſpected that any impiety ſhould be committed in that place. For my own part, I think that God hath deſtroyed our City, in C deteſtation of that Impiety: and for that he accounted the Temple impure, he hath ſent us the Romans, who have ſet it on fire to purge the City, and make us ſlaves, with our Wives and Children; intending thereby to teach us Wiſdom by our own miſeries.

Thus was the City filled with theſe Thefts and Murthers. And as for the Enchanters and Deceivers, they perſwaded the common people to follow them into the Deſart, promiſing them to ſhew them ſigns and miracles done by the Power of God; whereunto divers gave ear, and at laſt ſuffered the penalty of their folly: For Fœlix recalling them back again, puniſhed them.

people anew to make War againſt the Romans, telling them that they ought not to yield them obedience; and they burned and ſpoiled divers of thoſe Burroughs, which oppoſed themſelves againſt them. It chanced alſo, that the Jews that inhabited Cæſa- E rea, mutined againſt the Syrians that were in the ſame City, in that they ſtrove to have an equal Authority in the Government of the State as well as they. The Jews pretended the Title of Superiority, becauſe that Herod, who was a Jew, had builded the City of Cæſarea; on the other ſide, the Syrians owned the Jews ſayings to be true; but they replied alſo, that Cæſarea was formerly called the Tower of Straton, and that at that time there was not one Jew that inhabited the ſame. Which when the Governours of that Countrey heard, they laid hands on the Authors of this Sedition, as well of the one, as of the other party, and gave them the Baſtinado; pacifying by this means, the trouble for a little ſpace. For the Jews once more being puffed up with their Riches, and contemning the Syrians, injuriouſly reviled and provoked them: On F the other ſide, the Syrians being weaker in ſubſtance, but as great in heart (by reaſon the greateſt number of thoſe that bare Arms with the Romans, were Cæſareans and Sebaſtens) at ſome times brake out into opprobrious ſpeeches againſt the Jews; and at length the quarrel grew to that heat, that they caſt ſtones at one another, ſo that on both ſides divers of them were both killed and hurt; yet the Jews had the upper hand.
Fœlix perceiving that this debate might breed a War, came in between them, requiring the Jews to deſiſt from further violence, and commanding his Soldiers to beat down thoſe who would refuſe to obey him; by which means a great number were killed, and divers taken Priſoners. Moreover, he gave his Soldiers liberty to ſpoil, and rob divers very rich houſes. The other Jews, who, beſides their Authority, were re-G nowned for their moderation, fearing leſt the like miſery ſhould befall them, beſought Fœlix to ſound a retreat, and to call in his Soldiers, and to ſpare that which as yet remained, being ſore grieved at that which had happened; to which Fœlix condeſcended.

There aroſe alſo a diſſention betwixt the High Prieſts, and the other Prieſts and Governours of Jeruſalem; and each Faction walked forth, accompanied with a Troop of proud and mutinous perſons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of ſtones, ſo that no man might pacifie them: For all things were ſo out of order, as if there had been no Magiſtrates in the City; and the impudency and audaciouſneſs of the High Prieſts permitted ſo much, that they ſent their Servants to the Barns, to ſeize the Tenths that were due unto the Prieſts; whereby it came to paſs, that ſome poor Prieſts died for want; ſo much did the violence of the Seditious at that time prevail above all right.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 14.

After that Portius Feſtus had been ſent by Nero to ſucceed Fœlix in the Government of Judæa, the chiefeſt of thoſe Jews that inhabited Cæſarea, repaired to Rome to accuſe Fœlix; and without all doubt he had been puniſhed for the injuries he had committed againſt the Jews, if Nero had not pardoned him upon his Brother Palas's ſubmiſſion and entreaty, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chiefeſt amongſt the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had ſometimes been Nero's Maſter, and at that time was Secretary of Eſtate in the Greek Tongue, by mighty Bribes, to beg of Nero the revocation of the Right and Title which the Jews enjoyed in the Government and Adminiſtration of the Commonweal. For which cauſe Berillus ſolicited the Emperour, and obtained a Letter from him, which was the cauſe of thoſe miſchiefs that afterwards happened in our Nation; for the Jews of Cæſarea, underſtanding what Commiſſion the Syrians had gotten, were ſo much the more encouraged to make War.

Therefore, as ſoon as Feſtus was arrived in Judæa, he found the Countrey grievouſly afflicted with Robberies, and the whole Countrey was ruined with Fire and Sword. The Thieves likewiſe at that time encreaſed mightily; they uſed ſhort Swords, after the manner of a Perſian Cymetre, and crooked like the Roman Faulchion; with which they killed divers: For, thruſting themſelves into the preſs of the people that came in great multitudes on the Feſtival days, to celebrate God's ſervice, they killed thoſe very eaſily whom they pleaſed; and oftentimes repairing to their enemies Villages, they ſpoiled and burnt them. But Feſtus ſent divers Forces, both of Horſe and Foot, againſt certain Jews that were ſeduced by an Enchanter, who had promiſed them to free them from all their troubles, if they would follow him into the Deſart; they killed both the deceiver and the deceived that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a ſtately Building within the Palace at Jeruſalem, near unto the Porch. This Palace in times paſt appertained to the Aſmoneans, and was ſcituate in a high place, with a fine Proſpect, from whence they might with pleaſure behold the City of Jeruſalem, wherein the King took great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the Temple. The chiefeſt men of Jeruſalem, ſeeing this Building, were very much diſpleaſed; for neither doth our Cuſtom or Law permit that any one ſhould look on that which is done in the Temple, and eſpecially forbiddeth that any man ſhould behold the Sacrifices and Oblations: They therefore builded a high Wall upon the Gallery, which was within the Temple on the Weſt ſide, which did not only hinder the ſight of the Royal Chamber, but alſo that of the Gallery without the Temple on the Weſt ſide, where the Romans kept Guard near unto the Temple, on the Feſtival days. Herewith was King Agrippa highly diſpleaſed, and the Governour Feſtus far more than he, who commanded them to pull down the Wall: But they beſought him that he would give them Licence to ſend their Ambaſſadours to Nero, to this intent; alledging that it was impoſſible for them to live, if any part of their Temple ſhould be beaten down. Which being granted them, they ſent ten of their chiefeſt Nobility, and with them Iſmael the High Prieſt, and Chelcias, the Treaſurer of the Temple unto Nero; who no ſooner heard their ſuit, but he pardoned them, not only for that they had done, but he commanded that

A that the building ſhould remain as it was. All which he did in favour of his Wiſe Poppea, who was entreated by the Jews, ſhe being a devout Princeſs, to ſue for them. She therefore commanded the ten Ambaſſadours to return, and kept Chelcias and Iſmael for Pledges with her. The King underſtanding how all things had paſt, gave the High Prieſthood to Joſeph, ſurnamed Cabi, which was the Son of Simon, who in times paſt, had been High Prieſt.

C*Æſar* being advertiſed of Feſtus's death, ſent Albinus to govern Judæa. But King Agrippa commanded Joſeph to lead a private life, and advanced in his ſtead a certain man called Ananus, the Son of Ananus, who was reported to have been moſt happy; for he had five Sons, all which ſupplied the place of the High Prieſt, after himſelf C had long time before them enjoyed it; the like whereof hath never happened to any of our Prieſts. The younger Ananus, who, as we ſaid, was advanced to this place, was a raſh and head-ſtrong man, that followed the Sect of the Saducees, who (as we have already declared) were amongſt all other the Jews, the moſt ſevere in executing Juſtice: Whereas therefore, Ananus was of this diſpoſition, he thought that he had a fit occaſion offered him to do what he pleaſed after Feſtus's death, and whilſt Albinus was as yet upon his way. He therefore aſcended and ſat down in the Tribunal, aſſiſted by the Judges; and cauſed James, the Brother of JESUS, who was called CHRIST, to appear before him, with certain others, and accuſed them for tranſgreſſing the Law, and Blaſphemy againſt God, and cauſed him to be ſtoned to death. They D that were men of upright Conſcience within the City, and diligent obſervers of the Law, were very much diſpleaſed with this Act; and ſent ſecretly to the King, beſeeching him to prohibit Ananus, that hereafter he ſhould commit no ſuch like offence: For that his firſt action was not allowable. Some of them alſo went to meet Albinus, being on his way to Alexandria, to inform him that it was unlawful for Ananus to aſſemble the Council without his Licence. Albinus perſwaded by theſe words, wrote a cholerick Letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to puniſh him. And for the ſame cauſe, King Agrippa diſpoſſeſſed him of the Prieſthood, after he had held the ſame for the ſpace of three months; and in his ſtead he eſtabliſhed Jeſus the Son of Damnæus. After that Albinus was arrived in Jeruſalem, he employed all his care and ſtudy to pacifie the

But the High Prieſt Ananias daily encreaſed in honour and credit, and purchaſed the good will of the Citizens, by his liberality and great gifts. But he had ſome miſchievous Servants about him, who converſed with thoſe that were moſt intemperate and audacious; who repaired from Barn to Barn, and took up many Tithes that belonged to the Prieſts, and beat thoſe that refuſed to render them. The Prieſts uſed no leſs violence than their ſervants, having no man that might reſtrain them; whereby it came to paſs, that the Prieſts, who were formerly maintained by the tenth, died at that time for want of Victuals. And the Thieves renewing their entrance into the City by night, during the Feaſt that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of Captain Eleazer F alive, who was Ananias's Son, who was the High Prieſt: And having bound him, led him out of the City; ſending Ananias word, that they would deliver his Secretary, if he would prevail ſo much with Albinus, as to deliver them their ten Companions then Priſoners, who were taken by him. To the performance whereof, Ananias perſwaded Albinus by manifeſt reaſons: And by obtaining his demand, encreaſed and begat a number of miſeries. For the Thieves uſed all the cunning means they could deviſe, in apprehending ſome one of Ananias's houſe; and when they had taken any one of them alive, they would not deliver him, except before, they might have one of their own delivered. So that encreaſing both in courage and number, they became more and more inſolent to afflict the Countrey.

G At that time King Agrippa enlarged the City of Cæſarea, ſurnamed Philippi; and in honour of Nero, called it Neronias. He builded alſo to his great charge, a Theatre in favour of the Berytians: He diſtributed Oyl and Corn for every one of the people, and adorned all the City with moſt antick and fine Portraitures upon the Porches. In H ſhort, he tranſported into that City almoſt all the Ornaments of the reſt of the Kingdom: For which cauſe his Subjects began to hate him, ſeeing he deprived them of their rare Ornaments, to adorn one ſtrange City. Jeſus the Son of Gamaliel ſucceeded in the Prieſthood, which the King had given him, and taken away from Jeſus the Son of Damnæus; who reſigned him his place againſt his will. Whereupon, there aroſe a diſcord between them; for having aſſembled their reſoluteſt followers, they came from bitter words, to blows and ſtones. But amongſt all the reſt, Ananias was the richeſt in wealth, and by his bounty reconciled the more unto him. Coſtobarus alſo, and Saul, gathered each of them a Band of Raſcals, and deſperate men. Theſe two were of the Blood-Royal; and by reaſon of their affinity and alliance with Agrippa, they were well beloved: I For which cauſe they were inſolent and violent, oppreſſing always the weaker ſort. From this time forward the eſtate of our City grew deſperate, encreaſing daily more and more in wickedneſs.

When Albinus underſtood that Geſſius Florus came to ſucceed him, deſiring that they of Jeruſalem ſhould acknowledge ſome of his good deeds, he called before him all thoſe Priſoners that were notoriouſly guilty of Murther, and cauſed them to be executed. As for thoſe that were impriſoned upon any ſmall or ſlight cauſe, upon payment of their Fines, he delivered them; and in ſo doing, the Priſon was cleanſed of Malefactors; and from that time, the Countrey remained full of Thieves and Robbers.

Agrippa giveth them of the Tribe of Levi leave to wear the Linnen Garments.

Agrippa permitteth the Miniſters of the Temple to ſing the Sacred Hymns.

The Levites, who were ordained to ſing Hymns to God, ſolicited the King to aſſemble K the Council, and thereby to permit them to wear the Linnen Robe, which the Prieſts were accuſtomed to uſe; telling him that ſuch an Ordinance would dignifie his Eſtate very much, in that he would be always famous in memory of this new Eſtabliſhment.
This Suit of theirs was eaſily granted; for the King, after he had conſulted with thoſe who were his Aſſiſtants, ſuffered the Levites that ſung the Hymns, to lay aſide their ordinary Robe, and to apparel themſelves in Linnen, as beſt liked them. He permitted alſo, that another part of the Levites, who intended the ſervice of the Temple, ſhould learn to ſing the Hymns and Pſalms, as they had required: All which he did, contrary to the Ordinances of the Countrey; which being broken, there was nothing elſe to be expected but Puniſhment. L

The people of the Jews beſeech the King that it may be lawful for them to repair the Porch.

At that time the building of the Temple was finiſhed. And the people perceiving that more than eighteen thouſand Work-men ſhould be idle, and deprived of Wages, whereupon they were accuſtomed to live by the building of the Temple: on the other ſide, being loath to reſerve their money through the fear they had of the Romans; to provide for thoſe Workmen (in the entertainment of whom they reſolved to employ their Treaſure, for if any one of them wrought but one hour of the day, he was ſuddenly paid his wages) they requeſted the King, that it would pleaſe him to repair the Eaſtern Gate, on the outward part of the Temple, ſcituate in a Deſcent, the Walls whereof were in height four hundred Cubits; made of ſquare Stones of white Marble, from the top to the bottom; and every ſtone twenty foot long, and ſix foot thick. M

This Work was firſt builded by King Solomon, who was the firſt that builded our Temple. But Agrippa, to whom Claudius Cæſar had given the Commiſſion of building of the Temple; thinking with himſelf, that it was very eaſie to break it down, but very hard to build it up; and that to re-edifie the Porch, it would coſt much time and expence, he denied their requeſt; permitting them nevertheleſs, to pave their City with broad Stone. He took the Prieſthood from Jeſus the Son of Gamaliel, and gave it to Matthias, the Son of Theophilus; in whoſe time, the Wars betwixt the Romans and the Jews began.

Matthias, the Son of Theophilus, High Prieſt.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 18. The Succeſſion and number of the High Prieſts among the Jews.

There were eighty three High Prieſts in all.

But I think it not amiſs, but very anſwerable to the courſe of this preſent Hiſtory, N to ſpeak of the High Prieſts, and to ſhew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number until the end of the War. The firſt of them was Aaron, Moſes's Brother, after whoſe death, his Children ſucceeded him; and from that time forward, the honour hath continued with their Succeſſors. For it is a Law obſerved by our Anceſtors, that no man ſhould be admitted to the Prieſthood, except he be of Aaron's Poſterity: for albeit he were a King, if ſo be that he were of another Line, it was impoſſible for him to obtain the Prieſthood. All the Prieſts after Aaron, who (as we have ſaid) was the firſt, until Phanaſus, whom the Seditious created Prieſt in the time of the War, have been in number eighty three, whereof thirteen have executed the Office, from the time that O Moſes erected God's Tabernacle in the Deſart, until ſuch time as arriving in Judæa, King Solomon builded a Temple to God. For in the beginning, the High Prieſthood continued with

The year of the World, 4026. after Chriſt's Nativity, 64.

A with the Poſſeſſors for term of life; but afterwards, although the Prieſts were yet alive, yet were there other Succeſſors put in their rooms. Theſe thirteen were of Aaron's Poſterity, and obtained this degree in ſucceſſion, the one after the other. Their firſt Government was Ariſtocracy, which is the Government of the Nobility; afterwards a Monarchy; and at laſt a Royal Government. The number of years wherein theſe thirteen flouriſhed, were ſix hundred and twelve years, from the day that our Fathers departed out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moſes, until the building of the Temple in Jeruſalem by King Solomon.

After theſe thirteen High Prieſts, there were eighteen others; who after Solomon's time ſucceeded one after another, until the time that Nabuchodonozor King of Babylon, B having encamped before the City, took it, and burned the Temple, and tranſported our Nation into Babylon, and led away the High Prieſt Joſedech Priſoner. The time of the Prieſthood and continuance of theſe eighteen, was four hundred ſixty years, ſix months and ten days; ſo long as the Jews have had the Royal Government. After the ſurprizal of Jeruſalem by the Babylonians, until ſuch time as Cyrus, King of Perſia, diſmiſſed the Jews, and gave them leave to return from Babylon, into their own Countrey, with permiſſion to re-edifie their Temple, there are ſeventy two years; and at that time the Captives being returned, Jeſus, the Son of Joſedech, took upon him the High Prieſthood; who, with thoſe of his Poſterity, to the number of fifteen, have governed in a Democracy, or Popular Government, until the time of Antiochus, C ſurnamed Eupator, for the ſpace of four hundred and fourteen years. This Antiochus was the firſt, who, with his General Lyſias, diſplaced Onias, ſurnamed Menelaus, of his Prieſthood, commanding him to be killed at Berith; and after he had driven his Son out of the Succeſſion, he eſtabliſhed Jacim High Prieſt; who notwithſtanding, was of Aaron's Race, but not of his Family. For this cauſe Onias, the Son of Onias, and Nephew to the deceaſed Onias, retired himſelf into Egypt: Where growing familiar with Ptolomey, Philometor and Cleopatra his Wife, he perſwaded them to build a Temple in the Confines of Heliopolis, not unlike to that of Jeruſalem, and to create a High Prieſt in the ſame; of which Temple in Egypt, we have made very oftentimes mention. After that Jacim had held the Prieſthood for the ſpace of three years, he died without D Succeſſor; ſo the City remained ſeven years without a High Prieſt. Again, the Aſmoneans recovered the Government of their Nation, and after they had made War againſt the Macedonians, they eſtabliſhed Jonathan High Prieſt, who exerciſed the Office ſeven years; but afterwards he was killed in an Ambuſh, and Treaſon conſpired againſt him by Tryphon, as we have declared elſewhere. After him, Simon his Brother undertook the Prieſthood, who was, not long after, killed treacherouſly by his Son-in-Law at a Banquet. After him ſucceeded his Son Hircanus; who enjoying this Dignity for the ſpace of thirty one years, died when he was very old, leaving behind him Judas, ſurnamed Ariſtobulus; who dying, left his Brother Alexander his Heir, both of the Kingdom and High Prieſthood. After that Ariſtobulus had obtained the E Royal Government, he enjoyed both Dignities one whole year. For this Judas ſurnamed Ariſtobulus, was the firſt that ſet the Diadem on his head, cauſing himſelf to be called a King; the which Alexander did continue; for he alſo joyned the Kingdom with the High Prieſthood, and reigned twenty ſeven years: And feeling himſelf draw near to his death, he left in Alexandras his Wife's hands, to diſpoſe of the Prieſthood as ſhe pleaſed: She therefore beſtowed it on Hircanus; and as for the Kingdom, ſhe kept it in her own hands nine years, and afterwards died. Her Son Hircanus was High Prieſt for ſo long time: For after Alexandra's death, his Brother Ariſtobulus made War againſt him; and having overcome him, he took the Kingdom from him; and not only ſeized on the Crown, but the Prieſthood. After he had reigned three F years, and as many months, Pompey repaired to Jeruſalem, and took it perforce; and laying hold of Ariſtobulus, ſent him bound unto Rome with his Children. After which, he reſtored the Prieſthood once more to Hircanus; committing the Government of the Nation unto his hands, forbidding him in the mean ſpace to wear the Diadem. Beſides the firſt nine years, Hircanus governed twenty and four: But Barzapharnes and Pacorus, Princes of the Parthians, paſſed Euphrates, and made war againſt Hircanus, and took him alive Priſoner, and made Antigonus, Ariſtobulus's Son, King. But after he had governed three years and three months, Soſius and Herod took him alive perforce, and Antonius ſent him to Antioch, where he was beheaded. After that Herod was created King by the Romans, there was never any High Prieſt created of G the Poſterity of the Aſmoneans (for he gave the High Prieſthood to certain men of obſcure and baſe extraction, who were of the Order of Prieſts) Ariſtobulus only excepted. This Ariſtobulus was Hircanus's Nephew, who was a Priſoner among the Parthians; and having given him the Prieſthood, he married Mariamne his Siſter, to the intent H to continue himſelf in the good liking of the people, in remembrance of Hircanus: But afterwards fearing, leſt all of them ſhould turn to Ariſtobulus's ſide, he cauſed him to be killed, by finding out a means to cauſe him to be ſtifled, at ſuch time as he bathed himſelf in a Fiſh-pond near to Jericho, as we have declared before this. After him, he beſtowed the Prieſthood no more on any of the Line of the Aſmoneans. Archelaus his Son, followed his Father's ſteps in reſpect of the Prieſthood; and from that time forward, the Romans have enjoyed the Sovereignty over Jewry. All they then, that have exerciſed the Prieſtood from Herod's time, until the day that Titus took the City and the Temple, have been in all, twenty and eight: All the continuance of their Government was one hundred and ſeven years. Some of theſe governed during Herod's I life, and in the days of Archelaus his Son: But after theſe two were dead, the Government was Ariſtocratical, or of the Nobility, wherein the Prieſts had the Government over the whole Nation. Thus much have we thought fit to ſpeak at this time concerning the High Prieſts.

Florus the original cauſe of the Wars of the Jews.
The beginning of the Wars.

G*Eſſius Florus* being ſent by Nero, to ſucceed Albinus, filled all Judæa with many miſchiefs and miſeries. He was a Clazomenian born, and was married to a certain Woman called Cleopatra, no leſs miſchievous than himſelf; who, being beloved by Poppea, Nero's Wife, obtained this Dignity for him. He behaved himſelf ſo insolently and violently in all his Government, that through the great injuſtice he committed, the Jews praiſed Albinus, as if he had been their Benefactor. For he concealed his miſchief, taking care leſt it ſhould be diſcovered: But Geſſius Florus behaved himſelf ſo, as if he had been ſent to make open ſhew and ſale of his Villanies, publiſhed his injuſtice in the ears of our Nation, without omitting any injuſtice in executing L and inflicting puniſhment on the innocent. For he was pitileſs and covetous, and made no difference between Noble and Ignoble, and was not aſhamed to be partaker with Thieves; of whom there were divers, who made it their profeſſion to ſteal, without any fear, in that they were aſſured of their ſafety, becauſe he was partaker with them. And, in a word, there was no moderation in him; ſo that the poor Jews being unable to endure ſuch inſolence, were conſtrained to abandon their own houſes, and to fly their Countrey, and remain in ſome more commodious place of ſecurity; yea, though it were among ſtrangers. What need I ſpeak any more? he that conſtrained us to draw our Swords againſt the Romans, was Florus; we made this account, that it was better for us to die all at once, than to periſh by little and little. M In ſhort, the War began the ſecond year of Florus's Government in that Province, which was the twelfth year of Nero's Empire. but they that deſire to know exactly all that which we have been conſtrained both to do and ſuffer, may peruſe my Books of the Wars of the Jews. For which cauſe, in this place I will end this ancient Hiſtory.

The Epilogue of the Antiquities of the Jews.

This ancient Hiſtory containeth all that which hath been reported to be done ſince the firſt Creation of man, until the twelfth year of Nero's Empire, omitting nothing that hath befallen the Jews, as well in Egypt, as in Syria and Paleſtine: All that likewiſe, which we have been enforced to ſuffer under the Aſſyrians and Babylonians; as alſo our Eſtate under the Perſians and Macedonians, and finally under the Romans. N All this, as I ſuppoſe, I have compiled and gathered together with careful diligence; and I have enforced my ſelf to recite the number of thoſe, who have been High Prieſts for the ſpace of two thouſand years. I have alſo collected the Succeſſion of Kings, their Actions and Government, with the power of their Monarchies, according as it is amply deſcribed in Holy Scriptures, as alſo I have promiſed in the beginning of my Hiſtory. Moreover, I dare boldly ſay, that whatſoever I ſet down, is ſo true, that there is no man, either Jew, or of what Nation ſoever, yea, although he ſhould have employed the uttermoſt of his power, could more exactly communicate the ſame unto the Greeks, than I have done. For in their Confeſſions and Opinions who are of our Nation, I have ſuch knowledge in that which concerneth our O Doctrine, as I ſurpaſs them all: And as for the Grecian Diſciplines, I have ſtudied and learned the Tongue, although I cannot boaſt of the familiar and fit Pronunciation of

Joſeph expert in the Greek and Hebrew Tongue.

A of the ſame, for that I have lived in the Countrey. For amongſt us we make but ſlender reckoning of thoſe, who are exerciſed in divers Tongues; for that this Study is accounted Prophane by us, and common, not only to free perſons but alſo unto ſlaves; and they only are eſteemed to have profited in Wiſdom, who fully know the Contents of the Law, and who can expound the Holy Scriptures. For this cauſe, although divers have buſied themſelves in this exerciſe of writing Hiſtories, yet there are ſcarcely two or three of them that have written ſucceſsfully, and have received the Fruits of their Labours. And it may be that it will not be thought amiſs, if I freely ſpeak ſomewhat of my Progeny and Life; conſidering that there are men at this day living, who can approve or reprove me in that I ſet down. And in this place I will make an end of B my Antient Hiſtory, which I have reduced into twenty Books, containing ſixty thouſand Verſes. And if God grant me life, I will ſhortly treat of our Wars, and the events of the ſame that have happened hitherto, which is the thirteenth year of Domitianus Cæſar's Empire, and the fifty ſixth year of my Age. Moreover, I am reſolved to diſcover in four Books, the divers Opinions of the Sects of the Jews, as touching God and his Eſſence, and our Laws; according to which certain things are permitted us, and others are forbidden.

THE PREFACE,

C

In which the Author taxeth divers Hiſtoriographers of untruth ; and declareth his intent, and ſpecifieth the principal points of this Hiſtory.

THe War of the Jews againſt the Romans, was of all other the greateſt that ever was attempted in our Age, or heard of in D any other, either between City and City, or Nation againſt Nation :
Yet there have been ſome perſons, who (rather building their diſcourſe on the vain and falſe reports of others, than their own knowledge) have written the Hiſtory of it by hearſay ; and filled their diſcourſe not only with Vanity, but alſo with Contradiction. Others there are, who, though Witneſſes or Actors in the ſame ; nevertheleſs, have according to their own fancy, related many falſhoods, either out of flattery to the Romans, or hatred againſt the Jews : Whoſe Writings are full of nothing but Accuſations of the one, and Praiſes of the other, without obſervation of Hiſtorical E Verity. For this cauſe, I Joſeph the Son of Matthias, by Birth an Hebrew, a Citizen and Prieſt of Jeruſalem ; who, in the beginning of thoſe Wars, bore Arms againſt the Romans, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by neceſſity) was preſent at all thoſe things, which were attempted and proſecuted in thoſe Wars ; have thought good to write in the Greek Tongue (in favour of all thoſe who acknowledge the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire) all that which heretofore in my own Language I have written, to inform other Nations. When theſe great Wars began, the Romans were at Civil Wars among themſelves : And the younger and more turbulent ſort of Jews, truſting to their Riches and Courage, excited ſo great troubles in the Eaſt, to make uſe of this opportunity, that whole Nations were in apprehenſion to be brought into ſubjection to them, becauſe F they had confederated with thoſe of their Nation, that inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates, to revolt all together. Moreover, at that time the Gauls, who bordered upon the Romans, ſuffered them not to live in peace : And the Germans alſo began to take Arms. In a word, after the death of Nero, Seditions reigned every where : ſo that by reaſon of the opportunity of theſe times, many went about to make themſelves Kings : And the Soldiers, lead with the hope of gain, deſired nothing more than trouble and alteration. Now, becauſe theſe matters were important, the trouble I had to ſee the truth diſguiſed, made me take care to inform exactly the Parthians, Babylonians, and the fartheſt diſtant Arabians, and thoſe of our Nation, inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabenites, of the true cauſe of this War, of all that G paſſed in it, and how it was ended, leſt thoſe who were not preſent in it, ſhould be ignorant thereof, and deceived by flattering and fabulous Hiſtorians. Yet ſome of theſe there be,
who

The duty of an Hiſtoriographer, and how things that are paſt ſhould be written.

Joſeph himſelf had a hand in the Wars of the Jews.

After Nero's time all things full of trouble

Joſeph had written this Hiſtory in the Hebrew Tongue before.

The Glory of the Romans is diminiſhed, if you derogate from their labours at the Siege of Jeruſalem.

Titus his Piety towards the Jews.

who (beſides their falſe informations) ſtick not to write Hiſtories, not only void of all H truth, but alſo no ways anſwerable to the Subject which they undertake. For whereas they labour to extol the Romans, and debaſe the Jews; I cannot underſtand how they can be held great, who triumph in the Conqueſt of men ſo obſcure and abject. Nay, whilſt they thus extol the Romans valour in conquering the Jews, they conſider not the continuance of the War, nor the multitude of the Roman Forces, nor the honour of their Captains; whoſe Glory is much impaired, if they leſſen that of the reſiſtance, by which the valour of the Jews render'd the execution of the Enterpriſe ſo difficult.
For my own part, I am not reſolved to contradict thoſe, who ſhall enhance the Glory and Noble Actions of the Romans, nor to extol and cry up the Deſerts of my own Nation; but my reſolution is, in all truth and ſincerity to ſet down each Occurrent, without I reſpect or partiality towards either part. In performance whereof, I will order my diſcourſe according to the matter I treat of, and as my grief and ſorrow ſhall invite me to lament the miſeries of my Countrey. For the Civil Diſſenſion, that diſmember'd the ſame, was the cauſe that brought it to confuſion: And thoſe Tyrants that reigned amongſt us, were ſuch, who forcibly drew the Romans, with Sword and Fire, to effect the Deſolation of our Holy Temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæſar himſelf can juſtifie, who deſtroyed the ſame; who, during all thoſe Wars, ſtill pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceived) were kept in awe by the Seditious: And oftentimes, of his own accord, he deferred the taking of the City, and purpoſely protracted the Siege, to the intent, that in the mean time the Authors of the Seditions, K might have leiſure to repent and ſubmit themſelves. Now, if any man think that I write this, as one that exclaimeth againſt the Tyrants, and their Depredations; or that in bewailing the miſeries of my loſt Countrey, I accuſe their Villanies too paſſionately, and thereby tranſgreſs the limits of a Hiſtory; let it be imputed to my grief, and ſo pardoned. For amongſt all the Cities that ever were conquered by the Romans, our City only attained to the top of felicity; but now, alas, 'tis brought into extreme Miſery, Captivity and Deſolation. Nay, if all the Miſfortunes and Calamities which the World from the beginning hath ſeen, be compared with the infelicity and fall of the Jews, they are ſlight and inconſiderable.

All Calamities that hapned ſince the beginning of the World, being compared with thoſe the Jews ſuffered are of no moment.

And to encreaſe our ſorrow, 'tis not to Foreigners, but to our own Countrey-men, L that we are to attribute the cauſe of our miſeries. Wherefore, if any man too ſevere and Stoical, reprehend this my Lamentation, let him conſider only the deeds I recount in the Hiſtory which I write, and paſs over the Lamentations and ſorrows of me, who am the Hiſtoriographer. I confeſs I have often blamed, and perhaps with reaſon, the moſt eloquent Grecians; that (although theſe our moſt miſerable and memorable Wars hapned in their days, in reſpect whereof, all other former troubles are obſcure and of no reckoning) they have reſtrained their Tongues and Pens, to the end they might carp at thoſe with greater liberty, who undertake the publiſhing thereof; whom, though in Learning and Eloquence, they exceed, yet they have the advantage M of having managed Publick Affairs. Theſe Cenſurers of others, write the Hiſtories of the Aſſyrians and Medes, as if the ancient Writers had ill reported the ſame; though indeed they come as far behind thoſe ancient Authors, in their manner of writing, as they do in the deſign they had in writing. For ſuch as, in times paſt, publiſhed any worthy Hiſtory, endeavoured to write that which they themſelves had ſeen; and they were Eye-witneſſes of thoſe Affairs they committed to writing; they more effectually performed all that they promiſed, becauſe they accounted it an act of diſhoneſty, to report and publiſh Lyes in ſtead of Hiſtory. And truly, in my opinion, that man is worthy commendation, who ſtriveth by his ſtudious endeavours, to Regiſter, not only the Occurrences of times paſt, but alſo thoſe memorable events that have happened in his own days: And he only and truly, is to be accounted induſtrious, not that altereth N and pruneth at his pleaſure another man's Works, but he that of himſelf compileth an Hiſtory whereof no man hath before written. For my own part (being a ſtranger) I have ſpared no labour and expence, to declare the truth of theſe events in the ears of the Greeks and Romans. For, as touching their own learned men, their mouths are always open where their own intereſt, publick or private, is concerned; but if they come to a Hiſtory, wherein they ſhould both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of thoſe things that are paſt; here the travel is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, ſo that they leave the matter to their performance, who are uncapable and unapt both in ſtile and ſtudy to regiſter the Actions of Princes and great Captains; whereby it appears, that the Grecians make as little account of the truth of O Hiſtory, as we eſteem and ſeek it.

The Grecian Hiſtoriographers overpaſs the Wars of the Jews with ſilence.

Who may rightly be called a Hiſtoriographer.

A Now to diſcover unto you the Original of the Jews, what their Eſtate hath been in times paſt, and after what manner they departed out of Egypt; to ſhew what Countreys they conquered, and what Colonies they planted; were in my judgment, both impertinent, and to little purpoſe; conſidering that divers of mine own Nation have before my time written an exact Hiſtory of the actions of our Anceſtors: yea, many Greeks alſo have tranſlated theſe men's Writings into their own Tongue, without much deviating from the truth. I will therefore begin my Hiſtory in that time where theſe Writers, and our own Prophets have ended theirs, and ſet down at large all thoſe Wars that happened in my time. As for thoſe things that precede B my particular knowledge, I will only touch them briefly, and in a word or two. Firſt, I will relate how Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, took the City of Jeruſalem, and poſſeſſed the ſame for the ſpace of three years and ſix months; and how he was driven out of that Countrey at laſt, by the Aſmoneans. After this I will ſet down the Diſſentions that happened amongſt Antiochus's Succeſſors for the Kingdom; and how by this means they drew Pompey and the Romans into their Affairs. How Herod likewiſe, the Son of Antipater, being aſſiſted by Soſius, put an end to the Rule of the Aſmonean Princes: And how, in Auguſtus Cæſar's time, after the death of Herod, and during the Government of Quintilius Varus, a Sedition was raiſed among the people: And how in the twelfth year of Nero's Reign, the War began. What C likewiſe happened in Ceſtius's time; and what Warlike Exploits the Jews performed in their firſt Attempts and Revolts; how they ſtrengthened the Cities and Forts about them; and how Nero (hearing of the great Overthrow, which his Army received under Ceſtius their General, and fearing leſt he ſhould loſe all) made Titus Veſpaſian General of his Army; who being attended by his eldeſt Son, came into Judæa, accompanied with as great a number of Romans as he could poſſibly gather; how a great number of his Allies were defeated in Galilee; what Cities they took in that Province, either by Aſſault, or by Compoſition. Beſides all theſe things, I will expreſs what Order and Diſcipline the Romans obſerve in their Wars, and how they are accuſtomed to exerciſe their Soldiers. I will deſcribe alſo the places and nature D of the Countrey of Galilee and Judæa, together with the Mountains, Lakes and Fountains thereof, with all the Properties of the ſame; not forgetting thoſe miſeries which the Captive Cities ſuffered; and how they were ſurprized. All which (together with all thoſe evils and miſeries which during thoſe troubles befell my ſelf) I will diſcourſe with all truth and diligence, the rather becauſe I publiſh them to many who are no ways ignorant of them.

Antiochus Epiphanes, the firſt Author and Fountain of the Wars of the Jews.

The Epitome of the Wars of the Jews.

After this, I will ſet down how (upon the declining and downfall of the Jews) Nero died; and how at ſuch time as Veſpaſian had undertaken the Expedition to Jeruſalem, he was recalled from it, to receive the Imperial Dignity; and how when E he returned into Egypt to eſtabliſh that Province, the Jews began to mutiny among themſelves; how many Tyrants aroſe among them, who hatched much civil diſcord and debate in their Government. Moreover, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the ſecond time into Judæa, and ranged over the Countrey; and how and where he levied and encamped his Armies. How, and how often, the City was vexed by Seditions, eſpecially at ſuch time as he himſelf was preſent. What Onſets he gave, and how many Mounts he raiſed, in begirting the City with a triple Wall: The ſtrength and Proviſion of the City: The Scituation and Plat-form of the Temple, and the Altars therein: The Rites and Ceremonies uſed on Feſtival days: The ſeven Purifications, and the Offices of the Prieſts: The Garments alſo, of the High F Prieſt, and the Holy Sanctuary of the Temple. All which I will recount without any diſſimulation, or ſwerving from the truth of Hiſtory. After this, I will relate what cruelty the Tyrants uſed towards their own Countrey-men, what Humanity the Romans ſhewed to ſtrangers, and how often Titus (who deſired to ſave both the City and Temple) exhorted the Seditious to mutual Amity. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Jews (after the many and grievous Calamities which they ſuffered in the Siege, by War, Sedition, and Hunger) were at length reduced into ſervitude after the taking of that great and potent City. Neither will I omit the ſlaughter of ſuch as deſerted their Nation, neither the puniſhment inflicted on thoſe that were Captive: I will ſet down how the Temple was burnt againſt Cæſar's Will, and G what an infinite Maſs of Sacred Treaſure was conſumed by the Fire, and what ſigns and wonders happened before the ſame: The Captivity alſo of the Tyrants themſelves, and and the number of thoſe that were led away into Captivity, and what miſeries they endured: How the Romans continuing their Wars, utterly ruined the Fortreſſes of their Captives: Finally, how Titus travelling thorough the whole Countrey, eſtabliſhed a Form of Government; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All theſe things I have comprehended in ſeven Books, endeavouring as much as in me lieth, to avoid all occaſion of reproof, from thoſe men who know theſe Affairs, and were Actors in the War. Which I have done for their ſakes, who love truth. And according to that Order and Form I promiſed, I will begin my Hiſtory. H

CHAP. I.

The Deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Antiochus King of Syria. The Overthrow of the Syrians by Matthias Maccabæus and his Sons.

AT ſuch time as Antiochus, ſurnamed Epiphanes, made War againſt Ptolomey the Sixth King of Egypt, for the whole Dominion of Syria, thoſe of the chiefeſt Authority and Nobilty among the Jews, were divided into two Parties: And that of Onias the High Prieſt being become the G ſtrongeſt, expelled the Sons of Tobias out of the City; who fleeing to Antiochus for refuge, beſought him in all humility, that he would lead his Forces into Judæa; offering themſelves to be his Guides in the Expedition. An- tiochus (who had long deſired ſuch an occaſion) eaſily condeſcended to their requeſt; H and levying a great Army, he entred their Countrey, took Jeruſalem, and ſlew moſt part of them who favoured Ptolomey. He gave his Soldiers liberty to ſack the City, ſpoiled the Temple of the great Riches which were in it; and for the ſpace of three years and ſix months forbad the Sacrifices, which before time were accuſtomed to be offered every day to God in that place. Whereupon Onias the High Prieſt fled to Ptolomey; of whom having obtained the grant of a piece of Land, within the Liberties and Precincts of Heliopolis; he built a Town and Temple there, reſembling the City and Sanctuary of Jeruſalem; of which we ſhall ſpeak in due place.

Ant.l.12.c.6. Antiochus being ſtirred up by Tobias's Sons, invadeth Judæa, and ſurpriſeth Jeruſalem.

Ant.l.15.c.4. The High-Prieſt Onias flieth to Ptolomey.

But Antiochus not ſatisfied with the unexpected ſurprize of the City, nor with the pillage and ſlaughter of the Citizens, was ſo far tranſported by his paſſions, and incenſed with the remembranee of thoſe toyls which he had ſuſtained during this War, that I he compelled the Jews to renounce their Religion, to forbear the Circumciſion of their Children, and to immolate Swine upon the Altar. The abhorrence, which the chiefeſt and honeſteſt amongſt them, could not refrain to declare againſt theſe Abominations, coſt them their lives. For Bacchides, who was Governour of all the Gariſons of Judæa, by the appointment of Antiochus, being naturally very cruel, omitted no occaſion to execute his wicked Orders; inſomuch that he particularly tormented ſuch as were of Noble Birth and Quality; and every day repreſented to them the freſh face and memory of the deſolation of their City. But, at length, a Tyranny ſo inſupportable animated thoſe that ſuffered it, to attempt the means of freeing themſelves K from it; and of executing revenge upon the Authors. Matthias (or Mathathias Maccabæus) the Son of Aſmoneus, one of the Prieſts, who dwelt in a Village called Modin; accompanied with his five Sons and his own houſhold, armed with Swords, ſlew Bacchides; and fearing the power and multitude of the enemy's Garriſons, preſently retired himſelf into the Mountains. Thither reſorted divers of the people unto him; by which conflux, growing more confident and courageous, he deſcended from the Mountains; and overcoming the Captains of Antiochus, drave them out of the Borders of Judea. By many inſtances of ſuch happy ſucceſs, he became ſo renown'd, that he was by common conſent of the people (whom he had delivered from the ſubjection of ſtrangers) made their Ruler: And when he died, he left his eldeſt Son who was called L Judas, to ſucceed him in the Government. This brave Son of ſo brave a Father, could not doubt of the endeavours which Antiochus would uſe, to revenge the loſſes he had received; and therefore he gathered together an Army of his own Countrey-men, and was the firſt among the Jews that made a League with the Romans. Antiochus failed not (as he had foreſeen) to enter into Judæa with a powerful Army; and this great Captain repell'd him with a great Overthrow. And whilſt the remembrance of this Victory was yet freſh in men's minds, he aſſaulted the Garriſon of Jeruſalem, which as yet was entire; in which Conflict he forced them to forſake the high Town, which is called Holy, and betake themſelves to the lower part: And having recovered the Temple, he purified it, and compaſſed it with a Wall, and made new Veſſels for the M Service of God, and placed them there; (becauſe thoſe that had been formerly conſecrated there, were prophaned:) He built likewiſe another Altar, and began to renew the accuſtomed Sacrifice, and obſerve the Rites of Religion.

Scarce was the City brought to its former Eſtate, but Antiochus died; leaving behind him Antiochus Eupator, his Son and Heir; not only of his Kingdom, but alſo of his hatred againſt the Jews: Who having gathered together fifty thouſand Foot, and almoſt five thouſand Horſe, and fourſcore Elephants, entred by the Mountains, into Judæa, and took a Town called Bethſara; near which Judas met him, in a place called Bethzacary, where the paſſage was ſomething ſtrait: And before they joyned Battel, Eleazar, Judas's Brother, ſeeing one Elephant higher than the reſt, bearing a N great Tower on his Back, and adorned with Golden Furniture, thought Antiochus had been there; and ran from his Company, breaking the Ranks of the Enemies, till he came to the Elephant: but he could not reach him whom he deemed to be the King, he was ſo highly mounted; all he could do, was to wound the Elephant in the belly with his Sword, till the Beaſt fell upon him, and preſſed him to death; which act of his had no other ſucceſs but this, that by attempting ſo great a matter, he gave teſtimony that he preferred Glory before his life. For he that rid on this Elephant, was but a private perſon; and although Antiochus had been there, Eleazar had atchieved nothing more in this valiant attempt; but yet he adventured his life, in hope to perform ſome great exploit. This act of his was a preſage unto his Brother Judas, of the event O of that days Battel; for the Jews fought ſtoutly, and a long time; but yet Antiochus's Army (being both more in number, and more fortunate) obtained the Victory; and

Judas

A Judas after the loſs of many of his company, fled to the Gophonites, with thoſe of his ſide who eſcaped. Antiochus advanced afterwards to Jeruſalem, from whence after ſome ſtay he departed for want of Proviſions, leaving a ſufficient Garriſon there; as for the reſt of his Army, he led them for their Winter-quarters into Syria. But notwithſtanding the King's departure, Judas reſted not; but encouraged by many of his Nation, who daily came to him, and gathering alſo together thoſe who eſcaped out of the former Battel, he fought with the Forces of Antiochus at a village named Adaſa, where after many proofs of his valour in aſſaulting and ſlaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himſelf at length was ſlain; and within a few days after, his Brother John alſo was betrayed, and ſlain by their treacheries who favoured B Antiochus.

The Succeſſion of Princes, from Jonathan to Ariſtobulus.

AFter Judas ſucceeded his Brother Jonathan in the dignity of Prince of the Jews. He carefully ſtudied the peace and ſecurity of his people, and fortified himſelf by the friendſhip of the Romans, and was reconciled to Antiochus his Son; yet did C not all theſe things procure his ſafety. For Tryphon (who was tutor to the young Antiochus) laying wait for him, and ſeeking to ſpoil him of his friends, took Jonathan at ſuch a time as he came with a ſmall company to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an Army againſt Judæa: from whence being repulſed by Simon Jonathan's, Brother, in diſpleaſure and revenge thereof, he ſlew Jonathan.

But Simon valiantly beſtirring himſelf in the Conduct of the affairs of the Common-wealth, took Zara, Joppe and Jamnia (which were bordering Towns;) and overcoming the Garriſon of Accaron, he deſtroyed the City, and aſſiſted Antiochus againſt Tryphon, who beſieged Dora, before that expedition which he made againſt the Medes. Yet would not the greedy mind of the King be ſatisfied, notwithſtand- D ing Simon had thus faithfully ſerved and aſſiſted him to the ruine and death of Tryphon: but in a ſhort time after, he ſent Cendebeus (the General of the Army) to haraſs and ſpoil Judea, and to take Simon Priſoner. But Simon though very aged, acted both youthfully and valiantly, and ſent his Sons before with the moſt reſolute men he had againſt Antiochus, and himſelf with the reſidue of his Army, aſſaulted another quarter of the enemies Camp; and having laid many ambuſhes in the mountains, he obtained a great victory. After which he was made High Prieſt, and delivered the Jews from the ſubjection of the Macedonians, under which they had been two hundred and ſeventy years. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolemy his Son-in-law, he was murthered at a Banquet; who impriſoning his Wife and two Sons, ſent certain men E to kill his third Son John, otherwiſe called Hircanus. But the young man underſtanding the deſign, fled to Jeruſalem, accompanied with a great multitude; for he greatly hoped that the people would remember his Father's proweſs, eſpecially becauſe Ptolemy's iniquity was hated of all men. Ptolemy alſo haſted to enter the City at another gate: but he was ſpeedily repulſed by the people, who had already received Hircanus. For which cauſe he preſently retired himſelf into a Caſtle named Dagon, ſituate beyond Jericho.

After that Hircanus had obtained the office of High Prieſt, which was left him by his Father, and had offered Sacrifices to God, he led forth his forces with all ſpeed to beſiege Ptolemy, hoping to deliver his mother and brethren that were detained F Priſoners there by him. His tenderneſs of nature was the only obſtacle that hinder'd him from forcing the Caſtle. For when Ptolemy perceived himſelf to be in danger, he brought Hircanus's Mother and Brethren upon the walls, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatning to caſt them down from the wall, except Hircanus would preſently depart. How great ſoever the indignation of Hircanus was, it was forc'd to give place to the affection he had for perſons ſo dear to him, and to his compaſſion of ſeeing them ſuffer. But his Mother being no way diſmayed with the ſtripes which ſhe endured, nor with the death wherewith ſhe was threatned, lifted up her hands to her Son, beſeeching him that he would not in regard of her miſeries be moved to ſpare ſo impious a perſon; for ſhe ſhould eſteem her death G happy, if ſo be Ptolemy might receive juſt puniſhment for the villany which he had impiouſly committed againſt their houſe. Hircanus ſeeing the reſolute mind of his Mother and hearing her entreaty, was moved to aſſault the Caſtle; but ſtraightway

In the mean while, Antiochus, to be revenged for the Victory which Simon had got over his Generals, entred with an Army into Judæa, and beſieged Hircanus in Jeruſalem; who opening the Sepulchre of David (who had been one of the richeſt of all the Kings of Judæa) took more than three thouſand Talents from thence; of which he gave three hundred to Antiochus, and ſo obliged him to depart the Countrey. This Hircanus was the firſt Prince that entertained Forreign Soldiers. But ſo ſoon as Antiochus had bent his Power and Forces againſt the Medes, he took that opportunity to revenge himſelf, and preſently aſſaulted the Towers of Syria; aſſuring himſelf he ſhould find them (as indeed they were) void of Soldiers to defend them. He made himſelf Maſter of Medaba, Samea, Sichem and Garizim, and ſubdued the Cuthæans, who inhabit the places adjoyning to the Temple, that was built in imitation of that which is at Jeruſalem. Moreover he took many Cities of Idumæa, and amongſt the reſt, Doteon and Mariſa; and coming into Samaria (which Herod afterwards rebuilt, and called Sebaſte) he beſieged it on every ſide, and left his two Sons, Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, to continue the Siege: They omitted nothing to the purpoſe; and there came ſuch a Famine in the City, that the Inhabitants were conſtrained to eat very unaccuſtomed Meats. In this extremity, they deſired aid of Antiochus, ſurnamed Spondius, who ſpeedily came to relieve them; but he was overcome by Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, and was purſued by them to Scythopolis, whither he retired himſelf. But they, returning again to Samaria, ſtraitned the City; and at laſt, taking it by force, deſtroyed the ſame, and led away their Inhabitants Captives. Whilſt thus Fortune favoured them, they ceaſed not to purſue their good ſucceſs, but led their Army beyond Scythopolis; and ſhared between them all the Land of Mount Carmel.

Ariſtobulus famiſheth his Mother.

Ariſtobulus loved Antigonus very dearly.

THis Felicity and good hap of Hircanus and his Sons, was accompanied with the envy of many of his Countrey-men; and their diſcontent was the cauſe of an open Rebellion: For divers of the Jews riſing up in Arms againſt them, were ſo much over-ruled by their ambitious paſſion, that they could not contain themſelves from the proſecution of an open and bloody War; wherein, notwithſtanding, they were put to the worſt. From that day forward, Hircanus paſſed the remainder of his life in all tranquillity and happineſs; and after he had governed the Commonwealth for the ſpace of thirty and three years, he departed this life, leaving behind him five valiant Sons. He was a man of more than ordinary felicity, being poſſeſſed of three excellent endowments together; for he was the Prince of his Countrey, High Prieſt, and a Prophet, to whom God ſpake, and gave him the knowledge of future accidents. He foreſaw, and foretold, that his two eldeſt Sons ſhould not continue long in the Government, (whoſe ends are worth rehearſal, being very different from their Father's felicity;) for the eldeſt Son Ariſtobulus, after his Father's death, changed the Principality into a Kingdom; and was the firſt that put a Crown on his head; four hundred twenty one years, and three months, after the deliverance of the people from the Captivity of Babylon. As for Antigonus (who was his ſecond Brother, and whom in appearance he ſeemed to love moſt entirely) he made him partaker of his Dignity, and committed the reſt of them to Priſon: He impriſoned his Mother alſo, for that ſhe had contended with him for the Government of which Hircanus had made her Regent. And he was ſo given over to all kind of cruelty, that he not only kept her Priſoner in Bonds, but alſo put her to death by Famine: To which Impiety he added that of killing his own Brother Antigonus, whom he had entirely loved, and made Partner with him in the Kingdom. For by reaſon of certain ſcandalous ſlanders, which his envious and malignant Courtiers contrived and invented againſt him, he commanded him to be put to death. Upon their firſt information, Ariſtobulus (ſwayed by Brotherly affection) gave them no credit; conceiving thoſe Accuſations to proceed from envy, rather than any good ground. But when Antigonus returned from the War, at that Feſtival time, wherein, A according to the cuſtom of our Countrey, we celebrate the Feaſt of Tabernacles; it happened that Ariſtobulus fell ſick; Antigonus therefore, about the end of thoſe Feſtival days, attended with a great Equipage and Train of armed men, aſcended up into the Temple, to offer Sacrifice, and to pray God for the health of the King his Brother. Hereupon, certain curſed and wicked detractors repaired to the King, and told him, that this great Guard of Soldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and his magnificent Pomp, ſhew'd that he was not contented with the honour he had done him, in aſſociating him in the Royalty, but was minded to poſſeſs it wholly to himſelf; in which reſolution they ſaid he was come accompanied with ſo many Soldiers, that it could not be doubted, but that it was to murther him. Ariſtobulus, though unwillingly, yet at B laſt being won to believe them, deſirous to hide his ſuſpicion, commanded his Guard to hide themſelves in a certain place under ground; (himſelf then lodging in a certain Caſtle, which in times paſt was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia, by Herod, in honour of Antonius) with this Commiſſion, that if Antigonus came unarmed, they ſhould let him paſs; if otherwiſe, they ſhould kill him. He ſent certain Meſſengers alſo, to Antigonus, requiring him to repair unto him diſ-armed: But the wicked Queen prevented this good intent of his by a ſubtil ſtratagem complotted by thoſe, that with her conſpired againſt him; for ſhe perſwaded thoſe that were to carry this meſſage, to diſcover nothing of what the King had commanded them; but to tell Antigonus, that his Brother having intelligence that he had brought very goodly Armour, with other C fair Furniture for War, from Galilee, deſired him to come to him, arm'd as he was, that he might have the pleaſure to ſee him in his Warlike Ornaments. Which when Antigonus underſtood (who, by reaſon of his Brother's affection, ſuſpected no miſchief) he armed himſelf, and reſorted to him, intending to content him with his appearance. But no ſooner arrived he in the ſtrait, which is called the Tower of Straton, but the Guard of Ariſtobulus ſet upon him, and ſlaughtered him; yielding by this means a demonſtrative teſtimony, that Detraction is able to deſtroy all good nature and friendſhip; and that there is no union of affection ſo great, as it can always reſiſt the attempts of envy, to ruine it.

In this Occurrence there happened a thing which cannot be too much admired: D One Judas, who was of the Sect of the Eſſeans, had ſo certain a knowledge of the Future, that his Predictions were never found falſe. This man beholding Antigonus paſs thorough the Temple, cried out to his familiars, who attended him in no ſmall number (as ordinarily, divers of his Diſciples did:) Ah, how happy were it for me at this preſent, if I were dead, ſince truth is dead before me, and one of my Predictions is found faulty! For behold Antigonus yet liveth, who ſhould this day have died in the Tower of Straton, which is diſtant from this place ſix hundred furlongs, and 'tis now the fourth hour of the day; now therefore is the time, wherein my Divination ſhall be falſified. Having ſpoken to this effect, the old man ſat down, being altogether diſconſolate and penſive; within a while after, it was told him that Antigonus was ſlain in a place under ground, E called the Tower of Straton, being of the ſame name with that at Cæſarea, which is ſcituate upon the Sea-coaſt; which conformity of names, was the cauſe that Judas ſtaggered in his Divination.

The ſorrow which incontinently ſeized Ariſtobulus, for committing this hainous Murther, augmented his ſickneſs in ſuch ſort, that his Soul was continually troubled with the thought of his ſin; and his body, through extream heat of paſſion, became dried up; and the grief that he felt was ſo vehement, that his Entrails became exulcerated, ſo that he voided blood in great abundance. And it ſo fell out, by God's Providence, that one of his Servants, who was deputed to that Office, bearing out that blood which came from him, miſſed his way, and came to that place where Antigonus had F been ſlain, where ſtill there appeared ſome ſigns and ſtains of the blood of Antigonus; on which he poured out the blood of the Murtherer, Ariſtobulus: Which, when they perceived who ſtood hard by, imagining that the Servant had purpoſely ſpilled the blood in that place, as it were in Sacrifice to the Ghoſt of that Prince; they cryed out ſo loud, that Ariſtobulus hearing their cry, demanded the cauſe thereof; and the more that each man feared to diſcover the ſame to him, the more inſtantly he deſired to underſtand the truth; ſo that at length, after he had uſed threats, he was certified of what had paſſed. Whereupon, his eyes were ſuddenly filled with tears; and in vehement agony of mind, he cryed out, and ſaid; How could I hope, but that the great eye of the Divine Majeſty ſhould ſee my wicked acts, and the ſudden vengeance of my Brother's blood G *purſue and overtake me? How long, O thou miſerable Body, wilt thou detain my Soul from being ſacrificed to the vengeance of my Mother and Brother's death? The Sedition of the Jews againſt Alexander upon a Feſtival day.

Alexander aſſaileth the Caſtle of Amath, and razeth it.

His Wife after his death delivered his Brother Alexander from Priſon, and eſtabliſhed him King, who was both the eldeſt, and ſeemed to be the moſt moderate among the reſt of his Brethren. But growing by this means both proud and potent, he put one of his Brethren to death, for aſpiring after the Kingdom; but ſpared the other alive, for that he contented himſelf with a private and contemplative life. He made War alſo againſt Ptolomey, that was called Lathyrus, who had ſurprized the City of Aſoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the Sword; nevertheleſs, Ptolomey's ſide obtained the Victory: But retiring himſelf into the Countrey of Egypt, by reaſon that his Mother Cleopatra purſued him with open War; Alexander forcibly entred the City I of Gadara, and the Fort of Amath (one of the greateſt of all thoſe that were beyond Jordan) in which place Theodore, Zeno's Son, had hoarded up his chiefeſt and moſt precious moveables, which he took, but enjoyed not long; for Theodore, ſuddenly ſetting upon him, recovered all that which was his; and furthermore, laid hands on the King's Carriage; in ſeizing which, he ſlaughtered many Jews, to the number of ten thouſand. But Alexander, after he had recovered this loſs, invaded the Frontire Towns upon the Sea-coaſt, and won Rapha, Gaza and Anthedon, which afterwards by King Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered theſe places, the common ſort of the Jews raiſed a mutiny againſt him, during a certain ſolemn and holy Feaſt; (as Mutinies and Seditions are commonly raiſed at Banquets) and it is K thought that he could not have prevailed againſt thoſe Rebels, had he not been aſſiſted by the Piſidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to help him; for the Syrians he refuſed to hire, by reaſon of their natural hatred they bare againſt the Jews. Having therefore ſlain eight thouſand of the Rebels, he warred upon Arabia; and overcoming the Galaadites and Moabites (and impoſing upon them a Tribute) he returned to beſiege Amath. But Theodorus, daunted with his proſperous ſucceſs, and finding the Caſtle without any to defend it, razed it to the ground. After this, he aſſaulted Obodas King of the Arabians; who having laid Ambuſhments in the Countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for ſuch a purpoſe, diſcomfitted him and his whole Army, being driven into a deep Valley, where they were peſtered with a multitude of Camels.

But Alexander eſcaped to Jeruſalem, where the people who had conceived a hatred L againſt him, being encouraged by his great loſs and ſlaughter of men, began again to rebel; but then alſo he overcame them: and in ſix years ſpace, in ſundry Battels, ſlew above fifty thouſand Jews: Notwithſtanding, he never rejoyced in his Victory, becauſe the ſtrength of his Countrey was conſumed thereby. For which cauſe, giving over his Wars, he began to ſeek the people's favour by ſweet and mild courſes; but they ſo much hated his inconſtant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he ſhould do to win their favours, they anſwered, that he ſhould die, and that ſcarcely they could pardon him if ſo be he were dead, who had done them ſo much miſchief. The Jews ſent to Demetrius, ſurnamed Eucerus, for help; who, in M hope of great rewards, came and joyned his Forces with the Jews about Sichem, being three thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot: Alexander met them both with a thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot, that were ſtrangers, beſides ten thouſand Jews that remain'd faithful to him. Before the fight began, the two Kings ſent Meſſengers to one another's Army, perſwading one another's men to forſake their Colours and Captains: For Demetrius hoped that Alexander's hired men would have forſaken his ſervice, and come unto him; and Alexander hoped that the Jews that followed Demetrius, would have left Demetrius, and come to him. But when both parts perceived that the Jews continued obſtinate in their purpoſe, and the Greeks kept their fidelity, the two Armies encountred; in which Encounter, Demetrius had the upper hand N (although Alexander's Hirelings evidently ſhewed their ſtrength and courage.) But the end of this Victory was ſuch, as neither party expected; for they who ſent for Demetrius, after his Victory, forſook him; and Fortune changing her Colours, ſix thouſand Jews fled to Alexander, into the Mountains, whither for ſafety he had betaken himſelf. This revolt much diſpleaſed and diſcouraged Demetrius; ſo that he now thought, that Alexander uniting his Forces, was able to give him Battel; and he feared that all the Jews would at that preſent follow Alexander; for which cauſe, he returned home. Yet the reſt of the Jews, having thus loſt the help of Demetrius would not deſiſt from their Rebellion; but they ſo long warred with Alexander, till at laſt (the moſt of them being ſlain) he drave the reſt into the City of Bemezeli; and when he had ſurprized and O ſack'd the City, he led them Captive to Jeruſalem. But immoderate anger turned his cruelty into impiety; for having crucified eight hundred Captives in the midſt of the

City,

A City, he killed their Wives, and the Children he maſſacred before their Mother's Faces; and this pitiful ſpectacle he beheld with pleaſure, as he was drinking, and making merry with his Concubines. Whereat the people were ſo terrified, that the night after, eight thouſand of the contrary part fled out of the Countrey of Judæa, and ſtayed in Baniſhment, during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by ſuch actions ſought the tranquility of his Kingdom, which he obtained not, but with long time and great difficulty, he ceaſed to make War againſt his Countrey.

CHAP. IV.

Of the War of Alexander, King of the Jews, with Antiochus and Aretas; and of Ariſtobulus and Hircanus.

AFter this, Antiochus (who likewiſe was called Dyoniſius, Brother to Demetrius, and the laſt of all the race of Seleucus) raiſed up new broils againſt Alexander; who fearing him becauſe he had overcome the Arabians, drew a deep Trench along that ground which lieth between Antipatris, and the Sea-coaſt of Joppa: and before the Trench he built a very high Wall, and raiſed Towers of wood to hinder his enemies paſſage. But all this could not keep out Antiochus; who burning the Towers, C and filling up the Trenches, entred and paſſed over them with his Forces. But not tarrying at that time to revenge himſelf of him who had thus forbidden him paſſage, he preſently marched forward againſt the Arabians. Aretas, King of Arabia, retiring himſelf into certain places of his Countrey which were fitteſt for defence, and returning ſuddenly to Battel with his Horſe (who were in number ten thouſand) ruſhed ſuddenly upon Antiochus's Soldiers, and found them unprovided; ſo that a hot Skirmiſh began betwixt them; in which the Soldiers of Antiochus, whilſt he lived, ſhewed themſelves valiant (though they were on every ſide maſſacred by the Arabians) but ſo ſoon as he was ſlain (who was always ready to aſſiſt thoſe that were in danger) all of them fled; and the greateſt part of them were ſlain in the Battel, and in flight: As for D thoſe that eſcaped, they fled to the Town of Cana, where all (except very few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damaſcus being incited with the hatred they bare to Ptolomey the Son of Menneus, ſent for Aretas, and eſtabliſhed him King over Cœloſyria; who warring againſt Judæa, and overcoming Alexander in Battel, retired upon Compoſition. Alexander having taken Pella, reſorted once more to the Town of Geraſa, in that he was deſirous to get Theodorus's Riches; and took the place, notwithſtanding that it was fortified with three Walls, and that upon every Wall there was planted a Garriſon. He took Gaulan and Seleucia, and that Town which is called the Valley of Antiochus. Moreover, having taken Gamala, which was a very ſtrong Caſtle, and impriſoned the Governour thereof, who was called Demetrius, becauſe he was a wicked E perſon; he returned into Judæa after he had ſpent three years in War; where, for his proſperous ſucceſs, he was joyfully received of his Nation. But no ſooner ceaſed he from War, but he fell ſick of a Quartane Ague; and he thought that he ſhould drive away his ſickneſs, if he employed himſelf in ſome buſineſs; for which cauſe, labouring under his diſeaſe, he applied himſelf to War, and toiling above his ſtrength, amidſt thoſe tumults, he yielded up the Ghoſt in the thirty ſeventh year of his Reign; leaving the Kingdom to Alexandra his Wife, fully accounting that the Jews would in all things obey her, becauſe that ſhe, always miſliking and ſeeking to hinder his cruelty and iniquity, had won the hearts of the people: Neither was he deceived; for ſhe being admired for her piety amongſt them, they eaſily ſubmitted to her; the rather F for that ſhe was well acquainted with the Cuſtoms of her Countrey, and even from her Childhood deteſted them who violated our holy Laws. She had by Alexander two Sons, the eldeſt was called Hircanus, whom by reaſon of his years, ſhe made High Prieſt; and becauſe of his dull nature, ſhe thought that though he were in Princely Authority, yet he would moleſt no man: As for the youngeſt Son Ariſtobulus, becauſe he was of a hot ſpirit, ſhe was willing that he ſhould lead a private life.

the Kingdom; leaving to Alexandra, nothing but the Expences and care of the Government. H This Queen was always deſirous of high attempts, and daily ſtudied to encreaſe her wealth: She levied two Armies, and hired many ſtrangers, whereby ſhe not only ſtrengthened her own Countrey, but alſo made her ſelf feared by other Nations. She ruled others, but her ſelf was ruled by the Phariſees, who at laſt killed Diogenes, a gallant man, and highly in favour with King Alexander; affirming, that through his counſel, the King commanded thoſe eight hundred before-mentioned to be crucified: And further, they perſwaded the Queen Alexandra, that ſhe ſhould put to death all others, through whoſe counſel Alexander her Huſband had been incited againſt thoſe eight hundred. The Queen being blinded with Superſtition, thought it unlawful to deny any thing which they requeſted; ſo that they put to death whom they I pleaſed, till ſuch time as the chiefeſt of thoſe, who were in this danger, in humble wiſe came to Ariſtobulus, who perſwaded his Mother to ſpare ſome, and to baniſh others, who ſhe thought had deſerved puniſhment; which Exiles diſperſed themſelves through the whole Countrey. Now Alexandra ſent an Army to Damaſcus, and becauſe Ptolomey daily vexed the City, ſhe took it without doing any thing worthy of memory. She alſo ſolicited Tigranes, King of Armenia, with Gifts and Promiſes (who with an Army had beſieged Ptolemais, wherein Cleopatra was) but he, for fear of troubles in his own Countrey, in that Lucullus had entred into Armenia, withdrew himſelf from thence.

But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) impriſoned the Wife and Children of Ariſtobulus, in a Caſtle near the North part of the Temple, which in old time was called Baris (as we ſaid before) afterwards Antonia, from Antonius, as in like manner Sebaſte and Agrippias, other Cities were named of Auguſtus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before ſhe could revenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Ariſtobulus had done him. This Queen reigned nine years, and left Hircanus in poſſeſſion of all, whom during her life time ſhe had advanced to the Kingdom. But Ariſtobulus being both ſtronger in power, and greater in authority, encountred with his Brother about Jericho; where many of Hircanus's Soldiers forſaking their King, fled L to Ariſtobulus; ſo that he, and the remnant that followed him, were forced to fly into the Caſtle called Antonia, where he found Hoſtages to redeem them, for (as we have already ſaid) Ariſtobulus his Wife and Children were impriſoned in that place: And leſt any worſe miſ-hap ſhould betide him, he concluded a Peace, upon condition that Ariſtobulus ſhould be King, and that he, as Brother to the King, ſhould enjoy ſome other Dignities. Upon theſe conditions they were made friends in the Temple, where in the preſence of all the people, they friendly embraced each other; which when they had done, they changed houſes, and Ariſtobulus went to the King's Palace, and Hircanus to Ariſtobulus's houſe. CHAP. V.

Of the War between Hircanus and the Arabians, and of the taking of Jeruſalem.

Antipater perſwadeth Hircanus to fly to Aretas, King of Arabia, and to crave his aſſiſtance to recover his Kingdom Antipater with Hircanus fly from Jeruſalem by night, to Aretas King of Arabia. Aretas furniſheth Hircanus with fifty thouſand Soldiers.

Now a ſudden fear invaded all the enemies of Ariſtobulus, when they ſaw him (contrary to all expectation) made King; and eſpecially Antipater, above all others, whom Ariſtobulus had long hated. This Antipater was an Idumæan born; and for Nobility and Riches, the chief, and beſt reputed of his Nation. N This man perſwaded Hircanus to fly to Aretas King of Arabia, and crave his help to ſet him in his Kingdom: He exhorted Aretas likewiſe to receive Hircanus, and to help him to recover his Kingdom; ſpeaking much againſt the manners of Ariſtobulus, and praiſing Hircanus: adding, that he being King of ſo famous a Nation, ought to aſſiſt thoſe who were unjuſtly oppreſſed; and that Hircanus had manifeſt injury offered him, being forced to forſake his Kingdom, which by the right of Succeſſion, was due unto him. After he had thus made his way, he took in the night time Hircanus, and fled with him out of the City; and making all haſte poſſible, they arrived ſafe at a Town called Petra (a Town where the King's of Arabia are accuſtomed to keep their Court) there he delivered Hircanus into the King's hands, and by many gifts and entreaties, obtained of him that he O would aſſiſt him to recover his Kingdom. And to the effecting of the ſame, Aretas gave him an Army of fifty thouſand Horſe and Foot; which power, Ariſtobulus not

A able to reſiſt, was overcome at the firſt onſet, and forced to fly to Jeruſalem. Aretas beſieged him there, and he had been ſurely taken, if Scaurus, a Captain of the Romans, taking opportunity at thoſe troubles, had not raiſed the Siege: For Pompey the Great (who warred againſt Tigranes) ſent him out of Armenia, into Syria: And he coming to Damaſcus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; wherefore, underſtanding how matters ſtood in Judæa, he haſted thither in hope of a booty. As ſoon as he entred into the Confines of the Countrey, both the Brethren ſent their Ambaſſadours to him, deſiring him to take their parts: But Ariſtobulus having ſent him four hundred Talents, theſe made him neglect Juſtice; for Scaurus upon receipt of that Summ, ſent meſſengers to the Arabians and Hircanus, threatning the diſpleaſure of the Romans and B Pompey, except they would preſently raiſe their Siege: Whereupon Aretas being much terrified, returned out of Judæa, to Philadelphia, and Scaurus to Damaſcus. Yet it ſufficed not Ariſtobulus, that he had eſcaped from being taken; but gathering all his Forces together, he purſued his enemies; and joyning Battel with them about Papyron, he ſlew ſix thouſand of them; in which number was Cephalon, Antipater's Brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being deſtitute of the Arabians help, thought fit to ſeek for ſuccour from the Romans, who had hinder'd them from receiving that of the Arabians. For which cauſe, as ſoon as Pompey had enter'd Syria, and was come to Damaſcus, they in humble manner addreſſed him with many gifts, and made the ſame remonſtrances to him, that they had made before to Aretas; earneſtly requeſting him, C that he would conſider the violence offered by Ariſtobulus, and reſtore Hircanus to the Kingdom, to whom both by birthright, and for his virtue, it was due.

Ariſtobulus, who became confident in that he had gained Scaurus by Preſents, failed not to repair to Pompey alſo, and he went with the Equipage and Pomp of a King; but not abiding to debaſe himſelf, and thinking it diſparagement longer to pay him reſpects in more abject manner than beſeemed a King, he returned to Dioſpolis: Whereat Pompey being angry, at the requeſt of Hircanus and his followers, he went againſt Ariſtobulus, accompanied both with the Roman Army, and the Syrians, their Auxiliaries. When they had paſſed Pella and Dioſpolis, and came to Corea (where the Confines of Judæa begin) as they paſſed thorough the midſt of the Countrey, they underſtood that D Ariſtobulus was fled to Alexandrium (a Caſtle ſtrongly built, and ſcituate upon a very high hill.) Pompey arriving there, ſent meſſengers to him, commanding him to deſcend: Which imperious manner of ſo proceeding, appearing inſupportable to Ariſtobulus, he determined rather to hazard himſelf, than obey. But when he ſaw that the people began to fear, and that his friends adviſed him to conſider the power of the Romans, whoſe ſtrength he was no ways able to reſiſt; he followed their counſel, and came to Pompey; where having alledged many reaſons to ſhew that he had juſt Title to the Crown, he returned again into the Caſtle. And afterwards, being urged by his Brother to come and plead his Title, he came, and returned thither again, without contradiction from Pompey: As he fluctuated thus betwixt hope and fear, and doubt- E ed how the matter would go with him, he reſolv'd to go to Pompey, and tell him that he would do all that he ſhould deſire of him; but as he was in the midſt of his way, fearing leſt he ſhould ſeem to derogate any thing from the Majeſty of a King, he returned back again. Pompey willed him to write to the Governours of his Towns and Caſtles, to ſurrender (becauſe he had commanded them not to do it, except they received Letters written by his own hand:) In this he fulfilled Pompey's mind; yet being angry and diſcontented, he departed to Jeruſalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey: But Pompey not thinking it beſt to give him time to prepare himſelf, followed him with all ſpeed; and ſo much the more willingly, becauſe that near Jericho, he had news of Mithridates his death. This is the fruitfulleſt place of Judæa, F where there are great ſtore of Palms and Balm. This Balſom is a Shrub, whoſe Stem being cut with ſharp ſtones, droppeth Balm out of the wounds thereof, which men gather as it droppeth from them. After he had reſted there that night, in the morning he haſted to Jeruſalem. At his ſudden arrival, Ariſtobulus being diſmayed, in humble manner came to him, and by promiſing him money, and to yield himſelf and the City into his hands, he appeaſed his anger. But he performed no part of his promiſe; for his Aſſociates would not ſuffer Gabinius (who was ſent for the money) to enter into the City: For which cauſe Pompey being moved to diſpleaſure, retain'd Ariſtobulus in Priſon; and coming near the City, he took a view at what place it might be eaſilieſt entred, for he did not lightly perceive how he could batter the Walls, they were ſo G ſtrong. Moreover, there was a deep Ditch before the Wall; and hard by he beheld the Temple ſo fortified, that though the City were taken, it might be a ſecond refuge for the enemy. within the City; wherein Ariſtobulus's Confederates thought it beſt to fight, and deliver the King out of Priſon: But thoſe that favoured Hircanus, would that the Gates ſhould be opened to Pompey. At laſt, Ariſtobulus's Friends not prevailing, fled into the Temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the laſt, they cut down the Bridge which leads out of the City into the Temple. When the reſt had received the Romans into the City, and delivered to them the King's Palace, Pompey ſent a Captain called Piſo, with Soldiers to ſeize the ſame; who leaving a Garriſon in the Town (ſeeing he could perſwade none of them that were in the Temple to peace) prepared all things neceſſary to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends ſhewed themſelves ready to help them to their power, and to do whatſoever they were commanded. Pompey at the North ſide filled the Ditch and Valley with earth, which his Soldiers carried; though by reaſon of the great depth, and for that the Jews made reſiſtance, it was a hard thing to be done; and it had been left undone, had not Pompey (obſerving the ſeventh day, wherein the Jews Religion obliged them to abſtain from all labour) cauſed it to be filled up thoſe days; forbidding the Soldiers to fight at that time, to the intent he might fill the Ditch more conveniently (for it was lawful for the Jews only to do what was neceſſary to ſuſtain and defend their lives upon the Sabbath.) At laſt, when the Ditch was filled, and the Towers were built upon the Rampire, he batter'd the Walls with thoſe Engines that he brought from Tyre; but they were beaten back by thoſe who reſiſted from the top of the Walls, who rouled ſtones at them: Againſt the violent power whereof, the Towers that were built in that Quarter, being of a great and goodly building, reſiſted extreamly well. But the Romans found hard work in this place, and Pompey admired the valour of the Jews; that being amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies Darts, they omitted no Ceremony of their Religion; but (as though they had had firm Peace) they every day obſerved their Ceremonies, offered Sacrifices, and moſt diligently performed the Divine Service; yea, though every day they were killed at the Altar, they ceaſed not from the Lawful Rites of their Religion. At laſt, in the third Month of the Siege, during which, ſcarcely one Tower was beaten down, they brake into the Temple; and the firſt that attempted to climb over the Wall, was Cornelius Fauſtus, Sylla's Son; and after him two Centurions, Furius and Fabius, with their Regiments; who compaſſing the Temple about (while ſome ſought to hide themſelves, and others reſiſted) they ſlew them all. There were many Prieſts alſo among the reſt; who, although they ſaw the enemies with naked Swords ruſhing upon them, yet being nothing at all diſmayed thereat, continued ſtill their Sacrifices, and were ſlain even whilſt they offered and incenſed in the Temple; preferring the duty they ow'd to their Religion, even before their own ſafety. Many alſo were ſlain by their own Countrey-men that favoured the adverſe part, and many caſt themſelves down headlong upon the Rocks; others in their fury, having deſperately fired all things upon the Walls, burnt themſelves for company. So that twelve thouſand Jews were ſlain, but very few Romans, though many hurt: And amongſt all that Maſſacre, there was nothing ſo grievous to the Jews, as that the Holy Sanctuary (which never any one ſaw before that time) was revealed to ſtangers. For Pompey, with his followers, came into the Temple, where it is lawful for none but the High Prieſt to come, and ſaw the Candleſticks, Lamps, Table, Cenſers, and all the Golden Veſſels, and whatſoever was within the Temple. Moreover, he beheld the great quantity of Odoriferous Drugs, which were kept in ſtore in that place, and two thouſand Talents of Holy Money; yet did he not take away theſe things, nor any thing elſe belonging to the Temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacriſtans to purge and make clean the Temple, and to offer the uſual Sacrifice. He likewiſe confirmed Hircanus High Prieſt (who had in all things ſhewed himſelf very forward, and eſpecially at the time of the Siege; and alſo hindred a multitude of people, from joyning themſelves with Ariſtobulus) and thus, like a good Captain, he got the good will of the people more by love, than by fear.

Amongſt others that were Captives, there was Ariſtobulus's Father-in-law, who was alſo his Uncle: as for thoſe that had been the chief cauſe of theſe Wars, Pompey cauſed them to be beheaded. He rewarded Fauſtus likewiſe, and thoſe who had fought valiantly with him, with very rich Gifts, and impoſed a Tribute upon Jeruſalem, and took from that Nation the Cities which they had gotten in Cœloſyria, and appointed them to be governed by him who then was Preſident for the Romans; making them keep within the bounds of their own Countrey. And in favour of Demetrius of Gadara (a freed-man of his) he re-edified Gadara, which the Jews had deſtroyed: He delivered the Mediterranean Cities from their Government (for they had not as yet deſtroyed them, becauſe they were ſuddenly prevented) namely, Hippion, Scythopolis,

In this Battel Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renown; and although he had always ſhewed himſelf valiant, yet there eſpecially his courage appeared. Gabinius leaving ſome to beſiege the Caſtle, went to the Cities of the Province, and ſtrengthned thoſe that were not yet aſſaulted, and re-edified thoſe that were deſtroyed; and by his Com- F mandment Scythopolis, Samaria, Anthedon, Apollonia, Jamnia, Raphia, Mariſſa, Dora, Gadara and Azotus, and many more began to be inhabited, ſo that their Inhabitants joyfully returned and dwelt therein. Which when he had done, he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more cloſe Siege; whereat Alexander being terrified and made deſperate, ſent Ambaſſadours to him, beſeeching him to pardon him; promiſing to render unto him the Caſtles of Machæron and Hircania, which were in his power, beſides Alexandrium: All which, Gabinius, by counſel of Alexander's Mother, deſtroyed, leſt they might be occaſion of new Wars: For the apprehenſion which this Princeſs had for her Huſband, and for her other Children, Priſoners at Rome, made her omit nothing to endeavour to gain the affection of Gabinius. After this, Gabinius carried G Hircanus to Jeruſalem; and committing the Temple to his charge, he committed to others of the Nobility the care of the Commonwealth, and divided the whole Nation of the Jews into five parts and Governments, whereof one was eſtabliſhed at Jeruſalem,

CHAP. VII.

Of the death of Ariſtobulus, and the War undertaken by Antipater and Mithridates.

After that Cæſar had forced the Senate and Pompey to flee beyond the Ionian Sea, and by that means made himſelf ſole maſter of Rome, he ſet Ariſtobulus at liberty, and with two Legions of men ſent him in haſt into Syria, hoping through his means ſpeedily to reduce both it, and alſo all places adjoyning to Judæa: But both the hope of Cæſar, and the forwardneſs of Ariſtobulus were fruſtrated by ill B Fortune; for Ariſtobulus was poyſoned by Pompey's favourers, and even in his own Countrey his body lay unburied, which notwithſtanding was preſerved from putrefaction with honey, till ſuch time as Antonius ſent it to the Jews, commanding them to bury it in the Sepulchre of the Kings. His Son Alexander alſo was beheaded at Antioch by Scipio, being firſt according to the tenour of Pompey's Letters accuſed before the Tribunal-ſeat, of ſuch things as he had committed againſt the Romans. Ptolemy Prince of Chalcis which is upon Mount Libanus, ſent his Son Philippio to Aſcalon, to the widow of Ariſtobulus, to counſel her to ſend her Son Antigonus and her daughters to him. Philippio falling in love with the youngeſt named Alexandra took her to wife. But ſometime after he was put to death by his Father, who himſelf married C this Alexandra; and for that affinity ſake, was more careful of her Brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater ſought all means to get into Cæſar's favour: and when Mithridates of Pergamena was hindred by the Garriſon at Peluſium to paſs further with an Army into Egypt, and was by that means ſtayed at Aſcalon, Antipater not only perſwaded the Arabians to aſſiſt him, but he himſelf ſeconded him with almoſt three thouſand armed Jews. Moreover, he incited the Potentates of Syria, and Ptolemy who inhabited Libanus, and Jamblicus, and his Son Ptolemy to aſſiſt him; for whoſe ſakes the Cities of that Country did willingly undertake the War. And now Mithridates ſtrengthned by Antipater's means came to Peluſium; and becauſe they would not ſuffer him to paſs, he beſieged the City. In which ſiege Antipater ſhewed his valour; D for making a breach on that ſide of the wall where his Quarter was, he firſt of all with his company brake into the City, and ſo Peluſium was taken. After which the Inhabitants of the Province bearing the name of Onias reſolved not to ſuffer him to paſs any further: But Antipater handled the matter ſo diſcreetly with them, that they did not only ſuffer him to paſs, but alſo ſupplied victuals for his Army. Whereupon the City of Memphis would not fight, but yielded of their own accord to Mithridates: ſo that paſſing thorough Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians, in a place called The Camp of the Jews; and being with all his company in danger, he was reſcued by Antipater, who marching along the River ſide, ſet upon and diſcomfited the left wing of the Enemies battel, and ruſhing upon them that E preſſed upon Mithridates, he ſlew many, and purſued the reſt that fled, till he got their Camp, and all this with the loſs of fourſcore men. But Mithridates loſt eight hundred men; and being thus againſt all hope preſerved from being cut in pieces, he was without all envy a true witneſs before Cæſar of all that Antipater had done and deſerved. Whereupon Cæſar rewarded his courage with praiſe and promiſes, and ſo made him forward to hazard himſelf for him. In a word, he proved and ſhewed himſelf a ſtout Warriour, and the many wounds he had in every part of his body, were badges and teſtimonies of his valour and vertue. Afterward when the eſtate of Egypt was quiet, Cæſar returned into Syria, where he made him a Citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities thereof; adding ſo many other F proofs of his eſteem and affection, that he render'd him worthy of envy; and for his ſake confirmed Hircanus in the High-Prieſthood.

Herod called to his anſwer before the Council.

Which when Cæſar heard, he ſaid that Hircanus was moſt worthy to be High Prieſt, and bad Antipater name what Charge he would have: who leaving that to the pleaſure of the giver, he was made Governour of all Judæa. And moreover he obtained lieve to re-edifie the razed walls of his Country; and Cæſar commanded that this Decree ſhould be engraven in Tables of Braſs and in the Capitol, that it might be a memorial in time to come of Antipater's juſtice and vertue. Antipater having attended Cæſar out of Syria, firſt of all repaired the ruined walls of his Country, which Pompey K had razed: and going throughout all the Country, he threatned the obſtinate, and perſwaded the ſeditious to obedience, admoniſhing them, that if they obeyed Hircanus, they might live in wealth and peace, and enjoy happineſs; but if they ſuffered themſelves to be led away with the vain hopes of thoſe, who for their private commodity ſought alteration, then they ſhould find him in ſtead of a Governour, a ſevere Maſter, and Hircanus inſtead of a King, a Tyrant; and the Romans and Cæſar, inſtead of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not ſuffer his power to be overthrown, whom they themſelves had eſtabliſhed King. Antipater in ſpeaking thus conſidered himſelf and the need of providing for the ſafety of the State, becauſe he well knew the ſloth and ſtupidity of Hircanus. He made Phaſælus L his eldeſt Son Governour of the Army, and of Jeruſalem, and of the whole Province; and ſent Herod his youngeſt Son to govern Galilee (although he was very young) who being by nature valiant and ambitious, ſought out occaſion to ſhew his brave mind. He took Ezechias Captain of a troop of Thieves, who, as he underſtood, were wont to prey upon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other Thieves: which thing was ſo grateful to the Syrians, that in all Towns and Villages they made ſongs of Herod, as though he had reſtored them to peace and to their Poſſeſſions. This action alſo made his merit known to Sextus Cæſar, who was Cæſar the Emperour's Kinſman and Governour of Syria. Phaſælus alſo ſtriving to exceed the vertue and gallantry of his Brother, us'd M all his endeavours to win to himſelf the good will of the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem: ſo that during the time he governed the City, he did nothing inſolently or by force.
For which cauſe the people honoured Antipater no leſs than if he had been their King, yet was his fidelity and affection never the leſs towards Hircanus. But it is impoſſible that any man that liveth in proſperity, ſhould not be envied. For Hircanus, although before-time he were moved ſomething at the glory of the Father and the young men, and eſpecially with the proſperous ſucceſs of Herod; yet in particular he was ſtirred up by many envious perſons (who uſe to haunt the Courts of Princes) who were grieved that Antipater and his Sons ruled without offence. Theſe men told Hircanus that he only enjoyed the bare name of a King, and that Antipater and his Sons ruled N all; and that he would ſo long permit and wink at them, till at the laſt, they would make themſelves Kings; for they now did no more pretend themſelves to be Miniſters, but leaving that Title, they acted as Lords and Soveraigns, without any regard or reverence towards him; as appeared in Herod who had put to death a great multitude of Jews againſt the Law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the King had given him any ſuch authority: and that Herod, if he were not a King but a private perſon, was to be brought into judgment, there to anſwer the matter, and ſhew the King a reaſon, and ſatisfie the laws of his Countrey; which permit no man to be put to death, before by Law he be convicted. By theſe perſwaſions Hircanus grew angry: ſo that not concealing his wrath, he cauſed Herod O to be ſent for to anſwer the matter: who both for that his Father advertiſed him thereto, and becauſe he truſted to the equity of his cauſe, firſt leaving a Garriſon

A in Galilee, he repaired to the King, accompanied with a ſufficient Guard, not ſo great as to give jealouſie to Hircanus, nor ſo ſmall as to expoſe him to the attempts of his Adverſaries. Sextus Cæſar, who lov'd the young man much, and feared leſt any evil ſhould betide him amongſt his enemies, ſent to Hircanus, warning him to abſolve Herod from the crimes of which he was accus'd. Which Hircanus, who alſo loved Herod, made no difficulty to do. But Herod, ſuppoſing he had done it unwillingly, went to Damaſcus to Sextus, purpoſing not to appear, if hereafter he were ſent for. Hereupon Hircanus was once again incited againſt Herod by his enemies, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, with deſign to enterprize ſomething againſt him: which Hircanus believing, knew not what to do, ſeeing his enemy B more potent than himſelf.

Hircanus abſolveth Herod

Hircanus once more incited by the wicked

Shortly after Sextus Cæſar proclaimed him General of the Army, both in Syria and Samaria; ſo that now he was greatly to be feared by Hircanus, not only for that he was highly in favour with the Commonalty, but alſo for the forces which he commanded. Hereupon Hircanus fell into extreme fear, verily perſwading himſelf that Herod with his whole Army would preſently come againſt him. Neither was his ſuſpicion vain: for Herod angry at the pretended crime whereof he was accuſed, came with a great Army to Jeruſalem, intending to depoſe Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his Father and Brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating him that he would account that terrour (wherein he had put his enemies) C and his own indignation a ſufficient revenge, and that he would ſpare the King, by whoſe favour he came to be ſo potent; adding moreover, that he ought not to take it ill that he was called to anſwer his accuſations, ſince he was acquitted of them, and conſequently ought to ſhew himſelf grateful to the King who had ſaved his life. Moreover, that Prudence obliged him to conſider the fortune of war, together with the cauſe thereof; that the juſtice of Hircanus ſide might do more for him than a whole Army; and that he ought not to hope for victory, being to fight againſt his own King, who had always been gracious unto him, and never had thought of doing him hurt, but only being as it were urged thereunto by ſome of his Council, who through meer envy, and to ſatisfie their own paſſions, had framed a ſhadow of an D accuſation againſt him. Herod was ſatisfied herewith, and ſuppos'd it to be ſufficient in order to his great deſigns, to have ſhewed his forces and his power unto his Nation.

Herod gathering a great Army cometh to Jeruſalem to depoſe Hircanus.

Herod diſſwaded by Antipater from attempting againſt Hircanus.

At this time began Civil war among the Romans near Apamia, in which Cæcilius Baſſus, for the love he bare to Sextus Pompey, ſlew Sextus Cæſar at unawares, and made himſelf Governour of his Army; and other Captains of Cæſar's to revenge his death, made after Baſſus with all their forces; unto whom Antipater by his two Sons ſent aid, both for the ſake of Cæſar that was ſlain and of him that was yet alive (for he was an entire friend and well-willer unto them both) and theſe wars continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to ſucceed Sextus. AT this time aroſe great and bloody Civil Wars amongſt the Romans, after Cæſar was ſlain by the treaſon of Caſſius and Brutus, having ruled the Empire F three years and ſeven months. By reaſon of which murther their troubles daily increaſed, and the Nobility being at variance amongſt themſelves, every one followed that courſe, that they thought moſt expedient for themſelves. Whereupon Caſſius preſently marched into Syria, to take poſſeſſion of the Government of the Army which was about Apamia; where he made Marcus and Baſſus friends, took the conduct of the Legions which they commanded, and rais'd the ſiege from Apamia, and leading the Army in his own perſon, he forced every City to be tributary, and exacted without meaſure. He commanded the Jews to contribute ſeven hundred Talents: Antipater fearing his diſpleaſure, appointed his Sons and others of his friends preſently to gather the money; and eſpecially amongſt the G reſt, he gave this charge to one Malichus a friend of his. But Herod firſt of all got Caſſius his favour, having brought him an hunndred Talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or Province. negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: So that having pillaged Gophna and H Ammauntes, and other two ſmall Cities, he march'd onwards with intent to kill Malichus, for that he had been ſo careleſs and negligent in gathering the tribute-money.
But Antipater (preſently disburſing unto Caſſius an hundred Talents) ſaved both him and all the reſt of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Caſſius was departed, did no more remember how beneficial Antipater had been unto him, but oftentimes treacherouſly laid wait to murther him becauſe he hindered and withſtood his villanous pretenſions; notwithſtanding that himſelf had often confeſſed that Antipater had ſaved his life.
Antipater, fearing both his power and ſubtilty, paſſed over the River Jordan to gather an Army, that he might prevent thoſe treacheries. But Malichus being diſcovered, ſaw nothing left for him to do but to diſſemble; and accordingly by many I oaths and excuſes he won Phaſælus chief of the Garriſon in Jeruſalem, and Herod who was maſter of the Army, that they ſhould be a means to reconcile him unto Antipater.
Whereupon Antipater intreating Marcus (who was General of the Army in Syria, and had determined to kill him) he was ſaved. The reaſon that Marcus would have put him to death, was, becauſe Malichus was of a turbulent and factious

The young Cæſar, ſurnamed afterwards Auguſtus, and Antonius warring againſt Caſſius and Brutus: Brutus and Caſſius, gathered an Army in Syria; and in conſideration of the great capacity of Herod, they made him Procurator of all Syria, giving him a band of horſe and foot. Moreover Caſſius promiſed him, that if the war had an K happy end, he would make him King of Judea. But it ſo came to paſs, that the merit of Herod, which raisd this hope ſo high, was the cauſe of Antipater his Fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in fear, hired one of the Kings officers for a certain ſum of money to poyſon Antipater; by which means he died, being thus unjuſtly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to govern, and recovered the Kingdom being loſt for Hircanus: Malichus (perceiving the people incenſed againſt him, becauſe they ſuſpected that he had poyſoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their diſpleaſure by denying the fact; yet for his better ſecurity, he gathered about him a Guard of armed men: for he thought that Herod would not let the matter ſlip ſo, but would preſently come with an Army to revenge his fathers death. But by the counſel of his brother Phaſælus (who ſent him word L not openly to encounter Malichus, leſt a ſedition might ariſe among the people) he patiently permitted it ſo to be, and ſuffered Malichus to juſtifie himſelf, and celebrated a ſolemn funeral for his Father: which done, he went to Samaria, and appeaſed the ſedition wherewith that City was diſquieted. After this he returned to Jeruſalem, intending to celebrate the Feſtival, and having ſent certain of his armed men before him, he appointed the reſt to accompany him. But Malichus, who feared this approach of his, ſollicited Hircanus to give order, that no ſtrangers ſhould intermingle themſelves among the people, to diſturb their devotion. But Herod contemning this Prohibition entered the City by night: whereupon Malichus once more came to him, M and wept for Antipater. Herod, although he could very hardly bridle his diſpleaſure, yet diſſembled the ſame: and ſent letters to Caſſius, wherein he complained of his fathers death. Caſſius already hated Malichus ſufficiently, and ſo he writ again to Herod, willing him to revenge his father's death; which that he might the better effect, he ſecretly commanded the Captains of his Regiment to aſſiſt him. Now for that after the ſurprizal of Laodicea, all the beſt of the City came to Herod, bringing preſents and crowns, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended revenge: which Malichus ſuſpecting as he was near Tyre, he purpoſed ſecretly to get away his ſon, who was there a pledge, and to flee into Judæa. But deſpair of his own ſafety urged him to greater matters; for he hoped to incite the Jews to take Arms againſt the Romans, N whilſt Caſſius was now buſie in the War againſt Antonius; ſo that he thought he might eaſily depoſe Hircanus, and make himſelf King. But God prevented theſe vain hopes: For Herod, ſuſpecting he had ſome great deſign, invited him and Hircanus to ſupper, in order to which he made a ſhew as though he had ſent one of his ſervants to cauſe a banquet to be prepared, but indeed he ſent him to the Roman Captains to tell them to lie in wait for Malichus: who remembring what charge Caſſius gave them, came forth of the City to the ſhore next adjoyning to the Town, all armed with ſwords; where compaſſing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat aſtoniſhed, fell in a ſwoon, and being ſcarcely come to himſelf, he demanded who killed Malichus; one of the Captains anſwered, that Caſſius O gave the commandment: whereupon he anſwered, truly Caſſius hath preſerved me and my Country, in killing him who was a Traitour to us both: but whether herein

A he ſpake as he thought, or that for fear he approved the fact, it is uncertain. Thus was Herod revenged upon Malichus.

How Herod was accuſed, and ſet free

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 20.

Felix cometh with an army againſt Phaſælus.

Phaſælus overcometh Felix, and reproacheth Hircanus with ingratitude.

AFter Caſſius was departed from Syria, there aroſe another ſedition in Jeruſalem: for Felix came with an Army againſt Phaſælus, to be revenged upon Herod for B killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod was at that time at Damaſcus with Fabius a Roman Captain, and would have come to aſſiſt Phaſælus, but by the way he fell ſick, ſo that he could not ſuccour him: but it ſo fell out, that Phaſælus without any help, did of himſelf overcome Felix, and afterwards reproached Hircanus as ungrateful, in that he had both favoured Felix, and ſuffered Malichus's brother to ſeize upon divers place (as already he had done, and eſpecially one of greateſt ſtrength called Maſſada:) Yet all theſe did not protect him from Herod, who was no ſooner recovered of his ſickneſs, but preſently he retook them all, and at Hircanus's requeſt permitted him to depart. He alſo chaſed Marion, whom Caſſius had made Prince of the C Tyrians out of Galilee, who had got three Caſtles in that Country. As for the Tyrians that he took, he ſpared their lives, and ſent ſome away with rewards; whereby he got the good will of the City, and the hatred of the Tyrant. Which Marion had gotten into his hands all Syria; and for the hatred he bore to Herod, took with him Antigonus, Ariſtobulus's Son, and marched againſt him: and by Fabius's means, whom Antigonus had gained to himſelf by money: he alſo got Ptolemy to aſſiſt him in this expedition; which Ptolemy was father-in-law to Antigonus, and furniſhed him with all neceſſaries. Herod likewiſe, having prepar'd himſelf againſt them, gave them battel in the entrance into Judea, and got the victory: and having put Antigonus to flight, he returned to Jeruſalem, where he was honoured by all men for his courage in that victory; ſo that even they D that before deſpiſed him, now by reaſon of his affinity newly contracted with Hircanus, ſought his friendſhip and familiarity. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of his own Country, named Doris, and had by her a Son named Antipater: but he then married Mariamne, daughter of Alexander (who was Ariſtobulus his ſon) and of Alexandra Hircanus his daughter, by reaſon whereof he came to be in favour with the King. But when Caſſius was ſlain near Philippi, Cæſar departed into Italy, and Antonius into Aſia; at which time the chief of the Jews came and accuſed Phaſælus and Herod, alledging that they by force got unto themſelves the rule of the Country, and left Hircanus only the bare name of King. But Herod being then preſent, ſo wrought himſelf into Antonius's favour by a great ſum of E money, that he permitted not his enemies to ſpeak one word more; who thereupon returned home. Afterward an hundred men of the moſt honourable amongſt the Jews, repaired to Daphne near Antioch to Antonius (now doting on the love of Cleopatra) and offered an accuſation againſt the two brethren, having choſen ſome of the greateſt Quality and Eloquence to ſpeak for them, Meſſala undertook their defence being aſſiſted by Hircanus. Antonius having heard both parties demanded of Hircanus, whom he thought the fitteſt to govern the Common-wealth? who anſwered, Herod and his brethren. Whereat A*ntonius* was exceeding glad (for he had been moſt courteouſly entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinius into Judea;) and thereupon he made them Tetrarchs, committing to them the rule of all Judæa: F which, when the Jews Ambaſſadors miſliked, he put fifteen of them in priſon, and was near reſolving to put them to death; the reſt he ſent away after he had treated them very ill: Whereupon there aroſe greater tumults in Jeruſalem, and the Jews ſent another Embaſſage of a thouſand men to Tyre, where Antonius reſided with an intent to come againſt Jeruſalem. Antonius diſpleaſed with their murmurs and complaints, commanded the Magiſtrates of Tyre to kill all they could catch of the Jews, and to maintain their Authority, whom he himſelf had conſtituted Tetrarchs. But Herod and Hircanus went to theſe Deputies, who walk'd on the Sea-ſhore, admoniſhing them earneſtly to be contented, leſt by their indiſcreet proceeding, they ſhould become not only the cauſe of their own deaths, but alſo of War againſt their own G Country; but becauſe they would not be reclaimed by theſe admonitions, Antonius ſent out certain armed men, who killed many of them, and wounded the reſt. Hircanus after this diſaſter cauſed the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured, notwithſtanding

CHAP. XI.

Of the War of the Parthians againſt the Jews. Of the flight of Herod, and his being made King of Judæa.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 21. Lyſanias perſwadeth Barzapharnes to depoſe Hircanus, and enſtate Antigonus.

A ſore fight in the Market-place, betwixt Antigonus and Hircanus. Daily ſlaughters in Jeruſalem.

Phaſælus entertaineth the Parthian, and with him five hundred Horſe Pacorus's Treaſon and ſubtilty.

TWo years after this, and when Barzapharnes, a great Noble man of the Parthians, governed Syria with Pacorus the King's Son, Lyſanias who had ſucceeded his Father I Ptolomæus, Son of Minæus, promiſed them a thouſand Talents, and five hundred Women, to put Antigonus in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Judæa, and depoſe Hircanus. Being induced by theſe promiſes, Pacorus march'd along the Sea-coaſt, and Barzapharnes paſt through the midſt of the Countrey. But amongſt the reſt of the places bordering on the Sea, the Tyrians would not receive Pacorus (notwithſtanding the Citizens of Ptolemais and Sidon had given him entertainment) wherefore he gave part of his Horſe unto one who was the King's Butler, called Pacorus (as himſelf was;) commanding him to paſs into Judæa, and learn what their enemies meant to do, and to help Antigonus where need required. As they waſted the Countrey about Carmel, many Jews came of their own accord, and joyned with Antigonus, ſhewing themſelves K very prompt to fight; for which cauſe he ſent them before to take a place called Drymos; where having fought with his enemies, and put them to flight, he purſued them with all ſpeed as far as Jeruſalem: And his number being augmented, he came to the King's Palace. But Hircauus and Phaſælus met them with a ſtrong Company, and fought with them in the Market-place, where the enemies were forced to fly, and part of them were by Herod ſhut up in the Temple; and he appointed to keep them ſixty men, which he placed in the houſes next adjoyning,. But the people bearing a grudge to the two Brethren, ſet the houſes on fire: Whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were conſumed with fire) ſet upon the people, and killed a great many of them, and every hour one laid wait for another, ſo that every day ſome were murthered. L Now the Feaſt of Pentecoſt drawing nigh, all places about the Temple, and the whole City, was filled with people of the Countrey, whereof the moſt part was armed; and Phaſælus kept the Walls, and Herod with a ſmall Company, kept the King's Palace; and aſſaulting their enemies upon the ſuddain, as they were in the Suburbs, they killed a great many of them, and put all the reſt to flight; part of them he couped up in the City, others he ſhut in the Temple, and the reſt between that and the uttermoſt Rampire. Whereupon Antigomus requeſted that Pacorus might come and treat a Peace betwixt them. Phaſælus moved by theſe prayers received the Parthian into the City, and entertained him into his houſe, accompanied with five hundred Horſe, who came under a pretence to make Peace; but in effect he reſorted M thither to help Antigonus; for craftily conſpiring againſt Phaſælus, he perſwaded him to repair to Barzapharnes as an Ambaſſadour to treat a Peace, notwithſtanding that Herod altogether diſſwaded him, willing him to kill the Traitor, and not to truſt his ſubtilty; adding that the Parthians were naturally unfaithful.

The year of the World, 3924. before Chriſt's Nativity, 38.

Herod in Jeruſalem, and Phaſælus in the Camp, are in danger of their lives.

Pacorus departing out of the City, took Hircanus with him that he might be the leſs ſuſpected; and leaving ſome Horſe with Herod, named * Eleutheri, he followed Phaſælus with the reſt. When they came near Galilee, they found the Inhabitants at variance, and up in Arms, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily, with pretence of courteſie and friendſhip, hid his Treachery) who after he had beſtowed Preſents upon them, and that they were retired, laid an Ambuſh for them; whereof they had intelligence N as they came to a place near the Sea-coaſt named Edippon. Here they were informed of the thouſand Talents that were promiſed, and how that Antigonus had given the Parthians more than five hundred women of thoſe that were amongſt them; and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and had been lately taken, but that delay was made till ſuch time as Herod was ſurprized in Jeruſalem, leſt he hearing what was become of them, might provide for himſelf. Now they perceived that theſe were not only words, for they beheld ſome Guards not far off: Yet would not Phaſælus forſake Hircanus, notwithſtanding that Oſelius (to whom Saramalla, the richeſt among the Syrians had declared all the Treaſon) exhorted him to fly; but he choſe rather to to go to Barzapharnes, and to upbraid him to his face, that he had treacherouſly laid O wait for him, and for money had ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted; whereas he himſelf would have given more for his life and liberty, than Antigonus had done for the Kingdom.

* Or free.

A dom. At theſe words the Parthian with Oaths and Proteſtations craftily freed himſelf from ſuſpition, and repaired to Pacorus. But preſently the Parthians, who ſtayed behind, and had charge ſo to do, laid hands on Phaſælus and Hircanus, who openly exclaimed againſt their falſhood and perjury.

The year of the world, 3924. before Chriſt's Nativity. 38.

Herod is laid for to be betrayed.

In the mean time Pacorus was ſent out to ſurprize Herod, and by ſome ſtratagem to toul him out of the City: He wrought by all the means he could, according as he was inſtructed; but Herod who was always wont to miſtruſt the perfideous practices of the Parthian, and believed that the Letters which Phaſælus had writ to him to diſcover the Treaſon, were fallen into the enemies hands, would not go forth, though Pacorus incited him to ride out and meet them that brought the Letters, for he had already learnt B the taking of Phaſælus; and Mariamne a very wiſe woman, Hircanus's Daughter, with many entreaties perſwaded Herod not to go forth, but to beware how he truſted himſelf to the mercy of that Barbarous people, whoſe ill deſigns he could not be ignorant of. Whilſt Pacorus was conſulting with his Complices, how he might privily effect his Treaſons (ſeeing it was not poſſible openly to circumvent a man of ſo great Wiſdom) Herod in the night time, whilſt his enemies neither knew nor ſuſpected his intent, took his neareſt kindred, and fled into Idumæa; which being once known, the Parthians followed him. For which cauſe, he made his Mother, his Brethren and Mariamne, whom he had eſpouſed, and her Mother and youngeſt Brother to keep on their journey, and he with his Servants warily aſſaulted the Parthians; and having in divers aſ- C ſaults killed a great number of them, he haſted towards the Caſtle of Maſſada; and in his retreat ſuſtained more harm by the Jews, than by the Parthians; who, as they had been always troubleſome, ſo now within three ſcore furlongs from the Town, they ſet upon him: The Battel was long, but Herod obtained the Victory, killed a great many of them; and in remembrance of the action, built on that place a moſt ſtately Palace, and a ſtrong Caſtle, which from his own name he called Herodion. In this retreat many joyned with him: But when he came to Therſa, a Town of Idumæa, his Brother Joſeph met him, and perſwaded him to leſſen the number of his followers, becauſe Maſſada could not receive ſuch a multitude (for the number amounted to above nine thouſand.) Herod, according to his counſel, diſmiſſed thoſe that were unfit for D his turn, and ſent them into Idumæa, giving them neceſſaries for their journey. As for thoſe that were choſen men, and fit for his purpoſe, he retained them with him, and ſo he was received into the Caſtle; where leaving eight hundred Soldiers to defend the women, and Proviſion ſufficient for thoſe that were within, he himſelf went to Petra, a City of Arabia.

In the mean time the Parthians at Jeruſalem began to ſack the houſes of them that were fled, and the King's Palace; they only abſtained from Hircanus's money, which amounted to more than three hundred Talents. As for other men's Goods, they found not ſo much as they expected; for Herod long before, ſuſpecting the infidelity of the Parthians, had ſent all his Riches and Jewels into Idumæa, as his followers alſo had E done. When the Parthians had taken the ſpoil, they were ſo impious, that they left no place of the whole Countrey free from Pillage· They deſtroyed the City of Marſa, and bound Phaſælus and Hircanus, and delivered them in Chains to Antigonus, who preſently cut off Hircanus's ears, to the end, that if by ſome alteration, he chanced hereafter to get looſe, he might be no more High Prieſt; for by our Law, none may offer Sacrifice, that wants any member of his body. But Phaſælus his fortitude prevented the cruelty of Antigonus; for having neither Weapon, nor his hands at liberty, he beat out his own brains againſt a ſtone, and died; demonſtrating himſelf by that act, to be the true Brother of Herod and not a Poltron like Hircanus: Yet ſome report that Antigonus ſent a Chirurgeon under pretence to cure the wound, who filled the ſame with ve- F nomous Medicines, and ſo killed him. It is reported likewiſe, that underſtanding before his death by means of a certain woman, that Herod was eſcaped, he ſpake theſe words; Now I ſhall die without regret, ſince I leave behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies; and ſo he died. Although the Parthians had not yet received the five hundred women promiſed them (which was the chief thing they looked for) yet they eſtabliſhed Antigonus in Jeruſalem, and led Hircanus Priſoner into Parthia. But Herod with all ſpeed haſted into Arabia, as if his Brother had been yet alive, to the intent to borrow money of the King of Arabia, with which alone he hoped that the cruelty of thoſe barbarous Parthians might be mitigated towards Phaſælus: For his opinion was, that although the Arabian had now forgot his Father's Friendſhip, and G were hard-hearted; yet at leaſt he would lend him money, ſeeing it was to redeem his Brother, whoſe Son he meant to leave as a Pledge for it. For Herod took with him a Son of his Brother's into Arabia, that was ſeven years old; and purpoſed to give 300

He found alſo that the Arabians renounc'd the League of Amity; for Malichus their King ſent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all ſpeed to depart out of his Dominions; pretending that the Parthians had ſent Ambaſſadours to him, to requeſt him to drive him out of his Countrey; but indeed the cauſe was, that his ingratitude ſuffered him not to pay that which Antipater had deſerved, or requite his Sons, now comfortleſs, for thoſe good turns that he had received at their Father's hands: And thoſe who counſelled him to this, were ſuch as offered to forſwear thoſe Summs which Antipater had put them in truſt with, who were the chiefeſt men about him. Herod perceiving the Arabians to be his foes for that which I he thought would procure him friendſhip, anſwered the Meſſenger according as his reſentment moved him, and took his journey towards Egypt; and the firſt night he lodged in a Countrey Temple, to the intent that thoſe of his company that were behind him might overtake him. The next day coming to Rhinoſura, his Brother's death was told him; after he had paid what he could not refuſe to the firſt ſentiments of ſo violent a ſorrow, he went forward.

In the mean time the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himſelf of that which he had done to Herod, and ſent Meſſengers after him to deſire him to return, but they could not overtake him, he had marched ſo faſt. When Herod was come to Peluſium, the Mariners of the City would not receive him into their Veſſels; for which K cauſe, he in perſon went to the Governours; who reverencing the Fame and Dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no ſooner came, but Cleopatra received him very honourably, intending to make him General of her Army which ſhe was preparing at that time. But he neither regarding the offers of the Queen, nor yet diſcouraged by the hard Winter Seaſon, nor the dangers of the Seas, took his journey towards Rome; and being in great danger of Shipwrack near Pamphilia, both he and the reſt of the Paſſengers, were forced to caſt away the moſt part of their lading: with much ado he arrived ſafe at Rhodes, which had been much ruined in the War againſt Caſſius; there he was entertained by two of his friends, Ptolomey and Sapinas; and although his money grew ſcant, yet there he built a great Galley with three Ranks of L Oars; and in it (being accompanied with his friends) he ſailed to Brunduſium, and from thence went ſtraight to Rome. Where firſt of all (in regard of the familiarity between his Father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring unto him both his own calamity, and the miſerable deſolation of the whole Countrey; and how, leaving his deareſt friends beſieged in a Caſtle, himſelf through the ſtormy Winter Seas was come to him, to implore his aſſiſtance. Antonius compaſſionating his calamity, and remembring his familiarity with Antipater, and eſteeming the merit of Herod which ſtood before him, determined to make him King of the Jews, whom before, he himſelf had made Tetrarch: For he loved not Herod ſo well, but he hated Antigonus as much; holding him both a ſeditious perſon, and an enemy to the Romans. Now, to the ac- M compliſhment of this, he found Cæſar far more ready than himſelf, when he called to mind the ſervice that Antipater did in Egypt under his Father, and his entertainment and friendſhip in all things: And beſides all theſe, he was much ſatisfied with Herod's courage and ability. Wherefore he cauſed the Senate to be aſſembled, wherein Meſſala and himſelf, in the preſence of Herod, recounted his Father's deſerts and fidelity towards the Romans; declaring Antigonus to be an enemy, not only becauſe he had formerly revolted, but for that now lately, in deſpight of the Romans, he had by the aſſiſtance of the Parthians, uſurped the Kingdom. With which conſiderations the Senate being moved, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Roman Wars againſt the Parthians, that Herod ſhould be created King, the whole Senate conſented: N and when it was diſmiſſed, Antonius and Cæſar came forth with Herod between them, and the Conſuls marched before him accompanied with other Magiſtrates to offer Sacrifice, and to Regiſter the Decree of the Senate in the Capitol. After which Antonius feaſted Herod the firſt day of his Reign.

CHAP. XII.

Of Herod*'s War for the recovering of* Jeruſalem after his return from Rome; and how he warred againſt the Thieves.

The year of the World, 3925. before Chriſt's Nativity, 37.

AT this time Antigonus beſieged thoſe that were left in the Caſtle of Maſſada, who had great ſtore of Victuals, and wanted nothing but Water. Joſeph, Herod's Brother, who defended it, purpoſed to go to the Arabians with two hundred of his deareſt friends, for that he had intelligence that Malichus repented that he had given B Herod no better entertainment. And accordingly he had forſaken the Caſtle, had not great ſtore of rain fallen that very night, wherein he intended to flee; but the Wells and Ciſterns being now filled with Water, there was no cauſe to flee; ſo that iſſuing out of the Caſtle, he aſſaulted Antigonus's Soldiers, and killed very many of them; ſometimes in open fight, and ſometimes by pollicy: Yet, he fought not always with fortunate ſucceſs, but returned ſometimes with loſs. In the mean time, Ventidius (who was General of the Roman Army which was ſent to expel the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulſed them, came into Judæa, under pretence to ſuccour Joſeph and the reſt that were beſieged; but in effect, to get money from Antigonus. When therefore he drew near Jeruſalem, and had received the money he looked for, he departed with C the greateſt part of his Army, leaving Silo behind him with a few to colour his pretence: And Antigonus hoping for a ſecond Supply from the Parthians, corrupted Silo not to moleſt him for the preſent. By this time Herod having ſailed from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great Army of ſtrangers and his own Countreymen together, came into Galilee againſt Antigonus, being aſſiſted with the Forces of Ventidius and Silo, whom Gellius, who was ſent from Antonius, perſwaded to eſtabliſh Herod in his Kingdom. But Ventidius was buſie in appeaſing the Broils that the Parthians had made in the Cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: Yet did not Herod want aid; for every day, the further he marched into the Countrey, the more his Army encreaſed, all Galilee (very little excepted) yielding unto him. Whereupon he D purpoſed firſt of all to go to Maſſada, to deliver his friends that were there beſieged; but Joppa hindred his purpoſe; which being an enemy Town, he thought beſt to take it before he went any further, leſt whilſt he was going to Jeruſalem, his enemies ſhould have a place behind him to flee to. Now Silo joyned Armies with Herod, rejoycing that he had found occaſion to retire; but he was purſued by the Jews of Antigonus's Party, who Herod with a looſe Wing of his Army, and a ſmall Company of men, encountred, and preſently put to flight, and ſaved Silo, who had much ado to make reſiſtance againſt them. This done, and Joppa taken, he haſted to Maſſada; and the people of the Countrey (ſome for his Father's ſake, others for his own, and many for both) joyned themſelves to him: Many alſo, came to him for hope, becauſe he was E now King, ſo that now he had a very puiſſant Army: But Antigonus hindred his journey, by planting certain Ambuſhes in places convenient, where Herod was to paſs; though by all this they little harmed him.

Herod having raiſed the Siege of Maſſada, and reſcued his friends, from thence went to Jeruſalem; where both Silo's Soldiers, and many of the City came and joyned with him. Being now terrified with the greatneſs of his Forces, there pitching their Tents at the weſt ſide of the Town, they that guarded that part, aſſaulted them with Darts and Arrows; and others iſſuing by Troops forth of the City, aſſaulted the Front of the Army: Whereupon Herod cauſed one to go about the Walls of the City, and to proclaim, how that he was come for the good of the whole City; and that he would F not take revenge of any, though his open enemy; but would pardon, even them that had been moſt ſeditious. But when Antigonus his followers with loud exclamations hindred the Crier's voice from being heard, leſt any man ſhould alter his mind; Herod preſently commanded his men to beat the enemies off from the Wall; upon which order, they ſhot ſuch a flight of Arrows and Darts from the top of the Towers, that they forced them to retire. At this time Silo was detected to have been corrupted with money; for he ſolicited many Soldiers to cry out that they wanted Proviſions, and to ask money and Victuals, and to crave to be diſmiſſed and ſent into ſome fit place of Quarter during the Winter, becauſe Antigonus had laid waſte all the Countrey; and even Silo himſelf offered to be gone, and exhorted others to do the like. But Herod ſeeing G himſelf ready to be forſaken, went to the Captains that ſerved under Silo; and calling many of the Soldiers together, requeſted them not to forſake him at that exigent, whom Cæſar, Antonius, and the whole Senate (as they knew) had ſent thither; promiſing them, that within one day he would relieve all their neceſſities. When he had thus H entreated them, himſelf went about the Fields, and brought them ſo much Proviſion that he cut off all Silo's excuſes; and forecaſting leſt hereafter there ſhould be any want, he ſent Letters to Samaria (which City about this time had put it ſelf under his protection) willing them to bring Victuals, and Wine, and Oyl, and Cattel to Jericho. Antigonus hearing this, preſently ſent certain of his men to lie in Ambuſh in the Fields, and ſuddenly to ſet upon thoſe that came for Proviſion, and kill them, and ſo hinder them from carrying any Victuals to the Camp: according to his Commandment, there went a great number of Soldiers to Jericho, and placed themſelves upon the Mountains, with an intent to eſpy if any body carried Proviſion to the Army. In the mean I time Herod reſted not; for taking with him ten Companies (five of the Romans, and five of the Jews, with three hundred Mercenaries, and a few Horſe,) he came to Jericho, where he found the City without Inhabitants, and five hundred with their Wives and Families had placed themſelves upon the tops of the Mountains; whom when he had ſurprized, he permitted to depart. But the Romans brake into the City, and ſacked it (where they found the houſes ſtored with all manner of Riches;) and the King leaving a Garriſon at Jericho returned. He ſent likewiſe the Roman Soldiers to the Provinces which were on his ſide; to wit, Idumæa, Galilee and Samaria, that they might abide there till Winter was paſt. Antigonus alſo, through Silo's means (whom by money he had made his friend) obtained that a part of his Army might (during the Winter time) abide at Lidda, that he might by this means obtain the favour of Antonius: K and the Romans, being now diſcharged from the Wars, lived in great eaſe and plenty.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 24. Herod taketh the City of Sephoris.

Herod ſetteth forth againſt the Thieves.

All this time Herod was not idle, but accompanied with two thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe, he went about Idumæa, and ſent alſo his Brother Joſeph, leſt by Antigonus's means the people ſhould rebel. And having carried his Mother, and the reſt of his Kindred, whom he took from Maſſada, into Samaria, and placed them where no danger might betide them; himſelf went into Galilee, to ſubdue that part of the Countrey which as yet was not in his hands, and to expel from thence the Garriſons left by Antigonus. And when he was come to Sephoris, notwithſtanding there was a very great Snow, he eaſily took it, L for the Garriſon fled before he aſſaulted it; and finding there great ſtore of Proviſion, he refreſhed his Soldiers, which now with Winter weather were much haraſſed; and then ſent them againſt the great number of Thieves that infeſted that Province, and lay lurking in Dens and Caves; and who making often incurſions upon the Countrey, moleſted the Inhabitants no leſs than if they had been an Army of Enemies. And ſending before three Companies of Foot, and one Troop of Horſe into a Village called Arbela, himſelf forty days after came thither with the whole Army. For all this the Thieves feared him not, but arming themſelves, came to meet him, truſting to their experience in Warlike affairs, and their own deſperate courage. The Battel being joyned, the Right Wing of their Party put the Left Wing of Herod's to flight; but he with his Right Wing preſently ſuccoured them, M and recalled his men that fled; and ruſhing violently upon his enemies, he a little ſtopped their career; till at laſt the Fore-front of their Battel, not able to ſtand any longer, fled: Herod purſued them even unto Jordan, and killed many of them; thoſe that eſcaped fled over the River. And thus he freed Galilee from that fear, ſave that yet there were left ſome lurking in the Caves, by whom he was conſtrained to make a longer ſtay. Wherefore, firſt of all he gave the Soldiers ſome fruit of their labours, diſtributing to every one of them an hundred and fifty Drachmes of Silver, and unto the Captains more, and ſo he ſent them where they ſhould paſs the Winter. Alſo he writ unto his youngeſt Brother Pheroras, to provide neceſſaries for them, and to build a Wall about the Caſtle of Alexandrium; which he performed. N

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 25. The deſcription of the Caves where the Thieves kept.

In the mean while Antonius paſſed the time about Athens, and Ventidius ſent for Silo and Herod, to aſſiſt him in the War againſt the Parthians; after they had ſettled the affairs of Judæa, ſo as no longer to need their preſence. Herod willingly ſent Silo unto Ventidius; and in the mean time he with his Army went againſt the Thieves in the Caves. Theſe Caves were in very ſteep Mountains, ſo that there was no way to come to them, ſave only by crooked and very narrow paſſages: And theſe Mountains were all Rocks of Stone, hanging over the Valleys; ſo that the King a great while was doubtful what to do, ſeeing the place ſo inacceſſible. At laſt, Herod deviſed a way ſcarcely heard of before; for he put the valianteſt of his men into Cheſts, and ſo let them down to the mouths of the Caves, where they killed the Thieves and their Families, and put O fire to them that reſiſted. And Herod ſeeking to ſave ſome of them, cauſed a Trumpet to publiſh to them, that they might come to him with ſafety; but there was not one that

A that came; and thoſe that were forced, choſe rather to kill themſelves than be his Captives: So that an old man having ſeven Sons and a Wiſe, who all requeſted him, that they might go forth to the King and ſave their lives, killed them all after this manner: Himſelf ſtood before the door of the Cave, and bad them come forth one by one, and always as one of them came forth, he killed him. And Herod being in a place where he might behold this ſpectacle, being moved with compaſſion, ſtretched forth his hand and requeſted him to ſpare his Children: But he being nothing moved to compaſſion by Herod's words, upbraided Herod's meanneſs of mind; and having butchered his Sons, he alſo killed his Wife; and caſting the dead bodies down into the Valleys, at laſt he caſt himſelf likewiſe down headlong.

B Herod having thus taken the Caves, and ſlain thoſe that were in them, left ſuch a part of his Army, as he thought might ſuffice to repreſs any that ſhould attempt a Rebellion, under the Command of Ptolomey, and returned to Samaria, carrying with him three thouſand Foot, and ſix hundred Horſe againſt Antigonus. After his departure, thoſe that were accuſtomed to trouble Galilee, having now (as they thought) opportunity, aſſaulted Ptolomey at unawares, and killed him; and having waſted the Countrey, retired into Mariſh Grounds, and Strong Holds. Which when Herod underſtood, he preſently came to ſuccour the Countrey, and killed moſt part of the enemies; and having taken all the Caſtles by force, he exacted an hundred Talents for a puniſhment of that revolt, to be paid by the Cities. In the mean time the Parthians being put to C flight, and Pacorus ſlain, Ventidius, in obedience to Letters from Antonius, ſent Machæra to Herod with a thouſand Horſe, and two Legions of Foot, to aſſiſt him againſt Antigonus. Antigonus writ Letters to Machæra, deſiring him to help him; and complaining that Herod had injured him, promiſed him a great ſumm of money: But he thinking it not beſt to forſake him he was ſent to ſuccour, eſpecially ſeeing that Herod would give more, would not be ſubborned by him; yet counterfeiting himſelf to be Antigonus his friend, under that pretence to diſcover what Forces he had, contrary to Herod's counſel, he went to him. But Antigonus diſtruſting his intent, kept him out of the City, and like an enemy drave him away from the Walls: Machæra aſhamed of what he had done, returned to Emmaus unto Herod; and being in a rage that things fell out a- D gainſt his expectation, he killed all the Jews he found, not reſpecting whether they favoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod hereat was moved, and purpoſed to be revenged upon Machæra, as an enemy; yet he bridled himſelf, and haſted to Antonius, to let him underſtand Machæra's cruelty: Machæra remembring how he had offended, followed the King, and with many entreaties beſought him to be reconciled, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his journey to Antonius; and hearing that he was now with a great Army beſieging Samoſata (a very ſtrong City near Euphrates) he made the more haſte; thinking it now a fit time to ſhew his affection and his courage, and that thereby he might win Antonius's favour the more. His arrival haſtned the taking of the place, which Antiochus was conſtrained to deliver; for he killed a great number of the E enemies, and had for his reward a great part of the Spoil; and Antonius, though before he admired his vertue, yet now his opinion of him encreaſed, ſo that he had a greater addition of his honour, and reaſon to hope his eſtabliſhment in the Kingdom.

F IN the mean time Herod's Affairs in Judæa went backward. He had left his Brother Joſeph Governour of all, and commanded him to attempt nothing againſt Antigonus till his return; for he little truſted to Machæra's help, becauſe of the part he had played before. But Joſeph ſeeing his Brother to be far off, regarded not what charge was left him, but went to Jericho with his own Troops, and five Companies of Horſe which Machæra ſent with him, thinking now in Harveſt time to have taken away their Corn; but being aſſaulted by the enemies upon the Mountains, and in difficult places, himſelf was there ſlain, after he had ſhewed himſelf in the fight a worthy and valiant man; and there was not one left alive of all the Roman Horſe, for they had been newly levied in Syria, and they had no old Soldiers amongſt them to aſſiſt their want of experience. G Antigonus not contented with the Victory, became ſuch a Tyrant, that having the dead bodies in his power, he cut off Joſeph's head, and cauſed his body to be ſcourged, although Pheroras his Brother offered fifty Talents to redeem the ſame entire.

Herod certified of his Brother's death in a Dream.

Herod's Dining-room fell after he had forſaken it, and gone to bed.

After Antigonus had obtained this Victory, there was ſuch a change in Galilee, that H thoſe who favoured him, took the chiefeſt of Herod's Favourites, and drowned them in a Lake. Alſo there aroſe great Commotions in Idumæa, where Machæra was repairing the Walls of a certain Caſtle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the news; for after Samoſata was taken, Antonius made Soſius Governour of Syria, leaving order with him to help Herod againſt Antigonus, and ſo he departed into Egypt. Soſius ſent two Legions with Herod into Judæa to help him, and he himſelf with the reſt of the Army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia, near Daphne, his Brother's death was ſhewed him in a Dream; and being troubled at it, he leaped out of his bed, even at the ſame inſtant that the Meſſengers who brought tidings of his death, entred into the houſe. He could not forbear ſome expreſſions of grief; but he check'd his I ſorrow, to haſten to revenge it upon his enemies with incredible ſpeed. When he came to Libanus, he took eight hundred Inhabitants of that Mountain to help him, and joyned unto them one of the Roman Legions; and not expecting the day, with them he entred into Galilee; where meeting with ſome enemies, he forced them to flee to the place from whence they came, and beſieged their Caſtle; but before he could take it, he was conſtrained by hard weather, to lead his Army into the next Village. Within a few days his number being encreaſed with another Legion which Antonius ſent, he put his enemies in ſuch fear, that in the night time they forſook the Caſtle. Then he haſted to Jericho to be revenged on thoſe that had killed his Brother; where there befel him a moſt ſtrange accident, from which being againſt all hope delivered, he perſwaded K himſelf that God bare a particular love to him: For when many Nobles that night had ſupped with him, and Supper being ended, every one was gone forth, incontinently the houſe wherein he ſupped fell down. Herod took this as a Preſage, both of the dangers, and proſperous ſucceſs he was to have in his Wars. And the next morning early he removed from thence, and about ſix thouſand of the enemies deſcending from the Mountains, charged his Vanguard; yet they durſt not joyn Battel with the Romans, but moleſted them with ſtones and darts, with which they wounded many; ſo that Herod himſelf paſſing along, was wounded in the ſide with a Dart. Antigonus deſirous to ſhew himſelf the ſtronger, as well in multitude of men, as in courage, ſent Pappus a friend of his, with ſome Forces to Samaria, with a deſign to fight L and defeat Machæra. Herod, on the other ſide, went about the enemies Countrey, and took five Towns, and deſtroyed two thouſand of the Inhabitants; and firing the houſes, returned to his Army near a Village called Cana.

Herod beheadeth Pappus, Antigonus's Captain.

Every day there came flocking to him a very great number of Jews, both from Jericho and other parts of the Countrey; ſome out of hatred to Antigonus, and others out of love of change, and an eſteem of Herod. Whilſt thus he haſted to fight, Pappus, with his men, neither fearing the multitude nor ſtrength of their enemies, came fiercely upon them, and offered Battel: Which being begun, thoſe that were not engaged againſt Herod, reſiſted a while; but Herod remembring his Brother's death, ventured more than the reſt, to the end, to be revenged upon them that were the Authors thereof, and ſo he eaſily overcame the enemies; and ſtill aſſaulting the freſh men, put them M all to flight. There was a mighty ſlaughter; for many being forced to flee into the Village from whence they came, he purſued them, and ſlew an infinite number, though all the houſes and houſe-tops were full of armed men to defend it: After he had ſlain thoſe that were abroad, he overthrew the houſes, and ſo forced them that were within to come forth. Others he killed in Companies with the ruines of the houſes wherein they were; and if any one chanced to eſcape, the Soldiers without killed them: So that the heaps of dead bodies were ſo great, that they who had the Victory, could not paſs thorough the ſtreets for them. Thoſe of the Countrey were ſo diſmayed with this overthrow, that the whole multitude of them fled away; and Herod by the benefit of N his good fortune had even then come to Jeruſalem, had not a great ſtorm hindred him, which was the only cauſe that at that time he got not a full Conqueſt, and Antigonus was not utterly overthrown; who, through fear and deſperation, was preparing to leave the City. But Herod, towards night having given his friends leave to depart to refreſh themſelves, being himſelf heated with his Armour, after the manner of Soldiers, entred into a Bath, accompanied only with one Page: And as he was there, three of his enemies that had eſcaped out of the Battel, and came to the Bath to hide themſelves; ſeeing the King there, were ſo terrified with the King's Preſence, although at that time he was naked and weaponleſs, that they thought of nothing but flight; and being no body was preſent there to ſurprize them, they eſcaped; and Herod was very O well contented that he had no harm by them. The next day he beheaded Pappus, who was the General of Antigonus his Army, and ſent his head to his Brother Pheroras, to comfort him for their common loſs; for Pappus was he that ſlew Joſeph.

A The Winter being paſt, he with his Army came to Jeruſalem, and beſieged it, pitching his Tents before the Temple, where it was eaſieſt to take the City, and where formerly Pompey had entred it. It was now the third year after Herod had been declared King at Rome. Now, when he had quartered his Army as he thought beſt for his purpoſe, and divided the Suburbs, he cauſed three Rampiers to be raiſed for Towers to be built upon them; and leaving there his truſty friends that would not ſlack their buſineſs, he went to Samaria to viſit Mariamne (the Daughter of Alexander, who was Son to Ariſtobulus) formerly (as we before made mention) eſpouſed to him: And he wedded her even in the time of the Siege, to ſhew how he contemned his enemies. After his Marriage-rites were performed, he returned to Jeruſalem with a far greater B Army: Soſius alſo ſeconded him with a great Army of Foot and Horſe, whom he ſent before him through the midſt of the Countrey, and he himſelf came after by Phœnicia. Now when all his whole Army was joyned together, to the number of about eleven Legions of Foot, and ſix thouſand Horſe, beſides the Syrians that came to help him, which were no ſmall number; he laid his Aſſault and Battery to the Northermoſt Wall. He grounded his Right upon the Decree of the Senate, whereby he was declared to be King: Soſius alſo was warranted by Antonius's Letters, whereby he commanded him to help Herod with all the Forces under his Command. Mean-while the Jews that were within the City were diverſly troubled; for the weaker ſort, gathering themſelves together about the Temple, deplored their unhappineſs, and envied C the felicity of thoſe that died before they were reduced to theſe miſeries. But thoſe who were hardieſt among them, joyning themſelves together, robbed and took away what they could, eſpecially Victuals, from thoſe places that were next the City; ſo that they neither left meat for Horſes nor Men: And the valianteſt of them all being ſet to defend the Walls againſt thoſe that beſieged them, hindred the Adverſaries from erecting their Batteries by ſome new device: Neither did they any ways prevail ſo much as by their Mines. The King ſought to repreſs the Excurſions of the Plunderers, by placing an Ambuſh of men to intercept them; and relieved the want and ſcarcity of Victuals, by fetching Proviſion from places far diſtant. But notwithſtanding they in fight failed not to expreſs incredible valour, yet did the military experience of the D Romans ſurpaſs them. A wall no ſooner began to totter, but they wrought with ſo great diligence to make another, that this was finiſhed before that was fallen. In a word, they neither ſpared hands nor Engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out to the laſt: And although they were beſieged by two ſo potent Armies, yet they defended the Town five months. But at laſt, certain of Herod's braveſt men, by a breach, entered the City, and the Romans the like on another ſide. Thoſe places neareſt the Temple were the firſt that they ſeized upon: afterwards, the whole Army entring the City, it was lamentable to ſee how in every corner the people were maſſacred; for the Romans being diſpleaſed that the Siege continued ſo long time, became more cruel; and Herod's Army endeavoured to let none of the adverſe part eſcape. E So that many were ſlain, both in the ſtreets, and in their own houſes; yea, even then alſo when they fled into the Temple, without reſpect of Age or Sex. For although the King commanded the Soldiers to ſpare the people; yet, for all that, they never reſtrained their cruel hands; but like mad men, raged againſt all, men, women and children. Antigonus, not conſidering his former condition, came and proſtrated himſelf at Soſius's feet, beſeeching him to be merciful unto him; but Soſius nothing compaſſionating his calamity, inſulted over him, and called him Antigona; yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in Priſon.

Now when Herod had conquered his enemies, he endeavoured to the utmoſt to repreſs the inſolence of his Auxiliary Strangers, who thronged to ſee the Temple, and F the Holy Veſſels that were therein; but he withheld them, not only by threatnings and entreaties, but alſo by force; believing himſelf leſs unhappy to be conquered, than by obtaining the Victory, to miniſter a means whereby thoſe things which were not lawful to be revealed, ſhould be expoſed to the eyes of prophane Strangers. He alſo reſtrained the Soldiers from ſacking the City; and told Soſius, that if the Romans would deſolate the City both of men and money, they would leave him King of a Deſart: Adding further, that he eſteemed not the Empire of the whole World, to be a recompence for ſuch a Maſſacre of his Subjects. Hereunto Soſius anſwering, that the Soldiers ought to have the ſacking of the Town, in recompence of that labour they had ſpent in the Siege: Herod replyed, that he had rather recompence them out of his G own Treaſury; and by this means he redeemed, as it were, the Relicks of his deſolate Countrey; and in the end performed that which he had promiſed, for he bountifully rewarded every Soldier and Captain, according to his merit; and gave Soſius Preſents

Herod being now King, he made a diſtinction between the Citizens; and thoſe who had favoured him he uſed very honourably, and put thoſe to death who had followed Antigonus: And when money failed, he diſtributed all his Kingly Ornaments, and ſent them to Antonius and his Company. Yet did he not quite redeem himſelf from all troubles; for Antonius being paſſionately enamoured on Cleopatra, in all things yielded to her deſire: And Cleopatra having raged ſo againſt her own Kindred, that ſhe had I not left one of them alive, now turned her fury upon ſtrangers; and accuſing the Nobility of Syria to Antonius, ſhe perſwaded him to put them to death, that ſhe might thereby the eaſier obtain their Poſſeſſions. Afterwards her covetous mind thought to effect the ſame againſt the Arabians, and the Jews alſo; inſomuch that ſhe ſecretly went about to cauſe the Kings of thoſe places, Malchus and Herod, to be put to death: An-tonius made a ſhew as though he would have granted her requeſt; yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and ſo great Kings: Notwithſtanding, he no more accounted them his friends; but took a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their Countreys, and a Vineyard in Jericho where Balm grew; and gave her all the Cities on this ſide the River Eleutherus (Tyre and Sidon only excepted.) Now, when K ſhe had obtained the Dominion of theſe Cities, ſhe followed Antonius to Euphrates, when he ſet forward to make War againſt the Parthians; and afterwards, by Apamia and Damaſcus, ſhe came into Judæa; where Herod having ſomething pacified her angry mind with great gifts, obtained to pay her yearly two hundred Talents for that part of his Countrey which Antonius had given her; and ſeeking by all means poſſible to get himſelf an intereſt in her favour, he conducted her to Peluſium. Not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Artibazes the Son of Tigranes Captive, and gave him to Cleopatra, with all the money and Priſoners that he had taken. L

Cleopatra's ſubtil Treaſon againſt Herod.

Ant. lib. 15. cap. 6.

WHen War was declared between Auguſtus and Antonius, Herod prepared himſelf to attend Antonius; ſeeing for the preſent all troubles were pacified in Judæa, and he had already gotten the Caſtle of Hircanion, which Antigonus's Siſter had in her poſſeſſion. But Cleopatra craftily prevented him in this his journey, ſo that he could M not go with Antonius: For ſhe deſiring the ruines of both the Kings (as was before mentioned) perſwaded Antonius to cauſe Herod to make War againſt the Arabians; whom if he overcame, then ſhe ſhould be made Queen of Arabia; and if himſelf were overcome, then ſhe ſhould be Queen of Judæa: Intending hereby, that one of theſe Potentates ſhould ruine the other. But this practice of hers ſucceeded greatly to Herod's advantage; for firſt of all, making head againſt thoſe of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of Cavalry he could, which was very conſiderable; and meeting them near Dioſpolis, he overcame them, though they valiantly reſiſted. After which overthrow, a mighty Army of the Arabians came to help them; ſo that an infinite company was gathered together about Cæloſyria, expecting the Jews near the City cal- N led Canatha: Where King Herod meeting them, purpoſed not to fight unadviſedly, but to compaſs his Camp round about with a Wall; but his Army, puffed up with their former Victory, would not be counſelled, but violently aſſaulted the Arabians, and at the firſt onſet put them to flight. Herod purſuing his enemies, was greatly endangered by the Treaſon of the Inhabitants of Canatha (who were ſet on by Athenio, one of Cleopatra's Captains, who had always born him ill will) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned again to Battel; and they two joyned their Forces together, and ſet upon Herod in ſtony and difficult places, and put his Army to flight, and ſlew many of them; thoſe that eſcaped fled into a little Village hard by, called Ormi-za; where the Arabians compaſſing them about, took both the men and their Tents, O with all their Furniture. Not long after this overthrow of Herod's Soldiers, he came and brought help, but too late, and to little purpoſe. The cauſe of this defeat was,

The Arabians defeat Herod's Army.

A for that the Captains of his Army would not obey his Commandment; for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to work him that injury; yet was he revenged upon the Arabians, and daily made incurſions upon their Borders, and ceaſed not to invade and ſpoil them, till by many defeats, he had cried quittance with them for their one Victory.

The year of the World, 3934 before Chriſt's Nativity, 28.

Another calamity of Herod's.

While thus he purſued his enemies, a great calamity befel him in the ſeventh year of his Reign, and in the midſt of the War between Auguſtus and Antonius; for about the beginning of the Spring, there chanced a great Earthquake, which killed an infinite multitude of beaſts, and thirty thouſand people; yet the Army had no harm, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof, the Arabians were highly encouraged: B For as report always encreaſes a miſchief, the Arabians, making account that all Judæa was deſtroyed, and that there was no man left alive to reſiſt them, entred into the Countrey, aſſuring themſelves to conquer it; having firſt ſlain the Ambaſſadours of the Jews that were ſent to them. Herod ſeeing his people terrified at the ſuddain approach of their enemies, and diſheartned with the continuance of their calamities, rowzed up their drooping ſpirits by ſpeaking to them on this wiſe: I ſee no ſuch great reaſon of your preſent fear; for though there be cauſe for you to be troubled at the evils which God's indignation makes us ſuffer, yet none but cowardly minds are daunted by the coming of their enemies, who are but men, whoſe violence, if your ſelves pleaſe, ye may repreſs. For mine own part, I am ſo far from being diſcouraged by the approach of mine enemies, C *that I rather think that God hath, by his Providence, ſent this Earthquake as a ſnare to incite the Arabians to invade us, to the end, that by our means he may puniſh them:
For the cauſe that moveth them to aſſault us, is not the truſt they repoſe in their own valour and great Army, but our miſery: Yet, who knows not that that hope is deceitful, that is not founded upon our own courage, but upon others miſ-fortunes; there is nothing aſſured in humane affairs, in reſpect either of proſperous ſucceſs, or adverſe fortune, which a man may perceive to alter upon all Occurrents, as we our ſelves can witneſs by our own experience.
For in the firſt Conflict ye were Victors, in the ſecond ye were overcome, and now the third time (ſo far as I can conjecture) they, thinking themſelves ſure of the Victory, ſhall by us be overcome. For they who miſdoubt nothing, are raſh in their proceedings; whereas they* D that are fearful and timorous, providently ſeek to prevent their dangers: ſo that I am encouraged to hope for Victory, even by your fear. For when you were too confident, and againſt my will and direction ye encountered your enemies, Athenio found opportunity to ſurprize you: But now, your prudent caution, and diſcreet moderation, is an evident token to me of aſſured Victory. It behoveth you therefore, before the Conflict, to keep this mind; but in the Conflict, ye cannot ſhew too much ardour and courage, to make our impious enemies ſee, that no calamities, whence ſoever they come, whether from Heaven or from Earth, can daunt the courage of the Jews, whilſt their breath is in their bodies: and that never a one of you will ſuffer the Arabians to domineer over your Goods and Poſſeſſions, whom many times you have almoſt made your ſlaves. Be not therefore terrified with this E motion of an inanimate thing; neither yet perſwade your ſelves, that the Earthquake portends any miſ-fortune, for even the Elements themſelves by their own nature are ſubject to ſuch defects; and portend no other miſhap, but that which they bring with them. Perhaps the Plague, and Famine, and Earthquake have ſome tokens demonſtrating them before they come; but when they are once come, they ſignifie nothing elſe; but at laſt, end and ceaſe of themſelves. But ſay we ſhould be overcome; can we ſuffer more harm than we have ſuffered by the Earthquake? On the contrary, what fear ought not our enemies to be poſſeſſed with for the crime, whereby, contrary to the Law of all Nations, they have butchered our Ambaſſadours, and offered to God ſuch a Sacrifice for the good ſucceſs of their War? Think you they can hide themſelves from the ſight of God, and from his mighty arm? or that they ſhall F not be puniſhed for their offence, if, filled with the couragious ſpirit of our Nation, we ſtir up our ſelves to revenge that impious violating the Law of all Nations; and ſo every one march on to fight, not for his Wife and Children, or Countrey, but to revenge the murther of our Ambaſſadours; who will lead our Army, and know better than we that are alive, to direct the ſame. For my own part (if you will be ruled by me) I will be the firſt that will lead you, and will hazard my ſelf for you: For you know full well, that if your valour be not prejudiced by ſome headlong raſhneſs, there is no enemy that can bear your charge.

ſent ſome Troops to ſeize upon it ; but Herod's Forces gave the repulſe, and in deſpight H of them kept the hill. There paſſed no day, but he put his Army in Battalia, and braved the Arabians ; and ſeeing they would not come to the ſhock (for they were in great fear, and Elthemus their General more than any) he aſſaulted them in their Trenches, and caſt down their Rampier, ſo that they were conſtrained to come forth to Battel without any order ; and their Horſe and Foot were confuſedly mixt together: And although the Jews were in number inferior to them, yet they were inferior to the Jews in courage ; nevertheleſs, they became now more hardy, becauſe they deſpaired of the Victory ; and ſo long as they ſtood to it, they had no great loſs ; but when they turned their backs, then many were ſlain by the Jews, and many periſhed, being trodden on by their fellows. Thoſe that eſcaped, were forced to retire into I their Camp, where Herod beſieged them ; and there was ſuch penury of water, that for drink they were all like to periſh. For which cauſe, they ſent Ambaſſadours to the King, offering him fifty Talents to let them go ; but he contemned them, and would not hear them. At length, their want of water was ſo great, that coming out by companies of their own accord, they offered themſelves to the Jews ; ſo that in this ſort there came forth four thouſand in five days, whom the Jews put in chains ; and the ſixth day the whole multitude (deſpairing of their lives) came forth to fight, with whom Herod conflicting ſlew about ſeven thouſand. So great a Defeat ſatisfied Herod's revenge, and ſo abated the pride of the Arabians, that they took him for their Protector. K

How Herod was confirmed in the peaceable Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Judæa, by Auguſtus Cæſar.

Ant. lib. 19. cap. 7.

THe joy of this proſperous ſucceſs, was ſoon abated by the news of the Victory of Auguſtus over Antonius at Actium ; and his love for the latter made him apprehend the worſt that could be imagined from the former : Yet was he more afraid than L hurt by this his ſuſpicion ; for Cæſar counted not Antonius fully conquered, ſo long as Herod kept to his Party. Wherefore, the King timely foreſeeing thoſe dangers that might enſue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Cæſar reſided ; and in the habit of a private man, without a Crown, but with a Kingly Majeſty, he preſented himſelf before him, and with great conſtancy ſpake to him in this manner : I was, O Cæſar, made King of Judæa by Antonius his means ; and I cannot deny, but that (had not the Arabians hindred me) I had, with all the Power I could have made, ſeconded and aſſiſted Antonius againſt thee : Yea, although perſonally I could not go, yet did I what I could to help him, and ſent him many thouſand Meaſures of Corn. Nay, though he had the Overthrow at Actium, yet did not I forſake him, who had deſerved well at my hands : and although I M was not able to aſſiſt him with force of Arms, yet I gave him the beſt counſel I could ; inculcating oftentimes unto him, that the only way to redreſs his affairs was, to put Cleopatra to death ; which if he would do, I promiſed him to aſſiſt him with money, Strong holds, and an Army , yea, and with mine own perſon, againſt thee : But the love of Cleopatra, and God, who had already deſigned the Empire of the World to thee, ſtopped his ears. By this means, O Cæſar, I find my ſelf conquered with Antonius, and have forſaken my Crown and Dignity with his Fortunes ; and I am come unto thee, without grounding the hope of my ſafety upon any thing but my own Vertue, and the experience which thou mayeſt make of my fidelity to my Friends. Herod having ſpoken in this manner, Cæſar anſwered : Live in ſafety, and reign now with greater ſecurity than before ; for thou deſerveſt to rule others, N who with ſuch conſtancy didſt defend and maintain thy friendſhip. Hence forward endeavour to continue faithful towards them that are more fortunate than Antonius ; for, for my part, I have conceived a great hope and expectation of thy Valour and Proweſs. I cannot blame Antonius, in that he rather hearkened to Cleopatra than to thee , ſince, by his imprudence, I have obtained thy friendſhip. That thou haſt begun to do well, it hereby appeareth, becauſe Ventidius hath ſignified unto me, that thou haſt ſent him ſuccours againſt his enemies. For which cauſe, by this my preſent Decree, be thou eſtabliſhed in thy Kingdom ; and I will ſhortly give thee ſuch proofs of my Amity, that thou ſhalt have no cauſe to bewail the loſs of Antonius. After this ſpeech, Auguſtus put the Crown upon Herod's head ; and made a Decree and ſealed it, teſtifying how he had remitted all things O done by Herod, and confirmed him in his Kingdom, and rehearſing many things greatly tending to Herod's praiſe. After that Herod had made great Preſents to Cæſar, he requeſted

A requeſted him to pardon Alexander, one of Antonius his friends; who earneſtly, and in humble manner deſired the ſame: But Cæſar being much incenſed againſt him, anſwered, that he for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended; and ſo he repelled Herod with this anſwer.

Herod's gratulation toward Cæſar.

When Cæſar travelled into Egypt through Syria, he was entertained by Herod with all Royal Pomp poſſible: And that was the firſt time that he ſhewed himſelf to take part with Cæſar, when near Ptolemais he took a view of the Soldiers with Cæſar, and made a Banquet for him and all his friends, and feaſted the whole Army. And in as much as he travelled to Peluſium thorough a dry Countrey, when they returned again, he provided water for them, and furniſhed the Army with all neceſſaries; ſo that both Cæſar
B and the Soldiers thought the Kingdom a ſmall recompence for his deſerts. For which cauſe, after he came into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, he did not only encreaſe his honour, but alſo reſtored to him that portion of his Countrey which was taken away by Antonius, and given to Cleopatra: And beſides that, Gadara, and Hippon, and Samaria, and other Cities about the Sea-coaſt; to wit, Gaza, and Anthedon, and Joppa, and Straton's Tower; and moreover, gave him four hundred Galatians, which before were Cleopatra's Guard. Nor did Cæſar's Liberality ſtop here, but to ſhew how far his eſteem of this Prince's merit proceeded, he added to his Dominion, Trachonitis, and Batanæa, and Auranitis, upon this occaſion: Zenodorus (who for money had hired the Lands of Lyſanias) continually ſent people out of Trachonitis, to C rob the people of Damaſcus; who in humble manner went to Varus (who was at that time Governour of Syria) entreating him to inform Cæſar of their calamity: Cæſar underſtanding the ſame, writ back again, commanding him to exterminate thoſe Thieves. Whereupon Varus with an Army, went to thoſe places which were moſt infeſted, and rid the Countrey of the Thieves, and confiſcated the Territory from Zenodorus: which Cæſar (leſt it ſhould again be a refuge for Thieves to ſpoil Damaſcus) gave to Herod, and made him Ruler over all Syria. Ten years after, Cæſar returning to this Countrey, commanded the Governours to do nothing without Herod's counſel: And after Zenodorus's death, he gave him all the Countrey between Trachonitis and Galilee. But that which Herod eſteemed above all the reſt was, that Cæſar loved him beſt of all next to D Agrippa; and that Agrippa loved him moſt of all men next to Cæſar. When he was arrived to this pitch of Felicity, he ſhewed the greatneſs of his Soul, by the greateſt and moſt holy enterprize that can be imagined.

Ant. lib. 15. c. 10, 12, 13, 14. Herod's Buildings.

E IN the fifteenth year of his Reign he repaired the Temple, and encloſed twice as much ground as was before about the Temple with a ſtrong Wall, whereon he beſtowed great coſts and charges to beautifie it; as the great Porches will teſtifie, which he built about the Temple, and the Caſtle on the North part thereunto adjoyning, which he built even from the foundation. The Caſtle was ſo rich and ſumptuous, that it was equal to the King's Palace; and in honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. He built himſelf alſo a Palace in the upper part of the City, and in it two very great Apartments, ſo rich and admirable, that no Temple was to be compared to them: He termed one of them Cæſarea, and the other Agrippias, in honour of Auguſtus and Agrippa. But it was not only by Palaces that he would preſerve his Name to Poſterity, and immortalize F his memory; but in the Countrey of Samaria he built a fair City with a Wall, which was about twenty ſtades in circuit, and called it Sebaſte; and he ſent thither ſix thouſand Inhabitants, giving them a moſt fertile Soil and ſundry Privileges. There alſo amongſt other Buildings, he erected a very fair Temple, and dedicated it to Cæſar. About this Temple there was a piece of ground containing three ſtades and an half. For this Teſtimony of Herod's affection, Cæſar added to his Dominion another Countrey: In gratitude for which, Herod erected another Temple of White Marble to him, near the head of Jordan, in a place called Panium, where there is a Mountain riſing very high into the air; at the ſide whereof is an obſcure Valley, where there are high Rocks, that (by ſpouts of water falling on them) are made hollow; ſo that the water, ſtanding in G their concavity till they run over, falleth down with a ſtream of ſuch a depth as is admirable. At the foot of this Valley, on the outſide, ſpring certain Fountains, which many think to be the head of the River Jordan; which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

At Jericho alſo (between the Caſtle of Cyprus, and the other ancient Palaces) he erected H other Buildings fairer and more commodious than the former, calling them after the names of Auguſtus and Agrippa. Finally, there was no convenient place in the whole Kingdom, wherein he erected not ſomething in honour of Cæſar : and having in every place of his own Kingdom deviſed and dedicated Temples unto him, in Syria alſo where he ruled he did the like ; founding in many Cites, Temples, which he called by the name of Cæſar. Aud perceiving, that amongſt the Cities of the Sea-coaſt, there was one called Straton's Tower ; which being very old and ruinated, and for the ſcituation thereof deſerving reparation and coſt, he repaired it with White Stone, and built a very Royal Palace therein ; in which work, more than in any other, he ſhewed how great and high his mind was. For this ſtands in the midſt between Dora I and Joppa, in a Coaſt where there was no Port or Haven ; ſo that they who ſail from Phænicia into Egypt, are in great danger, by reaſon of the violent Winds that blow from Africa ; whoſe blaſts enforce the water with ſuch violence againſt the Rocks on the ſhore, that the waves, rebounding back again a good way within the Sea, make the whole Sea tempeſtuous. But the King, by his liberality and coſt, overcoming nature, built Stations for Ships. And although the nature of the place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he ſo overcame all difficulty, that the Sea could do that Building no harm : And it was ſo goodly and beautiful to behold, that one would have thought there had been no difficulty in this admirable work. For having meaſured out a fit place for the Port, he laid a Foundation twenty ells deep of Stone, K whereof moſt of them were fifty foot long, nine foot thick, and ten foot broad, and ſome bigger ; and all the bottom of the Haven, where the water came, was laid with theſe ſtones. Which done, he raiſed a Mole of two hundred foot ; whereof one hundred foot ſerved to break the violence of the waves, the other hundred foot ſerved for a Foundation of the Wall, wherewith the Haven was compaſſed ; and on which were built many goodly Towers, the greateſt and faireſt whereof he called Druſius, after the name of Druſus, the Son of the Empreſs Livia, Wife of Auguſtus. Within the Port there were very many Vaults alſo, to ſtore ſuch Merchandize as was brought into the Haven ; and divers other Vaults for Sea men to lodg in. A very pleaſant Deſcent, which might ſerve for a Walk,encompaſſed the whole Port : The entrance hereunto L was on the North ſide ; for by reaſon of the ſcituation of the place, the North Wind there is the calmeſt.

Cæſarea in times paſt called the Tower of Straton.

Phaſælus's Tower.

On either ſide of the entrance were three great Coloſſes ſet on Pilaſters ; thoſe on the left hand are propped up by a Tower, being a ſolid Rock of Stone. But at the entrance on the right hand were two huge ſtones joyned together, which make a greater Tower than the other. There is alſo a houſe adjoyning to the Haven built of white Stone. The Streets of the City leading to this place, are of one bigneſs and proportion. Upon a Hill oppoſite to the mouth of the Haven, he built a Temple very beautiful, and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæſar, wherein was placed Cæſar's Statue, full as great as that of Jupiter at Olympus (for it was made after that Model) and another of Rome, like that of Juno at Argos. The City he built for the benefit of the M Inhabitants of the Province, and the Port or Haven for Commerce. All this he did in honour of Cæſar ; after whoſe name he called it Cæſarea. And that nothing might be wanting to render it worthy ſo glorious a name, he added to ſo many great works, the faireſt Market-place in the World ; beſides a Theatre, and an Amphitheatre, not inferiour to the reſt. He alſo appointed Games and Spectacles to be celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Auguſtus : And himſelf firſt began them in the 192 Olympiade ; and he propoſed great rewards, not only to the Victors, but alſo to the ſecond and third after them. Moreover, he repaired Anthedon, which was deſtroyed by the Wars, and called it Agrippina, in honour of Agrippa ; whoſe name he cauſed to be engraven N over the Portal he built to the Temple. Nether was he unmindful of his Parents ; for in the richeſt Soil of the whole Kingdom he built a City in memory of his Father, and by his name called it Antipatris, being in a very rich Soil, both for Woods and Rivers. At Jericho alſo, he built a very goodly and ſtrong Caſtle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his Mother. He likewiſe built a Tower in memory of his Brother Phaſælus, at Jeruſalem, and called it Phaſælus his Tower ; of the ſtrength and beauty of which, we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. He alſo called another City Phaſælus, which is ſcituate in a Valley beyond Jericho, towards the North.

Herodium.

Having thus eternized the memory of his Friends and Kindred, he did not forget to do the like for himſelf ; for he built a Caſtle on a Mountain near Arabia, having on one O ſide a ſtrong place of defence ; and this Caſtle he called Herodium, after his own name. By the ſame name alſo he called a Mount, ſixty ſtades from Jeruſalem, artificially made

A in manner of a woman's Dug, which he adorned on the top with round Turrets ; and round about it he built Princely houſes, gallantly adorned both within and without.
He alſo brought water from a great diſtance, with great coſt and charges ; and made a pair of ſtairs of pure White Marble, to go up, which had two hundred ſteps. For the whole Hill was made by Art, and was of an exceeding height. At the foot thereof likewiſe, he built another Palace, and houſes to receive his Friends and their Carriages ; ſo that this Caſtle, for the abundance of all neceſſary Lodgings, ſeemed a City ; and yet was all the King's Palace. Having erected thus many Buildings, he ſhewed his great mind in ſtrange Cities likewiſe ; for at Tripolis, and Damaſcus, and Ptolemais, he built publick Colledges for inſtructing Youth. He built the Wall of Byblis ; B and Seats, Porches, Temples and Markets at Berytus and Tyre : At Sidon and Damaſcus he built a Theatre ; and a Water-conduit at Laodicea, a Sea-town. At Aſcalon he built Fountains or Lakes very ſumptuous ; and Baths with Pillars, that for greatneſs and good work, were miraculous. To other places he gave Forreſts and Ports ; and to many Cities added Fields, as though they had been Fellow-cities of his Kingdom.
And to others, as to Coos, he gave Annual Revenues for ever ; to the end, they might never loſe the remembrance of the obligation they had to him. Moreover, he gave all poor people Corn ; and he often, and in ſundry places, lent the Rhodians money to build a Navy of Ships. At his own proper coſt he repaired the Temple of Apollo Pythius, which had been burnt. What ſhall I ſay of his liberality towards them C of Lycia and Samos, or his magnificent Gifts towards all the people of Jonia ? Nay, and the Athenians, Lacedemonians, Nicopolites, and the Citizens of Pergamus and Myſia, received very many benefits at his hands. He paved alſo a large Street in Antioch, of Syria, which was in length twenty ſtades, and that with fair Marble. This Street before that time was ſo full of dirt, that no man could go thorough it : And all along it he built Galleries, that people might go dry thorough it in rainy weather.

Some may ſay, that theſe benefits thus beſtowed, were for the proper uſe of thoſe people on whom he beſtowed them ; but no man can deny, but that which he did for the Citizens of Elis, was not only common to thoſe of Achaia, but to all the World, where the Games, called Olympica Certamina, were ſolemnized. For Herod ſeeing D them decay only for want of maintenance, and that this was the only remainder of all the ancient Monuments of Greece ; he, not only in his perſon at that time became one of the propoſers of rewards in that Olympiade, in which he went to Rome ; but alſo, gave a yearly ſtipend to maintain the ſame, leſt, for want, they ſhould be left off. It is not to be told what Debts and Tributes he remitted ; for he delivered the Phaſælites and Balaneotes, and other Towns of Cilicia, from the payment of a yearly Tribute: yet was he not ſo liberal to them as he would have been, fearing leſt the envy of ſome might accuſe him of ſome further meaning, if he ſhould be more bountiful to the Cities than thoſe that were the owners thereof. He exerciſed his body likewiſe in exerciſes fit for ſo valiant a mind ; for he was a very skilful hunter, wherein he had always his E purpoſe, by reaſon of his skill in riding ; ſo that in one day he killed forty Wild Beaſts.

was ſuch a Warrier, that no man was able to encounter with him ; ſo that many were aſtoniſhed to ſee him, with what force and exactneſs he caſt the Dart, and drew the Bow. Beſides the Vertue, both of his mind and body, he had alſo good Fortune ; for very ſeldom the event of War was otherwiſe than he expected ; if it ſometimes fell

For being now made King, he put away his Wife which he firſt married (a Lady wifes Uncle, (notwithſtanding that he returned out of Parthia unto him) becauſe he H ſuſpected that he intended ſome treaſon againſt him. Barzapharnes, after he had taken all Syria had carried him away priſoner with him. But his own Countreymen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiſeration redeemed him from thraldom; and had he been counſelled by them, and not come to Herod, he had not been killed: but the marriage of his Niece cauſed his death: for, for that cauſe, and eſpecially for the love of his native ſoil, he came thither. That which moved Herod to kill him was, not for that he ſought the Kingdom, but becauſe he had right to the Kingdom.

Herod had five Children by Mariamne, two Daughters and three Sons. The youngeſt was ſent to Rome to ſtudy, where he died. The other two he brought up like Princes, both for their Mothers Nobility, and for that they were born after he I was King. But that which above all was moſt prevalent in their favour, was the love he bare to Mariamne: which from day to day tormented him more violently, in ſuch ſort, that he ſeem'd inſenſible of thoſe griefs which this his beſt beloved cauſed to him. For Mariamne hated him as much as he loved her: and having a juſt cauſe and colour of diſcontent, and moreover being emboldened by the love which he bare her, ſhe every day upbraided him, with that which he had done to Hircanus her Uncle, and to her Brother Ariſtobulus. For Herod ſpared him not, although he was a Child; but after he had made him High Prieſt in the ſeventeenth year of his age, he preſently put him to death, after he had ſo honoured him: who, when he came to the Altar clothed in ſacred attire upon a Feſtival day, all the people K wept for joy; which cauſed ſo great a jealouſie in Herod, that the ſame night he ſent him to Jericho, to be drowned in a Lake by the Galatians, who had received commiſſion to perform the murther. Theſe things did Mariamne daily caſt in Herod's teeth, and upbraided both his Mother and Siſter, with very ſharp and reproachful words: yet he ſo loved her, that notwithſtanding all this, he held his peace. But the women were ſet on fire: and that they might the rather move Herod againſt her, they accuſed her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a ſhew of truth: objecting againſt her, that ſhe had ſent her picture into Egypt to Antonius; and that through immoderate luſt ſhe did what ſhe could to make her ſelf known unto him, who doted upon womens love, and was of ſufficient power to do what wrong L he pleaſed.

Hereat Herod was much moved, eſpecially for that he was jealous of her whom he loved, bethinking himſelf upon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whoſe ſake King Lyſanias, and Malichus King of Arabia were put to death; and now he meaſured not the danger by the loſs of his wife, but by his own death which he feared: For which cauſe being drawn by his affairs into the Country, he gave ſecret commandment to Joſeph, his Siſter Salomes husband (whom he knew to be truſty, and one who for affinity was his well-willer) to kill his wife Mariamne, if ſo be Antonius ſhould have killed him.
But Joſeph not maliciouſly, but ſimply to ſhew how greatly the King loved her, diſcloſed that ſecret unto her: and ſhe when Herod was returned, and amongſt other talk M with many Oaths ſware, that he never loved woman but her; Indeed (ſaid ſhe) it may well be known how greatly you love me by the commandment you gave to Joſeph, whom you charged to kill me. Herod hearing this which he thought to be ſecret, was like a mad man, and preſently perſwaded himſelf, that Joſeph would never have diſcloſed that commandment of his, except he had abuſed her; ſo that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked up and down the Palace:
whereupon his Siſter Salome having fit opportunity, confirmed his ſuſpicion of Joſeph.
For which cauſe Herod growing now raging mad with jealouſie, commanded both of them to be killed. Which being done, his wrath was ſeconded by Repentance; and after his anger ceaſed, the paſſion of love was preſently renewed: yea, ſo great was N the power of his affection, that he would not believe ſhe was dead, but ſpake unto her as though ſhe were alive, until in proceſs of time being aſcertained of her funeral, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his paſſion for her death. Mariamnes Sons ſucceeded their Mother in her hatred, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their Father as a mortal enemy, both before and after they went to ſtudy at Rome, and eſpecially after they returned again into Judea. For as they grew in years, ſo did the violence of their revenge increaſe. And being now marriageable, one of them married the Daughter of their Aunt Salome, who accuſed their Mother; the other married the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was joyned a liberty to ſpeak O more freely againſt their Father, and by this occaſion of their boldneſs many were animated to calumniate them: ſo that ſome did openly tell the King, that both his

A Sons ſought to work treaſon againſt him, and that the one of them prepared an Army to help the other, to revenge the death of their Mother; and that the other (to wit, he that was Son-in-law to Archelaus) purpoſed to flee and accuſe Herod before Cæſar. Herod giving ear to thoſe calumniations, ſent for Antipater whom he had by Doris, to the end he might defend him againſt his two Sons, and ſought to advance him above them. But they thought this alteration intolerable; ſeeing one, whoſe Mother was but a private woman, ſo preferred: and they, exalted with their own Nobleneſs of Birth, could not contain their indignation, but upon every occaſion ſhewed themſelves offended; by reaſon of which imprudence they were every day leſs accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himſelf into favour: for he B knew how to flatter his Father, and raiſed many ſlanders on his two Brethren, partly invented by himſelf, partly divulged by ſome of his Favourites, whom he ſet awork about the matter, till at laſt he put his Brethren out of all hope of having the Kingdom. For he was now by the Kings Will and teſtament declared King, ſo that he was ſent as a King to Cæſar, in a Kingly habit and pomp, only he wore no Crown: and in time he ſo prevailed, that he wrought his Mother into Mariamnes ſtead; and with flatteries and calumniations ſo moved the King, that he began to deliberate about putting his Sons to death. For which cauſe, he conducted his Son Alexander with him to Rome, and accuſed him before Cæſar, that he had given him poyſon. But he with much ado, having obtained lieve to plead his own cauſe, and that beC fore a Judge more wiſe than Herod or Antipater, he modeſtly held his peace in all things his Father had offended in: and firſt of all he cleared his Brother Ariſtobulus from that crime in which he was involved with himſelf. And afterwards he inveighed againſt Antipater's ſubtilty, and complained of thoſe injuries which had been offered him, having, beſide the equity of his cauſe, ſufficient eloquence to acquit himſelf, for he was a vehement Orator, and knew well how to perſwade. Laſt of all he objected, that his Father having a deſire to put both him and his Brother to death, had laid an accuſation upon him; whereat the whole Audience wept, and Cæſar was ſo moved, that not regarding the accuſations that were laid upon them, he preſently made Herod and them friends, upon theſe conditions, that they in all D things ſhould be obedient to their Father; and that their Father ſhould leave the Kingdom to whom he pleaſed.

A reconcilliation between Herod and his Sons.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he ſeemed to have forgiven his Sons; yet he laid not his jealouſie and ſuſpicion aſide. For Antipater ſtill perſiſted to make Herod hate his other two Sons, though for fear of him that reconciled them, he durſt not openly ſhew himſelf an enemy to them. Afterward Herod ſailed by Cilicia, and arrived at Eleuſa, where Archelaus received him very courteouſly, thanking him for the ſafety of his Son-in-law, and declaring himſelf very joyful that they were made friends: for he had writ to his friends at Rome with all ſpeed poſſible, that they ſhould be favourable to Alexander, when he came to plead his cauſe. And E after this entertainment, he conducted Herod to Zephyria, and made him a preſent of thirty talents, and ſo took his leave of him. Herod as ſoon as he came to Jeruſalem, aſſembled the people together, and in the preſence of his three ſons, he ſhewed them the cauſe of his going to Rome, and bleſſed God and thanked Cæſar, who had appeaſed the diſcord of his family, and made his Sons friends; which he eſteemed more than his Kingdom: And I (ſaith he) will make their friendſhip firm. For Cæſar *hath not only given me an abſolute power in my State, but lieve alſo to chuſe whom I pleaſe of my Sons for my Succeſſor. Herod by his words did not utterly extinguiſh the hatred between his Sons.

Antipater's treaſon againſt his Brother Alexander.

Bywhat means Antipater corrupted his Brother Alexander's friends.

Antipater whetteth Herod and his Courtiers againſt Alexander.

After he had thus ſpoken he embraced them very lovingly and diſmiſſed the people, ſome praying that it might be as he had ſaid: others (who deſired alteration) making as though they heard nothing. Yet for all this, the diſſention amongſt the K Brethren was not appeaſed, but they were more divided in heart than ever. For Alexander and Ariſtobulus could not endure that Antipater ſhould ſucceed to part of the Kingdom, and Antipater was griev'd that his Brethren ſhould have a ſhare with him; yet he ſo craftily carried himſelf, that no man could perceive his hatred towards them. And they derived of a noble race ſpake all they thought, and many endeavoured to ſet them on; and others, friends to Antipater, inſinuated themſelves into their company, to learn intelligence: ſo that Alexander could not ſpeak a word, but preſently it was carried to Antipater, and from him to Herod with an addition; ſo that when Alexander ſpake any thing ſimply, meaning no harm, it was preſently interpreted in the worſt ſence poſſible: and if he chanced at any time to ſpeak freely L of any matter, preſently it was made a great thing. Antipater ſuborned men to urge him to ſpeak, that ſo their falſe reports might be ſhadowed with a colour of truth; and that if he could prove any one thing true, all lyes and tales elſe divulged might thereby be juſtifyed. All Antipater's familiars were either naturally ſecret, or elſe he ſtopped their mouths with bribes, leſt they ſhould diſcloſe his intents: ſo that one might juſtly have termed his life a myſtery of iniquity. All Alexander's friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering ſpeeches, wherewith Antipater overcame all, and made them thieves and proditors of ſuch things as were either done or ſpoken againſt him. But of all the means he employed to ruine his Brothers with the King, the moſt crafty and powerful was, that inſtead of declaring himſelf M openly their enemy, he caus'd his confidents to accuſe them, and at firſt made ſhew of defending them, but afterwards he clos'd in with the accuſers and cunningly perſwaded Herod to credit the accuſations, which were, that Alexander was ſo deſirous of his death, as to frame plots againſt his life: and nothing made ſo much credit be given to theſe calumniations, as that Antipater colourably excuſed his brother. Herod incenſed hereat, every day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreaſed his love towards Antipater. The Nobility alſo were inclined after the ſame manner; ſome of their own inclination, and others out of compliance: ſo did Ptolemæus the chiefeſt of all the Nobility, and the Kings Brethren and all his kindred; for all mens expectation was upon Antipater. And that which N grieved Alexander the more, was, that all theſe conſpiracies deſign'd for his overthrow were made by the counſel of Antipater's Mother: for ſhe being Step-mother to him and his Brother, was the more cruel againſt them, becauſe ſhe could not endure their having the advantage above her Son of being born of ſo great a Queen. And although many followed Antipater, for the hope they had of him, yet were they alſo compelled thereunto by the King's command, who gave ſpecial charge to his deareſt friends, not to follow Alexander or his Brother. And this Prince was a terrour not only to thoſe of his own Kingdom, but alſo to foreign Nations, becauſe Cæſar had given him ſo great authority; for he gave him licenſe to take any one that was a fugitive from him, out of any City, although it were not under his Dominions. Now the young men being O ignorant of the offences laid to their charge, were in the greater danger; for their Father did not openly tell them of any matter; but they every day perceived his

A his good will towards them to decay, which ſo much the more increaſed their grief. In like manner Antipater by little and little animated Pheroras their Uncle, and Salome their Aunt, againſt them ; to whom he ſpoke with the ſame liberty as if ſhe had been his Wife.

Glaphyra, Alexander's wife, encreaſed his conceived ſuſpicion by her words.

Alexander and Ariſtobulus oftentimes bewail their Mother, and by that means provoke their Father.

The two Brothers excuſe themſelves before their Father Herod.

Moreover, Glaphyra, Alexander's Wife, contributed to the encreaſing of theſe enmities, by bearing her ſelf above all women that were in the whole Kingdom ; (for ſhe derived her Pedigree by the Father's ſide from Timenus, by the Mother's ſide from Darius, Son of Hiſtaſpes :) and by inveying very much againſt the baſeneſs of Herod's Wives ; who, ſhe ſaid, were choſen for their Beauty, and not for their Nobility of Birth. For Herod (as we have ſaid) had many Wives, as it was lawful for him by the B cuſtom of the Countrey ; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyra's Pride, and contumelious ſpeeches. Ariſtobulus alſo, made Salome his enemy, although ſhe were his Wife's Mother ; becauſe he often upbraided his Wife with her baſe Birth, ſtill telling her that he had married a private woman, and his Brother Alexander a King's Daughter. Which his Wife often with tears told to her Mother ; adding moreover, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus threatned, that if they got the Kingdom, they would make their Father's other Wives weave with their Maids ; and his other Sons Notaries of Villages, becauſe they applyed themſelves to Learning. Salome moved hereat, could not contain her ſelf, but told all to Herod ; who eaſily believed her, becauſe ſhe ſpake againſt her Son-in-law. Moreover, another accuſation was laid to their C charge, whereat the King was greatly moved ; for he was informed that Alexander and Ariſtobulus did often bewail their Mother, and lament her hard fate, and curſed him : and that often, when he beſtowed ſome of Mariamne's Cloaths upon his latter Wives, they threatned that in a ſhort time, they would make them change them for Mourning. Whereupon, though Herod feared the fierce ſpirits of the young men, yet becauſe he would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them to him as he was to go to Rome ; and as a King, threatned them in few words ; and like a Father, gave them many admonitions, and requeſted them to love their Brethren, promiſing them forgiveneſs of their former offences, ſo that hereafter they mended all. But they beſeeching him not to believe Accuſations forged againſt them upon malice, and anſwering, D that the effect of matters would eaſily acquit them ; requeſted him, not ſo eaſily to believe tales, but to refuſe malignant people opportunity and recourſe unto him ; for that there would always be ſome, that would malitiouſly invent tales to tell, whilſt there was any one that would give them the hearing and believing. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their Uncle ; and both of them much to be feared, eſpecially Pheroras ; who was fellow with his Brother of all, ſaving the Crown, and had his own Revenues amounting to an hundred Talents a year, and received all the Profits of the whole Countrey beyond Jordan, which were given him by his Brother. Herod alſo, had obtained of Cæſar to make him Tetrarch, and had beſtowed upon him for his Wife, his own Wife's Siſter ; after whoſe deceaſe he offered E him his eldeſt Daughter, and three hundred Talents with her for a Dowry : But Pheroras falling in love with a mean perſon, refuſed ſo honourable a Match ; whereat Herod being angry, married his Daughter to his Brother's Son, who was afterwards ſlain by the Parthians : Yet, after ſome time, he pardoned Pheraras's offence. Divers formerly were of opinion that in the life time of the Queen, he would have poyſoned Herod ; and Herod, although he loved his Brother very well, yet becauſe many who had acceſs unto him, told him ſo, he began to miſdoubt : And therefore, examining by Torture many that were ſuſpected, at laſt he came to ſome of Pheroras's Friends ; but none of them confeſſed the Poyſon, but only, that he was determined to flee to the Parthians with her whom he was ſo in love with, and that Coſtabarus, Salome's Huſ- F band, was privy thereunto, unto whom the King had married her, after her firſt Husband, for ſuſpicion of Adultery, was put to death. Salome her ſelf was not free from Accuſation ; for Pheroras accuſed her, that ſhe had purpoſed Matrimony with Syllæus, who was Procurator to Obodas, King of Arabia, a great enemy of the King's : And ſhe being convicted both of this, and all things elſe, whereof her Brother Pheroras accuſed her, yet obtained pardon, as likewiſe Pheroras did ; ſo that the whole Tempeſt of all the Family was turned againſt Alexander, and fell upon his head.

Alexander corrupteth his Father's Eunuchs, and telleth them he is to ſucceed in the Kingdom.

The King had three Eunuchs whom he loved extremely, and every one known by their Offices ; for one of them was his Butler, the other was his Cook, and the third waited upon him in his Bed-chamber : Theſe three Alexander with great gifts cor- G rupted. Which the King underſtanding, by torments forced them to confeſs and declare with what promiſes they were thereto by Alexander induced ; and how he had deceived them by affirming that there was no truſting to Herod, who was a moroſe old man; and that he died his hair, to make himſelf ſeem young; and that in deſpight of H him, he would be his Succeſſor; and then he would be revenged upon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and eſpecially them: And that the whole Nobility ſecretly joyned with him, and the Captains of the Army and Governours privily came to him. Hereat Herod was ſo terrified, that he durſt not preſently divulge their confeſſions, but night and day he ſent out ſpies to learn what was ſaid or done; and whom he ſuſpected, them he preſently killed; ſo that his whole Kingdom was full of Bloodſhed.

For every one, as his malice moved him, feigned Calumniations; and many deſirous of Blood-ſhed, abuſed the King's paſſion as they pleaſed againſt their enemies: Credit was given to every lie; and no man was ſo ſoon accuſed, but preſently he was puniſhed; and he who preſently before accuſed others, was now accuſed himſelf, and I carried to be puniſhed with him whom he had accuſed. For the King's jealouſy ſhortned the time of Trial for their lives; and he became ſo tyrannous, that he afforded not a good look, even to them that were not accuſed, but ſhewed himſelf moſt fierce and violent to his deareſt friends: So that he baniſhed many out of his Kingdom, and railed againſt ſuch as he had no power over. Antipater encreaſed this miſchief more and more, by employing all his friends, to accompliſh the ruine of Alexander. By whoſe rumours and tales the King was ſo poſſeſſed, that he fancied always that he ſaw Alexander before him with a drawn Sword. For which cauſe he ſuddenly caſt him in Priſon, and tortured his friends; many of which died in torments, becauſe they would not confeſs more than in conſcience was true: Others, not able to endure the torments, K were forced to confeſs, that Alexander and his Brother Ariſtobulus deſigned Treaſon againſt their Father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; reſolving with themſelves, that having killed him, they would preſently flee to Rome. Although theſe and ſuch like Calumniations were no ways probable, yet extremity of pain forced men to invent them; and the King willingly believed them, as it were comforting himſelf thereby, that he might not be thought to have impriſoned his Son unjuſtly. Alexander perceiving that it was impoſſible for him to remove his Father's ſuſpicion, thought it beſt to yield himſelf guilty: and ſo he made four Writings, wherein he confeſſed the Treaſon, and nominated his partakers therein, namely, Pheroras and Salome, who were the chief; which later he ſaid had been ſo impudently unchaſte, as to come in the night to him without his conſent, and lie in his bed. L Theſe Writings, which charged the greateſt amongſt the Nobility with moſt heinous matters, were in Herod's hands when Archelaus, fearing his Son-in-law and Daughter to be in great danger, ſpeedily came into Judæa, and by his prudence appeaſed the King's wrath: For ſo ſoon as he came to Herod, he cryed, Where is that wicked Son-in-law of mine, or where may I ſee the face of that wretch that goeth about to murther his Father, that I may tear him in pieces with mine own hands, and marry my Daughter to a better Husband? For although ſhe be not privy to his counſel, yet 'tis enough to make her infamous, that ſhe is Wife to ſuch a man. Nay, I admire your patience, who are in ſuch danger, and ſuffer Alexander yet to live: For I came thus haſtily out of Cappadocia, thinking M he had been put to death, to talk with you concerning my Daughter, whom I married to him for your ſake. Wherefore now let us take counſel what to do with them both; and ſeeing you are too Father-like, and not able to puniſh your Son, your treacherous Son; let us change rooms, and let me be in your place to revenge you. How great ſoever Herod's choler was, this diſcourſe of Archelaus diſarmed it: And Herod ſhewed him the Books that Alexander had writ: And upon reading every Chapter with deliberation, Archelaus took occaſion fit for his purpoſe; and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and thoſe that were accuſed in the Book. And perceiving the King to give ear unto him: Let us (ſaid he) conſider whether the young man hath not been circumvented by the treachery of ſo many malicious perſons, and not of himſelf, formed a deſign againſt N you: For there appears no cauſe why he ſhould fall into ſuch wickedneſs, who already enjoyed the honours of the Kingdom, and hoped to ſucceed you therein, had he not been perſwaded thereto by other men; who ſeeing him a young man, enticed him to ſuch an attempt.
For we ſee, that by ſuch perſons, not only young men, but alſo old men, and moſt Noble Families; yea, and whole Kingdoms are ruinated. Herod, upon theſe ſpeeches, began ſomewhat to relent, and abate his animoſity againſt Alexander, but encreaſed it towards Pheroras; for he was the Subject of the whole Book. Pheroras perceiving the King ſo to truſt to Archelaus's friendſhip, that he was led by him to do what he pleaſed; he in humble manner came to Archelaus, ſeeking humbly for ſuccour at his hands, of whom he had not deſerved any favour. “ Archelaus anſwered him, that he knew O “ no ways to obtain his Pardon, who was guilty of ſo heinous Crimes; and convicted, “ manifeſtly to have practiſed High Treaſon againſt the King's own Perſon; and to be A “ the cauſe of all theſe miſeries that had now befallen the young man; except that he “ would lay aſide all ſubtil dealing, and denying of his Fact, and confeſs the Crimes “ whereof he was accuſed, and ſo humbly go to his Brother, who loved him dearly, “ and crave pardon; promiſing that if he would ſo do, he would do him what good “ he could. Hereupon, Pheroras obeyed Archelaus's counſel; and putting on a black Attire, in a pitiful manner, and with tears, he proſtrated himſelf at Herod's feet; and craving pardon, obtained it; confeſſing himſelf to be a moſt wicked and vile perſon, and to be guilty of all that which was objected againſt him; and that the cauſe which moved him to do all theſe things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into, for the love of that woman. After Pheroras had thus become his own Accuſer, and a Witneſs B againſt himſelf, Archelaus endeavoured to mitigate Herod's wrath towards him, and excuſe his fault; by alledging for example, that his Brother had attempted greater matters againſt him whom notwithſtanding, for Relation's ſake, he had pardoned: Adding that in every Kingdom, as in mighty bodies, frequently ſome part begins to inflame, which notwithſtanding, is not preſently to be cut off, but to be cured by eaſie means.

“the

Pheroras, by Archelaus's means, pacifieth Herod.

Archelaus uſing many ſpeeches to Herod to this purpoſe, at laſt quite appeaſed his wrath towards Pheroras, but ſtill counterfeited himſelf angry with Alexander, affirming that he would take his Daughter away with him; till, at laſt, he brought Herod of his own accord to intercede for the young man, not to break the Marriage. C Archelaus after much entreaty anſwered, that he was willing that the King ſhould beſtow his Daughter upon any, ſave Alexander, for he greatly eſteemed his affinity. Herod replyed, that if he would not divorce his Daughter from Alexander, he ſhould think that he had beſtowed his Son upon him again: For they had no Children, and his Daughter was dearly loved by the young man; ſo that if he would permit her to ſtay ſtill there, for her ſake he would pardon all Alexander's offences. Hereto Archelaus with much ado agreed, and ſo was reconciled to his Son-in-law, and he to his Father. Yet Herod affirmed that he muſt needs be ſent to Rome, to ſpeak with Cæſar, for he had written the whole matter to Cæſar. Thus Archelaus craftily delivered his Son-in-law from danger; and after this reconciliation was made, they ſpent the time D in Feaſting and Mirth. Upon Archelaus's departure, Herod gave him ſeventy Talents, and a Throne of pure Gold, adorned with Precious Stones; and Eunuchs, and a Concubine named Panichis; and rewarded every one of his Friends according to their deſerts. And all the King's Kindred, by his appointment, beſtowed rich Gifts upon Archelaus; and both he, and all his Nobility accompanied him to Antioch.

Ant. lib. 16. cap. 11.

Not long after, there came one into Judæa far more ſubtil than Archelaus; who both diſannulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and cauſed his death alſo. This man, named Eurycles, was a Lacedemonian born; and brought to Herod rich Gifts, as it were for a bait of that he intended. He had ſo behaved himſelf in Greece, that it could no longer tolerate his exceſs: And Herod again rewarded him with far great- E er Gifts than thoſe were that he gave him: But he eſteemed his liberality as nothing, except it were accompanied with the blood of the Princes. For which cauſe he circumvented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praiſing him feignedly, and eſpecially by his own craft and ſubtilty: And quickly perceiving his inclination, he both in word and deed ſought to pleaſe him; ſo that the King accounted him among his chiefeſt friends. And both the King and all the Court honoured him the more for his Countrey-ſake, becauſe he was a Lacedemonian. But he perceiving the diſtractions of Herod's Houſe, and the hatred between the Brethren, and how the King was affected towards each of them, he firſt of all lodged at Antipater's houſe; making a ſhew, in the mean while, of good will towards Alexander; pretending, that in times F paſt he had been much beloved by King Archelaus, his Father-in-law: And by this means he quickly inſinuated into favour with him, and was conſidered as a friend, and a faithful friend. Alexander preſently likewiſe, brought him into friendſhip with Ariſtobulus; and he having gained their affections, accommodated himſelf to their humours, in order to compaſs his deſign of adhering to Antipater, and betraying Alexander. And he often uſed incenſing words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that being eldeſt of the Brethren, he ſo ſlenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him beſides the Crown which was his right. Many times likewiſe, he uſed the like words to Alexander; admiring that he who was born of a Queen, and Huſband to a Queen, would permit one deſcended of a private woman, to ſucceed in the King- G dom; eſpecially, ſeeing he had ſuch a fair opportunity and means to effect the contrary; for he might aſſure himſelf of Archelaus's help in any thing. Alexander ſuppoſed he ſpoke as he thought, becauſe he counterfeited friendſhip with Archelaus; ſo that miſdoubting nothing, he diſcloſed to him all his mind concerning Antipater, ſaying, H that it was no wonder though Herod diſ-inherited them of the Kingdom, ſince he had ſlain their Mother formerly.

Eurycles the Lacedemonian ſecretly accuſeth Alexander to his Father, and is the cauſe of his death.

Eurycles, counterfeiting pity for them, and ſorrow for their miſ-fortune; enticed Ariſtobulus to ſpeak to the like effect: And having animated them both to complain in this ſort againſt their Father, he preſently went to Antipater, and diſcloſed to him all their ſecrets, falſely adding alſo, a ſtory of ſome Treachery which thoſe two Brethren intended againſt him; which was to diſpatch him with their Swords. Antipater rewarded him with a great Summ of Money for this advice, and commended him to his Father. And thus he, being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, became himſelf their accuſer: Whereupon, he came to Herod, and told him, that I in regard of thoſe benefits he had received at his hand, he would now venture his life for him, by giving him notice of a thing which concerned his own; which was, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus had long ſince reſolved together to kill him, and that he only was the cauſe that they performed it not, by promiſing them to aſſiſt them in the matter: That Alexander uſed theſe ſpeeches, that Herod was not contented to enjoy a Kingdom which was another's right, nor yet to have put Queen Mariamne to death, but he would alſo leave the Kingdom belonging to their Anceſtors, to a pernicious Baſtard, Antipater. But for this cauſe, he would revenge Hircanus and Mariamne's death: And that it was not fit that ſuch a man as Antipater ſhould receive the Kingdom without blood: And every day, he had occaſion given him to perſiſt in this reſolution, K for he could ſpeak nothing without being calumniated; for if any mention were made at any time of any ones Nobility, preſently he was upbraided without cauſe; for his Father would preſently ſay, There is none Noble but Alexander, whoſe Father's baſe Birth is a ſhame and diſcredit unto him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his Father was offended; if he praiſed him then it was ſaid, he mocked: So that in every thing, he found his Father's affection, turned from him, and that he was only favourable to Antipater; ſo that he would die with all his heart, if he failed of his purpoſe: If he killed him, his Father-in-law Archelaus would afford him ſafety, to whom he might eaſily flee. And after, he would go to Cæſar (who, as yet, knew not Herod's manners) and he would not ſtand before him then, as he did L before, terrified becauſe his Father was preſent; neither would he only ſpeak of his own wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole Nation, who were oppreſſed by exactions, even to the death. And then he would lay open on what pleaſures, and after what ſort, the money gotten with Blood was conſumed; and who, and what kind of men they were, that were thereby enriched: and what was the cauſe of the affliction of the City: and there he would bewail the death of his Unkle, and his Mother, and unfold all Herod's wickedneſs; which being once made manifeſt to the World, no man would account him a Murtherer of his Father. Eurycles having falſly reported this of Alexander, to Herod, fell preſently to praiſe and extol Antipater; affirming that he only loved his Father, and hindred ſuch practices. M

Another falſe Accuſation of Alexander and his Brother, moves Herod to indignation. Diophantus, the King's Notary, writeth feigned Letters in Alexander's name

The King, yet not throughly appeaſed for that which was paſt, grew into exceeding fury; and Antipater again ſuborned other falſe Witneſſes againſt him, who affirmed that they were wont to have ſecret talk with Jucundus and Tyrannus, who ſometimes were Officers of the King's Cavalry, and now diſplaced for ſome offence they had committed. Whereupon, Herod being very angry, preſently tortured them: and they affirmed, that they were ignorant of all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found, and brought to the King a Letter, pretended to be written by Alexander, to the Governour of the Caſtle of Alexandrium; requeſting him, that he would receive him and his Brother Ariſtobulus into the Caſtle, when he had killed his Father; and to aſſiſt them both with Arms, and other Neceſſaries. Alexander affirmed N that this Letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the King's Secretary; who was both malicious, and could counterfeit any one's hand; and who afterwards having counterfeited many, was at laſt for the ſame put to death.

Herod cauſed the Governour of the Caſtle to be tortured, but he confeſſed nothing that was laid againſt him: and although he had no good proof of any thing, yet he commanded his two Sons to be kept in hold. He likewiſe termed Eurycles (who was the Incendiary of his houſe, and the breeder of all the miſchief) Author of his ſafety, and one who had well deſerved at his hands, and gave him fifty Talents: Who, departing from Judæa before matters were well known, went to Archelaus, and feigning that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he received there a piece of money. O From thence he went into Achaia, and ſpent that which he had evilly got, in as bad manner as he had got it. Laſtly, he was accuſed to Cæſar, that he had cauſed diſſenſion in

A in all Achaia, and ſpoiled the Cities; for which cauſe he was baniſhed. And this was the puniſhment that was inflicted upon him for his treachery to Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

The year of the World, 3956. before Chriſt's Nativity, 6.

It is not amiſs here in this place, to compare Avaratus of Cous, unto this Eurycles: who being a dear friend to Alexander, and arriving about the ſame time that Eurycles did; being put to his Oath, ſware that he heard the young men ſay nothing; though indeed his Oath nothing prevailed nor profited them, for Herod would only hear and give ear to Accuſations, and he highly eſteemed them that would believe them with him, and ſhew themſelves moved thereat.

Cous Evaratus.

Moreover, Salome encreaſed his rage againſt his Sons; for Ariſtobulus minding to B engage her to aſſiſt him, being his Mother-in-law and his Aunt, ſent to her, to look to her ſelf, as though the King was minded to put her to death, becauſe it was reported to him, that ſhe purpoſed to marry with the King's enemy, Syllæus the Arabian, to whom ſhe privily revealed the King's Secrets: This was the utter ruine of the young men, wherewith they were overthrown, as it were with a violent Tempeſt. For preſently Salome went to the King, and told him of what Ariſtobulus had admoniſhed her: And he becoming outrageous, cauſed both his Sons to be bound, and impriſoned in ſeveral places. Then he he ſent Volumnius, General of his Army, and Olympus, one of his familiar Friends, to Cæſar, to carry the Informations againſt his Sons in writing; who ſailing to Rome, after their arrival, delivered the King's Letters. And Cæſar was very ſorry C for the young men; yet he permitted the Father to do what he would to his Children; and ſo writ to him, that he ſhould have licenſe to do what he thought good: Yet he ſignified to him, that he ſhould do better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquiry concerning the Treaſons; and then, if he found them guilty of thoſe things whereof they were accuſed, to put them to death.

Hereupon Herod, according to Cæſar's direction, went to to Berytum, and there gathered an Aſſembly to ſit in Judgment; the chief in that Judgment were the Governours that Cæſar in his Letters appointed. Saturninus and Pedanius preſided, and with them Volumnius, Intendant of the Province; next the King's Kindred, and Salome and Pheroras; and then the Nobility of Syria, Archelaus only excepted; who, D becauſe he was Father-in-law to his Son, Herod ſuſpected him to be partial. But he ſuffered not his Sons to come into Judgment, for he knew that the very ſight of them would have moved all men to compaſſion: And moreover, if they were permitted to ſpeak for themſelves, that Alexander would eaſily have acquitted them both: For which cauſe they were kept in Platan, a Village of Sidonia. The King beginning his Oration, was as vehement, as though they had been preſent againſt whom he ſpake: But he was half afraid to object any Treaſon againſt them, becauſe he had no proof thereof; and therefore he aggravated their opprobrious words, injuries and offences, which they had committed againſt him, which he affirmed to be more unſufferable than death.

Herod accuſeth his Sons in open Judgment.

E At laſt (when no man contradicted him) he began to complain of their ſilence, which ſeemed to condemn him; and thereupon, requeſted every one to give their verdict. And firſt of all, Saturninus condemned his Sons, but not to die; ſaying, that he had three Sons preſent, and he could not be ſo ſevere, as to judge other men's Sons to death. The two other Delegates alſo affirmed the ſame, and ſome others followed their advice: But Volumnius was the firſt that pronounced the ſorrowful Sentence; after whom all the reſt followed; ſome to flatter Herod, ſome for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation againſt the young men. Then all Judæa and Syria expected an end of this Tragedy; yet no man thought Herod ſuch a Tyrant, as to put his two Sons to death. Herod cauſed his Sons to be brought to Tyre, and from F thence, by Ship, he conveighed them to Cæſarea, bethinking himſelf what death he ſhould put them to. In the mean time, there was an old Soldier of the King's named Tyro, who had a Son belonging to Alexander, and highly in his favour, and he himſelf greatly loved the two young men: who being very much grieved in mind at that which had paſt, went about, crying, that Juſtice was trodden under foot, Truth oppreſt, the Sentiments of Nature extinguiſhed, and the Actions of Men full of iniquity; and whatſoever elſe, grief could put into the mind of a man, who nothing eſteemed his own life. At laſt, this Tyro came boldly to the King, and ſaid unto him. O King, thou ſeemeſt to me moſt unhappy, who giveſt credit to wicked and vile perſons, againſt thy deareſt Sons; for Pheroras and Salome thou believeſt before thine own Children, whom, G notwithſtanding, thou haſt often found to have deſerved death; and thou perceiveſt not that they do this, to the intent to make thee want lawful Succeſſors, and leave thee none but Antipater, whom in their hearts they would have King, becauſe they can rule him as they liſt. But bethink thy ſelf (O King) how all thy Soldiers will hate him for the death of H his two Brethren; for there is no man that doth not pity the two young men, and many of the Nobility are diſpleaſed hereat. After he had ſpoken this, he named them who were diſpleaſed: Whereupon, the King commanded them, and him, and his Son to be laid hold on: And preſently one of the King's Barbers, named Tryphon, ſhewing himſelf to be in I know not what fury, came forth, and ſaid to Herod: Tyro perſwaded me to kill thee with my Razor; promiſing me, that if I would ſo do, Alexander would give me a great reward. Herod hearing this, cauſed Tyro, and his Son, and the Barber, to be tortured; the two former denied all, and the Barber affirmed nothing more than he had already ſaid. Then he commanded Tyro to be more tormented; whereupon, his Son, moved with compaſſion towards his Father, promiſed to diſcloſe all I the matter to the King, if he would pardon his Father: and being releaſed of his torments, preſently declared that his Father, through Alexander's means and procurement, was purpoſed to have killed him. Many that were preſent thought it was a device of the young man, to free his Father from torments; but others were perſwaded that it was true. Upon this, Herod made a ſpeech unto the people, wherein he inveighed againſt the Officers of his Army, and Tyro, and made the people arm themſelves, and kill them with ſtaves and ſtones. After which, he ſent his Sons to Sebaſte, which was not far from Cæſarea, and there he cauſed them to be ſtrangled; and having quickly diſpatched the matter, he ordered them to be brought to the Caſtle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their Mother's Uncle. And this was the K end of Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

Of Antipater*'s Conſpiracy againſt his Father* Herod.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 11.

Antipater ſtriveth by Gifts and Bribes, to creep into men's favours.

A*Ntipater* now hoped without all controverſie to ſucceed in the Kingdom, but he became generally hated of the whole Nation; for it was openly known, that he, by falſe calumniations, had cauſed his Brethren's death. And on the other ſide, L he ſtood in no little fear of their Children, whom he perceived to begin to grow to years: For Alexander had by Glaphyra two Sons, Tygranes and Alexander: and Ariſtobulus had by Bernice, Daughter to Salome, five Children; to wit, three Sons, Herod, Agrippa and Ariſtobulus; and two Daughters, Herodias and Mariamne. Herod, after he had put Alexander to death, ſent away Glaphyra with her Dowry into Cappadocia; and married Bernice, Ariſtobulus's Wife, to Antipater's Uncle; for Antipater had deviſed this Match to become friends with Salome, whom before he hated and envied.
He alſo, by his great Gifts, ſought to get Pheroras's favour, and the Friendſhip of ſuch as were Friends to Cæſar, ſending to that end great ſumms of money to Rome. He gave Saturninus, and all the reſt, great Riches in Syria. But the more he M gave, the more he was hated of all men; for every one conſidered his Preſents, not as proofs of his Liberality, but as effects of his Fear; ſo that he got not the love of them, upon whom he beſtowed them; and they to whom he gave nothing, were ſo much the more his enemies. Yet he continued his bounty rather than diminiſhed it, when he ſaw, againſt his expectation, Herod made much of theſe Orphans, whoſe Parents he had ſlain. Intending to ſhew how much he repented their deaths, by the pity and compaſſion he took of their Children. For aſſembling together his friends, he cauſed the Children to be placed by him; and the tears ſtanding in his eyes, he ſaid, Since my ill Fortune hath taken away from me the Fathers of theſe Children, there is no care ſo great, which Nature, and my compaſſion of their preſent condition, obligeth me not to N take of them. Wherefore I will endeavour, that ſeeing I have been a moſt unfortunate Father, I may be a moſt affectionate Grand-father; and leave them who are moſt dear unto me, to reign after me. In order whereunto Brother Pheroras (ſaid he) I betroth your Daughter to Alexander*'s eldeſt Son, to the end, that this Alliance may oblige you to ſerve* in ſtead of a Father to him: and to your Son, Antipater, (ſaid he) I aſſure the Daughter of Ariſtobulus, that ſo you may be the ſame to her; and my Son Herod, Grand-ſon by his Mother to Simon the High Prieſt, ſhall marry her Siſter. This is my will and pleaſure, touching this matter, and let no man who loveth me ſeek to alter it. And I beſeech Almighty God to proſper theſe Marriages to the good of my Countrey, and of theſe my Nephews; and to look upon theſe Children with a more favourable eye than he did upon their Fathers. O Having thus ſpoken, he wept, and joyned the Children's hands, and courteouſly ſaluting every one, diſmiſſed the Council.

Herod grievouſly bemoneth his Sons, expreſſing the ſame by his commiſſeration towards their Children. Herod betrotheth his Nephews.

At

A At this action Antipater was ſo amazed, that all the Orphans well perceived it. For now he thought himſelf diſhonoured by his Father, and that he ſtood in great danger, ſeing that Alexander's Son was like to have both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrach to protect him. Moreover, he conſidered how he was hated, and how the people compaſſionated the children that were fatherleſs; and look'd upon him as the murtherer of their fathers. Wherefore he reſolved by all means poſſible to break theſe Marriages. Yet he feared to inſinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very ſuſpicious and miſtruſtful; and therefore went openly unto him to make his humble ſute and requeſt to him, that he would not leave him without honour, nor deprive him of that Succeſſion, which before he had judged him worthy B of, by giving him only the bare Title of King, and leaving the authority of the Kingdom in other mens power. For it would be impoſſible for him to obtain the Kingdom, if Alexander's Son were (beſides Archelaus his favour) made Son-in-law to Pheroras. Wherefore he earneſtly pray'd him, that ſeing he had many daughters, he would change theſe Mariages: for the King had nine Wives, and by ſeven of them he had children; Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamne daughter of Simon the High Prieſt, Archelaus by Malthace the Samaritan, and a Daughter call'd Olympias, whom his brother Joſeph married: and by Cleopatra of Jeruſalem, Herod and Philip, and by Pallas, Phaſelus; he had two other Daughters alſo, Roxane and Salome; one of them by Phædra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewiſe two wives, by whom C he had no iſſue, his Couſin and Niece; and beſide theſe he had two Daughters by Mariamne, Siſters to Alexander and Ariſtobulus. Wherefore Antipater ſeeing his Father had ſuch choice of Daughters, requeſted the marriages to be altered.

Herod's children by his ſeven wives.

The King, well perceiving his mind and purpoſe towards the Orphans, and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his Sons, whom he had put to death, he judg'd that if ever he found occaſion, he would be as induſtrious to deſtroy the children by calumnies, as he had done their fathers; and ſo falling into great anger with ſharp words he drove him out of his preſence; yet afterward, he ſo flattered Herod, that he got the marriages to be altered. And firſt of all he joyned Ariſtobulus's Daughter with Antipater himſelf, and his Son to Pheroras's Daughter. Here one may ſee what D Antipater could do by flattering ſpeeches: for Salome in the like matter could not ſpeed, although ſhe was his Siſter, and procured many times the Emperours Wife to ſpeak for her, that ſhe might marry with Syllæus the Arabian, yet was ſhe not permitted ſo to do. But Herod ſwore that he would account her as an utter enemy, except ſhe would deſiſt from that purpoſe; and afterward, againſt her will, he married her to Alexas, a friend of his; and one of her Daughters to Alexander's ſon, and the other to Antipater's maternal Uncle.

Herod is perſwaded by Antipater's flatteries to break off the marriages.

As for Mariamnes Daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his Siſters Son, the other to Phaſælus, his Brother's Son. When Antipater had quite overthrown the hope of the Orphans, and joyned affinity as he thought good, he now held himſelf on E ſure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, he became intolerable to all men. And ſeing he could not avoid their hatred, he now ſought by fear to work his own ſafety; and ſo much the more, becauſe Pheroras now aſſiſted him, as one that was confirmed and eſtabliſhed for King. Alſo the women in the Court fell at variance, and raiſed a new broil: for Pheroras's Wife with her Mother and her Siſter, and the mother of Antipater did behave themſelves very inſolently in many things, towards two of the Kings daughters; of which Antipater, who hated them, was very glad, none of the other women except Salome daring to oppoſe this Cabal. But Salome went to the King, and told him that their meetings were not for his ſervice.

Ant. l. 17. c. 3. Antipater buildeth upon the Kingdom.

A debate betwixt the Ladies in the Court.

F The women underſtanding how ſhe had informed the King, and that he was offended thereat, they met no more together openly, but abſtained from their wonted familiarity; and in the Kings hearing feigned to fall out one with another. Antipater alſo made the ſame ſhew, ſo that he ſtuck not openly to affront Pheroras: notwithſtanding they had meetings and banquets in the night; and the unity was the more confirmed, the more they perceived themſelves to be noted; for Salome knew all this and told it to the King. The King was very angry, and eſpecially againſt Pheroras's wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and having called together all his kindred and friends, he accuſed her before them amongſt other things, that ſhe had behaved her ſelf contumeliouſly towards his daughters, and that ſhe aſſiſted the Phariſees G againſt him, and that by a poyſonous drink ſhe had made his Brother hate him. And turning himſelf unto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather renounce the friendſhip of him his King and Brother, or abandon his Wife. And he anſwering, that he had rather die than loſe his Wife; Herod doubtful what to do, turned him to H Antipater, and commanded him to have no commerce with Pheroras, or his wife, or any one belonging to them after that time. He obeyed this command openly in ſhew, but ſecretly went to their houſe: and fearing that Salome might perceive it, he by his friends in Italy procured himſelf to be ſent for to Rome, by Letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that ſhortly after the receit thereof, Antipater ſhould be ſent to Cæſar. Wherefore Herod uſing no delay, ſent him preſently, furniſhing him with all things neceſſary, and a great ſum of money; giving him likewiſe his laſt Will and Teſtament to carry with him to Cæſar; wherein was written that Antipater ſhould be King, and after him Herod, the Son of Mariamne, Daughter of the High Prieſt. But Syllæus the Arabian, neglecting Cæſar's commandment, at I the ſame time ſailed to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controverſie between him and Nicholaus. He had alſo a great contention with Aretas his King, whoſe friends he had ſlain, and amongſt others, Sohemus, the moſt wealthy man in all the Country of Petra; and Fabatus, Cæſar's Procurator, whom he had corrupted, aſſiſted him againſt Herod. But Herod afterwards giving Fabatus a greater ſum of money, alienated him from Syllæus, and by this means diſpatched that which Cæſar commanded: and becauſe Fabatus reſtored nothing, he accuſed him that he was Procurator, not for Cæſar but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moved; and being as yet in great eſtimation with Herod, he diſcloſed Syllæus's his ſecrets, and ſignified to the King, how that Syllæus had corrupted Corinthus K one of his Guard, whom he adviſed to be taken and kept in hold. The King more eaſily hearkned to his counſel, becauſe Corinthus, though always brought up in the Kings Court, yet was born in Arabia. Wherefore he preſently took him, and two other Arabians that were found with him; one of them was Syllæus's friend, and the other Phylarchus. Upon their examination they confeſſed, that Corinthus for a great ſum of money was hired to kill the King. After this they were ſent to Saturnius, Governour of Syria, and by him to Rome.

How Herod ſhould have been poyſoned, and how the treaſon was diſcovered.

Herod baniſheth his Brother Pheroras and his wife.

Herod ſtill urged Pheroras to forſake his Wife: for he knew not how elſe to puniſh her, having many matters againſt her: which becauſe he would not yield to, at laſt he was ſo moved, that he baniſh'd them both. Pheroras taking this injury patiently, departed to his Tetrarchy, taking an Oath that his baniſhment ſhould endure as long as Herod lived; and that whileſt he lived, he would never come any more to him: And accordingly he would not come to viſit him when he was ſick, notwithſtanding he was often ſent for, when (as he thought) he lay on his death- M bed, and would gladly have imparted ſomething to him: but contrary to all hope he recovered, and afterwards Pheroras fell ſick. At which time Herod ſhewed his patient and humble mind; for he went to him, and very kindly ſought help for him; but he was too far ſpent, and a few days after died: and although Herod loved him until his dying day, yet was it bruted abroad, that he poyſoned him. Herod cauſed his body to be brought to Jeruſalem, and commanded all the Nation to mourn and buried him with a ſumptuous funeral. Thus one of the Murtherers of Alexander and Ariſtobulus came to this end: but ſhortly after, the revenge of that wicked fact fell upon Antipater, who was the chief Author thereof. For certain freed men that belonged to Pheroras came in mournful manner to Herod, and complained to him, that N his Brother Pheroras was poyſoned, and that his own Wife had given him a drink, which as ſoon as he had drunk, he preſently fell ſick; that two days before his ſickneſs, there came a Witch out of Arabia, ſent for by his Mother and Siſter, to give him a Love-potion; and that ſhee in ſtead thereof, through Syllæus's inducements, had given him poyſon; for ſhe was of Syllæus's acquaintance.

The confeſſion of the women in their tortures.

The King moved with this diſcourſe cauſed divers of Pheroras freed men and freed women to be put to torture; and one of them impatient of the pain, exclaimed in this wiſe: O God, ruler of heaven and earth, revenge us upon Antipater's Mother, who is the cauſe of theſe our evils. When the King underſtood thus much, he became more eager to ſearch out the truth; and the woman diſcloſed Antipater's O Mothers intelligence with Pheroras and the other women, and their ſecret meetings; and that when Pheroras and Antipater came from the Palace, they uſed to ſpend

A ſpend all the night in feaſting, not ſuffering any ſervant or domeſtick to be in the room with them; and one of the Libertines wives reveiled this. And when every one of the women were tortured apart all their examinations agreed; ſo that now it was evident wherefore Antipater had complotted to go to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the River Jordan. For they were often wont to ſay, that Herod having killed Alexander and Ariſtobulus, would next come to us and our wives: and that it was unlike that he would ſpare any one, who ſpared not Mariamne and her Sons; and therefore it was beſt to flee as far as poſſible from ſuch a wild beaſt. They alſo depos'd that Antipater was often wont to complain to his Mother, that now he grew gray-haired, his Father became young and luſty; that himſelf might die perhaps B before him, and that though his Father died firſt, yet he ſhould enjoy the pleaſure of the Kingdom but a ſhort time. That moreover, the heads of Hydra, that is to ſay, Alexander and Ariſtobulus's Sons, began to ſpring up again: and that he could not reaſonably hope to leave the Kingdom to his Sons, ſince Herod had declar'd that he would have it go after him to Herod the Son of Mariamne: wherein he was perſwaded that he doated, if ſo be he thought his Will ſhould be of force; for he would take ſuch an order, that he would have none of all his Progeny alive; and that Herod was the greateſt hater of his Sons of any Father in the World: and was not therewithal contented, but he alſo hated his own Brethren. A proof whereof was, that he not long ago gave him a hundred talents, that he ſhould have no more C commerce with Pheroras: and that when Pheroras asked wherein he had hurt him, Antipater anſwered, I would to God that he would take away all from us to our ſhirts, and leave us only our lives; but ſaid he, it is impoſſible to eſcape this dangerous Beaſt, who will not not ſuffer men openly to ſhew friendſhip to one another.
Thus we are reduc'd to that paſs that we cannot meet but in ſecret: yet if we bear the hearts and hands of men, the time will be when we may talk and meet openly.
The women in torments diſcloſed theſe ſpeeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with the reſt to Petra. Herod believed all theſe ſayings, and the rather becauſe of that which was ſaid concerning the hundred talents: For he ſaid nothing of the ſame to any one, but to Antipater.

Doris, Antipaters Mother is ſpoiled of her Jewels, and thruſt out of the Palace.

D Now firſt of all he turn'd his fury upon Doris, Antipater's Mother: and taking from her all the Jewels which he had beſtowed upon her, of the value of many talents, he baniſh'd her. When his wrath was ſomewhat appeaſed, he releaſed Pheroras's women from torments; yet he became ſo prone to ſuſpicion, that he tortured many that were innocent, leſt he ſhould let any eſcape that were guilty. Amongſt others Antipater the Samaritan, who was Steward to his Son Antipater, through torments confeſſed, that his Son Antipater had procured poyſon out of Egypt to kill him, by means of a friend of Antiphilus; which poyſon Theudion, Antipater's Uncle took of him, and delivered to Pheroras, whom Antipater charged to diſpatch Herod whilſt he was at Rome, far from ſuſpicion; and that Pheroras gave his Wife the poyſon to E keep. Whereupon the King calling for her, commanded her to bring forth the poyſon: and ſhe, making as though ſhe went forth to fetch it, caſt her ſelf headlong down from a Gallery, thereby to prevent the torments which, if ſhe were convicted, they would inflict upon her. But by the providence of God (as it ſhould ſeem) it came to paſs that ſhe fell not on her head, but on her ſide, and ſo eſcaped death, to the end that God might inflict puniſhment upon Antipater. And being brought to the King, as ſoon as ſhe was come to her ſelf (for ſhe was amazed with the fall) the King demanded of her, wherefore ſhe had done ſo, and ſwore unto her, if that ſhe would truly diſcloſe all, he would pardon her; but if ſhe told an untruth, her body ſhould be torn in pieces with torment, and not be buried. She a while held her F peace, and at laſt ſaid, Wherefore ſhould I keep any thing ſecret, ſeeing Pheroras is dead, to ſave Antipater, who hath cauſed all this miſchief? Hear O King, and God, who cannot be deceived, be witneſs of the truth of what I ſhall ſay: When I ſate weeping by Pheroras as he lay a dying, he called me to him, and ſaid, See, wife, how much I was deceived concerning my Brothers love towards me; for I hated and ſought to kill him, who thus loveth me, and ſorroweth ſo much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truly I am juſtly rewarded for my iniquity. And now (wife) bring me hither the poyſon which was left by Antipater in your keeping for my Brother, and make it away before my face, that I carry not with me to Hell a guilty Conſcience for that crime. So I brought it as he deſired me, and the moſt part of G it I caſt into the fire, where it was conſumed, and kept a little thereof, for fear of miſchances, and of you. And having thus ſaid, ſhe brought forth a box which had in it a very little of the poyſon. Hereupon the King tortured the brother and mother of Antiphilus; and they alſo confeſſed that Antiphilus had brought a box out of Egypt, H and that he received it from his brother, who practiſed Phyſick at Alexandria. Thus it ſeem'd that the Ghoſts of Alexander and Ariſtobulus went about the whole Kingdom, to diſcover the moſt hidden things, and to draw teſtimonies and proofs from the mouths of thoſe that were furtheſt from all ſuſpicion. For the Brothers of Mariamne, daughter of Simon the High Prieſt, being put to the rack, confeſs'd that ſhe was acquainted with this conſpiracy. Wherefore the King puniſh'd the mothers fault upon her child: for having writ in his Will, that Herod her ſon ſhould ſucceed Antipater in the Kingdom, now for her fault, he raz'd him out.

CHAP. XX.

How Antipaters malicious practices againſt Herod, were diſcover'd and puniſh'd.

Antipater's treaſons againſt Archelaus and Philip his brothers.

Antipater giveth a great ſum of money to thoſe that counterfeit letters againſt his Brothers.

THe arrival of Bathyllus was the laſt proof of Antipater's Crime, and confirm'd all the reſt. This Bathyllus was one of his freed men, and brought from Rome another ſort of poyſon, compos'd of that of Aſps and other Serpents; to the end that if the firſt proved too weak, and took not effect, then Pheroras and his wife might make an end of the King with this. And for the height of Antipater's wickedneſs, he alſo had given this man Letters, which he had written to Herod againſt K Archelaus and Philip his Brethren, who were at that time brought up at Rome to ſtudy, being very hopeful young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be ſome hindrance to him in that which he expected, he deviſ'd all means poſſible to make them away. And the better to effect this purpoſe, he counterfeited Letters in his friends name that were at Rome, and for money got others to write, that theſe two young men uſed in taunting wiſe to rail againſt their Father, and openly to complain of the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus: and that they took it ill that they were ſent for home (for their Father had ſent word that they ſhould come away) at which alſo Antipater was much troubled. For before his departure from Judæa to Rome, he procured ſuch like Letters to be forged againſt them at Rome; L and ſo delivering them to his Father, to avoid all ſuſpicion, he ſeemed to excuſe his Brethren; affirming ſomethings that were written to be lyes, other things to be offences whereunto young men were prone. At the ſame time he gave great ſums of money to them in whoſe name he had written the Letters againſt his Brethren: hereby as it were hiring them to be ſecret. For the concealment of which ſubornation from Herod's knowledge, he bought much rich Houſholdſtuff and Tapiſtry of curious work, and Plate, and many things more, amounting by his account to the ſum of two hundred Talents, which he pretended was to be employed in preſents in proſecuting the buſineſs againſt Syllæus. But the miſchief which he provided againſt was inconſiderable in compariſon of thoſe which he had more reaſon to fear; M and it cannot be ſufficiently admired, that though all thoſe that had been tortured gave evidence againſt him, how that he practiſed his Fathers death, and the Letters witneſſed how again he went about to make away other two of his Brethren; yet for all this, none of them who went out of Judea to Rome, bare him ſo much good will as to give him intelligence what troubles were in the Court at home, although it was ſeven months before he return'd to Judæa from Rome. Peradventure they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace, by conſideration of the blood of Alexander and Ariſtobulus which cried for vengeance againſt him.

Ant. lib. 18. cap. 8. Antipater is ſollicited by Herod with many kind words to haſten his return

At laſt he ſent Letters from Rome to his Father, that now he would ſhortly return home, and that Cæſar had treated him very honourably. The King deſired greatly N to have the Traytor in his power: and fearing that if he had inkling of matters he would look to himſelf, feigned great kindneſs towards him, and ſent back again unto him very loving Letters, willing him to haſten his return: which if he did, poſſibly he might obtain pardon for his Mothers offence: for Antipater had underſtood that ſhe was baniſhed.

Antipater received a Letter at Tarentum, whereby he underſtood the death of Pheroras, and greatly lamented it; which divers that knew nothing thought well of.
Yet as far as one may conjecture, the cauſe of his grief was, that his treaſon had not gone forward as he wiſhed, and that he feared leſt that which had paſſed might come to light, and leſt the poyſon ſhould be found. Yet when he came to Cilicia, O and there received his Fathers Letters before mentioned, he then made great haſte homeward. When he came to Celenderis, he began to reflect more upon his Mothers diſgrace,

A diſgrace, his mind as it were preſaging ſome ſiniſter fortune. And the wiſer ſort of his friends about him, counſelled him not to go to his Father, till ſuch time as he were certain for what cauſe his Mother was baniſhed and divorced. For it was to be feared, that he would be accuſed alſo of the ſame Crime that was laid to his Mothers charge. But the more imprudent being rather deſirous to ſee their Country, than to contrive what was expedient for Antipater, preſſed him to make haſte, leſt his long delay ſhould breed any ſuſpicion in his Father, and leſt thereby he ſhould give occaſion to malignant people to raiſe ſlanders: For, ſaid they, if any thing had paſſed againſt you, it was in your abſence; and were you in preſence no man durſt do or ſpeak againſt you; and it were a very unwiſe part, for uncertain ſuſpicions, B to deprive himſelf of certain felicity, and not to return ſpeedily to his Father, and receive a Crown from his hands, which he could place upon no other head but his. This counſel (as his ill fortune would have it) Antipater followed, and ſo arrived in the in the Haven of Cæſarea, having paſſed Sebaſte; where contrary to his expectation, he was much ſurpriz'd that all men eſchewed his company, and no man came near him. For although he was always hated, yet before they durſt not ſhew their hatred. But now they abſtained from coming to him for fear of the King; becauſe the rumour of thoſe things which Antipater had done was known in every City, and to every man, only Antipater himſelf was ignorant thereof. For there was never any man brought thither with greater pomp than he, when he was to ſail to Rome; C and never man more baſely entertained at his return. And now apprehending the danger at home, he craftily made himſelf ignorant thereof; and notwithſtanding that he was almoſt dead for fear, yet in his countenance he counterfeited confidence.
For he could not now poſſibly make any eſcape, nor rid himſelf out of the preſent danger: and yet he heard no certain news of matters at Court, becauſe the King by an Edict had forbidden all men to give him notice thereof: So that many times he comforted himſelf thus; that either all matters concerning him were yet ſecret; or if any thing was come to light, that he by policy and impudence could acquit himſelf thereof; for thoſe two were his only weapons. Being thus determined, he went to the Kings Palace alone, without any of his friends and followers, who at the very D firſt gate were moſt contumeliouſly repulſed. By chance Varus the Ruler of Syria was there; and then boldly going into his Father's preſence, he advanced boldly near him, to ſalute him. But Herod putting him back with his hands, and ſhaking his head, cried out, What thou that haſt attempted to murther thy Father, dareſt thou yet preſume to offer to embrace me, being guilty of ſo many treaſons! Mayeſt thou periſh, wretch, as thy crimes deſerve. Come not near me till thou haſt cleared thy ſelf of all that is laid to thy charge; for thou ſhalt have Juſtice, and Varus ſhall be thy Judge, who is by good fortune now here. Go and premeditate how to acquit thee againſt to morrow, which is all the time I will give thee to do it.

Antipater's entertainment at his Fathers hands.

Hereat Antipater was ſo aſtoniſhed with fear, that he was not able to reply any E thing, but ſilently went away. Preſently his Mother and his Wife came to him and told him all the proofs of treaſons againſt him; then he conſidered with himſelf how to anſwer every point. The next day the King called an aſſembly of his friends and kindred, and to them admitted Antipater's friends: and he and Varus ſitting in judgment, commanded all proofs to brought, and the witneſſes to appear: amongſt whom were certain of Antipater's Mothers ſervants lately apprehended, who had Letters from her to carry to him, to this effect: Foraſmuch as all things are known to thy Father, beware that thou return not unto him, before thou haſt obtained ſome warrant of thy ſafety from Cæſar. Theſe and others being brought in, Antipater alſo came in after them, and proſtrating himſelf before his Fathers feet, he ſaid, I beſeech you, F Sir, bear no prejudicate opinion againſt me, and lend me an open ear, whileſt I purge my ſelf: for if you pleaſe to give me lieve, I will prove my ſelf guiltleſs. Herod commanding him to hold his tongue, ſpake thus unto Varus: I know well, Varus, that you, or any other juſt and indifferent Judge, will find Antipater *to have deſerved death: But I

Herod loved Antipater above the reſt, and beſtowed many benefits on him.

hath attempted to make himſelf King, no other way but by murthering his Father. For H which I know no other reaſon, but that I called him out of the Country, where he lived abſcurely; and caſting off thoſe Sons whom I had begotten of a great Queen, appointed this to be heir of my Kingdom. I confeſs my error, that I incited them againſt me, by having for Antipater's ſake deprived them of their right. For wherein had I ſo well deſerved of them, as of Antipater? unto whom, during my life-time, I committed the ſway and rule of my Kingdom, and openly in my Will and Teſtament declared him my ſucceſſor: Beſides other gratifications, I beſtowed upon him the yearly revenue of fifty Talents. And lately when he was to ſail to Rome, I gave him three hundred Talents, and commended him to Cæſar, as the only Son of all my houſe, who had regard to his Fathers life. And what was the offence of the others compared with Antipaters? what proofs were produced I againſt them, equal to thoſe that have ſhewed me more clearly than the day the conſpiracy framed againſt me by this moſt wicked and ingrateful of all men? and is it now to be endured that he is ſo impudent as to dare to open his mouth, in hope to colour all again with craft and deceit. Beware, Varus, that he deceive you not: for I know this beaſt, and I even now ſee by his feigned tears, how probable a tale he will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whilſt Alexander lived, I ſhould beware of him, and not put every one in truſt with my perſon: This is he who was wont to go before me into my bed-chamber, and look about in every corner, leſt any ſhould have lien in wait to have attempted any treaſon againſt me: This is he who watched by me in my ſleep, and in whom I thought my ſelf ſecure; who comforted me when I mourned for them that were put to death. This is he K who gave me good or ill characters of his Brethren when they were alive. This was my defender and champion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and ſubtilties, and all his counterfeitings, I wonder that I am yet alive, and how I eſcaped the hand of ſuch a traitor. And ſeeing that fortune ſtirs up thoſe of mine own houſe againſt me, and that thoſe that I moſt eſteem are my greateſt enemies, I will bewail my hard fortune alone; and not one that hath thirſted after my blood ſhall eſcape, although proof be brought againſt every one of my children. Thus, his heart being ſurcharged with ſorrow, he was forced to break off his ſpeech: and preſently he commanded Nicolas, one of his friends, to report all the proofs and evidences.

Antipater's anſwer, and excuſe.

All this while Antipater lay proſtrate at his Fathers feet; but now lifting up his L head, he addreſs'd to him and ſaid: You Sir your ſelf made my Apology: For how can he paſs for a Parricide, who, as your ſelf confeſs, always watcht to preſerve you from all dangers? Which if you ſay I did feignedly, is it probable that I would be ſo circumſpect in other affairs and at other times, and now in ſo weighty a matter play the part of a ſenſleſs man? How could I think that ſuch a deſign, though kept ſecret from men, could be hidden from God, who ſeeth all things? Was I ignorant what befel my Brethren, whom God ſo puniſh'd for their wicked conſpiracy againſt you? Or what ſhould cauſe me to aim at their life? The hope of the Kingdom? I poſſeſs'd it already: Or a ſuſpicion of your hatred towards me? I knew you loved me paſſionately: Or any fear which I had of you? On the contrary, I rendred you formidable to others by the care I took of your preſervation. M Was it want of money? Nothing leſs; for who might ſpend more than I? Truly if I had been the wickedeſt perſon in the World, or the cruelleſt beaſt upon earth, yet I ſhould have relented, being overcome by the benefits of ſo loving a Father; ſeing, as your ſelf ſaid, you recall'd and prefer'd me before ſo many Sons, and being yet alive you proclaim'd me King, and made me a ſpectacle to all men to envie, through the benefits you beſtowed upon me. O wretch that I am! O unhappy time of my abſence out of my Countrie! what an opportunity hath it given to malicious and calumniating people! Yet, O Father, it was for your ſake, and about your affairs that I went to Rome, to the end that Syllæus might not triumph over your old age. Rome can witneſs my piety, and Cæſar the Prince of the whole world, who often called me a lover of my Father. Receive here, O Father, his Letters, far more N credible than thoſe feigned calumniations againſt me: let theſe plead my cauſe, let theſe teſtifie my affection towards you: remember how unwilling I was to go to Rome, knowing I had here in this Country many ſecret enemies. Thus you unwarily have been the cauſe of my ruine, by forcing me to that voyage which has afforded envy time to frame accuſations againſt me: but now I will come to the proof of theſe matters. Behold here I am, who, notwithſtanding a Parricide, yet never ſuffered any misfortune by ſea or land: is not this a ſufficient argument of my innocency? But I will not inſiſt upon this proof of my innocence, ſince I know that God hath permitted you to condem me already in your heart. Only I conjure you, give not credit to depoſitions extorted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all torments upon me, ſpare not my body: For if I am a Parricide I ought not to die with- O out all ſort of torment. Antipater accompanied theſe words with ſo many tears, that he moved all that were preſent, and Varus alſo, to compaſſion; but Herod only ab-

Antipater calleth Rome and Cæſar to witneſs.

A ſtained from weeping, for his anger againſt his unnatural Son fix'd his mind upon the proof of his Crime. And preſently Nicolaus at the King's commandment made a long ſpeech concerning Antipater's malice and artifices, which he laid ſo open, that he extinguiſh'd all pity in the minds of the hearers. He aſcrib'd all the miſchief which had befallen that Kingdom unto him, and eſpecially the death of his two Brethren, who through his calumniations were made away; affirming alſo that he uſed treacherous practices againſt thoſe yet alive, fearing leſt they ſhould ſucceed in the Kingdom: for he who had prepared poyſon for his Father would much leſs ſpare his Brethren. And then coming to the proof of his intent to poyſon his Father, he declared in order all the evidences thereof, aggravating his offence by the B corrupting of Pheroras, who by Antipater was drawn in to purpoſe the murther of his Brother and King, and how he had alſo corrupted the King's deareſt friends: and ſo filled the whole Court with wickedneſs. When he had accuſed him of many other things, and brought proof thereof he ended his ſpeech.

Nicolaus at the King's command beginneth a moſt heinous an bitter accuſation againſt Antipater.

Nicolaus's peroration.

Then Varus commanded Antipater to make anſwer to theſe things, and ſeeing that he continued lying on the ground, and ſaid nothing more, but God was witneſs of his innocency; he called for the poyſon, and gave it one who was condemned to die, who having drunk thereof, preſently died. Then Varus talked apart with Herod; and what was done there in that Council he writ unto Cæſar, and the next day he departed. And when Herod had put Antipater in priſon, he ſent meſſengers C unto Cæſar, to inform him of his hard fortune and calamity. After this it was diſcovered that Antipater deſign'd the death of Salome. For one of Antiphilus ſervants came from Rome, and brought Letters from Acme, who was one of Julia's maids, which ſhe writ to the King, telling him that ſhe found a Letter of Salomes among Julia's; which for good will ſhe had ſent him. Theſe Letters which ſhe affirmed to be Salomes, contained many invectives againſt Herod, and many accuſations. But theſe Letters were feigned by Antipater, who for money had perſwaded Acme to write them in her own name; as the Letter that ſhe writ to Antipater evidently ſhewed; for ſhe writ as followeth.

The poyſon tried upon a condemned man.

Another proof againſt Antipater.

I have writ to your Father as you requeſted me, and ſent alſo other Letters; and I aſſure D my ſelf he will not ſpare his ſiſter, if he do but read the Letters. You may do well, ſeeing I have performed all your requeſts, to be mindful of your promiſe. This Letter againſt Salome and others, being found to be counterfeited, the King began to doubt that Alexander was made away by ſuch counterfeited Letters; and he remember'd that he had almoſt put his Siſter to death, through Antipater's device. Wherefore he reſolved no longer to delay to puniſh him for all; yet was he hindred by a great ſickneſs from accompliſhing his purpoſe. He only ſent Letters to Cæſar concerning Acme's treachery and falſe accuſation of Salome; and changed his Teſtament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his room writ Antipas, leaving out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder Brethren, becauſe Antipater had render'd them odious to him. E He bequeathed to Auguſtus a thouſand Talents, beſide many other rich gifts: and to his Wife the Empreſs, and Children, and Kindred, and Freed men, about five hundred; he alſo gave great gifts to others, either in land or money, and left to his Siſter Salome great riches.

Herod intendeth Antipater's puniſhment, and therefore blotteth his name out of his Teſtament.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Golden Eagle, and of Antipater*'s and* Herod*'s death.*

F HErod's diſeaſe increaſed, partly through age, and eſpecially by his grief and ſorrow; for he was now threeſcore and ten years old; and his mind was ſo troubled for the death of his Children, that though he were in health, yet he took no pleaſure in any thing; and his ſickneſs was ſo much the more grievous to him, becauſe that Antipater was yet alive; but he purpoſed to put him to death as ſoon as he was recovered of his ſickneſs. To increaſe his calamity there aroſe a tumult among the people. There were in the City two Doctors reputed very ſkilful in our Country-laws: One of them was named Judas, the Son of Sariphæus; the other was called Matthias, the Son of Margalote. Theſe two were followed by a great number of young men; ſo that when they expounded the Law, they had an aſſemby like a great Army. G And hearing that the King, partly by grief, and partly by his diſeaſe, was very like to die, they told their acquaintance, that now it was a fit time to revenge the injury which God received by thoſe profane works, which were made againſt againſt his expreſs Commandment ; which forbids to place the Images, or likeneſs of H any living thing in the Temple. This they ſaid, becauſe the King had ſet a Golden Eagle upon the chief Porch of the Temple, which they exhorted the young men to take away ; ſaying, that it was meritorious, although danger might enſue thereon ; yea, even to die for their Countrey-laws. For they that died for ſuch a cauſe, ſhould enjoy everlaſting life and glory : And that many unwiſe men, ignorant of that Doctrine, ſo loved their lives, that they choſe rather to die by ſickneſs, than to ſpend their lives in ſo glorious an enterprize. Whilſt they ſpoke thus, there was a rumour ſpread, that the King was now at the laſt gaſp ; whereby the young men being encouraged, about Noon, when many were walking in the Temple, they let themſelves down from the top of the Temple with great ropes, and ſo with hatchets cut down the Eagle. I Whereof the Captain of the Soldiers being advertiſed, he went with a great many Soldiers ſpeedily to the Temple, and took almoſt forty of the young men, and carried them to the King : Who asked them if that were true, that they were ſo bold as to cut down the Golden Eagle : They confeſſed they had done it. Then he demanded by whoſe Commandment ? They anſwered, by the Commandment of the Law. After this, it was asked them, why they, who were preſently to die, were ſo joyful ? They anſwered, Becauſe after death, they hoped to enjoy Eternal Bliſs. The King hereat was ſo greatly moved with anger, that for all his diſeaſe, he went forth and made a Speech to the people wherein he inveighed againſt theſe perſons, as Sacrilegious ; who, under pretence and colour of their Countrey-laws and Religion, attempted ſome great mat- K ter ; and he adjudged them as impious people, worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learn who had favoured the act, requeſted him that only the Authors and Actors of that Crime, might receive puniſhment ; and that he would remit the offence to all the people beſides. The King, with much ado entreated, cauſed the young men that let themſelves down with Cords, and the two Doctors, to be burned ; and the reſt which were taken in the act, to be beheaded. After this, the King's ſickneſs ſpread over his whole body, and he was afflicted with moſt grievous pains : For he had a great Fever, and an Itch over all his body, which was intolerable, and a dayly Collick ; and his feet were ſwelled, as though he had the Dropſie : His belly alſo, was ſwelled, and his privy members putrified, ſo that the worms L bred in the putrified places. He was alſo grievouſly tormented with difficulty of breath, and a Convulſion of the whole body ; ſo that ſome ſaid, that this was a puniſhment laid upon him, for the death of the two Doctors. Herod, notwithſtanding he was afflicted with ſo many and grievous ſickneſſes, yet he was deſirous to live, and ſought remedy, in hope of health. At laſt, he paſſed over Jordan, where he uſed the warm Waters of Calliroe, which run into the Lake of Aſphaltites ; and are ſo ſweet, that men uſe to drink of them. There the Phyſicians cauſed his body to be bathed in hot Oyl, and he was therewith ſo weakened, that his ſenſe failed, and he was as though he were dead ; whereat thoſe that were about him being troubled, with their cries they cauſed him to look up ; and now deſpairing of life, he cauſed fifty Drachmes M to be diſtributed to every Soldier, and great Summs of money to the Captains and his friends.

Herod full of melancholy

Herod overcome with pain, would have ſlain himſelf. Ant. lib. 17. cap. 16.

As he returned, When he came to Jericho, he was in a very great likelihood to die ; and his melancholly put into his head a wicked reſolution : For he cauſed the chief men of every Town and Village in all Judæa to be aſſembled together, and then he ſhut them up in a place called the Hippodrome : And calling unto him his Siſter Salome, and Alexas her Huſband ; I know (ſaid he) that the Jews will make Feaſts for joy of my death ; yet if you will do what I deſire, it ſhall be mourned for, and I ſhall have a remarkable Funeral. As ſoon as I have given up the Ghoſt, cauſe my Soldiers to encompaſs theſe men whom I have here in hold, and kill them all : By this means all Judæa, and every N Houſ-hold thereof ſhall have cauſe to lament. After he had commanded this to be done, thoſe whom he had ſent to Rome, brought him Letters, wherein was ſhewed how Acme, Julia's Servant, was by Cæſar's Command put to death, and Antipater adjudged worthy to die : yet Cæſar writ, that if his Father had rather baniſh him, he permitted it. Herod with this news was ſomething pleaſed, yet preſently his pains and a vehement Cough ſeized him with that violence, ſo that he thought to haſten his own death ; and taking an Apple in his hand, he called for a Knife (for he was accuſtomed to cut the meat which he did eat) and then looking about him, leſt any ſtanding by ſhould hinder him, he lift up his arm to ſtrike himſelf. But Achab his Nephew run haſtily to him, and ſtayed his hand ; and preſently there was made great lamentation O throughout all the King's Palace, as though the King had been dead. Antipater having ſpeedy news hereof, took courage, and promiſed the Keepers a piece of money to let

A let him go. But the chiefeſt of them did not only deny to do it, but alſo went preſently to the King, and told him what Antipater requeſted. Herod hearing this, lifted up his voice with more ſtrength than was meet for a ſick man, and commanded his Guard to go and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Caſtle called Hircanion. And now again he altered his Teſtament, and appointed Archelaus his eldeſt Son King, and Antipas his younger Brother Tetrarch. Five days after the death of his Son Antipater, Herod died; having reigned thirty and four years after he ſlew Antigonus, and thirty ſeven years after the Romans had declared him King. In many things he was as fortunate as any man; for being born but a private perſon, he got the Crown, and kept it, and left it to his Poſterity: But in his Domeſtick Affairs, he was moſt unfortunate. B Salome, before it was known to the Soldiers that the King was dead, went forth with her Huſband, and releaſed all thoſe that were in Hold, whom the King had commanded to be ſlain; ſaying, that the King's mind was altered, and therefore he gave them all Licence to depart: And after their departure, the King's death was publiſhed to the King's Soldiers, who, together with the other multitude, were aſſembled in the Amphitheatre at Jericho, by Ptolomey, Keeper of the King's Seal; who made a Speech to them, and told them that Herod was now happy; and he comforted the multitude, and read unto them a Letter which the King left, wherein he earneſtly requeſted the Soldiers to favour and love his Succeſſor. After the Epiſtle read, he recited the King's Teſtament, wherein Philip was appointed Heir of Trachonitis, and the places thereunto C adjoyning; Antipas Tetrarch, and Archelaus King. He commanded his Ring to be carried to Cæſar, to whom he referred the cognizance and diſpoſal of all with full Authority; requiring, that as to any thing elſe, his ſaid Teſtament ſhould be performed.

This was no ſooner read, but preſently the Skies were filled with the voices and cries of the people, who congratulated Archelaus; and the Soldiers and the People promiſed to ſerve him faithfully, and wiſhed him a happy Reign. This done, the next care was about the King's Funeral, on which Archelaus ſpared no coſt, but buried the King with all Royal Pomp poſſible. The Herſe whereon he was carried, was adorned with Gold and Precious Stones; upon it lay a Bed wrought with Purple, whereupon was D laid the dead Corps of the King, covered alſo with Purple, a Crown and Diadem of pure Gold on his head, and a Scepter in his Right hand. About the Herſe were his Sons and Kinsfolk; and the Guard, and Bands of Thracians, Germans and Gauls, all went before in order, as though they had gone to Wars. The reſt of the Soldiers, in Warlike order, followed their Captains and Leaders; and five hundred of his Servants and Freed-men carried Perfumes. CHAP. I.

Of Herod*'s Succeſſor* Archelaus, and how he entred into the Temple; and the Mutiny that aroſe for the revenge of thoſe that were executed, for taking down the Golden B Eagle.

ARchelaus being acknowledged Succeſſor in the Kingdom to Herod, lately dead, neceſſity conſtrained him to go to Rome, to the end he might be confirmed by Auguſtus; which Journey gave occaſion of new broils. For after that for ſeven days he had celebrated his Father's Funeral, and largely feaſted the people (for this is a cuſtom amongſt the Jews, which bringeth many of them to poverty; and yet he that doth not ſo, is reputed impious) he went to the Temple, attired in a white Gar-
C ment, where he was, with great joy, received of the people; and he himſelf ſitting in a Tribunal, upon a Throne of Gold, very courteouſly admitted the people to his Preſence, and thanked them for their diligent care uſed in his Father's Funeral, and for the Honours they had rendered to himſelf, as to their King. Yet he ſaid, he would not take upon him either the Authority or Name of King, till ſuch time as his Succeſſion was approved of by Cæſar, who by his Father's Teſtament, was Lord and Maſter of all; and for that cauſe, he had refuſed the Diadem offered him by the Soldiers at Jericho, when they would have Crowned him. But he promiſed, that if he were confirmed King by the hands of the Emperour, he would largely recompence both the Soldiers and the people for their good will;
D and that he fully purpoſed to be more ſavourable unto them, than his Father had been. The multitude hereat greatly rejoyced, and made preſent tryal of his mind and purpoſe; for ſome cried out, requeſting that the Tributes might be leſſened; Others deſired that the new Impoſts might ceaſe; others requeſted him to ſet all Priſoners at liberty. Archelaus, in favour of the people, granted all theſe requeſts; and then offering Sacrifices, he banquetted with his Friends. But ſuddenly, a little after Noon, a great multitude deſirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the King's death being ceaſed) began a private mourning, bewailing their miſ-fortune, whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the Golden Eagle from the Porch of the Temple. This ſorrow was not ſecret; but the whole City reſounded with la-
E mentations for them, that were thought to have loſt their lives for the Temple, and their Countrey Laws. They alſo cried, that revenge was to be taken upon them, whom Herod for that fact, had rewarded with money. And that firſt of all, he who by Herod was conſtituted High Prieſt, was to be rejected, and another more honeſt and devout was to be put in his place. Archelaus, although he was herewith offended, yet, becauſe he was preſently to take ſuch a journey, he abſtained from violence, fearing leſt he ſhould render the multitude his enemies. Wherefore he ſought rather by admonition, than by force, to reclaim thoſe that were ſeditious; and he ſent the Governour of the Soldiers to requeſt them to be pacified. But the Authors of the Sedition, ſo ſoon as he came to the Temple, and before he ſpake one word, threw ſtones
F at him; and in like manner they uſed others, ſent afterwards by him, to appeaſe them; for Archelaus diſpatched many meſſengers unto them, whom they contumeliouſly treated; ſo that if they had been more in number, their fury would have proceeded further. Wherefore, when the Feaſt of Unleavened Bread drew nigh, which the Jews call Eaſter, wherein an infinite number of Sacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all Villages thereabout, for devotion ſake, to the Solemnity: And they who ſo lamented the death of the Doctors, remained in the Temple, ſeeking by all means to promote the Sedition. Which Archelaus fearing, ſent a Band of Soldiers, and a Tribune with them, to take the chief of the Seditous, before ſuch time as they had drawn unto them the multitude of the people; againſt whom the G whole people being ſtirred up, ſlew a great many of them with ſtones; and the Tribune himſelf being ſore hurt, had much ado to eſcape. And when they had ſo done, they preſently went and offered Sacrifice, as though no hurt had been done. But

Archelaus perſwaded himſelf, that the multitude would not be appeaſed without H ſlaughter: wherefore he ſent againſt them the whole Army, the Foot into the City, and the Horſe into the Field; who aſſaulting the ſeditious people as they were ſacrificing, ſlew of them almoſt three thouſand, and ſcattered the reſidue into the Mountains adjoyning. There were alſo ſome who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by vertue of his Command, that every one ſhould depart home to his houſe; as accordingly, notwithſtanding the holineſs of the day, they did. But he, accompanied with his Mother, Poplas, Ptolomey and Nicholaus his Friends, went to the Sea-coaſt, leaving Philip Governour of the Kingdom, and of his Houſhold: With them departed Salome and her Children, and the Kings Brethren and Kindred, under pretence to aſſiſt Archelaus to the Crown; but indeed, it was to inform Cæſar of the Murther committed in the Temple againſt the Law. When they came to Cæſarea, they met with Sabinus Governour of Syria, who was coming towards Judea, to take into his cuſtody Herod's Treaſure. Varus, to whom Archelaus had ſent Ptolomey about this mattter, forbad him to proceed further. And ſo Sabinus, in obedience to Varus, neither entred the Caſtles, nor took Herod's Treaſure from Archelaus; but promiſed, that he would let all alone, till Cæſar's pleaſure were underſtood. But ſo ſoon as one of them that hindred him was gone to Antioch, and the other, to wit, Archelaus, to Rome; he ſtill remaining at Cæſarea, now haſted to Jeruſalem, and took the King's Palace: Where, calling for the chief of the Guard, and the Purveyors, he exacted of them an account, and ſought to take into his cuſtody the Caſtles and Strong Holds. But the Captains of the Garriſons, mindful of the K charge which Archelaus had given them, refuſed him entrance; affirming that they kept them more for Cæſar than Archelaus.

Antipas elected King by Herod's former Teſtament, ſtriveth with Archelaus for the Kingdom.

At this time alſo, Antipas, one of Herod's Sons, went to Rome with a deſign to obtain the Crown; alledging that Herod's firſt Teſtament was of more force than the laſt, and that he in the firſt was declared King; and both Salome, and divers others of his Kindred, who ſailed with Archelaus, promiſed him their aid. He took with him his Mother and Ptolomey, Brother to Nicholaus; in whom he had great confidence, becauſe he had been always faithful to Herod, and was held by him in great credit. But none had ſo much encouraged him, as Irenæus the Orator, who had an excellent faculty of ſpeaking. Truſting to theſe, he refuſed the counſel of them who ſought to perſwade him to yield to Archelaus, both as the L elder, and appointed by the laſt Teſtament of his Father. Now, when they were all arrived at Rome, thoſe of the Kindred that hated Archelaus; and eſpecially thoſe that looked upon it as a ſort of Liberty to be governed by the Romans, favoured Antipas; in hope, that if their deſign of being freed from the Rule of Kings did not ſucceed, they ſhould, at leaſt, have the comfort to be commanded by him, and not by Archelaus.

Antipas accuſeth Archelaus by Letters to Cæſar.

And to further him the more, he obtained Sabinus's Letters to Cæſar; wherein Archelaus was accuſed, and Antipas commended. Salome, and the reſt of the Complices, preſented Accuſations againſt Archelaus, to Cæſar; who, after them, delivered alſo his Juſtification in writing; and withal, his Father's Ring, and an Inventory M of his Treaſure, by Ptolomey.

Cæſar calleth a Council of Roman Nobility.

Cæſar pondering with himſelf what both Parties alledged, and the greatneſs, and large Revenues of the Kingdom, and the number of Herod's Children; and having alſo read the Letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called the chief of the Romans to Council; where Caius, the Son of Agrippa, and his Daughter Julia, whom he had adopted by his aſſignment, ſate in the firſt place, and ſo he licenced the Parties to plead their Rights.

Antipater's vehement Accuſation againſt Archelaus.

Antipater, Salome's Son, being the greateſt of all Archelaus's Adverſaries, ſpake firſt, and ſaid, that Archelaus now only for form diſputed for the Kingdom, of which he had already poſſeſſed himſelf without waiting to know Cæſar's Pleaſure; and that he did now ſtrive in vain, to render Cæſar favourable to him, whom he would not attend to judge of his Lawful Succeſſion. That after Herod's death, he ſuborned ſome to offer him the Diadem: And that ſitting on a Throne of N Gold in Kingly manner, he had changed all Orders of the Soldiers, diſpoſed of Offices, and granted unto the people their Requeſts; which could not be effected but by a King. That he had alſo ſet at liberty many men, who for great Crimes were impriſoned by his Father. And having done all this, he came now to Cæſar, to crave the ſhadow of the Kingdom, the ſubſtance and body whereof he already poſſeſſed; ſo that herein he left nothing to Cæſar to diſpoſe of, but the bare Title. Moreover, he alledged that Archelaus did but counterfeit ſorrow for his Father's death, feigning himſelf to mourn in the day time, and in the night he would be drunk and Riotous.

Antipater ſpareth no vehemency in accuſing Archelaus.

By which carriage, he ſaid, that he had cauſed the Sedition of the people, and incurred O their hatred. After theſe Accuſations, he inſiſted upon the horrid ſlaughter of the multitude about the Temple: for he ſaid, that they only came againſt the Feſtival Day, to offer

A offer Sacrifice; and that they themſelves were ſacrificed, as they were offering the Sacrifices which they brought: And that there were ſuch heaps of dead bodies in the Temple, as never in any Foreign War, the like had been ſeen. That Herod, foreſeeing his cruelty, never judged him worthy of the Kingdom, till ſuch time as his Underſtanding failed him; when being more ſick in mind than body, he knew not whom he named his Succeſſor in his laſt Will; whereas, he had nothing whereof he could blame him, whom in his former Will, he had appointed his Succeſſor, when he was in health, both of mind and body. Yet (ſaid he) put the caſe, Herod in his extremity, knew what he did, yet Archelaus hath rendred himſelf unworthy of the Kingdom, by having committed many things againſt the Laws. For (ſaid B he) what will he be after he hath received Authority from Cæſar, who before he received any, hath murthered ſo many? Antipater having ſpoken more to this effect, and at every Accuſation taking Witneſs of his Kindred that ſtood by, ended his Speech.

Nicolaus defendeth Archelaus.

Then Nicolaus ſtood up, and firſt of all ſhewed, that the ſlaughter of them in the Temple was neceſſary and unavoidable; for they, for whoſe death Archelaus was now accuſed, were not only enemies of the Kingdom, but alſo of Cæſar: And for other Crimes objected, he ſhewed how that they were done, even by the counſel and perſwaſion of the Accuſers. He alſo urged, that the ſecond Teſtament might be of force, for that therein Herod had referred it to Cæſar, to confirm his Succeſſor. And C he who had ſuch remembrance, as to leave the Arbitriment of his Will to him who is Lord of all; could not be thought to miſtake himſelf in appointing his Heir, nor yet deprived of his Senſes, ſeeing he knew by whom he ſhould be eſtabliſhed. When Nicolaus had ended his Speech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus coming into the midſt of the Council, proſtrated himſelf at Cæſar's feet. Auguſtus courteouſly raiſed him from the ground, and declared him worthy to ſucceed his Father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitive Sentence; but the ſame

Of the Fight and Maſſacre at Jeruſalem, between the Jews and the Sabinians.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 14. Sedition in Jeruſalem.

BEfore Cæſar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malthace, the Mother of Archelaus, fell ſick and died; and many Letters came out of Syria, ſignifying E that the Jews had rebelled. Which Varus foreſeeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, had gone to Jeruſalem to repreſs the Authors of that Sedition: And becauſe the multitude would not be quiet, he left one Legion of the three which he brought out of Syria, in the City, and ſo returned to Antioch. But Sabinus coming afterwards to Jeruſalem, was the cauſe that the Jews began a new Broil: For he forced the Garriſons to render to him the Caſtles, and rigorouſly made ſearch for the King's Treaſure: And he was not only aſſiſted by thoſe that Varus left there, but alſo he had a great multitude of his own Servants all armed, to further his Avarice. And in the Feaſt of Pentecoſt (ſo called, becauſe it happens at the end of ſeven times ſeven days) the People gathered themſelves together, not for Religion's ſake, but for anger F and hatred; ſo that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee, and Idumæa, and Jericho, and the Countreys beyond Jordan. Yet the Jews which were Inhabitants of the City, ſurpaſſed the reſt both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themſelves into three Bands, and made three Camps; one on the North ſide of the Temple, another on the South towards the Hippodrome, the third on the Weſt, near the Palace; and ſo they beſieged the Romans on every ſide.
Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, ſent many Letters to Varus, earneſtly requeſting him with all ſpeed to bring ſuccour; for if he did not, the whole Legion would be deſtroyed. He himſelf got into the higheſt Tower of the Caſtle of Phaſælus, ſo called from the name of Herod's Brother, whom G the Parthians killed; and from thence he gave a ſign to the Roman Soldiers to iſſue out ſuddenly upon their enemies; for himſelf was in ſuch a fear, that he durſt not

A Skirmiſh between the Jews and Romans.
The Romans fire the Porches.

Command, attacked the Temple, and there fought a fierce Battel with the Jews; who H having none to aſſiſt them, and being unexperienced in Warlike Affairs, were ſoon conquered by them that were skilful. At laſt, many Jews got upon the Porches, and caſt Darts at them from the Pinacles, ſo that they killed many: But the other could not revenge themſelves of them, who fought againſt them from ſo high a place; neither could they ſuſtain the force of them who joyned Battel with them; till at laſt the Romans fired the Porches, which for greatneſs, and curious work, were admirable. By this means many Jews were either deſtroyed with the ſuddain fire, or elſe, leaping down amidſt their enemies, were by them ſlain; others going backward, were caſt headlong from the Wall; others deſpairing of life, killed themſelves with their own Swords; and they who privily came down the Walls, being aſſaulted by the Romans, I and aſtoniſhed with fear, were eaſily overcome: Till at laſt, all being either put to the Sword, or fled through fear, the Treaſure dedicated to God, was left deſtitute of Keepers; ſo that the Soldiers took away thereof about four hundred Talents; and that which they left, Sabinus got.

But this loſs of men and money ſtirred up many more Jews, and thoſe more brave than the firſt, againſt the Romans; whom they beſieged in the King's Palace, and threatned all their deſtructions, unleſs they would preſently depart from thence: Yet promiſing Sabinus and the Legion lieve to depart, if he ſo liked. Part of the King's Soldiers, who of their own accord fled to them, aſſiſted them. But the moſt Warlike and valiant amongſt them, were three thouſand men of Herod's Army, whoſe Leaders K were Rufus and Gratus; one of the Foot, and the other of the Horſe; both which, although they had had no Soldiers with them, might yet for their Valour and Counſel, have been conſiderable to the Party of the Romans. The Jews earneſtly continued the Siege, and aſſaulted the Caſtle-Walls, crying upon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now, after ſo long time, to recover their Countrey's Liberty. Sabinus, though with all his heart he wiſhed himſelf away, yet he durſt not truſt them; but he ſuſpected, that their courteſie was but a plot to entrap him. And on the other ſide, hoping that Varus would come and help him, he ſtill endured the danger of the Siege. At the ſame time there were tumults in many places of Judæa; and many, through opportunity of the time, aſpired to the Kingdom. For in Idumæa two thouſand old Soldiers, L who had born Arms under Herod, gathering together, and having armed themſelves, went to attack the King's Forces commanded by Achiab, Herod's Nephew; who, becauſe they were old Soldiers, and very well armed, durſt not meet them in the Field, but withdrew into ſome Fortreſſes. At Sephoris alſo, a Town of Galilee, Judas the Son of Ezechias, Captain of the Thieves which formerly were defeated by King Herod, and had waſted the Countrey; gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the King's Armory, and armed all his Company, and fought againſt them who affected the Royal Dignity. Alſo, beyond the River, one Simon, who had been Herod's Servant; being a goodly man, and of a huge ſtature, put a Crown upon his own head; and gathering together a company of Vagrants, went about with them to M Jericho, and burnt the King's Palace, and many fair and ſumptuous houſes there, and ſo got a great Booty there; and he had ſurely fired all other Buildings of Note, had not Gratus, Captain of the King's Footmen, made haſte to fight him with the Bow-men of Trachon, and the moſt Warlike men of Sebaſte. Simon loſt many men in this Encounter; and when he fled into a ſtrait Valley, Gratus overtook him, and cut him overthwart the neck, ſo that he fell to the ground. In like manner, other of the King's Palaces near Jordan, by Bethara, were burnt by a multitude of other Rebels, gathered together in Bands from beyond the River. At this time a Shepherd, named Athrongæus, pretended to make himſelf King: His Birth was ſo low, that formerly he had been but a ſimple Shepherd; and he had no other merit, but that he was very large, N and ſtrong of body, and deſpiſed death. With this reſolution he armed his four Brethren, each of which had a Company armed, and they were as his Lieutenants, to make Incurſions; whilſt he, like a King, meddled only with great Affairs, and wore a Crown upon his head: And thus he continued a long time waſting the Countrey, and killing, not only the Romans, and King's Soldiers; but alſo the Jews, if there was hope to gain any thing by them. One day he met a Company of the Romans at Emmaus, who carried Corn and Armour unto the Legion; he fought with them, and killed one Arius a Centurion, and forty of the moſt valiant amongſt them upon the place; the reſt being in like danger, through the help of Gratus with the Soldiers of Sebaſte, eſcaped. After they had done many things in this manner againſt their own Countrey-men O as well as ſtrangers, at laſt, three of them were taken; the eldeſt by Archelaus, and the two other, who were eldeſt after him, fell into the hands of Gratus and Varus, Governour of Syria for the Romans, repreſſes the Inſurrections in Judea.

WHen Varus had, by the Letters of Sabinus, underſtood the danger wherein the whole Legion was, being beſieged in Jeruſalem; he haſted to ſuccour them: B But firſt he went to Ptolemais with two other Legions, and four Cornets of Horſe; where he had appointed the King's Forces, and the other Auxiliary Troops to meet him. As he paſſed by Beritus, the Inhabitants gave him fifteen hundred men. Alſo Aretas the King of Arabia, for the hatred he bare to Herod, ſent him a great number, both of Horſe and Foot. As ſoon as the Hoſt was aſſembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his Army into Galilee, adjoyning to Ptolemais; and appointed a friend of his, the Son of Caius their Governour, who preſently put all to flight againſt whom he was ſent; and having taken the Caſtle of Sephoris, he fired it, and made all the Inhabitants thereof Slaves. Varus, with the reſt of the Army, went to Samaria, and C took it; yet he did the City no harm, becauſe he found, that amidſt all theſe Tumults, they had been quiet. When he had pitched his Tents at a Village called Arus, which belonged to Ptolomey, the Arabians ſacked it, for they hated thoſe that loved Herod. From thence they went to Sampho, another ſtrong Burrough; which they in like manner ſacked and deſtroyed, without ſparing any thing. All was filled with the ſlaughter and fires which the Arabians made, there was no end nor hindrance of their Avarice. Alſo Varus commanded Emmaus to be burnt, being angry for the death of Arius, and the reſt that were ſlain there; and the Inhabitants thereof abandoned it, every one by flight ſeeking to ſave himſelf. From thence he went to Jeruſalem; and at his approach, the Jews that beſieged the Roman Legion fled and ſcattered themſelves, D ſome here, ſome there, all about the Countrey: They that remained in the City excuſed themſelves, that they were not conſenting to the Tumult; but that for the Celebration of the Feaſt, they permitted thoſe Seditious to come into the City; affirming that they had rather have been beſieged together with the Romans, than have joyned with thoſe of the Sedition; and ſo they laid the cauſe of that Tumult upon others. But firſt Joſephus, Archelaus's Couſin, with Gratus and Rufus, went to meet him; leading the King's Army, and the Sibaſtians, and the Roman Soldiers, adorned in their accuſtomed Apparel. Sabinus durſt not be ſeen by Varus, and therefore got him out of the Town before, and went to the Sea-coaſt. Varus divided his Army, and ſent ſome Parties into the Countrey, to ſeek the Authors of the Tumult: And thoſe that E were brought to him who were in leſs fault, he committed to Priſon; thoſe who were the chiefeſt, he crucified, to the number of two thouſand.

And he pardoned the Common Soldiers, and ſent the Captains to Cæſar to anſwer the matter: Who, pardoning moſt of them, yet puniſhed ſome that were of Herod's Kindred, becauſe they had rebelled againſt their own King. Varus having F thus quieted the Eſtate of Judea and Jeruſalem, left in the Fortreſs of Jeruſalem, the ſame Legion that was there before, and departed to Antioch.

Salome Princeſs of Jamnia, Azotus and Phaſelis

NOw Archelaus met a new obſtacle at Rome; for the Jews, who before the Sedition, with the lieve of Varus, were gone to Rome, to crave the liberty of their Countrey. Thoſe who went as Ambaſſadours in their Countrey's behalf, were fifty in number; and they were aſſiſted by more than eight thouſand Jews, that lived at Rome. Whereupon, Cæſar called a Council of the Nobility of Rome in the ſtately Temple of Apollo, which he had built on Mount Palatine. The whole Body of the I Jews appeared with the Legats againſt Archelaus and his friends. Archelaus's Kindred neither came with him, nor with the reſt of the Jews: with him they would not joyn, for envy; and with the Jews they durſt not, for ſhame. Amongſt them alſo was Philip, the Brother of Archelaus, whom Varus ſent in courteous manner to aſſiſt his Brother; or to the end, that if it ſhould pleaſe Cæſar to divide Herod's Kingdom among his Children, he might have a part. The Ambaſſadours ſpoke firſt, and began to declaim againſt Herod's Memory: Firſt of all they ſaid, that they found him not a King, but the moſt cruel Tyrant that ever was; and that he had murthered many; and thoſe whom he left alive, endured ſuch miſery, as they thought themſelves far more unhappy than thoſe that were ſo butchered. For (ſaid they) he was not only contented K to tear his Subject's bodies with torments, but alſo defaced and ruined the Cities of his own Countrey, to adorn and beautifie the Cities of Strangers: And he permitted Forreigners to maſſacre the Jews without revenge. And inſtead of their ancient and wonted happineſs which Judea enjoyed by a Religious obſervation of the Laws, the Countrey was by him made ſo poor, and ſo waſted with Injuſtice, that within theſe few years that Herod reigned, they have ſuffered more Murthers and Maſſacres, than all their Anceſtors had, from the time of their departure out of Babylon, in the Reign of Xerxes, to the days of Herod. That being, by enduring ſuch miſery, now accuſtomed to the Yoke, they had willingly ſubjected themſelves to his Son Archelaus after that Herod his Father was dead, notwithſtanding he was the Son of ſuch a Tyrant; and had publickly mourned for the death of Herod, L and offered Sacrifice for the proſperity of his Succeſſor. But he, to ſhew himſelf Herod*'s true Son, began his Reign with the ſlaughter of three thouſand Citizens; and becauſe he had ſo well deſerved the Kingdom, he offered ſo many men to God for Sacrifice; and on a Feſtival Day, filled the Temple with ſo many dead bodies. Wherefore, 'tis not ſtrange that they who eſcaped that Maſſacre, conſider their own calamity; and as in Battel, turn their faces againſt thoſe who wounded them, and beſeech the Romans, that they would think the remnant of the Jews worthy of compaſſion; and not abandon and expoſe the reſidue of their Nation as a Prey to them, by whom they are like to be moſt cruelly butchered; but that it may pleaſe them to adjoyn their Countrey to* Syria, and to let them be ruled by the Romans; that ſo they may find that the Jews, though now counted ſeditious and rebellious, are under peaceable and quiet Governours, a peaceable Nation. M With this Petition the Jews ended their Accuſation. After this, Nicolaus ſtood up againſt them; and firſt of all acquitted the King's of the Crimes laid to their charge, and then reproved his Countrey-men, as people not to be eaſily Governed, and of their own nature averſe, except forced, to obey their King: And by the way he alſo blamed the Kindred of Archelaus, who joyned with his Accuſers. Cæſar having heard what both parts could ſay, diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. And within few days after he gave Archelaus half the Kingdom, with the Title of Ethnarch; promiſing moreover, to make him King, if he behaved himſelf well: the other half he divided into two Tetrarchies, and gave the ſame to the reſt of Herod's Sons; one to Philip, the other to Antipas, who contended with Archelaus N for the Crown. Antipas his Part lay from Galilee, beyond the River Jordan; the Revenues whereof amounted to two hundred Talents a year. Philip had Batanæa, and Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of what belonged to Zenodorus near Jamnia; the Revenues whereof amounted to one hundred Talents a year. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchy Idumæa, and all Judæa and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of the Tribute, becauſe they had not rebelled with the reſt. Theſe Cities alſo, were given him, Straton's Tower, Sebaſte, Joppa and Jeruſalem. But Gaza, and Gadara, and Hippon, Cæſar took from the Kingdom, and joyned them to Syria. Archelaus's yearly Revenues amounted to four hundred Talents a year. Cæſar alſo, beſides that which Herod had left Salome, as Jamnia, Azotus and Phaſelis, gave her the Palace O at Aſcalon; all which amounted to threeſcore Talents a year. But Cæſar obliged her to live in the Countrey ſubject to Archelaus. And having confirmed the reſt

A of Herod's Kindred the Legacies which in his Teſtament he had left them, he gave his two Daughters that were Virgins, over and above, a hundred and fifty thouſand Drachmes of Silver, and married them to Pheroras's two Sons. Laſtly, he divided that which Herod had bequeathed unto himſelf, amounting unto a thouſand Talents, amongſt his Sons; leaving himſelf only ſome Jewels of ſmall value, which he reſerved in honour and remembrance of the dead.

B Of the Impoſtor Alexander, Herod's pretended Son, and how he was taken.

AT the ſame time, a certain young man, a Jew born, brought up by a Freed-man of Rome in the Town of Sidon, being very like Alexander whom Herod had put to death, went to Rome, having one of his Countrey-men for his companion, who knew very well the Eſtate of the Kingdom; and by whoſe inſtructions he affirmed, that they who ſhould have put him and Ariſtobulus to death, being moved to compaſſion, let them go, and put two others in their room like them. With this tale he deceived many Jews living in Creet, where he was honourably received: From thence he ſailed to Melos, where he was entertained with greater pomp; and enriching C himſelf, he uſed ſuch means, that he got his Hoſts (which gave him entertainment) to accompany him to Rome. At his landing at Puteoli, he received great Preſents from the Jews who dwelt there, eſpecially thoſe that were well affected to his Father, honoured him as a King. For he was ſo like Alexander, that they that had ſeen Alexander, and knew him well, would have ſworn he had been the ſame. Wherefore, when he arrived at Rome, all the Jews deſired to ſee him, and an infinite multitude followed him whitherſoever he went in the ſtreets; and they ſo doted upon him, that they carried him in a Horſe-litter, and at their own proper coſt and charges, prepared for him a Royal Train.

He, accepting this proffer, followed him to Cæſar, and declared to him the Jew, who, for lucre ſake, had made uſe of his likeneſs to Alexander; confeſſing that he had received as great Gifts of the Cities by which he paſſed, as they would have given Alexander, if he had been alive. Cæſar laught at the Cheat, and condemned this falſe Alexander to the Galleys, but put the other Jew to death, who had induced him to this Impoſture. Oxen ſignified the change of his Fortune ; for as much as theſe creatures in labouring the Land, turned up and altered the face of it : And therefore, nine years being paſt ſince he had been eſtabliſhed Prince, he was to prepare himſelf for death. Five days after this Interpretation, Archelaus was ſent for to Rome, to anſwer before Auguſtus the things whereof he was accuſed. I have alſo thought it worth rehearſing, to ſet down the Dream of his Wife Glaphyra, Daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was firſt married to Alexander, Brother to this man, and Son to King Herod, by whom he was put to death, as we have ſaid before : After whoſe death, ſhe was married to Juba, King of Lybia ; and he being dead, ſhe returned home to her Father ; where living in her Widowhood, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was ſo inflamed with her love, that preſently he divorced his Wife Mariamne, and married her. Soon after ſhe came into Judæa, ſhe dreamed that ſhe ſaw Alexander her firſt Huſband, ſtanding before her, and ſaying unto her ; It had been enough for thee to have married the King of Lybia ; but thou, not contented therewith, comeſt again to my houſe, greedy of a third Huſband ; and which is worſt of all, art now married to mine own Brother. I will not conceal nor diſſemble this injury which thou doſt me, but I will recover thee againſt thy will. And ſhe ſcarcely lived two days after ſhe had related this Dream to her friends.

CHAP. VII.

Of Judas the Galilean, who eſtabliſhed a fourth Sect ; and of the three Sects amongſt the Jews.

Ant. lib. 18. cap. 12.

The year of the World, 3973. after Christ's Nativity, 11.

After that Archelaus's Dominions were reduced into a Province, a certain Roman Knight called Coponius, was made Governour thereof. During his Adminiſtration, a certain Galilean named Judas, incited his Countrey-men to revolt ; reproaching them for paying Tribute to the Romans, and for being ſubject to any but to God. This Judas was Author of a new Sect of his own deviſing, nothing like other Sects. For there are three Sects of Philoſophers amongſt the Jews ; one is that of the Phariſees, another of the Sadducees, and the third of the Eſſeans, which is the moſt famous of all the three. The Eſſeans are Jews born, but live in the greateſt union together imaginable : They conſider all Pleaſures, as Vices that are to be avoided ; and eſteem Continence and Victory over the Paſſions, as the greateſt Vertues. They reject Marriage, and account other men's Children, put to them to be taught whilſt young, as their own Kinſ-men, whom they diligently inſtruct in their Manners and Opinions ; not for that they condemn Marriage and Propagation of Mankind, but to avoid women's incontinence ; for they think that none of them keep themſelves true to one man. Alſo, they contemn Riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongſt them is richer than other. And they have a Law amongſt themſelves, that whoſoever will embrace their Sect, he muſt make his Goods common ; for ſo, neither any amongſt them ſeems abject for Poverty, nor any great for Riches ; but they have, as it were, all equal Patrimonies like Brethren. They account it a ſhame to anoint the body with Oyl ; and if any man, though againſt his Will, be anointed therewith, they uſe all diligence to wipe it away : And they account themſelves fine enough, if their Cloaths be white. They have amongſt them Stewards, to overſee all things for their common benefit ; who are choſen from amongſt them, by a common conſent. Their Revenue is diſtributed according to the need that every one hath. They have not one certain City, but are diſperſed in many Cities ; and if any of their Sect, though a ſtranger, come to them from another place, they give him any thing they have, as if he were their ancient Acquaintance. In like manner, they go boldly to thoſe, whom they never in their lives ſaw before, as though they were familiarly acquainted with them : And therefore, when they take a journey, they only arm themſelves againſt Thieves, and carry nothing with them elſe. In every City there is one appointed, whoſe Office is to receive and lodge thoſe of their Sect that come thither ; and to ſee that they neither want Cloaths, nor any thing elſe neceſſary for them. All Children under Government, brought up by them, go apparelled alike ; and they never change their Apparel nor Shooes, except they have worn out their firſt Apparel. Among themſelves they neither buy nor ſell ; but every man that hath any thing which another wanteth, giveth him it, and taketh that of him which himſelf needeth ; yea, every one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom he pleaſeth, without any change. Above all, towards God they are

A are very Religious ; for before the Son riſe, they ſpeak of nothing but holy things, and then they make certain Vows and Prayers after the cuſtom of their Countrey, as it were praying that God would pleaſe to make it riſe upon the earth. After this, every one is diſmiſſed to practice the Art he knoweth : And when every one hath diligently laboured till eleven a clock, they all meet together again, and being covered with linen cloaths, they waſh their bodies with cold water : and having thus purged themſelves, they go to their Cells, into which no man that is not of their Sect is admitted : And then they come to the Refectory, as into a holy Temple ; where all ſitting down with ſilence, there is ſet before every man in order, a loaf, and a little meſs of pottage, all of one ſort. Before they eat a Prieſt giveth thanks, and no man may eat B any meat till this Prayer be made to God. Likewiſe, when dinner is ended they pray again ; for both before and after, they give thanks to God, the Giver of all : And then putting off that Apparel as Sacred, they apply themſelves to their work till evening. At ſupper they do as before, cauſing their Gueſts to ſup with them, if by fortune any come. Their houſe is never troubled with cries or tumults, for every one is appointed to ſpeak in his turn ; ſo that their ſilence produces reſpect in ſtrangers The cauſe of this moderation is their continual ſobriety, and that every one is limited how much to eat or drink. And although, that in all other matters they are ruled by their Superior, yet in theſe two, to wit, compaſſionating and helping, they may do as they think good : for every one may when he pleaſeth, help thoſe whom he thinketh C deſerve help ; and when he pleaſeth, give meat to them that are in need. Yet may not they give any thing to their Kindred, without the lieve of their Superior. They take great care to ſuppreſs their anger ; they keep their promiſe, and maintain peace ; and people account every word they ſpeak of as much force, as if they had bound it with an oath : and they ſhun oaths worſe than perjury ; for they eſteem him a liar, who is not to be believed, without he call God to witneſs. They ſtudy diligently ancient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their Writings, what is moſt convenient for the ſoul and the body. Out of them they learn Remedies for Diſeaſes, and the Vertues of Herbs, Stones and Mettals. Thoſe who are deſirous to be of their Order, do not ſtraightway converſe with them ; but for a year before, live out of the Colledge, and D have the ſame diet, a little hatchet, and ſuch a girdle as is before ſpoken of, and a white garment. But at the years end, if they perceive ſuch a perſon to be continent, they give him a diet more agreeing with their own, and he is permitted to waſh himſelf in cold water, to the end, to purifie himſelf ; yet is he not admitted in common amongſt them, till for two years more, they have obſerved his life and manners : And at laſt, when he is thought worthy, he is admitted to their common company. But before he is received to the common Table, firſt he is to proteſt ſolemnly to honour and ſerve God with all his heart, to obſerve Juſtice and Fidelity towards all men ; never willingly to hurt any man, nor injure any for another man's command ; but always to hate the wicked, and aſſiſt the good ; to keep his faith to all, but eſpecially to his E Superiors ; becauſe they hold their power from God. To which they add, that if he be put in Authority over others, he never will abuſe it to the prejudice of thoſe that are under him ; and neither exceed the reſt in apparel, nor any other ambitious pomp : that he will always love the truth, and ſeverely reprove liars : and that he will keep his hands and ſoul pure from all theft and unjuſt gain : and that he will not conceal any myſteries, or ſecrets of their Religion from his companions, nor reveal them to any ſtrangers, although he ſhould be thereto threatned by death. Adding moreover, that he will never deliver any Doctrine, ſave that which he hath received ; and diligently preſerve the Books, as well as the Names, of thoſe from whom they received it. Theſe Proteſtations they oblige thoſe to take ſolemnly, who enter into their Order, to F the end, to fortifie them againſt Vices. Thoſe of the Society who tranſgreſs notoriouſly, they thruſt out of their company : and whoſoever is ſo puniſhed, for the moſt part dieth a miſerable death ; for, it being not lawful for him to eat with any ſtranger, he is reduced to feed on graſs like beaſts, and ſo he periſheth through Famine. For which cauſe oftentimes they are moved with compaſſion, to receive many into their Order again, when ready by Famine, to yield up the ghoſt ; judging them to have endured pennance enough for their offences, who with famine were almoſt brought to death's door. They are very ſevere and juſt in their Judgments ; and to decide any matter, there is never fewer of them than an hundred ; and that which is by them agreed upon, is irrevocable. Next after God, they reverence their Law-giver, inſomuch that if G any one revile him, they forthwith condemn him to death. They take it for a great duty to obey their Elders, and what is appointed by many ; ſo that if ten of them ſit together, no man of them muſt ſpeak, without he be licenced thereto by nine of the company pany. They account it a great incivility to be in the midſt of the Aſſembly, or on H their right hand. And they are more ſevere than any other Jews in obſerving the Sabbath ; for they do not only abſtain from dreſſing meat (which they dreſs the Evening before) that day, but alſo, they may not remove any veſſel out of its place, nor ſatisfie the neceſſities of Nature. Upon other days they dig a pit a foot deep in the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before ſaid) every one, at his entrance into their Order, hath given him ; and then covering themſelves diligently with their garment, as if they feared to be irreverent to the light of Heaven, in that pit they eaſe themſelves ; and then cover their ordure with the earth they took out of the pit : And this they do in moſt ſecret places. And although this purging of their bodies be natural, yet do they by waſhing purifie themſelves after it, as after great uncleanneſs. Furthermore, I amongſt themſelves they are divided into four Orders, according to the time which they have continued this exerciſe of life ; and they that are Juniors bear ſuch reſpect to the Seniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they are obliged to purifie themſelves, as though they had touched a ſtranger. They are long-liv'd, ſo that moſt of them live an hundred years, which I judge is by reaſon of their well ordered diet, and their temperance. They contemn adverſity, and by conſtancy and fortitude triumph over torments. They prefer an honourable death before life. The Wars which the Jews made againſt the Romans, ſhewed what invincible courage and hardineſs they have in all things ; for they ſuffered the breaking of the members of their bodies, fire and Sword, and all kind of Tortures, rather than be brought to ſpeak the leaſt word againſt K their Lawgiver, or to eat meats forbidden : They could not be forced to any of theſe, neither would they entreat the Torturers, nor ſhew any ſorrow amidſt their torments : Yea, in the midſt of their pains they ſcoffed at their Tormentors ; and joyfully yielded up their ſouls, as though they hoped to paſs to a better life. For it is an Opinion amongſt them, that the body is mortal and corruptible, but the ſouls remain ever immortal ; and being of a moſt Pure and Etherial Subſtance, wrap themſelves in bodies as in priſons, being drawn thereunto by ſome natural inclination : But when they are delivered out of theſe Carnal Bonds, then preſently, as freed from a long Bondage, they joyfully mount into the Air. And of the good ſouls they ſay, as did the Grecians, that they live beyond the Ocean in a place of Pleaſure, where they are L never moleſted with rain, nor ſnow, nor heat, but have always a ſweet and pleaſant Air.

But the wicked ſouls (as they ſay) go into a place very tempeſtuous, where there is always Winter weather, always lamentations of thoſe who for ever are to be puniſhed. For I judge that the Greeks are of this opinion, when they ſay there is an Iſle for the vertuous, whom they call Heroes and half-gods ; and that the ſouls of the wicked go to a place in Hell, where it is feigned, that ſome are tormented, as Syſiphus, Tantalus, Ixion and Titius. Theſe Eſſeans alſo believe that they are created immortal, that they may be induced to Virtue, and averted from Vice ; that the good are rendred better in this life, by the hope of being happy after death ; and that the wicked, who imagine they can hide their evil actions in this world, are puniſhed for them in the other with M eternal torments. This is the Eſſeans Opinion, touching the excellency of the ſoul ; from which we ſee very few of thoſe depart, who have once embraced it. There are alſo ſome among them, who promiſe to foretel things to come ; which faculty is obtained as well by the ſtudying of Holy Books and Ancient Prophecies, as by the care they take of ſanctifying themſelves : And their predictions ſeldom fail.

There is a Colledge of the Eſſeans, that differeth from the former in the point of Marriage.

The ſecond Sect of the Phariſees.

The third of the Sadducees

There is another ſort of Eſſeans, agreeing with the former, both in apparel, diet and kind of life, and obſervance of the ſame Laws and Ordinances ; only they differ in the matter of Marriage : Affirming, that to abſtain from Marriage, tends to aboliſh mankind. For (ſay they) if all men ſhould follow this opinion, preſently all mankind would periſh. Notwithſtanding, theſe people uſe ſuch moderation, that for three N years ſpace they obſerve the women they intend to marry ; and then, if they appear ſound enough to bear Children, they marry them. None of them lie with their Wives when they are with child ; to ſhew that they do not marry to ſatisfie Luſt, but to have Children. When their Wives waſh themſelves, they are covered with a Garment, as the men are, and this is the manner and cuſtom of this Sect. Of the two former Sects, the Phariſees are ſaid to be moſt skilful in Interpreting the Laws. The chief Article of their belief is, that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate ; yet ſo, that every man may in many things, of his own power, do good or ill ; though deſtiny may help much therein : And that the ſouls of men are all incorruptible ; but only the ſouls of good men go into other bodies, and the ſouls of wicked men are ſent O into everlaſting pain. But the Sadduces deny Fate, and affirm, that as God is the Author of no evil, ſo he takes no heed to what men do ; that a man hath power to do well

A well or ill, and every man may chuſe whether he will be good or bad; and they generally deny both pains and rewards for ſouls after this life. The Phariſees are as ſociable and loving one to another, as the Sadduces are at diſcord among themſelves, living like ſavage beaſts, and as uncourteous to their own Sect, as to ſtrangers. This is all which I have to ſpeak concerning the Philoſophers among the Jews. Now I will return to my purpoſe.

Of the Cities which Philip and Herod built; and of Pilates Government.

Ant. l. 18. c. 7.

The year of the World, 3997. after Chriſt's Nativity, 35.

ARchelaus his Ethnarchy being now made a Province, the reſt of his Brethren, to wit, Philip and Herod, who was ſurnamed Antipas, continued to govern their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying, left Julia by her Teſtament the Toparchy which ſhe ruled, as alſo Jamnia, and a ground ſet with Palm-trees in Phaſælis. When Tiberius the Son of Livia, upon the death of Auguſtus, (after he had reigned ſeven and fifty years, ſix months, and two days) was made Emperour of Rome, Philip built a City near the head of Jordan in the Country of Paneade, and called it Cæſarea; and another he built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Tiberias, and another in C Pærea on this ſide Jordan, which he named Julias. Pilate being ſent by Tiberius to be Governour over the Jews, cauſed in the night ſome Enſign on which was the Image of Cæſar to be brought into Jeruſalem; which thing, within three days after, cauſed a great tumult among the Jews: for they who beheld this action were aſtoniſhed, and conſider'd it as a violation of the Law of their Country, which forbids expreſly, any Picture or Image of men or other creatures to be brought into the City. At their lamentation who were in the City, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the villages adjoyning, and they went preſently to Pilate then at Cæſarea, beſeeching him earneſtly that the Images might be taken away out of Jeruſalem, and that the Laws of their Countrey might remain inviolated. When Pilate denied their ſuit, D they proſtrated themſelves before his houſe, and there remained lying upon their faces, for five days and nights, without moving. On the ſixth day Pilate ſitting in his Tribunal-ſeat, call'd all the Jews together before him, as though there he would have given them an anſwer: but on the ſudden a company of armed Soldiers (for ſo it was provided) compaſſed the Jews about on all ſides: The Jews were hereat amazed, ſeeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told them, that except they would receive the Images of Cæſar he would kill them all; and to that end made a ſign unto the Soldiers to draw their ſwords. The Jews, as if they had agreed together, fell all down at once, and offered their naked necks to the ſtroke of the ſword, crying out that they would rather loſe their lives, than ſuffer their Religion to be pro- E phaned. Then Pilate admiring the conſtancy of the people in their Religion, preſently commanded the ſaid Enſigns to be taken out of the City of Jeruſalem.

The people would not condeſcend to Pilate to alter their Country-laws.

Pilate admiring the conſtancy of the Jews in their Religion, ſent the Statues from Jeruſalem.

After this, he cauſed another tumult among them; for they have a ſacred Treaſure called Corban, which Pilate reſolv'd to make uſe of to bring water into the City, four hundred furlongs off: for this cauſe the people murmured; ſo that when Pilate came to Jeruſalem, they flocked about his Tribunal to make their complaint. Pilate foreſeeing a tumult, cauſed Soldiers ſecretly armed to mingle themſelves among the people in private apparrel, and commanded them not to uſe their ſwords, but to beat thoſe with clubs whom they ſaw make ſuch clamours. And when he had thus plotted the matter, ſitting in his Tribunal, he gave a ſign unto the Soldiers; and preſent- F ly the Jews were beaten; and many of them, partly with blows, and partly trodden upon by the multitude, died miſerably. The multitude amazed at the calamity of thoſe that were ſlain, held their tongues. For this cauſe Agrippa Son of Ariſtobulus, whom Herod the King his Father put to death, went to Rome, and accuſed him to Cæſar. Tiberius not admitting his accuſation, he remained ſtill at Rome, and ſought the favour of other great men there, and eſpecially he courted Caius the Son of Germanicus, he being yet a private perſon: and upon a certain day, having invited him to a banquet, he ſtretched forth his hands, and openly pray'd Almighty God inſtead of Tiberius Cæſar he might ſee him Lord of all the world. Tiberius having notice hereof by one of his familiar friends, cauſed Agrippa to be impriſoned; where G he endured hard and ſtrait impriſonment till the death of Tiberius, which was ſix months after. After he was dead (having reigned two and twenty years, ſix months, and three days) Caius Cæſar, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, freed him from pri-

The Emperour Caius orders Petronius Governour of Syria to conſtrain the Jews by arms to receive his Statue into the Temple. Petronius forbears to do it. The death of Caius ſaves him from puniſhment.

The year of the World, 4002. after Chriſt's Nativity, 40.

Ant. lib. 18. c. 15. Caius Cæſar calleth and reputeth himſelf a God. The fear the Jews had of Petronius's Army.

Caius Cæſar ſo abuſed his Authority, that he would be thought to be a god, and ſo called. Alſo he put many Noble men of his Country to death by his cruelty; which he likewiſe extended even to Judæa: for he ſent Petronius with an K army to Jeruſalem, commanding him to ſet his Statues in the Temple; and if the Jews refuſed to receive them, that thoſe who withſtood him ſhould be put to the ſword, and the reſt led away captive. Almighty God did otherwiſe diſpoſe this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three Legions, and many aſſiſtants out of Syria, came with all ſpeed from Antioch to Judæa: many of the Jews would not believe any war towards, notwithſtanding that they heard a general report thereof: and they that believed it, could not bethink themſelves of any means to reſiſt. Suddenly all were in a great fear; for the Army was now come to Ptolemais, which City is ſituate by the Sea-ſhoar in Galilee, in a fair Field; and on the Eaſt-ſide it is compaſſed with Mountains, diſtant from it threeſcore furlongs, L which belong to Galilee; on the South-ſide it is inveſted with Mount Carmel, which is diſtant an hundred and twenty furlongs: on the North-ſide it is environed with an exceeding high Mountain, which the Inhabitants call the Tyrians Ladder: this Mountain is an hundred paces diſtant from the City. Two miles from this City there is a River running by, called Pelus, a very little one, near which is the admirable Sepulchre of Memnon, which is a hundred cubits high and of a concave form. In this place is ſeen a ſort of Sand as tranſparent as Glaſs, which many ſhips carry away for Balaſt; but though they empty the place of it, yet that place is preſently after covered with the like ſand again. For there are winds which as it were on purpoſe, carry this ſand from the higher places round about it thither; and this M ſand being put into the furnace is preſently changed into Chryſtal or Glaſs. And that which in my opinion is more to be wondred at, is, that the ſand being ſo turned into Glaſs, if afterward any part thereof be caſt upon the brink of this place, it is again turned into ordinary ſand. And this is the nature of that place.

The deſcription of Ptolemais.

Sand like Glaſs near Memnon's Sepulchre.

Now the Jews with their wives and children gathered themſelves together in the field where the City Ptolemais is ſituate, and humbly beſought Petronius not to violate their Country-laws, but to have compaſſion on them. Petronius ſeeing the multitude that humbly ſued to him, and how earneſtly they ſought his favour, left Cæſar's ſtatues at Ptolemais, and himſelf went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias called all the Jews and Nobility together, he repreſents to them the power of the N Romans, and how dreadful Cæſar's threatnings ought to be to them; adding moreover, that the Jews ſupplication was indeed a contumely, ſeeing all Nations under the dominion of the Romans (the Jews only excepted) had already placed Cæſar's Statues in their Temples among thoſe of their gods: and herein they did as it were revolt from the Emperour, and affront him their Governour who repreſented his perſon. They anſwered, it was againſt the Laws and Cuſtoms of their Country: for it was not lawful for them to have the Image of God, much leſs of a man; and that they were not only forbidden by the Law to have an Image in the Temple, but alſo to have it in any prophane place. Petronius replied, if you obſerve your Laws ſo religiouſly, I muſt alſo obſerve my Lord's command; for if I do not, but ſpare you, O I ſhall be juſtly puniſhed: and 'tis not to me, but to him you muſt make your addreſſes; for I my ſelf, as well as you, am ſubject to him. At theſe words the whole multitude

Petronius certifieth the Jews of the Romans power and Cæſar's threats.

A multitude cried out together, that before they would ſee their Religion violated, they would willingly expoſe themſelves to any danger. When the noiſe of the people was ceaſed, Petronius ſaid; Are ye then prepared and minded to fight againſt Cæſar? The Jews anſwered, No, we every day offer ſacrifices for Cæſar and the Romans. But if Cæſar muſt needs place his Image in the Temple, he muſt firſt kill us all with our wives and children. Hereat Petronius greatly marvelled, and was moved to compaſſion when he beheld the conſtancy of the Jews in their Religion, and ſo great a multitude prepared to die for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he aſſembled only the Nobility of the Jews, and ſpoke to them both generally and one by one, exhorting them to obey B Cæſar's command, and ſometime admoniſhing them, otherwhile threatning them, and putting them in mind of the power of the Romans, and Cæſar's indignation, and that he muſt of neceſſity do as he was commanded. But they were moved by none of theſe. Whereupon Petronius, fearing the ground would be left untilled, (for it was now ſeed-time, and all the people had remained idle in the City for fifty days ſpace) calling them together, he ſaid, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger him ſelf. For (ſaid he) I will either (God aſſiſting me) appeaſe Cæſar's wrath, or elſe I will loſe mine own life to ſave ſuch a multitude as you are. And diſmiſſing the people, who made daily prayers to God for him, he led his Army from Ptolemais to Antioch, from whence he preſently ſent to Cæſar in all haſte, C recounting to him with how great an Army he went into Judea, and that all the whole Nation made ſupplication to him; whoſe requeſt and humble ſuit if he denied, he muſt utterly deſtroy the men and their Country; for they remained reſolute in their Countrey-religion, and vehemently reſiſted any new Law. Caius writ an anſwer of theſe Letters to Petronius, threatning him, that it ſhould coſt him his life, becauſe he made no more haſte to execute his command. The meſſengers that brought theſe Letters, were toſſed in a tempeſt upon the Sea three whole months together; but others coming after them to bring news of Caius's death, had a proſperous wind: ſo Petronius received the Letters of Caius Cæſar's death twenty ſeven days before the other threatning Letters came.

CHAP. V.

The Roman Army declares Claudius Emperour. Of the Reign and Death of Agrippa.

Caius Cæſar being aſſaſſinated, after he had reigned three years and ſix months, Claudius was made Emperour by the Army which was at Rome. The Senate by the inſtigation of the Conſuls Sentius Saturninus, and Pomponius Secundus, commanded three Legions of Soldiers to keep the City, during the Council holden in the E Capitol: and abhorring Caius Cæſar's cruelty they determined to fight againſt Claudius, and to reduce the Empire to the ancient Government; that as before-time, ſo for ever after, thoſe ſhould rule that the Senate judged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate ſent to him, requeſting him to come and take place in their Council. Claudius alſo deſired him to take part with the Army, intending to uſe his help where need required. Agrippa perceiving that Claudius was in a manner already Emperour for his power, he took part with him; who preſently ſent him as Ambaſſadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpoſe; how that firſt of all, the Soldiers, whether he would or no, ſet him in that dignity; and it had been in him an undiſcreet part, to have forſaken ſuch an offer from the Soldiers, who F did it for good will; that if he had refuſed it his life had been in danger; and it was ſufficient danger, that he had been elected Emperour. Moreover, he purpoſed to rule, not as a Tyrant, but as a good Prince: for he would be contented only with the Title of Emperour, and do nothing without the common conſent of them all, And although he was not naturally inclined to modeſt and courteous behaviour, yet he had a ſufficient example to beware, that he abuſed not his authority, by Caius Cæſar's death. Agrippa carried this meſſage to the Senate, who anſwered, (as though they truſted to their Soldiers and the Juſtice of their Cauſe) that they would not thruſt themſelves into voluntary bondage. Claudius receiving this anſwer, ſent Agrippa again to tell them, that nothing could cauſe him to abandon them by whom he was made G Emperour: and that he was forced to make war againſt them, with whom he was very loath to conteſt; and therefore willed them to chuſe a place out of the City for the battel to be fought in: for it ſtood with no reaſon to deface the City with civil wars and Maſſacres, for the obſtinacy of ſome few. Agrippa did this meſſage alſo to the Senate; and one of the Soldiers that were for the Senate drew his Sword, and ſaid, Fellow Soldiers, what ſhould move us to maſſacre our Friends, and Kindred, and Parents, who follow Claudius? eſpecially, ſeeing we have an Emperour with whom we can find no fault; unto whom we ſhould rather go forth with Congratulations, than with Arms. When he had ſaid this, he paſſed thorough the midſt of the Court, and all the Soldiers followed him.

The Senate follow the Soldiers to Claudius.

The Senate, being thus left deſolate, and abandoned by their Forces, began to be in great fear; and ſeeing it was no ſtanding out for them, they followed the Soldiers, and went to Claudius. Before the City Walls, there met them ſome that endeavour to ſhew themſelves dutiful to Claudius for his Fortunes ſake; who, having their Swords drawn, had killed the formoſt before Cæſar underſtood any thing of their coming, had not Agrippa haſtened to advertiſe him of the matter. He told him, that if he did not preſently appeaſe the Soldiers fury, now raging againſt the Citizens, all the Nobility would preſently be deſtroyed, and he ſhould be left Emperour of a deſolate place. When Claudius heard this, he repreſſed the Soldier's fury, and very honourably received the Senate into his Camp; and went forth preſently with them, and offered Sacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good Eſtate of the Empire, and to give him thanks for that Sovereignty which he held of him. Alſo, he preſently made Agrippa King of all his Father's Dominions; giving him likewiſe, all that Auguſtus had given Herod, to wit, Trachonitis and Auranitis, and beſides them, another Countrey, called the Kingdom of Lyſania; and publiſhed this his Gift by Edict to the people, and commanded the Senate to engrave that Donation in Brazen Tables, and to place it in the Capitol. Moreover, he gave the Kingdom of Chalcis to his Brother Herod, who was become alſo his Son-in-law by the marriage of Bernice, his Daughter. Agrippa now received greater Revenues of his Kingdom than he could deſire; which he ſpent not vainly, but in building ſuch a Wall about Jeruſalem, as, had he finiſhed it, the Romans could never have taken it: But before he could end that work, he died in Cæſarea; having reigned three years with the Title of King, and other three years before with that of Tetrarch. He left behind him three Daughters, which he had by Cypris; Bernice, Mariamne and Druſilla; and one Son by the ſame Wife named Agrippa; who, becauſe he was very young Claudius reduced the Kingdom into a Province, and made Cuſpius Fadus Governour thereof. After whom ſucceeded Tiberius Alexander; who nothing violating the Laws of the Nation, ruled them in Peace. After this, Herod, King of Chalcis, died; leaving behind him two Sons, which he had by his Brother's Daughter Bernice; to wit, Bernicianus and Hircanus; and by his firſt Wife Mariamne, Ariſtobulus. His other Brother alſo, Ariſtobulus, died a private perſon, leaving one Daughter, Jotapa. And theſe were the Poſterity of Ariſtobulus, Son of King Herod by Mariamne, whom he put to death: But his elder Brother Alexander's Poſterity reigned in the greater Armenia.

Of divers Tumults in Judæa and Samaria.

A filthy fact and ſpeech of a Soldier againſt the Jews on a Feſtival day.

After the death of Herod, who reigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa, the Son of the former Agrippa, King of Chalcis, his Unkle's Kingdom: And Cumanus was made Ruler of the other Province after Tiberius Alexander; under whom many new tumults and calamities befel the Jews. For when they were aſſembled together at the Feaſt of Unleavened bread in Jeruſalem, the Roman Soldiers ſtanding in the Porch of the Temple (for always armed men kept that place upon Feſtival days, leſt the people gathered together ſhould make any tumult) one of the Soldiers taking up his coat, turned his bare buttocks againſt the Jews faces, ſpeaking words as unſeemly as was his geſture. At which inſolence the whole multitude began to murmur; and they flocked about Cumanus, requeſting him to puniſh the Soldier for his miſdemeanour: And ſome of them, raſh young men, and prone to Sedition, began to revile the Soldiers, and threw ſtones at them. Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Jews would violently move againſt him, called to him many armed Soldiers, and ſent them to ſeize the Gates of the Temple. The Jews being in great fear, fled, and left the Temple; and there was ſuch a throng, that as they haſted to flee, above ten thouſand people were preſt and trodden to death: So that this Feſtival day was turned into woful lamentations and mournings in every place. This calamity was followed ſoon after by another;

Cumanus feareth the people's rage. Some ten thouſand men thronged to death.

A another; for near Bethoron, one Stephanus, Servant to Cæſar, carrying ſome rich houſhold-ſtuff, was robbed of it in the High-way. But Cumanus ſending for thoſe in the Villages next adjoyning, in order to diſcover the Thieves, commanded them to be bound and brought to him, becauſe they had not taken the Thieves: In one of which Villages a certain Soldier finding the Book of the Holy Scripture, cut it in pieces, and burnt it. Hereupon all the Jews of this Countrey gathered themſelves together from all places, being no leſs incenſed, than if they had ſeen their Countrey ſet on fire; and carried by zeal for their Religion, they forthwith went to Cæſarea, to Cumanus, there beſeeching him, that the Soldier, who had affronted God and their Law, might not eſcape unpuniſhed. Cumanus perceiving that the Jews would not be appeaſed without B ſome ſatisfaction, condemned the Soldier to death, and ſent him to Execution in their preſence; which done, they all departed.

A Soldier cuts the Book of the Holy Scripture in pieces and burneth it

The Soldier executed, that burned the Bible.

At the ſame time there aroſe a great difference between the Galileans and Samaritans; for at a Village called Geman, ſcituate in the great Plain of Samaria, a certain Galilean, of the number of the Jews that came to the Feaſt, was ſlain: For which fact many Galileans joyned together, to be revenged of the Samaritans: And the Principal of the Countrey went to Cumanus, requeſting him, before any more harm were done, to go into Galilee, and puniſh the Authors of this Murther. But Cumanus being buſied in greater Affairs, ſent them away without granting their requeſt. When this murther was known in Jeruſalem, all the multitude left the ſolemnity of the Feſtival, C and went to Samaria, refuſing to be reſtrained by the Magiſtrates. Of this their Tumult and Sedition, the Son of Dinæus, called Eleazar, and one Alexander, were Captains; who, with violence entring the Borders of the Countrey of Lacrabatana, killed man, woman and child, and burnt the Towns. When Cumanus heard this, he took the Cavalry of Sebaſte, and went to help them that were thus oppreſſed; and he killed and made Priſoners many of them who took part with Eleazar. Now the Magiſtrates of Jeruſalem went out to the reſt of the Jews which ſo waſted Samaria, clothed in ſackcloth, and aſhes upon their heads, and beſeeched them not to ſeek revenge upon the Samaritans, leſt thereby they moved the Romans to deſtroy Jeruſalem; but to be merciful to their Countrey, the Temple, their Wives and Children, and not at once hazard D all, and overthrow their whole Countrey and Nation in revenging the death of one Galilean. The Jews hereby were pacified, and departed. At the ſame time there were many that made it their Trade to rob and ſteal (as moſt commonly people by long peace grow inſolent) ſo that they robbed in every part of the Countrey, and the ſtrongeſt and moſt audacious oppreſſed thoſe that were weaker. Hereupon the Samaritans went to Tyre, to pray Numidius Quadratus, Governour of Syria, to revenge them of thoſe that ſo robbed and ſpoiled their Countrey. The chief men of the Jews went thither alſo; and Jonathas, the Son of Ananus, who was High Prieſt, defended the Jews againſt the Samaritans Accuſation; affirming, the Samaritans to have been cauſe of that tumult by killing the Galilean; and that Cumanus was cauſe of the reſt of their E calamities, who refuſed to puniſh the murtherers. Quadratus for that time ſent away both Parties, promiſing them that when he came into their Countrey, he would diligently enquire of the matter: And coming from thence to Cæſarea, he crucified all thoſe whom Cumanus had made Priſoners. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritans complaints, and ſent for eighteen men, whom he underſtood for certain to have been in that broil, and beheaded them, and ſent the two High-Prieſts, Jonathas and Ananias, and his Son Ananus, with ſome of the moſt conſiderable Jews, to Cæſar; and alſo, the chief of the Samaritans. He likewiſe commanded Cumanus and Celer the Tribune, to go to Rome, and juſtifie themſelves to Claudius, for that which they had done in that Countrey.

to Antioch. Cæſar at Rome hearing the Allegations of Cumanus, and the Samaritans (Agrippa was alſo there, earneſtly defending the Cauſe of the Jews; as alſo Cumanus was aſſiſted by many Potentates) he pronounced ſentence againſt the Samaritans, and commanded three of their chief Nobility to be put to death, and baniſhed Cumanus, and ſent Celer the Tribune bound to Jeruſalem, that the Jews might draw him about the City, and then cut off his head. This done, he ſent Fælix, Brother to Pallas, to govern Judæa, Samaria and Galilee. And he preferred Agrippa from Chalcis, to a greater Kingdom; making him King of that Province, whereof Philip had been Tetrarch; to G wit, Trachonitis, Batanæa and Gaulanitis; adding thereunto the Kingdom of Lyſania, and the Tetrarchy whereof Varus had been Governour. Claudius having reigned thirteen

Ant. lib. 20. cap. 12.

BUt I think my ſelf to relate particularly the Actions of this Emperour towards the Jews. He made Ariſtobulus, Herod's Son, King of the leſſer Armenia; and added to Agrippa's Kingdom, four Cities, and the Territories belonging unto them: Two of them, Abila and Julias, were in the Countrey of Peræa; the other, Tarichæa and Tiberias, were in Galilee: And he made Felix Governour over the reſt of Judæa. This Felix took Eleazar, Captain of the Thieves, after he had robbed and ſpoiled the Countrey twenty years, and many more with him, and ſent them bound to Cæſar; and he crucified a great number of them, who either were Thieves and his Confederates, or K elſe had aſſiſted him. The Countrey was no ſooner cleanſed from theſe, but preſently another ſort of Thieves aroſe in Jeruſalem, called Sicarii, from their ſhort Swords, who at high Noon in the midſt of the City killed many in every place; and eſpecially at the celebrating of Holy Feaſts, they mixed themſelves with the multitude, having ſhort Swords under their coats, and therewith killed thoſe to whom they bare any grudge; and when men fell down dead, they amongſt the reſt, cried out of the murther.
By this deceitful means they were a long time unſuſpected and unknown. And firſt of all, they killed Jonathan the High Prieſt, and after him, every day ſome were ſlain; and the City was put in no leſs fear, than if it had been in a time of War, for each man every moment expected death, and caſt a diligent eye upon thoſe that came L near him, and no man truſted his familiar friends; and yet were they murthered, whilſt they were looking about them to eſcape danger. So cunningly did theſe Thieves cover aud conceal their actions. Moreover, there aroſe another ſort of miſchievous people, who did not ſo much harm with their hands as the firſt, but with their impious counſel more; and did no leſs trouble the quiet Eſtate of the City, than did the Thieves. Theſe people being Vagabonds and Juglers, deſiring alteration under pretence of Religion, made the people frantick; for they led them into the Wilderneſs, affirming, that there God would ſhew them tokens of his purpoſe to ſet them at liberty.
Fœlix, perceiving that theſe Aſſemblies tended to Rebellion, ſent an Army of Horſe and Foot againſt theſe people, and killed many of them. M

An Egyptian Prophet gathereth well nigh thirty thouſand men.

Fœlix overthroweth the Egyptian.

But a certain Egyptian, a falſe Prophet, occaſioned a far greater Maſſacre among the Jews than this: for being a Magician, he came into the Countrey; and calling himſelf a Prophet, he gathered unto him almoſt thirty thouſand Jews, who were by his Magick Arts ſeduced: and leading them from the Wilderneſs to Mount Olivet, he determined from thence to go to Jeruſalem, and to drive thence the Forces of the Romans, and there to fix the ſeat of his Dominion over the people. He choſe for his Guard a good number of his followers. Fœlix foreſeeing his intent, met him with his Legions of Romans, and a great number of other Jews; and fighting againſt him, the Egyptian being defeated, fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to Priſon, and the reſt of the multitude diſperſed themſelves into their Countrey. Theſe N being thus repreſſed, another part (as it happeneth in a ſick body) began to riſe: For ſome Magicians and Thieves being gathered together, exhorted the people to ſhake off the Roman Yoke, and threatned preſent death to thoſe that continued to ſuffer ſo ſhameful a Servitude; ſo that they forced them who were contented with their ſubjection to the Romans, to diſobey them. Theſe people being diſperſed all over the Countrey robbed and ſacked rich men's houſes; killed them, and fired the Villages; ſo that all Judæa was in extream fear of them, and every day their cruelty encreaſed.

The Thieves and Magicians work much miſchief to many men.

At this time aroſe another tumult at Cæſarea, between the Jews that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Jews challenged the City to be theirs, becauſe it was founded by O Herod, who was a Jew. But the Syrians denying not that the builder of the City was a Jew; yet affirmed, that it ought to paſs for a Greek City; for (ſaid they) the Founder

A Founder would not have placed in it Shrines and Statues, if he had meant that it ſhould have belonged to the Jews. Hereupon there aroſe a great controverſie among the Jews and Syrians, ſo that the matter came to blows; and every day, thoſe that were the hardieſt of both parts, fought together. For the wiſer ſort of the Jews could not reſtrain thoſe of their Nation from being ſeditious; and the Greeks ſcorned to give place to the Jews. The Jews ſurpaſſed them in Riches and ſtrength of body, and the Grecians truſted to the help of the Roman Soldiers; for a great many of the Roman Army being levied in Syria, were ready to aſſiſt the Syrians, becauſe of Kindred and Conſanguinity. The Officers that commanded them endeavoured to appeaſe the Tumult, and took thoſe that were moſt ſeditious, and beat them, and caſt them into Priſon. B But the puniſhment of thoſe that were apprehended, terrified not the reſt; on the contrary, they were hereby more tumultuous. Fœlix finding them at blows as he paſſed into the great Market-place, commanded the Jews, who had the advantage, to retire; and becauſe they obeyed not, he ſent for Soldiers, who ſlew them, and plundered their Goods. The Sedition being ſtill on foot, he ſent ſome of the Nobility on either Part, to Nero, to plead their Cauſe before him. Feſtus ſucceeded Fœlix, who vigorouſly perſecuted them that troubled the Countrey, and deſtroyed many Thieves.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Albinus and Florus, Preſidents of Judæa.

Albinus, who ſucceeded Feſtus, followed not his ſteps; for there was no miſchief ſo great, which he was not guilty of: For, he, not only took away by force men's Goods from them under colour of Juſtice, and at his own pleaſure exacted a greater Tribute; but alſo freed and let looſe any one, whom, either the Magiſtrates of the City took, or his Predeceſſors had left in Priſon, ſo that their Friends would give a piece of money; and they only, who were not able to give money, were impriſoned D as moſt hainous Offenders. At this time, they in Jeruſalem that deſired alteration, began to take courage; and thoſe that were rich among them feed Albinus with money, to have his Protection: and the common people that loved not to be in quiet, were much pleaſed with Albinus's Government; and each of the moſt wicked, had a Troop of Thieves after him: But Albinus himſelf was over them all, as chief of the Thieves; whom he uſed as his Guard to rob the meaner ſort. They, whoſe houſes were ſacked and ſpoiled, were glad to hold their peace; and they, who yet had eſcaped, were glad to be very officious towards thoſe who deſerved death, for fear they ſhould ſuffer it. In general, no men could truſt one another. Every one trembled under the Rule of ſo many Tyrants: And all theſe miſchiefs were the Seeds of the Servitude, which after befel this miſerable City. E

Notwithſtanding that Albinus was of ſuch behaviour, yet Geſſius Florus, who ſucceeded him, ſo behaved himſelf, that in compariſon of him, Albinus might have been thought a good Governour. For Albinus did all things ſecretly and craftily, but Geſſius committed any iniquity, how great ſoever, ſo openly, as though he gloried in miſchief; and behaved himſelf, not as a Ruler of the Countrey, but as a hangman ſent to execute Malefactors; omitting no manner of Theft, nor any means whereby he might afflict the people. Where he ought to have ſhewed pity, there he was a Tyrant; and where he ought to have been aſhamed, there he ſhewed himſelf ſhameleſs. No man ever could invent more means to betray the truth, and deviſe more ſubtil ways to do F harm, than he; for it ſufficed him not, for his own gain to abuſe men one by one at his pleaſure, but he waſted and ſpoiled whole Cities at once, and deſtroyed the people in great multitudes. He was not aſhamed, by the publick voice of a Cryer, to proclaim it thorough the whole Countrey, lawful for any one that would, to rob and ſteal, ſo that they would bring him a part of their Booty. In brief, his Avarice was ſuch, that the Countrey was almoſt left deſolate; people forſaking their own native home, and fleeing into ſtrange Lands. And all the time that Ceſtius Gallus was Governour of Syria, no man durſt go to him, to make any complaint againſt Florus. But when, at the Feaſt of Unleavened Bread, Gallus came to Jeruſalem, there met him a multitude of the Jews above three hundred thouſand; all beſeeching him to help and ſuccour their G afflicted Countrey, and baniſh Florus, who was the very Peſt of their Nation. Yet Florus was ſo impudent, that being with Gallus, and hearing theſe Out-cries againſt him, he was no whit moved, but laughed at it. Ceſtius for that time appeaſed the people was the ſafeſt means to cloak his villanies: for if they continued in peace and obedience, he feared that ſome of them would accuſe him before Cæſar; but if he could make them revolt, then he hoped that their great fault would ſhadow his injuſtices.

Wherefore to bring about his purpoſe, he every day oppreſſed them with new calamities, in order to force them to rebel againſt the Romans. At this time Florus's perjury and deceit toward the Jews.

The conflict of the Jews with the Cæſareans.

Florus impriſoneth twelve of the chiefeſt Jews in Cæſarea.

Another cauſe of war raiſed by Florus.

HOw great ſoever the Evils were which Florus perpetrated tyrannically, our Nation ſuffer'd them without revolting. But that which hapned at Cæſarea was as a ſpark that kindled the fire of War. The Jews dwelling at Cæſarea, had a Synagogue near unto a piece of ground that belonged unto a Gentile dwelling there. The Jews often K ſought to purchaſe it of him, offering him far more than it was worth: but the man not only contemn'd their requeſt, but alſo, to their great grief, he reſolv'd in that place to build Taverns; and ſo to leave them a very ſtrait and narrow paſſage to go to their Synagogue. Some young men among the Jews, led with zeal, reſiſted the workmen, and would not ſuffer them to build. Florus hearing this, commanded the Jews to let the workmen go forward in their work. The Jews not knowing what to do, one John, a Publican, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building; whom he promiſed for that money to fulfil their requeſt: and now having it, he preſently departed from Cæſarea, and went to Sebaſte without performing L any thing, giving as it were occaſion of ſedition, as though he had received money of the Nobility of the Jews to permit them to fight a certain time. The next day, which was the Jews Sabbath, when they were all aſſembled to go to the Synagogue, one of Cæſarea, a ſeditious perſon, took a great earthen veſſel, and ſet it at the entrance into the Synagogue, and upon it offer'd Birds. This fact ſo moved the Jews, that they would not be pacified, becauſe it was done in contempt of their Religion and thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Jews that was more modeſt and wiſe, counſelled the Jews to complain to them that were in Authority: but thoſe who by heat of youth were prone to ſedition, began contumeliouſly to revile their adverſaries. On the other ſide, the authors of this action and the more ſeditious of the people of Cæſarea were alſo prepared to fight with them, having M cauſed it to be done before the Synagogue, only to pick a quarrel; and ſo they fought together. Jucundus, General of the Horſe, that was left to keep all in quiet, preſently came with Soldiers, and commanded the Veſſel to be taken away, and ſo endeavoured to appeaſe the tumult: but not being able to do it through the violence of them of Cæſarea; the Jews took the Books of their Law, and retired themſelves to a place called Narbata, belonging to them, which was diſtant from Cæſarea threeſcore furlongs: from whence twelve of the chief of them, together with John the Publican, went to Florus being at Sebaſte, to complain of the injury done to them, and to requeſt him to aſſiſt them, and modeſtly put him in mind of the eight Talents they gave him. But he preſently commanded them to be bound and impriſoned, N becauſe they had preſumed to take and carry their Law from Cæſarea.
Hereat thoſe of Jeruſalem were greatly moved; but they ſhewed it not. Whereupon Florus, as upon ſet purpoſe to give occaſion of rebellion, ſent for ſeventeen Talents out of the Sacred Treaſury, pretending that it was to be employed in Cæſar's affairs. At this time the people were much troubled, and ran to the Temple calling upon the name of Cæſar, that he would deliver them from Florus his tyranny.
Some of them being ſeditious, began to curſe Florus bitterly, and took a Box, and carried it about and begged an alms for Florus; which they did in deriſion, as who ſhould ſay, he was as miſerable as beggars that have nothing. Florus for all this abated not his avarice, but was more eager to rob the inhabitants of their goods. O
So that when he ſhould have gone to Cæſarea, to have quieted the ſedition and removed

The people to pacifie him, went out in courteous ſort to meet the Army, ſhewing themſelves ready to give them the beſt entertainment they could, and to receive Florus with all honour and reverence. But he ſent before him one Capito a Centurion, with fifty horſemen; commanding them to depart, and not to mock him with a pretence of honour, whom they had ſo heynouſly affronted. That if they had any courage, they ſhould flout and reproach him to his face; and not only in words, but in deeds ſhew, that they deſired liberty. Herewithal the multitude was terrified; and the horſemen that came with Capito aſſaulting them with violence, every B one fled before they ſaluted Florus, or did any honour to his troops: and going every one unto his houſe, they paſt the watchful night in fear and ſorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the King's Palace. The next day he cauſed a Tribunal openly to be placed, and the high Prieſt and all the chief of the Jews reſorted thither and ſtood before the Tribunal. Then Florus ſitting in the Tribunal-ſeat, commanded them to bring forth preſently all thoſe, that had uſed any opprobrious words againſt him, and threatned to be revenged on them except they did it. The Jews made anſwer, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietneſs, and requeſted that they that had offended in words, might obtain pardon. For it was no marvel in ſo great a multitude, if there were ſome raſh and fooliſh young men: and that it was C impoſſible to diſcern all that offended, ſeeing every one was now penitent for that which was done, and at leaſt for fear would deny it; and that if he intended to maintain the quietneſs of the Nation, and preſerve the City ſtill to the Romans, he then muſt rather pardon a few ſeditious for ſo many good mens ſake, than revenge himſelf of a few wicked perſons, by the hurt and moleſtation of ſo many that thought no harm. Hereat Florus's Choler was increaſed, and preſently he commanded the Soldiers to plunder the Market-place (which was the higher part of the City) where things were ſold, and put all they met or found to the ſword. The Soldiers who were deſirous of gain, having now authority from their Ruler, did not only ſack the place they were ſent to, but alſo all the houſes, and murthered the Inhabitants. D All ſtreets and gates were filled with them that ſought to flee, and the dead bodies of them that fell into the Soldiers hands: no ſort of ſpoyling was omitted. They alſo apprehended many of the Nobility, and brought them to Florus: and he cauſing them to be whipt, afterward hanged them. There were ſlain on that day, of men, women and Children (for they ſpared not the infants) ſix hundred and thirty. So horrid an action appeared ſo much the more inſupportable to the Jews, in regard it was a new ſort of cruelty which the Romans had never exerciſed. Florus then doing that which none before durſt ever preſume to do: for he cauſed Knights before the Tribunal-ſeat to be whipped, and after hanged; who though they were Jews born, yet had received that dignity from the Romans.

CHAP. XV.

Of another oppreſſion of the Citizens of Jeruſalem by Florus.

AT this time King Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to ſee Alexander, whom Nero had ſent to be ruler over Egypt. His Siſter Bernice in the mean while remained in Jeruſalem; and ſeeing the cruelty of the Soldiers, ſhe was much grieved, and F often ſent the Lieutenant of her horſemen and her own guard to Florus, requeſting him to abſtain from the ſlaughter of the Citizens. But he, neither regarding the multitude of them that were ſlain, nor the dignity of her that entreated, but only his private gain, and what he could gather by oppreſſion and rapine, denied her requeſt: ſo that the rage of the Soldiers extended it ſelf alſo againſt the Queen. For they did not only before her face beat and kill all that came in their way, but they had alſo killed her, had ſhe not fled into the Palace, where ſhe watcht all night, keeping a guard about her, in fear that the Soldiers would break in upon her. She came to Jeruſalem to fulfil her vow to God: for it is the cuſtom, that if any be afflicted with grievous ſickneſs, or be in any other diſtreſs, they muſt abide in prayer thirty days before they offer ſacrifice, and abſtain from wine, and ſhave their hair; which G cuſtom Queen Bernice then obſerving, went alſo barefoot to Florus his Tribunal-ſeat, to entreat him: but he not only contemned, but alſo put her in danger of her life. This was done the ſixteenth day of May. The day after, the multitude gathered together that ſo many were ſlain,and eſpecially uſed contumelious words againſt Florus: which the Nobility and high Prieſts (fearing death) apprehending, beſeeched them to abſtain from ſuch words as had already cauſed that calamity in the City, and not to provoke Florus to greater indignation. And ſo the multitude was pacified for their ſakes who entreated, and hoped that hereafter Florus would deſiſt from ſuch cruelty. Florus, when he ſaw the multitude quieted, was ſorry: and that he might again provoke them, he aſſembled together the Nobility and high Prieſts, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not ſeek alteration any more, if they would go in courteous manner and meet the Soldiers which were coming from Cæſarea, whereof there were two Legions. Having thus aſſembled the Jews together to I go meet the Soldiers; he alſo ſent and commanded the Centurions not to ſalute the Jews who came to meet them: and if therefore the Jews were offended, and gave any hard ſpeeches, they ſhould fall upon them with their weapons. The high Prieſts aſſembling themſelves together in the Temple, deſired them to go, and ſolemnly meet and entertain the Soldiers, for fear of a greater inconvenience. Notwithſtanding this counſel, thoſe that were ſeditious refuſed to do as they were requeſted: and others for grief of them that were ſlain, took part with the ſeditious.

The exhortation of the Prieſts and Princes to the people.

Then all the Prieſts and Levites brought forth the holy veſſels and ornaments of the Temple, and with Harps, ſongs, and muſical inſtruments came before the multitude, and on their knees conjur'd them by the care, that they ought to have of K the honour and preſervation of the Temple, not to provoke the Romans through contumelious words, leſt they ſhould ſack the Temple. There might you have ſeen the chief of the Prieſts with aſhes upon their heads, and their cloaths rent, ſo that their naked breaſts were perceived; calling every Nobleman by his name, and ſpeaking to all the multitude, requeſting them not for a ſmall offence, to betray their whole Country to them, who ſtill gaped after the deſtruction thereof. For what thanks ſhall ye have from the Romans for your former ſalutations, if now in hope of amendment of your miſeries you go not forth to meet them? contrariwiſe, if you would go to them in ſolemn manner, then you take from Florus all occaſion of violence, and ſave your Country from ruine, and your ſelves from further calamities. L Adding that it was a great ſhame that ſuch a multitude ſhould be led away with a few ſeditious perſons; and that it was more fit that ſo many ſhould force thoſe few ſeditious people to obey them, and joyn with them in opinion.

The event ſheweth Florus's intent and counſel. The ſlaughter of the Jews.

With theſe perſwaſions they mollified the obſtinacy of the Jews, and alſo perſwaded many of the ſeditious people, ſome with threats, and ſome with reverence of themſelves to be pacified. And ſo they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Roman Soldiers. At their coming near them they ſaluted them; who anſwering nothing again, thoſe of the Jews that were ſeditious, began to rail againſt Florus, by whoſe order this was done: whom preſently the Soldiers apprehending, beat them with clubs; and the reſt flying, the Roman horſemen purſued M them, and trode upon them with their horſes. Many were ſlain, by the Romans, and more were killed in the throng, one tumbling upon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the City; for every one haſting and ſtriving to get in, hindred themſelves and others. Many died moſt miſerably in the throng, and ſome were ſtifled, and ſome preſt to death and trodden upon; ſo that their neighbours coming to bury them, could not know them. The Soldiers alſo cruelly aſſaulted them, killing all that they could come to, and hindred the people from going in by the gate called Bezetha, becauſe they deſired firſt to recover the Temple and the Caſtle called Antonia.

The ſeditious for fear leſt Florus ſhould ſeize their ſpoils, flee to the Temple. Florus taketh the ſpoils, and entreth the Temple. Florus ſeeing the Jews inexpugnable in the Temple, ſurceaſeth his violence, and leaving a band behind him, goeth to Cæſarea.

At the ſame time Florus coming with a party of Soldiers out of the Palace purſued N them thither, ſtriving to get the Caſtle; yet he did not prevail: for the people made reſiſtance, and threw down ſtones from the houſes tops, and killed many of the Romans; who being peſter'd with ſtones and darts caſt from aloft, could not reſiſt the people, who on every ſide came againſt them, but retired themſelves to the reſt of the army at the King's Palace. Thoſe that were ſeditious, fearing that Florus would again aſſault them, and by the Caſtle Antonia get entrance into the Temple got upon the Galleries that reached from the Porch of the Temple to Antonia, and beat them down, hereby to defeat the covetouſneſs of Florus, who greedily gaped after the ſacred Treaſure, and ſtrived to enter by Antonia into the Temple to take it: but ſeeing the Porches beaten down, he offered no more violence. And calling O together the high Prieſts and Nobility, he ſaid that he was content to depart out of the City, but he would leave them as great a garriſon as they would requeſt. Whereunto

B Of Politianus the Tribune: King Agrippa's ſpeech to the Jews, exhorting them to obey the Romans.

Florus yet deviſed another way to ſtir the Jews to rebellion: for he ſent word to Ceſtius that the Jews were revolted, impudently belying them to have committed that which indeed they endured at his hands. The Nobles of Jeruſalem and Bernice certified Ceſtius of all that Florus had done. He receiving Letters from both parties, deliberated with his Officers what to do. Some counſelled Ceſtius to go into Judea with an army, and puniſh the Jews, if they were revolted; and if they were not, then to confirm them in their obedience. Yet it pleaſed him better to ſend ſome about him thither before, to bring him true news of their eſtate, and what had C hapned. So he ſent Politianus the Tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa in Jamnia as he was returning from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was ſent. Here alſo were preſent the Prieſts and the chief of the Jews, to welcome Agrippa; and having ſaluted him as courteouſly as they could, they preſently bewayled the miſery which had befaln their Nation, and the cruelty of Florus. Which although Agrippa compaſſionated, yet he made as if he were angry with the Jews whom he greatly pitied; purpoſing hereby to allay their paſſions in ſtead of further irritating them by teſtifying the ſame ſentiments to revenge. All the better ſort, who for the ſake of their lands and eſtates deſired quietneſs, well perceived that the Kings reprehenſion was not of malice, but for their good.

Ceſtius Gallus, Preſident of Syria conſulteth with the Princes what were beſt to be done.

Politianus is ſent to Jeruſalem, and meets with Agrippa

D Alſo the people of Jeruſalem went out to meet the King threeſcore furlongs off, and received him and Politianus very courteouſly; yet the women lamented the death of their husbands ſlain, and with tears moved the whole multitude to ſorrow, who beſought Agrippa to have compaſſion on their Nation, and entreated alſo Politianus to go into the City, and behold what Florus had done. There they ſhewed him the Market-place deſart, and the houſes deſtroyed; and by means of Agrippa they perſwaded him to go round about the City as far as Siloa, only with one man, and behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romans in all things, and only were enemies to Florus who had uſed them ſo cruelly. Politianus having gone about the whole City, aſcended into the Temple E where he well perceived many arguments of the Jews fidelity towards the Romans: and calling the people there together, he praiſed their loyalty, and exhorted them ſtill to continue in like obedience, and worſhipped God and the holy places, as far as the Law permitted him: and ſo he returned to Ceſtius. After his departure, the multitude of the Jews came to Agrippa and the high Prieſts, requeſting them to ſend Ambaſſadours againſt Florus to Nero, becauſe otherwiſe they ſhould give occaſion to think it a voluntary rebellion, by not complaining of ſuch murthers: For Florus would make him believe that they had rebelled, except they went to him to ſhew that Florus gave firſt occaſion; and it was certain that the multitude would not be quieted, if any one hindred that Embaſſage. Agrippa thought F it would be an hateful matter to ſend Ambaſſadours to Rome to accuſe Florus; and on the other ſide he perceived, that it was to no purpoſe to contradict the Jews, who were ready now to rebel: wherefore calling the people together he made a ſpeech to them, having ſeated his ſiſter Bernice in an eminent place in the houſe of the Aſmoneans. The porch wherein he called them together, was in ſuch a place that it overlook'd all the higher part of the City, for there was only a bridge between it and the Temple, which joyned this and that together; and there he ſpake to the Jews in manner following: If I ſaw that you were reſolved to make war againſt the Romans, and that the better part of the the people were not inclined to peace, I would not have come unto you, nor have preſumed to have counſelled you in any thing. For it is in vain to give G *counſel of ſuch things as are expedient, where all the Auditors are already determined to follow that which is contrary to the counſel given them. Agrippa ſtriveth to make the common ſort flexible and attentive.

It behoveth to honour the Magiſtrate, and not to provoke him by injury.

Agrippa excuſeth Cæſar and the Romans.

Depulſion of the Jews liberty, which they ſo vehemently ſeek others are moved with a raſh and unadviſed deſire of liberty, and others are drawn by avarice and hope of gain in combuſtions, I thought good to aſſemble you all together, and declare unto you what means are to be uſed to reſtrain ſuch people, that the good may the better know how to reſiſt and overcome the practices of the wicked. But let no man murmur, if he hear that which diſpleaſeth him, and I will tell you nothing but that which ſeemeth expedient for you. For they that are ſo bent to rebellion, that they will not be recalled, may for all my words continue in the ſame mind ſtill. And I will ſpeak nothing at all, except you will all keep ſilence. I know many ſeek to aggravate the injuries that are done by the Rulers of this Country, and highly commend and extol liberty: yet before I begin to declare unto you the difference between you and thoſe againſt whom ye purpoſe to make war, I muſt firſt divide and ſeparate two things which you think inſeparable. For if you ſeek only to get ſatisfaction upon thoſe that have injur'd you, why do ye ſo extol liberty? or if you think it not tolerable to obey any other, theſe complaints againſt your Rulers are ſuperfluous: for although they were never ſo mild, ſtill would ſubjection be intolerable. Call all things to mind, and conſider what a ſmall cauſe of war is given you. And firſt of all weigh with your ſelves the crimes and offences of your Rulers; for you ought to ſhew your ſelves humble and dutiful to thoſe that are in authority, and not exaſperate and provoke them to wrath by reproachful ſpeeches. For in reviling them for ſmall offences, you incite againſt you thoſe whom you ſo revile: and whereas before they only did you a little injury, and with ſome ſhame, now being moved by your reſiſtance, they will openly ſet upon you and deſtroy you. There is nothing that ſo reſtraineth cruelty as patience; ſo that oft-times the patience of them who have ſuffered injury, makes them that did the injury aſhamed thereof. Be it ſo that they, which are ſent into the Provinces and appointed by the Romans for your Governours, are grievous to you: yet all the Romans do not oppreſs you, nor Cæſar, againſt whom you muſt take arms. For they command no cruel Governours to come to you; nor can they who are in the furtheſt part of the Weſt, eaſily know what is done in the Eaſt, or indeed be exactly informed thereof. And truly it is a thing moſt againſt reaſon to take arms for ſo ſmall a cauſe; eſpecially, when they againſt whom you take arms know nothing of the matter. But there is reaſon to hope, that theſe matters you now complain of will not be always ſo: For there will not be always the ſame Governour; and it is credible, that they who ſucceed this, will be more gentle and courteous. But if once you begin to make war, it is not eaſie to end or ſuſtain it without great calamities. And let them who ſo thirſt after liberty, diligently adviſe with themſelves, that they do not bring upon their necks a greater bondage. Slavery is a cruel thing; and it ſeemeth a lawful cauſe to make War to avoid being brought into it; yet he that is already in bondage and revolteth, is rather a rebellious ſlave, than one who loveth liberty. Tou ſhould therefore have endeavoured to reſiſt the Romans, when firſt Pompey entred this Land: but then our anceſtors and their Kings far exceeding you in riches, ſtrength of body and courage, were not able to withſtand a ſmall part of the Roman forces; and do you who are their ſucceſſors, and far weaker than they, having ſucceeded them in ſubjection, think that you are able to reſiſt all the whole power of the Romans?

The compariſon of the Romans force with the Jews weakneſs.

The Romans have brought the whole world under their government, and have ſought another world beyond the Ocean ſea.

The Athenians, who ſometime to preſerve the liberty of Greece, feared not to ſet their own City on fire, and with a ſmall fleet defeated that proud Xerxes, whom they forced to flee with one ſhip (though he had ſuch a navy that the ſeas had ſcarce room for one ſhip to ſail by another, and all Europe was not able to receive his army) and got that famous victory over Aſia, near the little Iſle of Salamina, yet now are ſubject to the Romans, and that City, the Queen of all Greece, is now ruled by the commands it receives from Italy. The Lacedemonians alſo, after they had gotten ſuch a victory at the Thermopyles, and under their General Ageſilaus ſacked Aſia, acknowledge now the Romans for their Lords. The Macedonians alſo, who had before their eyes the valour of Philip, and Alexander, and promiſed themſelves the Empire of the whole world, now patiently bear this change, and obey them whom fortune hath made their maſters. Many other Nations, who for their power and ſtrength have far more cauſe than you to ſeek their liberty, yet patiently endure to ſerve the Romans: But you only think it a diſgrace to obey them, who are Lords of the whole World. And where are the armies that you truſt in or your navy to make you maſters of the Roman Seas? Where are your treaſures to effect what you intend? Think you that you are to war againſt the Egyptians or Arabians? and do you not conſider the bounds of the Roman Empire? Do you not conſider your own inability? Know you not that your neighbour-nations have often by force taken your City? and that the forces of the Romans have paſſed thorow the whole world unconquered, and as it were ſearching for ſomething geater than the world? Are you richer than the Gauls, ſtronger than the Germans, wiſer than the Greeks; are you more in number than the whole world beſide? What hope can you have to encourage you againſt the Romans? But ſome of you will ſay, that bondage is a grievous thing. But how much more ſhould the Greeks think ſo, that were thought to be the nobleſt Nation under heaven, and had ſuch large dominions; yet now obey the Roman Governours? as alſo the Macedonians do, who have greater cauſe than you to ſeek their liberty? What ſhall I ſay of the five hundred Cities of Aſia? do they B not all obey one ruler, and the authority of one Conſul, without any garriſon? What ſhall I ſpeak of the Enochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Helleſpont, and Pontus, and about Mæotis, who in times paſt had no maſters, no, not of their own Nation, yet now three thouſand Soldiers keep them in awe; and forty long Gallies keep peaceably thoſe ſeas that were never ſailed on before? What think you, the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and thoſe of Pamphilia, Lydia and Cilicia, could ſay for their liberty, who notwithſtanding peaceably pay tribute to the Romans? What of the Thracians, whoſe country is five days journey in breadth, and ſeven in length, far more inacceſſible and ſtronger than yours, by reaſon of the mountains of Snow and Ice? yet do they obey two thouſand Romans, who are in garriſon? Beſide them the Illyrians, whoſe country reacheth to Dalmatia and Iſter, are kept in obedience only by two Legions, with help of C whom they alſo reſiſt the Dacians. The Dalmatians themſelves, who have ſo often attempted their own liberty, and ſtill as their wealth increaſed rebelled, are now in peace under one Legion of the Romans. Nay, if any have reaſon to rebel, 'tis the Gauls, whoſe country is by nature ſtrong, being on the Eaſt-ſide compaſſed with the Alpes, on the North with the River of Rhene, on the South with the Pyrenæan mountains, on the Weſt with the Ocean. Notwithſtanding, having amongſt them three hundred and five Nations, and as it were the very fountain of plenty of all ſort of goods and commodities wherewith they inrich the whole World; yet do they pay tribute to the Romans, and account that their happineſs depends upon that of the Romans; and that neither for want of D courage in them or their anceſtors, who fourſcore years long fought for their liberty. For two Legions only placed in the City, keep all the great Countrey of Egypt, and the Nobility of Macedon in awe. Now, ſince all the inhabited World is ſubject to the Romans, what Aſſociates will you have from ſome Countrey not inhabited, to aid you againſt the Romans? Except peradventure ſome of you hope for help from beyond Euphrates, and that your Countrey-men of Adiabena K will help you: But they will not entangle themſelves in theſe dangerous Wars, without reaſonable cauſe; and if they would conſent to ſo bad counſel, the Parthians will not ſuffer them: For they are careful to maintain their League with the Romans; and would think it violated, if any under their Dominions ſhould war againſt them. It remaineth then, that you muſt only truſt that God will help you; but you ſee God doth aſſiſt the Romans: For it is impoſſible that ſuch an Empire ſhould have been without the help of God. Beſides, conſider that although you were to war againſt far weaker than yrur ſelves, yet you could not promiſe to your ſelves favourable ſucceſs; and it may ſo come to paſs, that if you Religiouſly obſerve the cuſtom of Sabbaths, and in them do nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For ſo your Anceſtors found by experience with Pompey; L who deſigned all his Enterprizes for that day, wherein his enemies were idle, and made no reſiſtance. But if in War ye tranſgreſs your Countrey laws, I know not then for what you ſhould rebel. For truly, all of you, at this time, are of that mind, that you take Arms to maintain your Countrey Laws. And I pray you, how will you requeſt help at God's hands, if wilfully you break his Laws? All that begin War, either truſt in Humane Riches, or Divine Succour: and they that war, having no probability to hope for any of thoſe, wilfully lead themſelves into open deſtruction. But if you cannot reſiſt the paſſion which tranſports you, let every man with his own hands butcher his Wife and Children, and conſume this goodly Countrey with fire; for ſo you ſhall gain this, not to abide the ſhame of a Conqueſt. It is good, O Friends, it is good, M whilſt yet the Ship is in the Haven, to fore-ſee and provide for future Tempeſts; and not then begin to fear, when you are amidſt the Waves and Surges of the Sea. They who fall into miſery not fore-ſeen, are worthy to receive compaſſion; but they that run into wilful calamity, deſerve no pity, but reproach. Unleſs perhaps ye think that the Romans will fight with you, on certain conditions; and that if they overcome you, they will not uſe you hardly, nor fire and deſtroy this Sacred City, and all the whole Nation, as they have done others. If ye be overcome, whoſo eſcapeth unkilled, can have no place of refuge; for all Nations either are already ſubject to the Romans, or fear that they ſhall be ſhortly. So that not only you ſhall be in danger, but alſo all Cities wherein any Jews remain. For there is no Nation nor people in the whole World, among whom ſome of your Countrey-men are not, who all ſhall be moſt cruelly put to death, if you rebel: And for the wicked counſel of a N few men, all Cities ſhall flow with the blood of the Jews; and no man ſhall be puniſhed for killing Jews, becauſe of your offence. But if you think the Romans will not execute all this Outrage after your Rebellion, then conſider how impious a thing it is, to rebel againſt ſo mild Governours. Take compaſſion, if not of your Children and Wives, yet, at the leaſt, of this City, which is the Mother-city of all your Nation. Have ſome regard to theſe Holy Walls, and the Sanctuary, and your Holy Laws: Aſſure your ſelves, that if the Romans again overcome you, they will not ſpare theſe things, ſeeing you were no more grateful unto them, for preſerving them before. I proteſt before God, your Holy Temple, and all the Angels of Heaven, and our whole Countrey, that I have kept back no counſel which I think profitable for you. Now, if you conſider thoſe things which are profitable for you, ye ſhall live with me O in peace: But if you follow your private paſſions, I will not be partaker of the miſeries and dangers you thruſt your ſelves into. King Agrippa thus ended his diſcourſe, which his

Herewith the people were content; and aſcending into the Temple with Agrippa and was behind.) And thus Agrippa ſtifled the beginning of the War. After this, he began to perſwade the people to obey Florus, till ſuch time as another were ſent to ſupply his place. Herewith the multitude was ſo moved, that they contumeliouſly reviled the King, and threw ſtones at him, and drave him out of the City. The King ſeeing that their Sedition would not be quieted, complaining of the injury done to him, he ſent ſome perſons of the beſt rank to Florus, who was at Cæſarea; that he might

Of the Rebellion which the Jews begun againſt the Romans.

AT this time, ſome of the chief Incendiaries, aſſembled together, ſuddenly aſſaulted a Caſtle called Maſſada, which they took by ſurpriſe, and killed all the Romans and in their places put a Guard of their own Company. In the Temple alſo, Eleazar, Son of the High Prieſt Ananias, a bold and deſperate young man, Captain of the Soldiers; perſwaded them who offered Sacrifices, not to offer any, but thoſe that were D given by Jews. And this was the ground and cauſe of the War that enſued: For they rejected thoſe Sacrifices that were wont to be offered in the name of the Emperour.
And although the High Prieſts, and People of Account, requeſted them not to omit that Cuſtom of ſacrificing for their Kings and Governours; yet they refuſed ſo to do, truſting greatly to their Faction: All thoſe of the City that deſired alteration, were of this mind, and eſpecially Eleazar, who at that time was General, as is before ſaid.
Wherefore all the chief men, High Prieſts, and Principal of the Phariſees, aſſembled themſelves; and perceiving into how great danger thoſe Rebels brought the City, they determined to make tryal of the courage of the ſeditious people: Wherefore, they aſſembled them together before the Brazen Gate, which was in the inner part of E the Temple, towards the Eaſt. “And firſt of all, they greatly complained of their “raſh and unadviſed Rebellion, and that they ſought to ſtir up ſo great a War againſt “their Countrey; inveighing againſt the cauſe that moved them thereto, as being “without reaſon: Telling them, that their Anceſtors, for the moſt part, adorned the “Temple with the Gifts of Gentiles, never refuſing the Offerings of Strangers; and “not only not refuſed their Offerings (for that were an impious fact,) but alſo placed “in the Temple the Gifts that they ſent, which were yet to be ſeen. And that it was “ſtrange, that now only they thought to provoke the Romans to War, by making new “Laws: And beſides other danger alſo, to make the City guilty of a great Crime in “matter of Religion, as though it were ſuch, wherein none might offer Sacrifice but F “Jews, nor any but they adore God. If we ſhould make ſuch a Law againſt any private “perſon, he had juſt cauſe to accuſe us of Inhumanity. But now the Romans are “deſpiſed, and Cæſar himſelf accounted prophane; and it was to be feared, that if the “Jews diſdained to accept of Cæſar's Offerings, Cæſar would hinder them from offering “any: And the City of Jeruſalem would preſently be accounted as an enemy to “the Empire, unleſs they preſently accepted Cæſar's Sacrifice; and before ſuch time as “they heard theſe news, againſt whom this outrage was attempted. Having thus ſpoken, they brought forth the moſt learned amongſt the Prieſts, to recount from time to time how their Anceſtors had always accepted of the Sacrifices of Strangers.

The Jews refuſe Cæſar's Sacrifices for the proſperity of the Romans.

Againſt thoſe who refuſe Forreign Sacrifices.

None of the Seditious gave ear to thoſe that were in Authority.

But none of the Mutineers gave ear to any thing that was ſaid, and the Levites came G not to ſerve at the Altar, as now preparing for War. When the Nobility ſaw that they could not appeaſe this Sedition, and that they themſelves ſhould firſt feel the Romans power, they deviſed all means to pacifie the Tumult, and ſent ſome Deputies to Ambaſſadors ſent to Florus and Agrippa, againſt the Seditious.

War in Jeruſalem between the Seditious and thoſe that favoured Peace.

Florus; the chief whereof was Simon, the Son of Ananias; others alſo, were ſent to H Agrippa, of which the chief were Saul, Antipas and Coſtobarus (who were all a kinn to the King) requeſting them both to come with an Army to the City, and ſuppreſs the Sedition which was raiſed, before it went further. Florus was glad of theſe tidings; and deſiring nothing more than War, gave no anſwer to the Deputies. But Agrippa, willing to ſpare both parts, as well the Good as the Rebels; and to preſerve Judæa to the Romans, and the Temple to the Jews; thought it not meet for him to buſie himſelf in ſuch affairs, but ſent three thouſand Horſe to aid the people againſt the Rebels; Which Horſe were of Auranitis, Batanæa and Trachonitis; and he made Darius their Captain, and Philip, Son of Joakim, General of all the Army. Theſe coming into the City, the Nobility, with the High Prieſts, and the reſt of the people that deſired Peace, I received this ſuccour in good part, and quartered them in the higher part of the City; for the Rebels kept the lower part, and the Temple. The War began inſtantly with Darts and Slings, and ſhooting of Arrows; and ſometimes they encounter'd one another hand to hand. The Seditious were more valiant, but the King's Soldiers were more skilful in War, and chiefly endeavoured to get the Temple, and expel out of it thoſe who thus prophaned it. The Rebels, with Eleazar, endeavoured, beſides that which they had already, to get alſo into their hands the higher part of the City. Wherefore, during the ſpace of ſeven days, there continued a great Conflict betwixt them, and either part kept what they had. When the Celebration of the Feaſt called Xylophoria was come, wherein every one carrieth Wood to the Temple, to keep a K fire continually upon the Altar; the Rebels would not ſuffer their enemies to do their Devotion.

Xylophoria a Feaſt.

The King's Soldiers are overcome.

Now many of the Sicarii or Thieves, who carried ſhort Poyniards under their Coats, went amongſt the weaker multitude, and boldly followed their old practice. By which, thoſe of the King's ſide were forced to leave the higher part of the City; which the Rebels preſently entring, ſet the Palaces of Ananias, Agrippa and Bernice, on fire; and forthwith went to the place where all Charters were kept, purpoſing there to burn all Bonds and Obligations of Debtors, thereby to defraud the Creditors; and ſo to joyn all the Debtors to their Faction, and ſtir up all the poor people againſt the rich. The Keepers of theſe publick Writings fleeing, the ſeditious perſons ſet all on L fire: And ſo having deſtroyed thoſe Records, which were in a manner the publick Eſtate of the City, they addreſſed themſelves againſt ſuch as refuſed their Proceedings. Some of the High Prieſts and Nobles hid themſelves in Vaults; others fleeing with the King's Soldiers into the higher Palace, locked up the doors after them; amongſt whom was Ananias the High Prieſt, and Ezechias his Brother, and they who (as is before ſpoken) were ſent Deputies to Agrippa: And ſo the Seditious were ſatisfied that day with the Victory, and firing of the houſes aforeſaid.

The Jews take Antonia, and burn it.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of Auguſt, they aſſaulted the Caſtle Antonia; having beſieged it two days, they took all that guarded it and killed them, and placed in it a Garriſon of their own company. This done, they went to the King's Palace, whither M Agrippa's Soldiers were fled; and dividing their Company into four parts, they began to pull down the Walls; none of them that were within durſt come out for fear of the multitude, but went up to the Turrets of the Palace, and killed all thoſe that offered to come up, and many of the Thieves under the Walls, with things that they caſt down. This Conflict continued day and night, for the Rebels thought that thoſe within could not hold out long for want of Victuals; and they within thought that the Seditious being wearied, would ſoon give over. In the mean ſeaſon, one Manahem, the Son of Judas of Galilee (that moſt crafty ſubtil Sophiſter, who reproached the Jews in Cyrenius's time for paying Tribute, and for being ſubject to any but to God) taking with him certain Nobles, went to Maſſada, where King Herod's Armory was; N and breaking into it, he armed the common people, and the other Thieves; and having them for his Guard, he returned again to Jeruſalem as King: And being thus made Head of the Rebellion, he prepared the Battery againſt the King's Palace. But they wanted Engines, and could not openly undermine the Walls, by reaſon of the enemies, who continually caſt down Darts upon them. Wherefore they began a Mine a great way off, till it came under one of the Towers, which then they ſupported with Poſts of wood; and they ſet fire on the Wood ſupporting it, and went their way; ſo the Supporters being conſumed with fire, the Tower preſently fell down. But thoſe within, foreſeeing their Adverſaries intent, perhaps by the ſhaking of the Tower; had built a Wall behind it, to keep out the Rebels, between them and it. The Seditious O verily thinking that with the fall of the Tower they ſhould be Victors, when they ſaw another Wall, were amazed. Yet the beſieged ſent to Manahem and others, that were

A chief of the Rebels, requeſting them to give them licence to depart; which Manahem only granted to the King's Soldiers, and to the Jews; who, preſently accepting thereof, departed, and ſo left the Romans in great fear; for they were not able to reſiſt ſo great a multitude, and they thought it a ſhame to entreat that they might depart; beſides, that it was dangerous for them, although it were granted. Wherefore, leaving the lower place which was called Stratopedon, becauſe it might eaſily be taken, they retired into the King's Towers, whereof one was called Hippicos, the other Phaſælus, the third Mariamne. The Rebels that were with Manahem brake preſently into the lower part that the Romans had forſaken, and killed all that they found there; and when they had ſacked it, they ſet it on fire: And this was done the ſixth day of B September.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the death of Ananias the High Prieſt, Manahem and the Roman Soldiers.

THe next day following, Ananias the High Prieſt was taken in one of the Water-conduits of the King's Palace, where he had hid himſelf, and was there killed with his Brother Ezechias, by the Seditious: And the Rebels beſieged all the Towers round about, and kept diligent watch, leſt any of the Romans ſhould eſcape. But Manahem, both C upon his good ſucceſs in deſtroying the ſtrong Holds, and upon the death of Ananias, the High Prieſt, became ſo proud and inſolent, that he thought none ſo capable as himſelf for Government; and became an intolerable Tyrant. Now Eleazar and ſome of his Companions aſſembled together, ſaid, that it would be ſhameful for them that had revolted from the Romans, only to recover their liberty, to receive for maſter one of their own Nation, who, although he were not ſo violent as Manahem, yet was ſo inferiour to them. And if it were ſo, that it were expedient to have one Ruler over all the reſt, Manahem ought to be the laſt that ſhould be choſen to command them. Being thus agreed, they ſet upon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pomp, apparrelled like a King, and having about him a guard of his friends in armour, D Now when Eleazar his followers ſet upon Manahem, the people all took up ſtones to ſtone him, hoping that by his death the ſedition would be extinguiſhed. The guard of Manahem at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but when they perceived the whole multitude againſt them, every one ſhifted for himſelf as he could; and thoſe that were taken were put to death, and they that eſſcaped were afterwards ſought for: only a few of them fled to Maſſada, amongſt whom was Eleazar, the ſon of Jairus, Manahem's kinſman, who afterward became a Tyrant there. But Manahem fled into a place called Ophias, where he hid himſelf: and being taken, he was drawn out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him all the chief miniſters of his Tyranny, and particularly Abſalomon, who was his chief Officer. E And in this matter (as I have ſaid) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to have ſome end of that ſedition. But the Rebels did not kill Manahem, to the end to extinguiſh ſedition, but to the intent to rob and plunder more freely.

The people indeed with many intreaties beſought them to let the Romans alone, whom they beſieged; but they were ſo much the more earneſt againſt them: till being no longer able to make reſiſtance, with the conſent of Metilius their Captain, and ſome other of more Authority, they ſent to Eleazar, requeſting him to give them licence to depart with their lives, and leave their baggage to the Jews. He accepting their offer, ſent to them Gorion, the ſon of Nicodemus, and Ananias the Sadducee, and Judas the Son of Jonathas, to confirm the promiſe of F their lives. Which done, Metilins led away the Soldiers: and whilſt the Romans had their weapons, none of the Rebels durſt attempt any of their treachery againſt them: but ſo ſoon as, according to covenant, they had laid down their ſhields and Swords, and ſo departed miſtruſting nothing, Eleazar's Guard ſet upon them, and kill'd them; they neither made reſiſtance, nor any entreaty for their lives; only put them in mind of their Promiſe and Oath. So they were all ſlain, ſave only Metilius; who, greatly entreating for his life, and promiſing that he would become a Jew in Religion, and be circumciſed, they ſpared him. Though this was a ſmall loſs to the Romans, becauſe there were but a very few ſlain of their great, and almoſt infinite Army; yet it was eaſie to judge, that it would cauſe the Ruine and Captivity of the Jews.

and was ſorrowful and deſolate, lamenting as though they themſelves ſhould anſwer for H the Seditious, for that murther which was committed on the Sabbath, when it is not lawful for the Jews to do even any good work.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the great Maſſacre of the Jews at Cæſarea, and in all Syria.

AT the ſame hour, on the ſelf-ſame day, it happened, as it were, by God's Providence, that the Inhabitants of Cæſarea maſſacred the Jews that dwelt among I them; ſo that at one time above twenty thouſand were ſlain, and not one Jew left alive in all Cæſarea: For thoſe that eſcaped, Florus took, and brought them forth bound to the people. After this Maſſacre done at Cæſarea, the whole Nation of the Jews was enraged: And dividing themſelves iuto Companies, they waſted and deſtroyed in ſhort time all the borders of Syria, and the Cities thereabout; to wit, Philadelphia and Gebonitis, Geraſa, Pella and Scythopolis: Alſo, they took by force Gadara, Hippon and Gaulanitis; pulling down ſome places, and firing others. From thence they marched towards Cedaſa, a City of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaza and Cæſarea; and neither Sebaſte nor Aſcalon could reſiſt them, but they alſo were conſumed with fire. K Likewiſe they deſtroyed Anthedon, with Gaza: And moſt places belonging to theſe Cities were ſacked, to wit, the Fields and Villages; and a mighty ſlaughter was made of them that were taken in theſe Towns. The Syrians made as great a Maſſacre of the Jews as this, among them; for all the Jews inhabiting among them were murthered, not only for an old grudge, but alſo, to render their own danger leſs, by diminiſhing the number of their enemies. By this means all Syria was in a moſt deplorable condition, and every City was expoſed to the diſorders and violences of two ſeveral Armies, each of which placed their ſafety in making a great Effuſion of Blood: The days were ſpent in blood-ſhed, and the nights in fear, worſe than death it ſelf. For though they only pretended to deſtroy the Jews, yet were they drawn to ſuſpect other Nations, that followed the Jews Religion; and becauſe they were, as it were, L Neuters, the Syrians thought it not good to deſtroy them; but, on the other ſide, for their agreeing in Religion with the Jews, they were conſtrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before ſeemed modeſt, were now through Avarice incited to meddle in this Murther; ſo that every one took the Goods of them that were ſlain, and carried them to other places, as Conquerors. He was moſt renowned that had ſtolen moſt, or killed moſt. There might you ſee in ſeveral Cities, the dead bodies of all Ages unburied; old men, and children, and women, lying in moſt ſhameful manner, their ſecret parts being uncovered. Briefly, all the Countrey was filled with exceeding great calamity; and the fear of yet greater miſery to come, M was unſpeakable.

The Jews ſpoil the Villages, and burn the Cities of Syria.

All Syria full of miſerable calamities.

Theſe were the Conflicts between the Jews and Strangers. But afterwards, making incurſions upon the Borders of Scythopolis, the Jews there dwelling, became their enemies. For they conſpiring with the Citizens of Sythopolis, and preferring their own Commodity and Security before Kindred and Conſanguinity, joyned with the Gentiles againſt the Jews; and yet, for all that, they were ſuſpected for their forwardneſs. For the Scythopolitans fearing that they would aſſault the City by night, and excuſe their revolting by their great miſery, commanded all the Jews, that if they would ſhew themſelves truſty to the Gentiles, they, with all their Children, ſhould go into a Wood hard by. The Jews forthwith did as they were required, ſuſpecting nothing; N and the Scythopolitans were quiet for two days after, and did nothing: But the third night they ſent forth Scouts to ſee what they were doing; who finding moſt of them aſleep, they ſurprized them in a moment, and killed them all, who were in number thirteen thouſand; and afterwards, took their Goods. Here I think it not amiſs to ſpeak of the death of Simon, who was the Son of Saul, whoſe Race was very Noble: He was a man of great courage, and ſtrength of body, both which he uſed to the great hurt of his own Nation; for he daily killed many Jews who dwelt near Scythopolis, and often ſcattered divers Companies, and put whole Armies to flight; but at length he had an end worthy of his deeds, and the murther of his Countrey-men. For when the Scythopolitans had compaſſed the Wood about, ſo that none could eſcape their hands, they killed the Jews in every part thereof. Simon not drawing his Sword, made O no reſiſtance to any of his enemies; for he ſaw that it was bootleſs to ſtrive againſt ſuch a multitude. But pitifully crying out, I receive, O Scythopolitans, a worthy reward for

I am not worthy to receive death from the hands of my enemies, and therefore I will kill my ſelf with my own; and this death will be a ſufficient Puniſhment for my Offences, and a full Argument of my magnanimity, that none of my enemies may boaſt of my death, nor inſult over me.* When he had thus ſaid, he beheld all his Family with compaſſion and rage mixt together, as his Wife and Children, and aged Parents. And firſt, taking his Father by the hair of the head, he ſtood upon him, and thruſt him thorough; after him he killed his Mother, who was willing to die; after them his Wife and Children, every one of them as it were offering their bodies to the B Sword, and deſirous to prevent the enemies. When he had ſlain all his Kindred, himſelf remaining alive, he ſtretched forth his arm, that they might ſee what he would do; and thruſt his Sword into his own body, up to the Hilts. Cruelties exerciſed againſt the Jews in divers other Cities, and particularly by Varus.

AFter this ſo great A Maſſacre of the Jews at Scythopolis, other Cities alſo, where they inhabited, roſe againſt them; and two thouſand five hundred were ſlain at Aſcalon, and two thouſand at Ptolemais; and the Tyrians killed divers, and put more in Priſon: Likewiſe, they of Gadara and Hippon ſlew the moſt valiant, and thoſe of leaſt courage they caſt into Priſon. Alſo all other Cities, who either feared or hated the Jews, roſe up againſt them. Only they of Antioch, Sidon and Apamea, ſpared thoſe that dwelt with them, and neither killed nor impriſoned any of them; perhaps they ſtood in no fear of them if they ſhould have riſen, becauſe their City was ſo populous; yet I think they ſpared them only for pity ſake, becauſe they ſaw they were D quiet, and not ſeditious. The Inhabitants, alſo, of Geraſa did no harm to the Jews amongſt them; but when they deſired to depart, they conducted them ſafely to the end of their Borders. In the Kingdom, alſo, of Agrippa much cruelty was ſhewed againſt the Jews; for he being gone to Ceſtius Gallus at Antioch, left the Rule of his Countrey to one of his Friends named Varus, Kinſman to King Sohemus; to whom there came ſeventy of the chief Nobility of the Countrey of Batanæa, requeſting a Garriſon to repreſs thoſe that ſhould attempt Rebellion amongſt them. Varus, inſtead of receiving them well, ſent certain of the King's Soldiers by night, and killed them all as they were coming to him. He committed this Murther without Agrippa his conſent, only for Avarice. But being emboldened by this Fact, he ruined the whole Realm; E ſtill continuing ſuch Cruelties and Violences againſt his Nation, till ſuch time as Agrippa underſtood thereof; who, for Sohemus's ſake, durſt not put him to death; but diſpoſſeſſed him of his place. In the mean while the Revolters took the Caſtle of Cypros, which is ſituate above Jericho; and after they had killed the Garriſon, they deſtroyed the Fortreſs. At the ſame time a multitude of Jews laid Siege before the Caſtle of Macheron, and perſwaded the Soldiers left in Garriſon, to yield the Caſtle; who, fearing that if they denyed, they ſhould be compelled thereto, delivered it to them, upon condition, that they might quietly depart: Which done, the Jews placed a ſtrong Garriſon in it.

Fifty thouſand Jews ſlain at Alexandria.

THE Citizens of Alexandria had always a quarrel againſt the Jews that lived with them, ſince the time that Alexander the Great, for their help againſt the Egyptians, permitted them to inhabit Alexandria, and to have the ſame Privileges with the Grecians. This Honour and Privilege was alſo continued to them by the Succeſſors of Alexander; who alſo gave them a certain place in the City to dwell in, that they G might live more commodiouſly, and not be mingled with the Gentiles: And permitted them alſo to call themſelves Macedonians. the Jews Privileges which Alexander had given them. But there were daily conteſts H between them and the Greeks; and although the Judges on both parts ſtill puniſhed thoſe that were in fault, yet the Sedition more and more encreaſed; and though all Cities elſe were filled with Troubles, yet here the Tumult was moſt vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people, to determine of an Embaſſage to Nero, certain Jews mingled themſelves amongſt the Greeks, and ſo went into the Amphitheatre: Who being eſpyed by their Adverſaries, the Greeks cryed out, that the Jews were enemies, and came as Spies; and ſo they laid violent hands upon them. Some of them fled, only three of them were taken by the Greeks, whom they drew to a place to burn them alive. All the Jews of the City came to ſuccour them; and I firſt they threw ſtones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ran in a rage into the Amphitheatre, and threatned to burn all the people there aſſembled; which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander, Governour of the City, had not appeaſed their fury; who did not at firſt uſe Force of Arms againſt them, but ſent ſome of their chief men to perſwade them to ceaſe, and not to incite the Roman Army againſt them. But the ſeditious Jews refuſed this advice, and mocked Tiberius: Who ſeeing that they would not otherwiſe be appeaſed, ſent two Legions of Romans, and five thouſand other Soldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia; and gave them charge, not only to kill them, but alſo to fire their houſes, and take their Goods. The Soldiers preſently went into the place called Delta (where the Jews were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, though not without a bloody Victory. For the Jews gathering themſelves K together, placed thoſe amongſt them that were beſt armed, in the Front, who held out for a long time: But when they began to flee, they were maſſacred like Beaſts; ſome of them were killed in the field, ſome were burnt in their houſes; the Romans firſt taking what they found, and ſparing neither Infants nor Old men, but killing all Ages and Sexes. So that all that place flowed with blood, for there were ſlain fifty thouſand Jews; and all the reſt had been extinguiſhed, had not Alexander (moved to compaſſion by their entreaties) commanded the Soldiers to leave off; who being obedient to him, preſently departed: But the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawn from the Maſſacre, becauſe of the hatred which they had conceived againſt the Jews; and with much ado, they were withheld from tyrannizing over the L dead bodies. And this befel the Jews of Alexandria.

The Romans take Joppa, and burn it, and kill eight thouſand four hundred Jews.

CEſtius Gallus now thought it time to beſtir himſelf, for as much as the Jews were now hated every where; and taking with him the twelfth Legion out of Antioch, two thouſand choſen Foot, and four Companies of Horſe, out of the other Legions, M and with them the King's Forces that came to help him, to wit, two thouſand Horſemen of Antioch, three thouſand Foot all Bow-men, and three thouſand Foot, ſent by Agrippa, a thouſand Horſe, and four thouſand which Sohemus brought, whereof the third part were Horſe, the reſt Foot, and for the moſt part Bow-men; he went towards Ptolemais. Many joyned themſelves to them out of every City, who, though they were not ſo skilful in War as the Romans, yet their hatred was more than theirs. Agrippa himſelf was there with Ceſtius, commanding thoſe he brought. There Ceſtius taking a part of the Army, went to Zabulon (which is the ſtrongeſt City of Galilee, called alſo Andron, and parts the Borders of the Jews from Ptolemais) and when he found it deſolate of Inhabitants (who were fled into the Mountains) but full of Riches; N giving licence to the Soldiers to ſack it, he afterwards ſet it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof (for it was not inferior to Tyre, or Sidon, or Beritum) and after ſpoiled all the Territories about it. When he had burnt all the Villages thereabout, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and eſpecially thoſe of Berith, ſtayed ſtill behind to get Booties: Which when the Jews underſtood, and that Ceſtius was departed, they took courage, and came and ſet upon them, and killed of them two thouſand. Ceſtius departing from Ptolemais, went to Cæſarea, and ſent part of his Army before to Joppa; commanding them to keep the Town, if they could get it; and if the Townſmen made any reſiſtance, that then they ſhould ſtay till he came with the reſt of the Army. Some of them attacked it by Sea, ſome by Land; by which O means they eaſily took it. The people thereof had neither time to flee, nor to prepare themſelves to fight; but they were all killed with their Families. After the ſackcarried away much booty with them.

Of Ceſtius his Battel againſt Jeruſalem.

B HE ſent alſo Ceſennius Gallus, General of the twelfth Legion, into Galilee, and gave him as many other Troops as he thought ſufficient to conquer that nation. The ſtrongeſt City of Galilee called Sephoris open'd the gates to them, and other Cities followed their example. They that were ſeditious and gave themſelves to robbing, retir'd to the Mountain of Azamon which is ſituate in the midſt of Galilee over againſt Sephoris: Theſe Gallus went to attacque with his Army; and ſo long as they kept the higher part of the Mountain, they eaſily repelled the Romans, and killed above 200 of them: but when they ſaw the Romans had gain'd a higher place than that wherein they kept, they reſiſted no longer: for not being armed, they could not ſtand out, and if they ſhould have fled, they could not have eſcaped the Horſemen; ſo that C only a few who hid themſelves in difficult places eſcaped, and above 2000 of them were ſlain. Gallus finding he had no more to do in Galilee, returned with his troops to Cæſarea, and Ceſtius with his whole Army went to Antipatris: were underſtanding that a great company of Jews were gathered together in the Tower called Aphec, he ſent ſome before to attacque them: but the Jews would not abide battel, and the Romans burnt their Tents and the Villages adjoyning. Ceſtius going from thence to Lydda found the City deſolate; for all the people were gone to Jeruſalem, becauſe of the Feaſt of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty perſons whom he found there, he fired the Town, and went by Bethoron to Gabaon, which is but fifty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem. When the Jews ſaw the War draw near their D capital City, they left their ſolemnity, and run to their arms: and having got together a great multitude, they went to fight with the Romans, obſerving no order, nor regarding the Sabbath, which formerly they held in ſo great eſtimation: and the ſame fury that made them leave their devotion, made them alſo victorious in the battel; for they aſſaulted the Romans with ſuch courage, that they brake their body, and killing all that reſiſted, preſſed into the midſt thereof: and if a freſh ſupply both of Horſe and Foot had not come in in time, all Ceſtius's Army had been in danger. There were ſlain five hundred and fifteen Romans, whereof four hundred were Foot, and the reſt Horſe; but of the Jews only two and twenty. The moſt valiant in this combat were Monobazus and Cenelæus, Kinſmen to Monobazus King E of Adiabena; and next to them Paraides Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who had fled to the Jews from King Agrippa, whom he had lately ſerved. But at length the Jews being repulſed, returned to Jeruſalem; and Simon the Son of Gioras attacqued the Romans, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and ſlew many of the Rereward, and took many Carts and much Baggage, which he brought into the City.
Ceſtius ſtaied three days in the Field, and the Jews kept the high places, obſerving which way he would go, with a purpoſe to ſet upon the Romans if they ſtirr'd.

were covered with infinite numbers of Jews, he purpoſed to try, if with gentle Ceſtius draweth forth his whole Army againſt the Jews.

Divers Jews call for Ceſtius as if they intended to open their Gates unto him. The Romans cover themſelves with their Shields, and undermine the Walls, and burn the Temple-gates into the Town that were the authors of this fact. Ceſtius perceiving them divided among themſelves, thought that he had now a fit opportunity to aſſault them, and ſo came upon them with his whole Army: and putting them to flight, he purſued them to Jeruſalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, ſeven furlongs from the City, he did nothing againſt it for three days ſpace; perhaps hoping that they within would relent; and in the mean time he ſent a great many Soldiers into the Vilages adjoyning to fetch Corn. The fourth day, which was the thirteenth of October, he came againſt the City with his Army in battel array. The Jews were ſo ſurpriz'd and terrified to behold the Roman Diſcipline, that they forſook the outmoſt parts of the City, and retir'd into the Temple. Ceſtius paſſing Betheza, burnt Scenopolis, and the place called the new Market; and coming to the higher part of the City, he took up his quarters near the King's Palace: and if at any time he had violently given the aſſault, he had taken the City, and ended the War. But Tyrannus Priſcus General of the Foot, and many other Rulers and Captains of the Horſe, being corrupted with money by Florus, hindred that his purpoſe; whereby the War was prolonged, and a thouſand Calamities beſel the Jews. In the mean time many of the chiefeſt among the Jews, and Ananus the Son of Jonathas made an offer to Ceſtius to open the Gates to him: but either through anger or diffidence, he contemned the offer. The Rebels underſtanding this Treaſon, with ſtones conſtrained Ananus and his complices to throw themſelves over the wall for their ſafety. Which done, they retired thmſelves to the Towers, from whence they beat back thoſe that ſcaled the walls. The Romans for five days ſpace aſſaulted the walls on every ſide, but all invain; and the ſixth day, Ceſtius with many choſen Soldiers and Bowmen aſſaulted the Temple on the North-ſide. The Jews valiantly made reſiſtance out of the Porches, and often repulſed the Romans, as they approach'd the Walls: yet at laſt by the multitude of their adverſaries darts, they were forced to give back. Then the formoſt of the Romans holding their ſhields over their heads, and leaning againſt the wall, they in the ſecond rank alſo held their Shields againſt thoſe in the firſt, and ſo in order until the laſt, thereby making a Tortoiſe, as the Romans call it, or defence, that all their ſhot and darts could do them no harm; ſo that the Soldiers ſafely undermined the walls, and attempted to fire the Gates of the Temple.

Ceſtius's ſudden departure maketh the Thieves more confident.

The ſeditious were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the City as if it would preſently be taken. But the people were as glad of it as the Rebels were diſmaied, and came to the Gates to open them to Ceſtius, as one who had well deſerved at their hands. And truly if he had but a little longer continued the ſiege, he had taken the City. But I think that God being angry with theſe wicked perſons, would not ſuffer the War to be ended at that time. For Ceſtius neither regarding the good will of the people, nor the deſperation of the Rebels, removed his Army from thence; and having received no loſs, very unadviſedly departed from the City: at whoſe unlooked for flight, the Rebels took heart; and making after him, they killed ſome Horſe and foot of his Rear. Ceſtius quarter'd that day in the Camp which he had fortified near Scopion. The next day he went further into the Country, whereby he more encouraged the Rebels; who following, killed many of his Rere, becauſe the place thorough which the Romans march'd was narrow, the Jews aſſaulted them on the flank, and the laſt durſt not caſt any darts againſt them who wounded them on their backs, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them; and they were not able to reſiſt them that aſſaulted them on each ſide, being heavy arm'd and not daring to break their order; whilſt on the contrary the Jews were active and light: ſo that the Romans endured much harm at the hands of their Enemies, and did them none. And thus were they beaten all the way long, and many of them killed; amongſt whom was Priſcus Captain of the ſixth Legion, and Longinus the Tribune, and Æmilius Jucundus Campmaſter of a Regiment of Horſe. And ſo with much ado, they came to Gabio; where they firſt pitch'd their Tents, caſting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them. Ceſtius ſtaied there two days, doubtful what to do. The third day he perceived his enemies increaſed, and all places about filled with Jews: whereby he ſaw that his ſlowneſs was to his diſadvantage, and the number of his enemies would ſtill increaſe, if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flee ſpeedily, he cauſed the Soldiers to caſt away all thoſe things that might be a hindrance to them, and to kill their Mules and Aſſes, and Cattel, ſaving only thoſe that carried munition; fearing that if he ſhould not deſtroy them, the Jews might make uſe of them againſt him; and ſo he led his Army toward Bethoron. The Jews in large paſſages little moleſted his Army: but when they were to paſs a ſtrait, then they ſet upon thoſe of the

A the Rere, and drove others down precipices, and all the army of the Jews were ſpread upon the eminent places, where the Romans were to paſs, expecting to welcome them with their Arrows. While the Roman Foot were in this extremity, the Horſe were in greater danger; for they could not keep their ranks for the multitude of darts and arrows; neither could they get up to their enemies, the aſcent to the top of the Mountains was ſo ſteep: and they were compaſſed on each ſide with Rocks and deep Valleys, ſo that if any went out of the way he fell down and was killed; and thus there was no way either to flee or to reſiſt. In this deſperation they fell to lamentations and outcries, which the Jews anſwered with ſhouts of joy, encouraging one another to play the men, being glad of their enemies adverſity: and all the Army of B Ceſtius had there periſhed, had not the night come on and helped them, which by the darkneſs gave leiſure to the Romans to flee into Bethoron. In the mean while, the Jews kept all the places thereabouts beſieged, and guarded the paſſages. Ceſtius ſeeing it not poſſible to march openly, thought beſt to flee, and choſe almoſt 400 of his ſtrongeſt Soldiers, and ſet them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they ſhould cry as they did before, that the Jews might think that the whole Army was there, and ſo he with the reſt of his Army marched quietly 30 Furlongs. In the morning, the Jews perceiving the Romans to be fled, aſſaulted the 400, by whom they were deceived, and preſently killing them with Darts, they purſued Ceſtius: who having fled away in the night, made more haſte the next day; C ſo that the Soldiers for fear, left their Arms and Inſtruments to beat down Walls, and Slings, and much other munition; which the Jews taking, after uſed againſt them. Thus they followed the Romans to Antipatris: and ſeeing they could not overtake them they returned, bringing with them the warlike Inſtruments, and rifling thoſe that were ſlain, and taking whatſoever the Romans had left behind; and ſo ſinging Songs of Victory, they returned to Jeruſalem, having loſt very few of their company, and ſlain 5380 of the Roman Foot and their Auxiliaries; and 980 Horſe. And this was done upon the eighth day of October, and in the twelfth year of the Reign of Nero.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the Cruelty of thoſe of Damaſcus againſt the Jews, and of Joſeph's affairs in Galilee.

After this ill ſucceſs of Ceſtius, many of the chiefeſt among the Jews daily fled and forſook the City, as a ſhip preſently ready to ſink. Coſtobarus and Saul two Brethren, and Philip the Son of Joachim General of Agrippa's Army, retir'd themſelves to Ceſtius. As for Antipas, who was alſo beſieged by them in the Kings Palace, he would not flee with the reſt, and ſo was killed by the Rebels. But Ceſtius ſent Saul and the reſt of his Company into Achaia unto Nero, to inform him of the cauſe of E his retreat, and to ſhew how Florus had cauſed all theſe wars: for ſo he hoped that Nero would turn his anger againſt Florus, and free him from danger. Then the people of Damaſcus underſtanding the defeat of the Romans, deviſed how to deſtroy the Jews which inhabited amongſt them: and they thought it was eaſie to be accompliſhed, for that the Jews were already aſſembled in the common places of exerciſe, for fear of ſome ſuch matter: yet they miſtruſted their own Wives, who all, except a few, were Jews in Religion. Wherefore they took great heed to conceal their intent from them; and ſo aſſaulting the Jews in a narrow place and unarm'd, they put them all to the ſword, to the number of ten thouſand. After the Rebels that had F purſued Ceſtius were returned to Jeruſalem, they laboured to joyn all to them that favoured the Romans, either by force or by flattery; and aſſembling themſelves in the Temple, they determined to chuſe a great number of Captains to carry on the War. Joſeph the Son of Corion, and Ananus the high Prieſt, were appointed Rulers of the City, and eſpecially to ſee the Walls thereof repaired. Eleazar the Son of Simon was put into no authority, notwithſtanding that he had in his cuſtody great prey and ſpoil taken from the Romans, and Ceſtius his money, and a great part of the publick treaſure; becauſe they perceived he aſpired to a Tyranny, and had his greateſt Confidents about him as his Guards: yet in time Eleazar by money and craft perſwaded the people to obey him in all things. They alſo choſe other Captains, to be ſent into Idumea, who were Jeſus the Son of Sapphas, and Eleazar the Son of the new G high Prieſt: and they commanded Niger who was born beyond Jordan to obey theſe Captains, who was therefore called Peraites, and was then Governour of Idumea. they neglected not to do the like by other Regions: for Joſeph the Son of Simon was ſent Joſeph maketh 70 Elders Rulers in Galilee, and appointeth ſeven in every City to determine the cauſes of leſs weight.

Joſeph instructeth the Galileans in War.

Joſeph teacheth the Galileans how they ſhould obey in the Wars.

Every one of the Cities of Galilee ſend the half of their multitude to warfare, the reſt they keep to provide them Victuals.

Each of theſe Governours diſcharged his place according to his wiſdom and dexterity. When Joſeph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his firſt care was to get the good will of the Inhabitants; knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he ſhould offend: conſidering that he ſhould have the moſt conſiderable perſons his friends, if he made them pertakers of his Authority. I He choſe ſeventy of the moſt ancient wiſe men amongſt them, and made them Rulers over all Galilee, and elected ſeven Judges over the leſſer Towns to judge inferiour matters: but he reſerved all great affairs and Criminal Cauſes to his own hearing. Moreover, having ordained a form of Juſtice that thoſe ſeventy ſhould follow, he took counſel how to provide for his ſecurity abroad. And being aſſured that the Romans would come into Galilee, he compaſſed thoſe places with ſtrong Walls that were fit for his purpoſe, to wit, Jotapata, Berſabea, Selamis, Perecho, Japha and Sigoph, Tarichea and Tiberias: Moreover he fortified the Hill Itaburin, and the Caves near the Lake of Geneſareth, which is in lower Galilee; and in high Galilee Petra, which is alſo called Acheberon, and Seph, Jamnith, and Mero; in Gaulanitis alſo, Seleucia, and Soganes, K and Gamala; he only permitted them of Sephoris to build their own Walls, becauſe he perceived them to be rich and prone to War of themſelves. Likewiſe John the Son of Levias, at Joſeph's command, built the Walls of Giſcala himſelf alone; but in all other places that were fortified. Joſeph put to his helping hand, and directed how they ſhould be done. He liſted an hundred thouſand men, who were all young perſons and fit for the War, and he armed them with old Armour, which he had gathered from all parts of the Country. And conſidering that that which made the Roman Army invincible, was that they were all obedient to their Officers and well diſciplin'd, and that he could not exerciſe them in martial diſcipline, by reaſon of his other occaſions, he thought good at leaſt to teach them to be obedient. And L calling to mind that the multitude of Rulers made obedience, he ordained many Captains, and conſtituted divers ſorts of Soldiers, as the Romans uſed to do; making ſome Governours of ten, others over a hundred, and others over a thouſand; and appointed likewiſe Rulers over them. He taught them alſo how to give the ſign of War, and how to ſound the trumpet, both to call to combat, and to retire; how to march in lengh, and caſt in a ring, and how to ſuccour thoſe that were moſt in danger: and in ſhort, he taught them whatſoever might either encourage them, or make them active: but eſpecially he exerciſed them in good Diſcipline, imitating in particular the order of the Romans, and often telling them that they were to fight with men, who for ſtrength of body and courage ſurpaſſed all nations of the World. Alſo M he told them that hereby he ſhould perceive whether they would be obedient in War, if now they abſtained from ſuch things as were uſual to Soldiers, to wit, robbing and ſpoiling their Country-men, crafty and deceitful dealing, and ſpoiling thoſe with whom they converſed, for their own gain; for thoſe Wars had always beſt ſucceſs, where the Soldiers carried good Conſciences; and thoſe that were bad ſhould not only have men, but God alſo for their enemy. After this manner he daily exhorted them: and now he had got together as many men as he deſired; for their number was 60000 Foot, and 250 Horſe, beſides 4500 ſtrangers whom he hired, and to whom he chiefly truſted, and 600 choſen men to guard his own perſon. And the hirelings only excepted, the reſt of the Soldiers were provided for by the Cities: for every N City before mentioned, ſent one half of their men for Soldiers, and the other half they kept to provide Victuals for them; that one part being employed in War, the other might do ſuch buſineſs as the City required.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of Joſeph's danger and eſcape; and of the malice of John of Giſcala.

The year of the World, 4031. after Chriſt's Nativity, 69.

WHilſt Joſeph thus ordered the Eſtate of Galilee, there aroſe a Traytor born in Giſcala, John the Son of Levias, a moſt ſubtil and deceitful man, who by vile means was now become the richeſt perſon in that Countrey, having before been very poor, and unable to put his Villanies in practice. He could lie at his pleaſure, and thought deceit a Virtue, which he uſed even towards his deareſt friends; he was alſo a B great Counterfeiter of Humanity; and yet for the hope of gain became a cruel Murtherer.
He always aimed at high matters, with an aſpiring mind, and at firſt nouriſhed his hope with ſmall Villanies. For firſt he was a Thief alone, and lived in Woods and ſolitary places; at laſt he got to him a company of audacious people like himſelf, at firſt ſmall, but afterwards he greatly encreaſed it. He alſo had a great care to chuſe no weak perſons; but ſuch as were ſtrong of body, valiant of mind, and skilful in Martial Affairs: Of theſe he gathered four hundred, moſt of them out of Tyre, and the Villages thereabout; and with them he waſted all Galilee, and killed many of thoſe whom the fear of War had driven thither. This man, long time before, had deſired to be General of a formed Army, and aſpired to greater matters, only the want C of money hindred him: And perceiving that Joſeph conſidered him as a ſerviceable man, he perſwaded him to ſuffer him to build the Walls of that place where he was born, and which was now deſolate; and to accompliſh this, he gathered great ſumms of money of the richer ſort. After which, having perſwaded Joſeph to give order to all the Jews that were diſperſed over all Syria, that they ſhould ſend no Oyl to the neighbouring places, ſave only that which was made by their own Nation, he cauſed great quantities of Oyl to be brought to the Confines of Galilee, and buying four Barrels for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted to four Attick Groats) he ſold them again to the Syrian Jews; the half of one Barrel for as much as all four coſt him. And for that Galilee abounded with Oyls, and eſpecially at that time, he conveyed it to D ſuch places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himſelf. By this means he gathered an infinite maſs of Money, which preſently he turned to the prejudice of him who had given him licence to get it. And thinking that if he could depoſe Joſeph, he might come to be Ruler over Galilee, he commanded his followers to rob and ſpoil more than they did before; and ſo to trouble the Countrey, that he might either kill the Governour treacherouſly, if he ſought to redreſs it; or if he neglected it, to accuſe him of ſlothfulneſs, and ſo make him odious to the people. Moreover, he had already given out ſpeeches, that Joſeph went about to betray Galilee to the Romans; and he deviſed many things to this effect, to work Joſeph's Overthrow. It happened that at that time, ſome of the Village of Dabarita, who watched in the E field, ſet upon Ptolomey, who was Steward to King Agrippa, and his Siſter Bernice, and plundered all his Carriages, wherein was much coſtly Apparel, and many Silver Veſſels, and ſix hundred pieces of Gold. And for that they could not carry this ſecretly, they brought all the whole Booty to Joſeph, at Tarichea: who, reproving them for offering violence to the King's Servants, commanded the things to be kept at the houſe of Æneas, who was one of the richeſt men in the Town, and ſhould reſtore them to the owner when time ſerved; wherein, thinking to do himſelf great good, he brought himſelf into much danger. For the Thieves being offended that they received no part thereof, and ſeeing that Joſeph would reſtore to Agrippa and his Siſter Bernice that which they had laboured for, they went round about the Villages in the F night, and ſpred this falſe report in every place, that Joſeph was a Traytor to his Countrey; and with the ſame rumour alſo, they filled the Cities thereabout. So that early in the next morning, ten thouſand men armed aſſembled themſelves together in the Theatre at Tarichea; the greateſt part of them cryed out in their fury, that the Traytor Joſeph ought to be ſtoned, others that he ought to be burned? and John himſelf, with one Jeſus the Son of Sapphias, who at that time was a Magiſtrate in Tiberias, omitted nothing to animate the people yet more againſt him. All the Friends of Joſeph, and his Guards, being terrified with ſuch a multitude, fled, four only excepted. Joſeph in the mean while was aſleep; and had he ſlept a little longer, they had ſet his houſe on fire. The Tumult awakened him, and the four that remained with him, G counſelled him to flee: But he not diſmayed for that he was left alone, nor that ſo great a multitude came againſt him, went boldly towards them with his Garment all neck. At this ſight they that bare him good will, eſpecially the people of Tarichea, H were moved to compaſſion; but the Countrey people, who thought he overlaid them with Taxes and Tributes, curſed him; and bad him bring forth the publick Treaſure, and confeſs his Treaſon; for ſeeing him in this plight, they thought he would not deny any thing whereof he was accuſed; and that he came ſo only to move them to compaſſion, in order to obtain pardon for his offence. This his humility ſtood him in good ſtead; for hereby thoſe that before were enraged againſt him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalf, when he promiſed to confeſs the whole matter: And having obtained licence to ſpeak, he ſaid: I was never minded to ſend back that money to Agrippa, nor to keep it to my private uſe. For (God forbid) that I ſhould ever hold him for my friend, who is your open Enemy; or that I ſhould ſo ſeek my I own profit, as thereby to damnifie you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea*) for as much as I perceived that your City eſpecially had great need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the Walls, and for that I feared the people of* Tiberias, and others adjoyning, who ſtill gaped after this Prey and Wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get thoſe Spoils for you, to re-edifie your Walls. If ye miſlike this, I will bring out the Treaſure, and give it to be divided amongſt you: But if you like thereof, then you are obliged to defend me.

John's Envy and Treaſon againſt Joſeph.

John perſwadeth the Tiberians to revolt from Joſeph.

John ſendeth certain Armed men to kill Joſeph.

Joſeph flees in a little Boat by the Lake.

This Speech of his well pleaſed the people of Tarichea, who gave him great Praiſes, and diſpleaſed them of Tiberias, ſo that they breathed out threatnings againſt him. Thus they both left Joſeph, and conteſted one againſt another. Joſeph now having many K partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almoſt forty thouſand) ſpake more boldly to the multitude, and rebuked their temerity; telling them, that it was neceſſary to ſtrengthen Tarichea with that preſent money, and that he would alſo provide to ſtrengthen other Cities; and that they ſhould not want money, if they would agree and conſpire together againſt thoſe from whom they might get it, and not offer violence to him, who could procure it for them. The multitude being thus deceived, though they were angry, yet departed: Yet two thouſand of thoſe that were animated againſt him, offered to ſet upon him: but he being already retired into his houſe, they there beſieged him. Wherefore Joſeph uſed another device likewiſe to repreſs theſe: and getting to the top of the houſe, he beckned unto them with his hand, to L keep ſilence; and then ſaid, that he was ignorant what they requeſted at his hands; for he could not hear one for another, becauſe their voices were confounded with their number; but if they would ſend ſome into the houſe to talk friendly with him, he would do whatſoever they requeſted. The Nobles and Magiſtrates hearing this, preſently entred into the houſe; whom, when he had led into the innermoſt part of the houſe, and ſhut the doors, he cauſed to be beaten ſo long, till that their ribs appeared. The doors in the mean time being faſt, the people ſtayed before the houſe, thinking that the cauſe of their long tarrying was to debate reaſons to and fro: But preſently Joſeph opening the doors, put them forth amongſt the people all bloody as they were; whereat they were ſo daunted, that leaving their Weapons behind them, M they ran away. Hereat John took occaſion to encreaſe his hatred and jealouſie againſt Joſeph; and having ill ſucceſs in this policy, he ſtill attempted other plots to bring Joſeph in danger. Firſt he counterfeited himſelf ſick, and requeſted Joſeph to permit him to go to Tiberias, and uſe the hot Baths, in order to recover his health. Joſeph, not having yet perceived his Treaſon, writ Letters in his behalf to the Governour of the Town, to provide John with good accommodation, and to let him want nothing that he needed. Two days after his arrival there, he went about the buſineſs which he deſigned; and enticed ſome with money, others with flatteries, to revolt from Joſeph. Silas, whom Joſeph had made Governour of the City, underſtanding this, preſently by N Letters gave notice thereof to Joſeph; who receiving the ſame in the night, went to Tiberias very early in the morning. All the people, except thoſe that John had corrupted, went out to meet him: but John, notwithſtanding he judged that he came againſt him, ſtill counterfeited himſelf ſick in bed, and ſent a man of his acquaintance to excuſe his abſence for not coming to meet Joſeph. Then Joſeph aſſembled the Tiberians together in a place to ſpeak to them, concerning that which was written to him: And John ſent armed men thither with Commandment to kill Joſeph. The people perceiving them to draw their Swords, cryed out; and Joſeph at their cry looking about him, and perceiving their Swords even almoſt at his throat, he leaped down a little Hill upon the Shore, which was ſix cubits high, upon which he ſtood to ſpeak to the O people: And going into a boat with two of his Guard which he found there, he went into the midſt of the Lake; and preſently his Guard taking their Weapons, aſſaulted the Traytors. Joſeph fearing that a great conflict would enſue, and ſo the whole City,

A for a few men's fault be deſtroyed, ſent to his Soldiers, charging them only to take care for their own ſafety, and no more; and to kill none, nor reprove any, for that wicked fact: and they forthwith obeying his Command, ceaſed from fight.

But thoſe that inhabited about the City, and heard of the Treaſon, and by whom it was attempted, armed themſelves and came againſt John; but he, before their coming, fled to Giſcala, where he was born. In the mean while, all Galilee came and joyned with Joſeph; and there were many thouſands of Armed men gathered together, affirming that they came againſt John, and to fire that City which had received him. Joſeph thanked them for their good will, ſaying, that he had rather conquer his enemies by moderation, than by fire and Sword; and therefore requeſted them to B be content. He alſo publiſhed an Edict, wherein he declared, that all thoſe that had rebelled with John, and did not forſake him within five days next following, ſhould loſe all their Eſtates, and their houſes ſhould be ſacked and ſet on fire. Hereupon, three thouſand preſently forſook John, and came and laid down their weapons at Joſeph's feet, proſtrating themſelves before him; ſo that there remained with John but two thouſand fugitive Syrians. By whom being aſſiſted, he again went ſecretly to work, having had ſo ill ſucceſs by open dealing; and ſo he privily ſent meſſengers to Jeruſalem, to accuſe Joſeph that he had gathered a great Army, and that except he were quickly prevented, he would come and uſurp Dominion over the Mother-city. But the people underſtanding before of John's hatred, did not regard it; yet divers C rich men and Magiſtrates who envied Joſeph, ſecretly ſent money to John, to hire Forreign Soldiers, that he might make War againſt Joſeph; whom they determined amongſt themſelves to diſplace: And thinking that their order was not ſufficient to effect it, they ſent moreover two thouſand five hundred men, and four of their Principal Nobility with them, to wit, Joazar the Lawyer, and Ananias the Saducee, and Simon and Judas, the Sons of Jonathas; all very eloquent men, and learned in our Laws, to withdraw the people's minds from Joſeph; giving them charge, that if he of his own accord came to them, then they ſhould permit him to ſpeak for himſelf; but if he refuſed ſo to do, then they ſhould hold him as an enemy. Joſeph's Friends at Jeruſalem gave him intelligence that an Army was coming againſt him, but for what cauſe D they knew not, becauſe it was kept ſecret. And hereupon, before he could prevent it, four Cities revolted from him, to wit, Sephoris, Gamala, Giſcala and Tiberias, which nevertheleſs he ſoon after eaſily recovered, without Force of Arms: And having taken the four Captains and Counſellors of his enemies, he ſent them to Jeruſalem; againſt whom the people being incenſed, would have killed them, and thoſe that ſent them, had they not fled in good time.

At length he reſolved to overcome the Rebels by policy; and ſo he commanded the Gates of Tarichea to be kept ſhut, that his intent might not be revealed to them, of Tiberias. Then taking all the Boats that were in the Lake, in number two hundred and thirty, and in every one of them four Sailers, he ſpeedily ſailed to Tiberias: And when he came near the City, yet ſo far off, that the Inhabitants thereof could not eaſily deſcry him, he commanded all the Boats to ſtop, and the rowers to beat the water ſtill as if they were rowing; and taking only ſeven of his Guard with him, unarmed, he went near enough the City, that they might ſee him. When the Rebels perceived him, and thought that the Boats were full of Armed men, they threw down their Weapons, and held up their hands to him, beſeeching him to ſpare the City. Joſeph, with many threatning and bitter Speeches, reproached them firſt, that having G undertaken War againſt the Romans, they with Civil Diſſentions conſumed their own Forces: Secondly, that they had ſought his life, from whom they ought to expect their ſafety; and that they were not aſhamed to ſhut the Gates againſt him, who had built the Walls; yet if any would come and talk with him, and give him aſſurance of their fidelity, he would not refuſe them. So ten of the chiefeſt among them came to him, whom he carried away in a Fiſher-boat far from the City, and he demanded fifty Senatours, as though he required their promiſe alſo. And deviſing new Cauſes, he ſtill under pretence of agreement ſent firſt for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the Boats: which done, he commanded all the Boatmen with all ſpeed poſſible to go to Tarichea, and put them in Priſon; ſo he carried away all the Council, which were in number ſix hundred, and 2000 more, all whom he brought to Tarichea. But they which remained in the City, cried with one voice that one Clitus was cauſe of the revolt, and therefore beſought Joſeph to puniſh him for all. Joſeph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one of his Guard, called Levias, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to truſt himſelf amongſt ſo many enemies, refuſed to do execution. Clitus perceiving that Joſeph was angry, and ready to come out of his Boat to do it himſelf, beſought him to grant him one of his hands; which Joſeph did upon condition that he ſhould cut off the other himſelf. So Clitus drawing out his Sword with his right hand, cut off his left. After this manner Joſeph brought Tiberias again under his ſubjection. And within a few days after, he took Giſcala and Sephoris, which had revolted, having given the ſpoils thereof to his Soldiers; yet afterward he reſtored moſt that was taken away to the people; and the like he did to the inhabitants of Tiberias: by which means he got the good will of them all.

How the people of Jeruſalem prepared themſelves for War, and of the Robberies of Simon Son of Gioras.

The troubled Eſtate of Jeruſalem.

AFter that theſe broils, which hitherto hapned only in Galilee, were ceaſed, they prepared themſelves againſt the Romans. And the chief men of Jeruſalem, and Ananus the high Prieſt, with all ſpeed renewed and repaired the Walls, and made all ſorts of Inſtruments for war, Arrows and other weapons; ſo that all the City was buſied herein, and trained their men in warlike diſcipline. All places were filled with agitation and tumult; but the graver ſort were very penſive, and many as it were foreſeeing the calamity that after enſued, could not refrain from tears: they that deſired peace, received no comfort in any thing: all things were done at their beck who were cauſe of all this War. And the Eſtate of the City, even then before the Romans came, was like a City to be deſtroyed, But Ananus neglected that which was neceſſary for War, and laboured to reconcile the ſeditious faction of thoſe that were called Zelous: but how he was overcome, and what his end was, we will declare hereafter.

Simon the Son of Gioras committeth great rapines, and murthers in Acrabatena and Idumea.

In the mean time one Simon the Son of Gioras in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, having gathered together a multitude of ſeditious people, robbed and ſpoled every where; and he not only broke into rich mens houſes, but alſo beat them grievouſly, openly exerciſing his Tyranny. But when Ananus and the reſt ſent an army againſt him, he fled to his fellow-thieves of Maſſada, and there ſtaid till Ananus and the reſt of his Enemies were ſlain: and then he waſted Idumea with the reſt; ſo that the Governours of that place were fain to put a Garriſon in every Village: ſo great was the number of them that were ſlain by theſe Thieves. And thus ſtood the affairs of the Jews.

CHAP. I.

Of Veſpaſian's coming into Judea, and of the Maſſacre of the Jews.

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Jews.

VVHen the Emperor Nero underſtood the ill ſucceſs of his Armies againſt the Jews, he was ſeized with fear and aſtoniſhment; yet he diſſembled it as much as neceſſity would permit him. In the mean-while he ſet a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, ſaying, That that which hapned, was rather by the fault of his General Ceſtius, than the valour of their Adverſaries: thinking that it behoved him, who was Emperor, not to ſhew himſelf moved with a little bad news; and that the greatneſs of his Empire ought to ſecure his mind from the apprehenſion of conſiderable misfortunes. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his ſpirit that he was much moved, and in great care to whom he ſhould commit the charge of the Eaſt, which had rebelled; who might both reduce the Jews, and hinder the Inhabitants of other Countries from the like attempts. At laſt, he pitcht upon Veſpaſian, whom he thought only meet for that purpoſe; a man who from his Infancy had been trained up in War, even until he was gray-headed; who had appeaſed the people of the Weſt, and helped them being troubled by the Germans, and recovered it for the Romans: as alſo he did Britain, which was unknown before; and for that cauſe made his Father Claudius triumph, without taking any pains for it. Nero conſidered all theſe things, and his prudence grounded on old Age and Experience; and that alſo he had Sons in the flower of their Age, to be pledges for his fidelity, who might aſſiſt their Father by their Courage. Wherefore God, as it ſhould ſeem, even then diſpoſing it ſo for the good of the whole Common-wealth, Nero ſent him to govern the Armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with fair ſpeeches and promiſes, as at that time need H required.

Veſpaſian and Titus gather great Forces againſt the Jews.

The Jews beſiege Aſcalon.

Anthony fighteth with the Jews.

The Romans overcome the Jews, and make a great ſlaughter of them.

Ten thouſand Jews ſlain.

Eight thouſand Jews ſlain at Aſcalon.

Accordingly Veſpaſian departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commanded Titus his Son to lead the fifth and tenth Legions from Alexandria; and he himſelf croſſing over the Helleſpont, followed after by land into Syria, where he aſſembled all the Roman forces, and all Auxiliaries of the Kings adjoyning that were confederates. The Jews after Ceſtius unfortunate ſucceſs, became proud of their Victory, and could not contain themſelves; but like men uncapable of moderation, they ſtill gave more occaſion of War: and gathering all their Forces together, they went to Aſcalon, which is an old City ſeven hundred and twenty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, which the Jews had always hated, for which cauſe they alſo firſt aſſaulted it. The Commanders I in this expedition, were three men excellent above the reſt for Conduct and Valour, to wit, Niger of Pærea, Silas the Babylonian, and John the Eſſean. Now the City of Aſcalon had very ſtrong Walls, but few men to defend it; for it had only one Company of Foot, and one Band of Horſe, whom Antonius commanded. The Jews made ſuch haſte, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perſwading himſelf that they would aſſault him, cauſed his Horſe to iſſue forth of the City: and neither fearing the multitude, nor the malice of his adverſaries, he valiantly received the firſt aſſault of the Enemies, and beat them back that attempted to aſſault the Wall. So the Jews who were unskilful, having to do with them that were expert; and fighting on foot againſt Horſemen; without order, againſt thoſe that were in good order; lightly armed, againſt K their adverſaries who were well provided; they were eaſily defeated. Indeed, they were more led by rage and fury than good Counſel; and they againſt whom they fought were obedient, and would do nothing without the commandment of their Leader. Wherefore their firſt ranks being broken, they were forced by the Horſe to turn their backs; and retiring themſelves to their own Company who turned toward the Wall, they became as it were Enemies to themſelves. So that ſeeking to avoid the Horſemen, they were all diſperſed about the field, which was in every place for the advantage of the Horſe. This greatly helped the Romans to kill ſo many Jews: for they that fled were eaſily overtaken by the Romans, and killed; and others compaſſing divers of the Jews about, ſlew them with Darts; ſo that the Jews were in a great L deſperation for all their great multitude, as if they had been alone. The Jews willing to overcome their misfortunes, were aſhamed to flie, and ſo fled not haſtily, in hope that Fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied with that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the moſt part of the day; ſo that there were ſlain of the Jews ten thouſand, and two of their Leaders, John and Silas. The reſt, whereof many were wounded, followed their General Niger, who fled into a little Town of Idumæa, named Salis: Of the Romans only ſome were wounded in that fight. Yet the Jews were not daunted with this misfortune; but the grief thereof much increaſed their Courage: neither were they diſmayed with the former loſs of ſo many men within ſo ſhort time; but rather calling to mind the great Victory they had got before, they M drew upon themſelves another defeat. For before their mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their Forces, and went again to Aſchalon in great number and fury, but with the ſame ſucceſs and diſadvantages in warlike affairs which they had before. For Antonius having notice which way they meant to come, placed an ambuſh in the way; and the Horſe ſetting upon them at unawares, killed above eight thouſand of them, before they could prepare themſelves to fight: whereupon all the reſt fled, and Niger with them, after he had given all the proofs that could be expected from a valiant man: and for that the Enemies purſued them, they fled into the Tower of a Town called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vain to ſtay about the Tower that was invincible, and yet loth to let the General of the Enemies eſcape, ſet fire on the N Walls; and ſo departed triumphing with the thought that Niger had been burnt. But he leapt into a deep Vault in the Caſtle, and ſo eſcaped, and three dayes after he ſhewed himſelf unto his Souldiers, who ſought for him weeping, that they might have his body, for they thought him dead: whom againſt all expectation ſeeing alive, they were very glad, as though by Gods providence he had eſcaped to be ſtill their Leader.

Veſpaſian with his whole Army cometh to Ptolomais.

The Sephorites do courteouſly entertain the Romans.

Veſpaſian being arrived with his Army at Antioch, which is the mother-City of Syria, for greatneſs and other advantages, doubtleſs the third in the whole World; and finding that King Agrippa there expected his coming, he haſted with all his Forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came to him the Citizens of Sephoris a City of Galilee, who had no thought at all of Rebellion: theſe both provident for their own O ſafety, and well knowing the Forces of the Romans, before Veſpaſian came, ſubmitted themſelves

A ſelves to Ceſtius Gallus, and received from him a Garriſon of Souldiers; and now alſo courteouſly entertaining Veſpaſian, offered their help againſt their Country-men. Veſpaſian at their requeſt gave them a Guard of Horſe and Foot, ſo great as he thought was able to reſiſt the force of their Enemies, if the Jews ſhould attempt any thing againſt them. For he thought it would be a great help to him in the future War to have Sephoris on his ſide, the greateſt City of Galilee, ſcituate in a ſtrong place, and which otherwiſe might be a ſafeguard to the whole Country.

B The Deſcription of Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa.

The Deſcription and Scituation of the higher Galilee.

THere are two places named Galilee, one called high Galilæa, and the other low Galilee: and they are both compaſſed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the Weſt Ptolemais, with the limits of its Territory borders them, as alſo does Mount Carmel, which in time paſt belonged to Galilee, but now to the Tyrians. Unto which adjoyneth Gabaa, which ſignifieth the Horſmens City: ſo called, becauſe King Herods Horſmen were ſent thither to inhabit. On the South part it joyneth to the Samaritanes and Scythopolitanes, as far as Jordan. On the Eaſt part it bordereth upon Hippene, Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, which are the Borders of King Agrippa's Country. On the North it C bordereth upon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias to Zabulon; near which is Ptolemais by the Sea-Coaſt. In breadth it reacheth from the Village Xaloth, ſcituate in a great Plain, to Berſabe, where alſo begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth to the Village called Baca, bordering upon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a Village near Jordan named Thella, to Meroth. And though of ſuch bigneſs, and environed with ſo many Nations, yet they alwayes reſiſted Forreign Forces. For the Galileans are from their Child-hood Warlike, and never daunted by fear or penury; For their Country is moſt fruitful, and abounding with all manner of Trees, notwithſtanding the Inhabitants take ſmall pains in tilling the ground; and there is no waſte ground.

The length and breadth of the lower Galilee.

D The Cities are many, and in every place there are Villages populous and rich; ſo that the leaſt Village there, hath in it above 15000 inhabitants. And although Galilee be leſs in compaſs than the Region beyond the River, yet it is more populous, fertile and rich than that: For it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited; for there are many Deſarts, and barren Places, unfit to bear fruits for the nouriſhment of Men. Peræa hath a good ſoil and large plain beſet with divers trees, eſpecially Olives, Vines, and Palm-trees: and it is abundantly water'd with Brooks running from the Mountains and Springs that continually ſtream forth during the greateſt heats of Summer.

The Deſcription of the Country beyond the Flood.

The Length of this place is from Macheran to Pella; the Breadth from Philadelphia E to Jordan. This Town Pella lieth on the North part, and Jordan on the Weſt, and the Countrey of the Moabites bordereth on the South; and on the Eaſt Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia and Geraſis. Samaria is ſeated between Judæa and Galilee, beginning at a Town called Ginea, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Judea. For both of them are full of Mountains and have rich plains and good for Tillage; full of Trees abounding with wild Apples and others: Though they are of their nature dry yet they have rain enough, and have many ſweet waters, and abundance of good graſs, and great ſtore of milch-Beaſts; and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. On the confines of theſe Countries ſtand Ananth, a Village otherwiſe called Borceos, which lieth on the North part of F Judæa. The South part of Judæa, if you meaſure the length, extends to the Village of the Arabians, called Jordan: the breadth reacheth from Jordan to Joppe: in the midſt thereof is ſituate Jeruſalem; ſo that ſome call that City the navel of the Country. Judæa alſo bordereth on the Sea-Coaſt, even unto Ptolemais. It is divided into eleven portions: the firſt is Jeruſalem, Head and chief of all, and above all the reſt, as the Head is above the Body: and the reſt are Toparchies. Gophua is the ſecond, after that Acrabatena, then Thamna, afterward Lydda; alſo Emmaus, Pella, Idumea, Engadda, Herodium and Jericho; beſides theſe, Jamnia and Joppa command the places adjoyning. Moreover, there is Gamala, Gaulanitis, Batanea and Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to King Agrippa's Kingdom. This Country beginneth at Mount Libanus, G and the Fountains of Jordan, and reacheth in breadth to the Lake near Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Julias to Arphas; and the Inhabitants are partly Jews, and partly Syrians.

I Have ſpoken of Judæa as briefly as might be, and with what Countries it is environed.
Now Veſpaſian ſent help to the Inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Leader. The Horſemen divided themſelves into two Companies,and lodged in a great Plain; and the Footmen were in Garriſon in the City to defend it, as the Horſemen did without. Theſe I Horſemen made excurſions one every ſide, and greatly moleſted Joſeph although he committed no act of hoſtility; and alſo ſpoiled all that was without the Cities, and always repulſed the Inhabitants, if at any time they took courage to revenge themſelves.
Joſeph ſeeing things in this poſture aſſaulted the City Sephoris, in hope to take it;but before ſuch time as it revolted unto the Romans,he had compaſſed it with ſo ſtrong Walls, that the Romans themſelves could not have taken it, and ſo his hope was fruſtrate: for neither by force nor fair means would the Sephorites yield to him.
Hereat the Romans being angry, troubled the Country more than before: they now neither night nor day ceaſed from deſtroying it, but robbed and ſpoiled all they found; and all men able to bear Arms they ſlew, and made the reſt their ſlaves. Thus all Galilee K was filled with fire and ſword, and no man eſcaped that calamity; only thoſe ſaved themſelves, that fled into the Cities that Joſeph had walled.

Titus bringeth a mighty Army into Judæa.

In the mean time Titus came to Alexandria during Winter, ſooner than he was expected; and ſo received there the Souldiers that he was ſent for: and having a proſperous journey, he quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his Father there, to two of the chiefeſt Legions, to wit, the fifth and tenth, he alſo adjoyned that fifteenth Legion that he brought with him, and there followed them eighteen Companies; five out of Cæſarea, one Troop of Horſe, and five Companies of Horſe out of Syria: ten of theſe Companies of Foot had in every one of them a thouſand Men, the reſt only ſix hundred and thirteen, and in every Troop of Horſe, were an hundred and twenty. L
The Princes that were Allies alſo brought great Aid: for Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, brought each of them two thouſand Bowmen, and a thouſand Horſe: and Malchus King of Arabia, brought five thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe; the moſt of his Foot were Archers, ſo that the whole Army, together with the Kings Aid, amounted to the number of threeſcore thouſand, Horſe and Foot together; beſides them that followed the camp, who were a great multitude, and inferiour to none but their Maſters in warlike diſcipline: for one cannot too much admire the Romans, who ſo train up their ſervants in time of Peace,that they are very fit for War. So that whoſoever well beholdeth their Military Diſciplin, he ſhall perceive that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by their valour: for they do M not only then begin to uſe weapons when they come to fight, but they practiſe military diſcipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but always practiſe themſelves therein without ceaſing. Their exerciſes are like War it ſelf, and every Souldier is every day inur'd to ſome ſort of Weapon, even as though they were fighting againſt the enemy; ſo that hereby they eaſily indure the burthen and travel of War. For no diſorder makes them forget what to do; neither doth fear diſmay them, nor continuance of Fight and War weary and tire them. So that whoſoever they fight againſt, who are not ſo well expert in theſe affairs as they, they always overcome them: and one may well call their exerciſes amongſt themſelves, conflicts without blood-ſhed; and their wars, conflicts with blood-ſhed. They are not eaſily overcome N at unawares: for in what Enemy-country ſoever they come, they fight not before they have fortified their Camp about; which they do not raſhly, nor pitch their Tents in mariſh or high places after a diſordered manner; for if the place be unequal, they make it plain. And they proportion their Camp four-ſquare: for they have many Smiths, and all kind of Workmen needful, which ſtill follow the Army, to perform ſuch buſineſs. And in the innermoſt part of the Camp they make Quarters, whoſe outſide reſembleth a Wall, with Towers equally diſtant one from another, and between them Engines of War to caſt Stones, and ſuch-like, that all kind of ſhot may be in readineſs. They alſo build four Gates large and wide, both for their Horſe eaſily to come in at, and alſo for themſelves if need require, to enter in or iſſue out ſpeedily. O Within the camp, there are ſtreets divided by certain ſpaces: in the midſt lodge

The order of the Romans in their Camp.

A their Officers, and the Pretorium, or Generals Tent, is like a Temple; ſo that it ſeemeth a City, and a Market full of ſhops made in an inſtant. There are alſo ſeats built for the Chief Officers to judg of controverſies, if any ariſe between the Souldiers and others. All this place, and all things belonging thereto, are made in an inſtant, partly by reaſon of the multitude, partly by the induſtry of ſuch as work: and if need require, they compaſs it with a Trench four Cubits deep, and as many broad. Thus the Souldiers encloſed with their Arms, live quietly in their Tents, without diſorder; and all things are done with good advice and prudence, whether they need Water, or Corn, or Wood, they all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all ſleep at once; and a Trumpet giveth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not B commanded. In the morning all the Souldiers come to their Captains to ſalute them, the Captains go to the Tribunes, and they all to the General, who gives them a Watch-word, and tells them what he thinks good, and how they ſhall behave themſelves towards thoſe that are under them; how in fight to demean themſelves, and when to aſſault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the Camp, a Trumpet ſounds and no man is idle, but at the firſt notice takes away his Tent, and makes all ready for departure.
Then the Trumpet ſoundeth again, warning them to be ready; and having loden their Beaſts with their baggage, they expect the ſound again, as though they were to run a race; and at their departure they burn their Camp, becauſe it is eaſie to build the like again; and alſo leaſt afterwards it ſhould advantage their Enemies. When the C Trumpet hath ſounded the third time, which is a ſign to ſet forward, then they haſten thoſe that are ſlow, leſt they break their ranks. And a Herald ſtandeth on the right hand of the General, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often anſwer that they are, holding up their right hands with courage: and ſo they march on orderly, every man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to give Battel. The Footmen have a Head-piece, a Breaſt-plate, and a Sword on the left ſide, and on the right ſide a Dagger. The Footmen guarding the General, have a Javelin and a Shield:
the reſt are armed with Bucklers and Pikes. Moreover, they carry a Saw, a Basket, a Fardle, a Hatchet, a Cord, a Sythe, a Chain, and Victuals for three days: ſo that the Footmen are as much loaden as the Cattel. The Horſmen carry at their D right ſide a long Sword, in the left hand a Dart, and a long Shield hanging againſt the horſe ſide, and a Quiver with three Darts, with broad edges, which are as big as a Spear; they have alſo Helmets and Breaſt-plates like the Footmen. The Generals Horſemen that guard his body, nothing differ from the reſt. That company always leadeth, that the lot falleth unto. And theſe are the faſhions of the Romans concerning their warlike diſcipline. They never do any thing unadviſedly in Battle, but manage all things according to counſel; ſo that they either do not err, or if they do, their fault is eaſily amended. For they think that bad ſucceſs after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it; and they think that therein fortune did but flatter them, to work them ſome deſpight, by reaſon they did not deliberate: but that which is premeditated, E although it have ill ſucceſs, yet it maketh them wary againſt another time. And none of them account that good ſucceſs, which comes by chance; and every one is comforted in their misfortune, if then they took good advice. By their military exerciſes they do not only make the Bodies of their Souldiers ſtrong, but their minds alſo more couragious: and their diligence is the greater by their fear of puniſhment. For their Laws are capital, not only for them that forſake their order, but alſo for them that commit the leaſt negligences; and their Generals are more ſevere then their Laws. Yet their Rewards of merit are ſo great, that they ſeem not cruel in puniſhing the faulty. Moreover, they are ſo obedient to their Rulers, that in Peace they honour them, and in War the whole Army ſeemeth one body united together: they keep ſuch good order, and are ſo F ready to turn here or there, and ſo attentive to any command, ſo diligent to note ſigns made unto them, and ſo quick to labour with their hands, that they are always apt to execute any thing, and patient to ſuffer labour. Inſomuch that no number of Enemies, no Rivers, Mountains, Foreſts, or difficult place, can hinder them from Victory; no not even the croſsneſs of Fortune: for they think themſelves unworthy the name of Romans, if they triumph not over her too. Therefore ſeeing their deeds are ruled by Advice and Counſel, and their Commandments ſo well executed by the Army, what marvel is it if their Empire in the Eaſt reach to Euphrates, in the Weſt to the Ocean, in the South to Africk, in the North to Rhine and Danubius? ſeeing that one may juſtly affirm the poſſeſſion leſs than the poſſeſſors. This I have G ſpoken, not ſo much to praiſe the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie thoſe that deſire alteration: and perhaps it may inſtruct them who want good

E Of Veſpaſian's coming into Judea, and of the Maſſacre of the Jews.

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Jews.

WHen the Emperor Nero underſtood the ill ſucceſs of his Armies againſt the Jews, he was ſeized with fear and aſtoniſhment; yet he diſſembled it as much as neceſſity would permit him. In the mean-while he ſet a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, ſaying, That that which hapned, was rather by the fault of his General Ceſtius, than the valour of their Adverſaries: thinking that it behoved him, who was Emperor, not to ſhew himſelf moved with a little bad news; and that the greatneſs of his Empire ought to ſecure his mind from the apprehenſion of conſiderable misfortunes. Syria, greatly encouraging him with fair ſpeeches and promiſes, as at that time need H required.

Veſpaſian and Titus gather great Forces againſt the Jews.

The Jews beſiege Aſcalon.

Anthony fighteth with the Jews.

The Romans overcome the Jews, and make a great ſlaughter of them.

Ten thouſand Jews ſlain.

Eight thouſand Jews ſlain at Aſcalon.

Accordingly Veſpaſian departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commanded Titus his Son to lead the fifth and tenth Legions from Alexandria; and he himſelf croſſing over the Helleſpont, followed after by land into Syria, where he aſſembled all the Roman forces, and all Auxiliaries of the Kings adjoyning that were confederates. The Jews after Ceſtius unfortunate ſucceſs, became proud of their Victory, and could not contain themſelves; but like men uncapable of moderation, they ſtill gave more occaſion of War: and gathering all their Forces together, they went to Aſcalon, which is an old City ſeven hundred and twenty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, which the Jews had always hated, for which cauſe they alſo firſt aſſaulted it. The Commanders I in this expedition, were three men excellent above the reſt for Conduct and Valour, to wit, Niger of Pærea, Silas the Babylonian, and John the Eſſean. Now the City of Aſcalon had very ſtrong Walls, but few men to defend it; for it had only one Company of Foot, and one Band of Horſe, whom Antonius commanded. The Jews made ſuch haſte, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perſwading himſelf that they would aſſault him, cauſed his Horſe to iſſue forth of the City: and neither fearing the multitude, nor the malice of his adverſaries, he valiantly received the firſt aſſault of the Enemies, and beat them back that attempted to aſſault the Wall. So the Jews who were unskilful, having to do with them that were expert; and fighting on foot againſt Horſemen; without order, againſt thoſe that were in good order; lightly armed, againſt K their adverſaries who were well provided; they were eaſily defeated. Indeed, they were more led by rage and fury than good Counſel; and they againſt whom they fought were obedient, and would do nothing without the commandment of their Leader. Wherefore their firſt ranks being broken, they were forced by the Horſe to turn their backs; and retiring themſelves to their own Company who turned toward the Wall, they became as it were Enemies to themſelves. So that ſeeking to avoid the Horſemen, they were all diſperſed about the field, which was in every place for the advantage of the Horſe. This greatly helped the Romans to kill ſo many Jews: for they that fled were eaſily overtaken by the Romans, and killed; and others compaſſing divers of the Jews about, ſlew them with Darts; ſo that the Jews were in a great L deſperation for all their great multitude, as if they had been alone. The Jews willing to overcome their misfortunes, were aſhamed to flie, and ſo fled not haſtily, in hope that Fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied with that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the moſt part of the day; ſo that there were ſlain of the Jews ten thouſand, and two of their Leaders, John and Silas. The reſt, whereof many were wounded, followed their General Niger, who fled into a little Town of Idumæa, named Salis: Of the Romans only ſome were wounded in that fight. Yet the Jews were not daunted with this misfortune; but the grief thereof much increaſed their Courage; neither were they diſmayed with the former loſs of ſo many men within ſo ſhort time; but rather calling to mind the great Victory they had got before, they M drew upon themſelves another defeat. For before their mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their Forces, and went again to Aſchalon in great number and fury, but with the ſame ſucceſs and diſadvantages in warlike affairs which they had before. For Antonius having notice which way they meant to come, placed an ambuſh in the way; and the Horſe ſetting upon them at unawares, killed above eight thouſand of them, before they could prepare themſelves to fight: whereupon all the reſt fled, and Niger with them, after he had given all the proofs that could be expected from a valiant man: and for that the Enemies purſued them, they fled into the Tower of a Town called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vain to ſtay about the Tower that was invincible, and yet loth to let the General of the Enemies eſcape, ſet fire on the N Walls; and ſo departed triumphing with the thought that Niger had been burnt. But he leapt into a deep Vault in the Caſtle, and ſo eſcaped, and three dayes after he ſhewed himſelf unto his Souldiers, who ſought for him weeping, that they might have his body, for they thought him dead: whom againſt all expectation ſeeing alive, they were very glad, as though by Gods providence he had eſcaped to be ſtill their Leader.

The Sephorites do courteouſly entertain the Romans.

Veſpaſian being arrived with his Army at Antioch, which is the mother-City of Syria, for greatneſs and other advantages, doubtleſs the third in the whole World; and finding that King Agrippa there expected his coming, he haſted with all his Forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came to him the Citizens of Sephoris a City of Galilee, who had no thought at all of Rebellion: theſe both provident for their own O ſafety, and well-knowing the Forces of the Romans, before Veſpaſian came, ſubmitted

For he thought it would be a great help to him in the future War to have Sephoris on his ſide, the greateſt City of Galilee, ſcituate in a ſtrong place, and which otherwiſe might be a ſafeguard to the whole Country.

THere are two places named Galilee, one called high Galilæa, and the other low Galilee: and they are both compaſſed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the Weſt Ptolemais, with the limits of its Territory borders them, as alſo does Mount Carmel, which in time paſt belonged to Galilee, but now to the Tyrians. Unto which adjoyneth Gabaa, which ſignifieth the Horſmens City: ſo called, becauſe King Herods Horſmen were ſent thither to inhabit. On the South part it joyneth to the Samaritanes and Scythopolitanes, as far as Jordan. On the Eaſt part it bordereth upon Hippene, Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, which are the Borders of King Agrippa's Country. On the North it C bordereth upon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias to Zabulon; near which is Ptolemais by the Sea-Coaſt. In breadth it reacheth from the Village Xaloth, ſcituate in a great Plain, to Berſabe, where alſo begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth to the Village called Baca, bordering upon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a Village near Jordan named Thella, to Meroth. And though of ſuch bigneſs, and environed with ſo many Nations, yet they alwayes reſiſted Forreign Forces. For the Galileans are from their Child-hood Warlike, and never daunted by fear or penury; For their Country is moſt fruitful, and abounding with all manner of Trees, notwithſtanding the Inhabitants take ſmall pains in tilling the ground; and there is no waſte ground.

D The Cities are many, and in every place there are Villages populous and rich; ſo that the leaſt Village there, hath in it above 15000 inhabitants. And although Galilee be leſs in compaſs than the Region beyond the River, yet it is more populous, fertile and rich than that: For it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited; for there are many Deſarts, and barren Places, unfit to bear fruits for the nouriſhment of Men. Peræa hath a good ſoil and large plain beſet with divers trees, eſpecially Olives, Vines, and Palm-trees: and it is abundantly water'd with Brooks running from the Mountains and Springs that continually ſtream forth during the greateſt heats of Summer.

This Town Pella lieth on the North part, and Jordan on the Weſt, and the Countrey of the Moabites bordereth on the South; and on the Eaſt Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia and Geraſis. Samaria is ſeated between Judæa and Galilee, beginning at a Town called Ginea, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Judea. For both of them are full of Mountains and have rich plains and good for Tillage; full of Trees abounding with wild Apples and others: Though they are of their nature dry yet they have rain enough, and have many ſweet waters, and abundance of good graſs, and great ſtore of milch-Beaſts; and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. CHAP. III.

How Aid was ſent to the people of Sephoris; and of the military Diſcipline of the Romans.

Veſpaſian ſendeth help to the Sephorites, but filleth Galilee with ſword and fire

I Have ſpoken of Judæa as briefly as might be, and with what Countries it is environed. Now Veſpaſian ſent help to the Inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Leader. The Horſemen divided themſelves into two Companies, and lodged in a great Plain; and the Footmen were in Garriſon in the City to defend it, as the Horſemen did without. Theſe I Horſemen made excurſions one every ſide, and greatly moleſted Joſeph although he committed no act of hoſtility; and alſo ſpoiled all that was without the Cities, and always repulſed the Inhabitants, if at any time they took courage to revenge themſelves. Joſeph ſeeing things in this poſture aſſaulted the City Sephoris, in hope to take it; but before ſuch time as it revolted unto the Romans, he had compaſſed it with ſo ſtrong Walls, that the Romans themſelves could not have taken it, and ſo his hope was fruſtrate: for neither by force nor fair means would the Sephorites yield to him. Hereat the Romans being angry, troubled the Country more than before: they now neither night nor day ceaſed from deſtroying it, but robbed and ſpoiled all they found; and all men able to bear Arms they ſlew, and made the reſt their ſlaves. Thus all Galilee K was filled with fire and ſword, and no man eſcaped that calamity; only thoſe ſaved themſelves, that fled into the Cities that Joſeph had walled.

In the mean time Titus came to Alexandria during Winter, ſooner than he was expected; and ſo received there the Souldiers that he was ſent for: and having a proſperous journey, he quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his Father there, to two of the chiefeſt Legions, to wit, the fifth and tenth, he alſo adjoyned that fifteenth Legion that he brought with him, and there followed them eighteen Companies; five out of Cæſarea, one Troop of Horſe, and five Companies of Horſe out of Syria: ten of theſe Companies of Foot had in every one of them a thouſand Men, the reſt only ſix hundred and thirteen, and in every Troop of Horſe, were an hundred and twenty. L The Princes that were Allies alſo brought great Aid: for Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, brought each of them two thouſand Bowmen, and a thouſand Horſe: and Malchus King of Arabia, brought five thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe; the moſt of his Foot were Archers, ſo that the whole Army, together with the Kings Aid, amounted to the number of threeſcore thouſand, Horſe and Foot together; beſides them that followed the camp, who were a great multitude, and inferiour to none but their Maſters in warlike diſcipline: for one cannot too much admire the Romans, who ſo train up their ſervants in time of Peace, that they are very fit for War. So that whoſoever well beholdeth their Military Diſciplin, he ſhall perceive that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by their valour: for they do M not only then begin to uſe weapons when they come to fight, but they practiſe military diſcipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but always practiſe themſelves therein without ceaſing. Their exerciſes are like War it ſelf, and every Souldier is every day inur'd to ſome ſort of Weapon, even as though they were fighting againſt the enemy; ſo that hereby they eaſily indure the burthen and travel of War. For no diſorder makes them forget what to do; neither doth fear diſmay them, nor continuance of Fight and War weary and tire them. So that whoſoever they fight againſt, who are not ſo well expert in theſe affairs as they, they always overcome them: and one may well call their exerciſes amongſt themſelves, conflicts without blood-ſhed; and their wars, conflicts with blood-ſhed. They are not eaſily overcome N at unawares: for in what Enemy-country ſoever they come, they fight not before they have fortified their Camp about; which they do not raſhly, nor pitch their Tents in mariſh or high places after a diſordered manner; for if the place be unequal, they make it plain. And they proportion their Camp four-ſquare: for they have many Smiths, and all kind of Workmen needful, which ſtill follow the Army, to perform ſuch buſineſs. And in the innermoſt part of the Camp they make Quarters, whoſe outſide reſembleth a Wall, with Towers equally diſtant one from another, and between them Engines of War to caſt Stones, and ſuch-like, that all kind of ſhot may be in readineſs. They alſo build four Gates large and wide, both for their Horſe eaſily to come in at, and alſo for themſelves if need require, to enter in or iſſue out ſpeedily. O Within the camp, there are ſtreets divided by certain ſpaces: in the midſt lodge

The order of the Romans in their Camp.

A their Officers, and the Pretorium, or Generals Tent, is like a Temple; ſo that it ſeemeth a City, and a Market full of ſhops made in an inſtant. There are alſo ſeats built for the Chief Officers to judg of controverſies, if any ariſe between the Souldiers and others. All this place, and all things belonging thereto, are made in an inſtant, partly by reaſon of the multitude, partly by the induſtry of ſuch as work: and if need require, they compaſs it with a Trench four Cubits deep, and as many broad. Thus the Souldiers encloſed with their Arms, live quietly in their Tents, without diſorder; and all things are done with good advice and prudence, whether they need Water, or Corn, or Wood, they all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all ſleep at once; and a Trumpet giveth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded.
B In the morning all the Souldiers come to their Captains to ſalute them, the Captains go to the Tribunes, and they all to the General, who gives them a Watch-word, and tells them what he thinks good, and how they ſhall behave themſelves towards thoſe that are under them; how in fight to demean themſelves, and when to aſſault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the Camp, a Trumpet ſounds and no man is idle, but at the firſt notice takes away his Tent, and makes all ready for departure.
Then the Trumpet ſoundeth again, warning them to be ready; and having loden their Beaſts with their baggage, they expect the ſound again, as though they were to run a race; and at their departure they burn their Camp, becauſe it is eaſie to build the like again; and alſo leaſt afterwards it ſhould advantage their Enemies. When the C Trumpet hath ſounded the third time, which is a ſign to ſet forward, then they haſten thoſe that are ſlow, leſt they break their ranks. And a Herald ſtandeth on the right hand of the General, asking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often anſwer that they are, holding up their right hands with courage: and ſo they march on orderly, every man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to give Battel. The Footmen have a Head-piece, a Breaſt-plate, and a Sword on the left ſide, and on the right ſide a Dagger. The Footmen guarding the General, have a Javelin and a Shield:
the reſt are armed with Bucklers and Pikes. Moreover, they carry a Saw, a Basket, a Fardle, a Hatchet, a Cord, a Sythe, a Chain, and Victuals for three days: ſo that the Footmen are as much loaden as the Cattel. The Horſmen carry at their D right ſide a long Sword, in the left hand a Dart, and a long Shield hanging againſt the
horſe ſide, and a Quiver with three Darts, with broad edges, which are as big as a Spear; they have alſo Helmets and Breaſt-plates like the Footmen. The Generals Horſemen that guard his body, nothing differ from the reſt. That company always leadeth, that the lot falleth unto. And theſe are the faſhions of the Romans concerning their warlike diſcipline. They never do any thing unadviſedly in Battle, but manage all things according to counſel; ſo that they either do not err, or if they do, their fault is eaſily amended. For they think that bad ſucceſs after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it; and they think that therein fortune did but flatter them, to work them ſome deſpight, by reaſon they did not deliberate: but that which is premeditated, E although it have ill ſucceſs, yet it maketh them wary againſt another time. And none of them account that good ſucceſs, which comes by chance; and every one is comforted in their misfortune, if then they took good advice. By their military exerciſes they do not only make the Bodies of their Souldiers ſtrong, but their minds alſo more couragious: and their diligence is the greater by their fear of puniſhment. For their Laws are capital, not only for them that forſake their order, but alſo for them that commit the leaſt negligences; and their Generals are more ſevere then their Laws. Yet their Rewards of merit are ſo great, that they ſeem not cruel in puniſhing the faulty. Moreover, they are ſo obedient to their Rulers, that in Peace they honour them, and in War the whole Army ſeemeth one body united together: they keep ſuch good order, and are ſo ready F to turn here or there, and ſo attentive to any command, ſo diligent to note ſigns made unto them, and ſo quick to labour with their hands, that they are always apt to execute any thing, and patient to ſuffer labour. Inſomuch that no number of Enemies, no Rivers, Mountains, Foreſts, or difficult place, can hinder them from Victory; no not even the croſſneſs of Fortune: for they think themſelves unworthy the name of Romans, if they triumph not over her too. Therefore ſeeing their deeds are ruled by Advice and Counſel, and their Commandments ſo well executed by the Army, what marvel is it if their Empire in the Eaſt reach to Euphrates, in the Weſt to the Ocean, in the South to Africk, in the North to Rhine and Danubius? ſeeing that one may juſtly affirm the poſſeſſion leſs than the poſſeſſors. This I have ſpoken, G not ſo much to praiſe the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie thoſe that deſire alteration: and perhaps it may inſtruct them who want good Placidus draweth his forces againſt Jotapata, and being repulſed, flyes.

IN the mean time Veſpatian being at Ptolemais with his Son Titus, prepared all things neceſſary for his Army. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and run through it, where he ſlew almoſt all he had found, who were of the weaker ſort of people incapable of reſiſting. And ſeeing that thoſe of courage always fled into the Cities I that Joſeph had fortified, he turned his forces againſt Jotapata, which was the ſtrongeſt of them, thinking it might eaſily be taken by a ſudden aſſault, and that he thereby ſhould get great glory and advantage; becauſe the people ſeeing the ſtrongeſt Cities ſurprized, would not fly to any again. But it fell not out as he expected; for the people of Jotapata underſtanding his coming, met him near the Town, and ſuddenly encountering the Romans, being a great multitude and well diſpoſed to fight, as thoſe that bare Arms for the general ſafety of the Country, and the lives of their Wives and Children, they put the Romans to flight, and wounded many, though only ſeven were ſlain; becauſe the Romans in flying kept their ranks, and were well armed: but the Jews being unarmed, rather truſted to their Darts and Arrows, than come to handy K blows. There were three Jews ſlain, and a few wounded. And ſo Placidus when he ſaw himſelf repulſed from the Town, abandon'd the Enterprize.

How Veſpatian invaded Galilee, and how at the very ſight of him the Seditious fled.

Veſpatian directeth the Romans march

VEſpaſian deſirous to maſter Galilee himſelf, departed from Ptolemais, making ſuch journies as the Romans are wont to. And he commanded his Auxiliary L Troops, becauſe they were lighter armed, to go before and repreſs the enemies incurſions, and ſearch the Woods and Forreſts fit for Ambuſhes, whereby they were to paſs. After them followed part of the Romans Foot and Horſe: and ten commanded out of every Company, with their Arms and all things neceſſary to make a Camp. After them followed the Pioneers, whoſe office it was to mend the Ways, where they were bad, and to cut down the Woods that were in the way, leſt by bad way the Army ſhould be retarded. After them he ſent his baggage, and the baggage of the Officers under him, with Horſemen to guard it. And after them he himſelf followed, leading an Army of choice Foot and Horſe: And accompanied with his own Guard of Horſe. For he had out of every Legion ſix ſcore men for his guard. Next followed thoſe M that carried the Engines to batter the Walls of Cities, and other Inſtruments, with the Prefects and Tribunes, Guarded with Choice Souldiers. After them the Emperial Eagle, which the Romans have choſen for their Standard, becauſe it is the King of all Birds, and is moſt valiant and ſtrong; wherefore they think it a ſign of Dominion and Victory over all them againſt whom they bear it. After theſe ſacred Enſigns followed the Trumpets ſounding in warlike manner; and after them the Body of the Army, marching ſix in a rank; and, as the cuſtom is, with Centurions, by them to keep order. The Servants of each Legion accompanied the baggage. The laſt Company were Victuallers, Handicrafts-men, and other mercenary people, guarded by Foot and Horſe in great number. Thus Veſpatian with his whole Army N came to the borders of Galilee, and there pitched his Camp. He might have paſſed on, but he thought fit by the ſight of his Army to terrifie his enemies, and give them time to repent, if any one would alter his mind before the War began. Yet in the mean time, he prepared all things neceſſary for a ſiege. The only Rumor of his coming made many Rebels faint-hearted. For Joſephs Souldiers, who had pitched his Tents a little from Sephoris, when they knew that the enemy approch'd, and that they were preſently to fight with the Romans, they fled not only before they fought, but alſo before they ſaw them. Joſeph being left with a very few, and knowing that he was not able to abide his enemies, and that the Jews were diſmayed, and that if he put any truſt in them, they would for the moſt part revolt to the enemies; for that time abſtain- O ed from battel, and thought to get himſelf out of Danger: and ſo accompanied with thoſe that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

How Gadara was beſieged and taken.

VEſpatian went firſt to Gadara, and took it eaſily at the firſt aſſault: for all the able men and fit for War were fled out of the City. The Romans entring the place put all to death without mercy, partly for the hatred they had conceived againſt the Jews, and partly in revenge of that which had befaln Ceſtius. And they burnt the City, and all Towns and Villages adjoining: ſome of which were already deſolate, and B the inhabitants of the reſt were made ſlaves. Joſeph's preſence in the City, which he had made choice of for his ſafeguard, filled it with fear. For the People of Tiberias thought he would never have fled if there had been any hope of withſtanding the Romans: wherein they judged not amiſs: for he foreſaw what event the War would have, and that their ſafety conſiſted only in changing their rebellious minds. He himſelf, though he hoped to obtain pardon of the Romans, yet had much rather have died, then lived pleaſantly with them againſt whom he was ſent, and ſo become a Traytor to the Country comitted to his charge. Wherefore he determined faithfully to write a true ſtate of the Country to the Nobility at Jeruſalem, and not to extol the enemies forces too much, leſt they ſhould ſay he was a Coward; nor yet put them in any comfort, leſt C perhaps now penitent for what they had done, they ſhould by his Letters be incited to go foreward in their rebellious courſe. He deſir'd them preſently to write an anſwer, whether they thought good to enter into League with the Romans; or, if they would make War, then they ſhould ſend a ſufficient Army againſt them: And having written to this effect, he preſently ſent men away to Jeruſalem to carry the Letters.

Joſeph is afraid of the Romans and writeth to Jeruſalem.

Of the Seige of Jotapata.

VEſpatian was very deſirous to take Jotapata, becauſe he knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and this was the ſtrongeſt Refuge they had. So he ſent before ſome Foot and Horſe, with Pioneers to plain the ways, which were full of ragged ſtones, ſo that it was hard for Footmen to paſs, and altogether unpoſſible for Horſemen. Within four dayes they effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the Army to paſs. On the fifth day, which was the one and twentieth of March, Joſeph before they came, entred into the City, coming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Jews who were diſmayed. A certain run-away told Veſpatian E that Joſeph was come thither, and adviſed him to haſten thither; for if he could take Joſeph, he might eaſily take all Judea. Hereat Veſpatian was very glad, and took it as a good fortune that the moſt prudent and potent of his enemies, ſhould (God ſo diſpoſing) put himſelf as it were in hold. And ſo preſently he ſent Placidus before with a thouſand Horſemen, and with him Ebutius, a man both valiant and prudent; and commanded them to inveſt the City on all ſides, leſt Joſeph ſhould privily eſcape from thence. The day after he himſelf followed with the whole Army, and about noon came to Jotapata; and leading his Army to the North ſide of the Town, he pitched his Tents upon a Hill ſeven ſtades diſtant from the City: purpoſely placing himſelf within the view of his Enemies, that the very ſight of his Army might terrifie them: F as it alſo did; for preſently all were in ſuch a fear, that none durſt go out of the City. The Romans being wearied that day, would not aſſault the City: but they beſet the Gates with two Squadrons of Horſe; and a third, that conſiſted of Foot, was placed without to intercept all paſſages, that none of the Jews could paſs any-whither. Hereupon the Jews now in deſperation took heart; for in War nothing is more forcible then neceſſity. The next day began the Battery, and the Jews kept themſelves in order, and reſiſted the Romans before their Walls. But when Veſpaſian ſent all the Bowmen, and Slingers, and other Engineers to beat them off from the Walls, and he himſelf with Foot aſſaulted the Wall in another place where it might eaſily be entred: then Joſeph, accompanied with all his Forces, iſſued out the Town, and aſſaulted the G Romans fiercely, and drove them from the Walls with great courage: though they themſelves ſuffered as much harm as they did to their Enemies. were animated by deſperation, ſo were the Romans with ſhame; theſe latter had Military A knowledge and ſtrength, and the Jews had deſpair and rage to encourage them.
The fight continued all day even till night; wherein many Romans were wounded, and only thirteen ſlain: and of the Jews there were ſix hundred wounded, and ſeventeen ſlain. The next day alſo they encountred the Romans, and reſiſted them more ſtoutly than before, taking courage that they the day before had reſiſted them contrary to their expectation. The Romans alſo fought more valiantly, aſhamed as it were of themſelves, in ſuffering the Jews to reſiſt them; thinking withal that they themſelves were overcome, if they did not quickly ſuppreſs their Enemies. Wherefore the Romans for five dayes together ceaſed not to aſſault the Town, and the Jews ſtrongly repelled them; and neither the Jews feared their Enemies, nor the Romans were diſmayed B with the difficulty of taking the Town. Jotapata is almoſt all ſituate upon a Rock, and compaſſed about with deep Valleys, which deſcend ſtrait down like a Wall, ſo that one can ſcarcely ſee the bottom without dazling. There is only one acceſs to it on the North, where it is ſeated upon a declining Mountain; which Joſeph encloſed with a Wall, to the end it might be no paſſage for the Enemies: all the reſt of the City is environed with high Mountains, ſo that it cannot be diſcerned by any before they be hard by it, ſuch was the ſtrength of Jotapata.

The ſituation of Jotapata.

Veſpatian intends to begin a ſharp Siege.

Veſpatian determined both to combate the nature of the place, and the hardineſs of the Jews; and therefore called all his Captains together, and conſulted with them to begin a hot ſiege: at laſt they reſolved to rear a Mount in that place where the City was C eaſieſt to be entred. He ſent his whole Army to provide wood to do it, who cut much on the Mountains near the Town: and great ſtore of wood and ſtone being brought, and having ſet hurdles before them to bear off the Darts and Arrows, he began to raiſe a Mount; ſo that they received little or no harm by Darts caſt from off the Walls; whilſt others brought earth from places thereabouts, and no man was idle. The Jews caſt continually great ſtones, and all kind of Darts upon that which defended them; which though they pierced not thorow, yet they made a great noiſe and terrified the Workmen. Which Veſpatian ſeeing, cauſed all Engines that caſt ſtones and darts, which were in number an hundred and threeſcore, to be placed againſt the Walls to beat the Jews from thence. And ſo they caſt Stones, Darts, Fire and Arrows in great D abundance: ſo that they not only beat the Jews from off the Walls, but alſo out of the reach of their ſhot; for both the Arabian Archers, and thoſe that uſed Slings and Darts, and all the Engines continually played upon them. For all this the Jews reſted not, but running out in Companies, they pull'd down the Sheds which defended the Workmen, and then aſſaulted them having no defence: and when they had beaten them away, deſtroyed and fired all that the Romans had wrought for their own defence and ſafeguard. At laſt Veſpatian perceived that theſe damages hapned, for that there was ſome ſpace left between all theſe works, whereby the Enemies had acceſs to do them ſuch harms: Wherefore he united them together, and ſo hindred the excurſions of the Jews. When the Mount was almoſt made, and the Towers upon it finiſhed, E Joſeph ſhun'd to do nothing for the ſafeguard of the Town, called all workmen neceſſary together, and commanded them to build a Wall there higher than the Romans Work; but they ſaid, it was impoſſible for them to work, for the number of Darts in that place. Then Joſeph made this device to defend them: he fixed ſtakes in the ground, and faſtened to them hides of Kine and Oxen new ſlain, by which they were defended from ſhot and fire; ſo that labouring night and day they raiſed the Wall twenty cubits high, erecting alſo upon it many Towers: and by this means they made it a ſtrong defence.
The Romans, who before thought themſelves ſure of the Town, were now greatly diſmayed, both by this device of Joſeph, and alſo by the hardineſs of the Jews.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Siege of Jotapata by Veſpatian, and the diligence that Joſeph uſed; and how the Jews made Sallies againſt the Romans.

THis Stratagem, and the Courage of the Jews, greatly moved Veſpatian: for now they receiving courage from that defence, made aſſaults upon the Romans of their own accord, and every day skirmiſhed, running out in Companies, and like Thieves G taking away whatſoever they lighted upon; and what they could not carry away, they

Another Policy of Joſeph.

The people beſeech Joſeph that he would not forſake them.

A ſet on fire. At laſt, Veſpaſian would not permit his Souldiers to fight any longer, but determined to take it by Famine, and either to make them come and yield themſelves for lack of Food, or if they held out, to famiſh them : conceiving that it would be more eaſie to take it by force, if ceaſing a while from aſſaulting it, he afterwards ſet upon it when their Caſe was more deſperate. Wherefore he commanded all paſſages to be kept, that none could go out of the City; but they had great ſtore of Corn, and of all other things elſe, except Salt and Water, whereof they ſtood in great want: for there is never a Fountain in the City, and they have little rain in Summer, ſo that the Inhabitants were in great diſtreſs; for there was hardly any Water left in the City. Joſeph perceiving there was abundance of all things elſe, and that the Citizens were valiant, B as alſo the Siege like to continue long, he gave to every one water in meaſure, with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to have it in that manner; and now they began to faint, and refuſe to labour. The Romans perceiving this, being upon a high hill, over againſt the place whither all the Jews came together to receive Water, they with their ſhot killed many that came thither, inſomuch that Veſpaſian hoped that within ſhort time their Water would be ſpent, and they conſtrained to yield. But Joſeph to fruſtrate this hope, commanded a great many Garments to be laid in water and hanged upon the Walls, ſo that the Water might run down on every ſide. When the Romans ſaw this they were much ſurpriſed, imagining that they would not waſte ſo much Water in mockery, if they wanted Water to C drink; wherefore Veſpaſian no longer hoping to win the City by Famine, purpoſed to aſſault it again by force. The Jews were very glad of this; and being in manifeſt danger, rather wiſh't to be ſlain, than periſh through hunger or thirſt. Joſeph deviſed alſo another way to get Water out of the Country. There was a little Valley out of the way, and therefore not regarded by the Romans; by this way Joſeph ſent men into the Country to his Friends, for ſuch things as the City wanted, commanding them when they came near the Watchmen, to hide and cover themſelves with hairy Skins, that the Watchmen might think them to be Dogs: and this he uſed a good while, till at laſt the Watchmen perceived it, and ſo ſet a guard there to ſtop the paſſage.
When Joſeph perceived the City could not hold out long, and fearing his own Life if D he ſtill continued there, he conſulted with the chief of his Officers, how he might flie.
But the People diſcovering his intent, flocked about him, and beſought him to take pity upon them, and not forſake them, who had no hope but in him; affirming, that for his ſake they were all courageous and bold to fight; and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort to them, and that it did not become him to flie from his Enemies, nor forſake his Friends, nor, as it were, leap out of a Ship ſhaken with a Tempeſt, into which he came when the Seas were calm; for ſo by this means the City would ſoon be loſt, and he once gone, no man afterward could or durſt reſiſt their Enemies, for in him was all their hope.

Joſeph's Prudence.

Joſeph kept it to himſelf, that his purpoſe was to work his own ſafety : and told E them, the thing which he intended was for their good, and that though he ſtayed ſtill in the City, he could do them little good : and if the City ſhould chance to be taken, then he and they were like to periſh; but if he were abroad and not beſieged, he could do them great ſervice, for he would preſently aſſemble all the People of Galilee, and come againſt the Romans, and ſo raiſe the Siege : whereas now ſtaying with them, he ſaw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romans againſt them, making them more earneſt to take the Town than they would be, only becauſe he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that he were fled, they would not then be ſo earneſt in the Siege. Joſeph herewith could not perſwade the people, but they flocked faſter about him, and both young and old of all ſorts came and proſtrated F themſelves at his feet, weeping, and beſeeching him to take ſuch hap as ſhould befal them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they envied his eſcape, but for that they hoped they ſhould receive no harm if he remained with them.

Joſeph ſtayes in Jotapata. Where there is no hope of help there war is the laſt remedy.

The great courage of the Jews in their extream deſparation.

Joſeph conſidering with himſelf that if he ſtayed with them voluntarily, he granted their requeſt, and if he denyed, he feared they would force him; therefore being partly moved with compaſſion, he determined to ſtay: and being now, as all the City was, deſperate, he told them that now it was time to fight; ſeeing there was no hope of ſafety; and that it was a glorious thing to ſpend their lives honourably, and by ſome noble act to leave a remembrance unto their poſterity of their Valour. And ſo iſſuing out of the City, with the moſt valiant among them, when he had killed the Watchmen, G at the firſt encounter he came even to the Romans Tents, and tore the Skins that their Tents were made of, and fired others, and their Engines : and ſo he did the ſecond and third day, and for certain days and nights afterward never ceaſed. When Veſpaſian perceived the Romans greatly endamaged by ſuch Sallies, and very loth to fly for ſhame, and not able to follow them, being ſo loaden with their Armour, and that the Jews always did ſome exploit before they retired themſelves into the City, he gave command to his Souldiers to leave the aſſault, and not to fight againſt men who deſired to dy, becauſe no men were more couragious than the deſperate; and that if they found none to aſſail, their courage would ſoon be laid, like a flame of fire, when the matter that nouriſheth it is conſumed. That the Romans muſt ſeek victory more warily, for that they fought not for neceſſity, but only to increaſe their Dominions. After this, oftentimes they beat the Jews by the Arabian Archers, and with Slings and Darts, and others ſhot which never ceaſed. But ſo ſoon as they were without the danger of ſhot, they more furiouſly aſſailed the Romans, ſparing neither Life nor Limb, but continually fought by turns, and every one of the City aſſiſted them that ſo laboured.

How Veſpaſian battered the Walls of Jotapata with a Ram, and other Warlike Engines.

A Ram.

Joſeph's device how to break the Force of the Ram.

Joſeph burnt the Engines, and turneth off the Romans.

Eleazar's ſtrength and courage.

V*Eſpaſian* thinking himſelf as it were beſieged, both in regard of the long time which he had continued the Siege, and alſo of the divers ſallies and excurſions of the Jews; and having now almoſt raiſed the Rampiers as high as the Walls of the City, determined to batter them with a Ram. A Ram is a huge Beam like the Maſt of a Ship, whoſe end is armed with ſtrong maſſie Iron, and made in the form of a Rams-head; whence it takes its name, becauſe it butteth Walls as a Ram butteth with his head. It hangeth on another Beam with Ropes, like the Beam of a pair of Ballances: the Beam it hangeth on lying acroſs, is held up with two props, which being drawn back by force of many men, and then jointly with all their Forces ſhov'd forward, it ſtriketh the Wall with the head of Iron: And there is no Wall nor Tower ſo ſtrong, but though it abide the firſt ſtroke of the Engine, yet can it not hold out long. The General of the Romans thought good to uſe this means to take the City by force, for that the Siege was dangerous, by reaſon that the Jews never reſted, to which end the Romans with all kind of ſhot endeavoured to beat the Jews from off the Walls that made any reſiſtance; and the Archers and they who uſed ſlings, were hard by: and when they ſaw that none of the Jews durſt come upon the Walls, they applied the Ram to them; and covered it above with Hurdles and Skins, both for to defend themſelves and the Engine. At the firſt ſtroke the Walls were ſhaken, ſo that the Citizens cried as though the Town had been already taken. Joſeph ſeeing them ſtill beat one place, and that preſently the Wall would fall, deviſed a way to reſiſt the force of the Ram, he filled ſacks with chaff, and let them down off the Wall juſt againſt that place where the Ram ſtruck ordinarily, and ſo brake the force of the blows, the looſneſs of the chaff making no reſiſtance, but drowning or abating the violence of the ſtroke. By this invention the Romans were retarded: for whitherſoever they brought the Ram, thither did they upon the walls alſo remove the Sacks of Chaff, and brake the force thereof; till at laſt the Romans alſo deviſed a way to cut the Sacks, by taking long Poles, and binding Sithes to the end of them, and ſo they cut theſe Sacks of Chaff. And the Ram ſhook the Wall, which being newly built was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt. Then Joſeph and his Souldiers ſought to help themſelves by fire, and ſo they fired all that was made of dry wood in three ſeveral places; and withal the Engines, and Mounts of the Romans, who now had enough to defend themſelves, becauſe they were aſtoniſht at the valour of the Jews: every one having work enough to ſecure himſelf againſt the fire, which ſeizing upon dry matter with Brimſtone and Pitch wonderfully increaſed, ſo that in one hours ſpace, it conſumed all the works that the Romans had made with ſo great labour. There was an action of a Jew one Samſon of Eleazar, which deſerves eternal memory: the man was born at Saab in Galilee. He took up a great ſtone, and caſt it down with ſuch force upon the Ram, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing leapt down amongſt the midſt of his Enemies, and brought the head away to the foot of the Wall, where being unarmed, and as it were a mark for his enemies to ſhoot at, he received in his body five Arrows; and as though he had not felt them, he got up the Wall again, where, that all might ſee him, he boldly ſtood ſtill, till through grief of his wounds, having the head of the Ram in his arms, he fel down. Next to him two brethren of Netiras and Philips valour againſt the Romans.

A Ramath in Galilee ſhewed themſelves valiant, named Netiras; and Philip, who aſſaulted the tenth Legion of the Romans with ſuch violence, that they broke their ranks, and put all to flight that endeavour'd to withſtand them. At the ſame time Joſeph and a good number with him, took fire and burnt the Engins, Works and Huts of the fifth and tenth Legions, and thoſe that followed him deſtroyed all Engines, and other matter that was left. In the evening the Romans again erected the Ram againſt that part of the City which before they had beaten: and one of the Jews ſhot an Arrow from the Wall, and wounded Veſpaſian in the ſole of the foot; yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the Arrow was ſpent before it came to him, having come a great way off.

Veſpaſian wounded in the ſole of the Foot by an Arrow.

The War renewed againſt the Jews.

B This fact greatly troubled the Romans, who ſeeing Veſpaſian bleed, preſently ſpread the news through the whole Army, and almoſt all of them came running to ſee their General, and eſpecially Titus, who feared his fathers danger. But Veſpaſian preſently freed the Army from all perturbation, and his Son Titus from fear. For the diſſembling grief of the wound, he ſhewed himſelf to all that were ſorrowful for him, and incited them to fight againſt the Jews more earneſtly than before. Whereupon every one as it were to revenge their General, deſpiſed all danger, and aſſaulted the Walls, exhorting one another. Joſeph and his aſſociates, notwithſtanding many of them were killed with Shot, Darts and Arrows; yet forſook not the Walls, but with Fire and Sword, and Stones fiercely aſſaulted them, that being defended with Hurdles C battered the Walls with the Ram: but to little purpoſe; for they were continually killed by their Enemies, becauſe they could not ſee them: But their Fire made ſuch a light, as though it had been day, ſo that the Romans eaſily perceived whither to direct their ſhot. And for that their Engines were not perceived afar off, the Jews could not defend themſelves from the Arrows and Stones that were ſhot againſt them, by which means many of them were ſlain, and the tops and corners of the Towers beaten down. And many that were behind were ſlain by force of thoſe ſtones; ſo that any man may know of what force that Engine is, by that which hapned that night. For one that ſtood neer Joſeph upon the Wall, was ſtruck with a Stone, and his head carried from his body by violence of the blow three furlongs off, as though it had been D caſt out of a ſling: and the next day a Woman great with Child was ſtruck on the belly with one of thoſe ſtones, and the Child carried forth of her from the place where ſhe was ſtruck three furlongs; ſo great was the force of this Engine. Thus the violence of the Engines was moſt terrible, and likewiſe the noiſe of Darts, Arrows and other ſhot. Many were ſlain on every ſide, and the bodies of thoſe that were killed, being daſht againſt the Wall made a great noiſe: and within the City was heard a pitiful lamentation and weeping amongſt the Women; and without a heavy mourning and cry of them that were wounded to death; and all that part of the Wall where the fight was, flowed with Blood: ſo that now the multitude of dead bodies had ſo filled the ditch before the Wall, that the Romans might eaſily paſs over into the City; and E the Mountains about Eccho'd with the cries of the Citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the Eye or Ear move terrour. Thus many ſtoutly fighting for Jotapata died moſt valiantly; many alſo were ſore wounded: and notwithſtanding the Wall was continually battered, yet it was almoſt Morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ram. And then they of Jotapata repaired the breach with indefatigable labour, before the Romans could ſet up a Bridge to enter it.

How Jotapata was again aſſaulted.

Veſpaſian leadeth on his Army to enter the City.

THe next day in the Morning Veſpaſian brought his Army to enter the breach, having given them but little reſt after their whole nights labour: and deſirous to make the Jews that defended the breach, forſake their Station, before ſuch time as he entred, he took the moſt valiant of his Horſemen, and unhorſed them, being armed from Head to Foot, and placed them in three ranks; that they being ſo armed, might beſiege round that part of the Wall that was battered, having long Pikes in their hands, G ſo that as ſoon as the Bridges were ſet, they might firſt enter the breach. After them he placed the ſtrongeſt of his Foot: the reſt of his Horſe he ſet round about the City upon the Mountain, to the end that none might eſcape. After the Footmen he commanded Archers to follow with their Arrows ready in their hands, and them that uſed ſlings alſo and other Engines for ſhot. And he cauſed others to ſcale the Walls, where they were not battered, to the intent that the Townſmen, buſied in reſiſting them, might leave the breach unmanned; and the reſt being wearied and oppreſt with the thickneſs of the ſhot, might be forc'd to forſake their ſtanding. But Joſeph, perceiving his intent, placed the old Men and Children, and thoſe that were already wearied, upon thoſe parts of the Walls that were not battered: and himſelf with the ſtouteſt of the City went to defend the breach; and he placed ſix men before them whom he choſe out, himſelf being one of them to ſuſtain the firſt brunt of the enemies aſſault: commanding them likewiſe to ſtop their Ears to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the Army, and to cover themſelves with their ſhields againſt the Darts and Arrows; and give back a little, till ſuch time as the Archers Quivers were emptied; and if ſo be that the Romans ſhould offer to make bridges, then they employ all their courage to repel them: and now fight, not to defend but as it were to revenge their Country, being in a manner already loſt; and make thoſe feel the effects of their juſt fury, whoſe cruelty would doubtleſs after the taking of the place ſhed the blood of their Fathers, Children, and Wives: ſuch were the orders which Joſeph gave. In the mean time, the weaker multitude, Women and Children, ſeeing the City compaſſed about with three ranks of Horſemen, and the Romans with their Swords drawn preſſing againſt the breach, and all the Mountains about ſhining with their enemies weapons, and the Arabians ready to let fly a Shower of Arrows: they cried out as though the City were already taken; ſo that a man would have judged them already under their Enemies Swords, and not only in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Joſeph commanded the Women to their houſes, leſt their cries ſhould diſmay his Souldiers; willing them likewiſe to keep ſilence, and threatned them if they did not: and ſo he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot: He gave not much heed to them that ſought to ſcale the Walls, but only minded what effect the terrible Storme of the Enemies Arrows would produce.

The War of the Romans with the Jews upon the Bridge.

The Jews pour ſcalding Oyle upon the Romans.

The Romans retire without obtaining their purpoſe

As ſoon as the Trumpets began to ſound, the Air became obſcured with the multitude of Arrows. Joſephs Companions remembring the charge given them, ſtopped their Ears, and cover'd their bodies againſt the ſhot of arrows. And as ſoon as the bridges were ſet againſt the Wall, preſently they fell on; and before the Romans could enter upon them, they repell'd them back with great proweſs and courage which the greatneſs of the danger did not abate but increaſe, ſo that they did not give one foot back, till either they kill'd or were killed. But the Jews had not any freſh men to ſecond thoſe that were tired; and the Romans, ſtill as they were wearied ſent freſh ſupplies and joyning together their long ſhields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall of defence invincible; and the whole Army like one body, beat back the Jews, and ſo ſet foot on the Walls. Joſeph, in this deſperate caſe deviſed a new way to repel this preſent danger: he commanded the Jews to fetch ſcalding Oyl, which they had ready, and pour it upon the Romans, and alſo caſt the Pans upon them. This device broke the body of the Romans ſo that through great pains they fell from the Wall: for the Scalding Oyl eaſily got between their fleſh and Armour, and ſcorched them like fire, being eaſily heated, and long continuing hot by reaſon of the fatneſs. The Romans being loaden with Helmets and Breaſt-plates, could not retire ſo nimbly as was requiſite: ſo that ſome leapt down off the bridg, and others died of the pain; others would fain have retired themſelves, but could not, becauſe their Enemies followed them ſo hard. But neither the Romans wanted vertue and valour in adverſe fortune, nor the Jews prudence. For the Romans, notwithſtanding they were in intolerable pain, being Scalded with hot Oyl, yet they freſhly aſſaulted them that hurt them, deſirous to ſhew their courage. Then the Jews uſed another device to make them retire: for they poured boyled Fenigreek upon the bridge, ſo that they ſlid down: and neither they that would have fled, nor they who ſtrove to aſſault the Jews, could ſtand upon their feet, it was ſo ſlippery; and many falling down upon the bridge, were by their own Company trodden to death; others ſlid down upon the Rampier; and always as they fell, the Jews ſtruck them: and when the Romans were retired from the place, ſo that now they were not forced to handy blowes, they had leiſure to ſhoot Arrows and Darts againſt them. When Veſpaſian ſaw that his men in the fight endured much miſery, towards evening he cauſed them to retire, many being ſlain, and more wounded, only ſix men of Jotapata were ſlain, but above 300 wounded: this fight was upon the 20. day of June. But after Veſpaſian had comforted his Souldiers for that

A that which had hapned, perceiving that they were enrag'd, and deſired to fight to revenge themſelves, ſo that they needed no exhortation; he raiſed the Rampier higher, and erected three Towers 50 foot high, covering them aloft with Iron, that ſo by reaſon of their weight they might ſtand ſtedfaſt, and not be conſumed by fire; theſe he placed upon the Rampier, and in them Archers, and men that caſt Darts and ſuch like: who not being perceived of them that were upon the Walls by reaſon of the highneſs of the Towers, and the covering thereof, eaſily wounded them who ſtood thereon. So the Jews when they could not avoid the Arrows, nor be revenged upon them whom they could not ſee, nor yet fire the Towers being covered with plates of Iron, forſook the Walls; yet they always encountred with them who ſought to enter. Thus the B people of Jotapata reſiſted, notwithſtanding that many every day were ſlain, and that they did their Enemies no harm without great danger to themſelves.

How Japha was taken by Trajan and Titus.

At this time Veſpaſian underſtood that Japha a City neer Jotapata, minded to rebel, C encouraged thereunto for that they heard how they of Jotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: wherefore he ſent thither Trajan, Governour of the tenth Legion, and with him two thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe: who finding the Town able to reſiſt, and the Inhabitants prepared for fight, and marched out to meet him, (for the Town being by ſituation ſtrong enough, was alſo compaſſed with a double Wall) he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and in the purſute entred with them at the firſt Gate: which the Citizens perceiving, ſhut the ſecond Gate, not ſuffering their own Citizens to enter in, leſt the Enemies alſo ſhould ruſh in with them, as they had done into the firſt Gate. Truly, God gave this Victory unto the Romans; and his will it was, that moſt of the Valiant men of the City ſhould D have their own Gates ſhut upon them, and ſo fall into their Enemies hands, who were moſt greedy to deſtroy them. Many of them came to the gates, and called thoſe that kept them by their names, pitifully intreating that they might come in: which whileſt they were kept out, were butchered like Sheep, being incloſed between two Walls; their own Citizens having ſhut one Gate upon them, and the Romans the other: and many thus encloſed periſhed by their fellows Swords; and an infinite number by the rage of the Romans, having no courage to reſiſt and revenge themſelves. For the Inhumanity of their own Citizens, and terrour of their Enemies together, utterly diſcouraged them; and ſo they died all, in number 12000; curſing not the Romans, but the Jews their own Country-men. Trajan, thinking that the City was now E deſtitute of fighting men; or if any were within, that they durſt not reſiſt being thus terrified, reſerved the taking of the City for the General, and ſent Meſſengers to him, requeſting him to ſend his Son Titus to accompliſh the Victory. Veſpaſian fearing that yet there would be ſome reſiſtance, ſent Titus with 500 Horſe and 1000 Foot, who haſtening thither, placed Trajan on the left ſide of the Town, and himſelf on the right: ſo the Romans on every ſide ſcaled the Walls; and the Galileans, having a while reſiſted, at length left them. Then Titus and his followers leaping down, got into the City, and began a vehement fight with them that were aſſembled therein, ſome valiantly iſſuing out of the Narrow ſtreets, and aſſaulting them, and the Women caſting ſuch things as they could get, upon the Romans, from the tops of their F houſes; and thus they held battel ſix hours. When their fighting men were all ſlain, then the Old Men and Children, and all the other Company both in the ſtreets and in their houſes were ſoon diſpatcht, that none of them were left alive, ſave only Infants, who with the Women were led Captives. The number of them that were ſlain, both in the City and in the firſt conflict, amounted to 15000, and the number of thoſe that were led into Captivity, were 1130. How Cerealis Conquered the Samaritans.

THe Samaritans alſo were partakers of the ſad Effects of this bloody War. They aſſembled themſelves together upon Mount Garizin, which they accounted a ſacred place. But this Aſſembly gave cauſe to believe, that not warned by their neighbours harms, nor with any advice or judgement, conſidering their own infirmity, and the Romans power, they began to be tumultuous. Veſpaſian foreſeeing this, thought good to prevent them : and although all the Region of Samaria had Roman Gariſons in B it, yet the great multitude aſſembled, made it reaſonable to fear them. Wherefore he ſent thither Cerealis, the Tribune of the fifth Legion, with ſix hundred Horſe, and three thouſand Foot. Cerealis thought it not the beſt way to go unto the Mountain, and attaque the whole multitude there, who were ſo numerous, but he commanded his Souldiers to beleagure the Mountain about, at the Foot thereof, and to keep there all the day. There hapned at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritans wanted Water. It was then Summer, and the People had not provided themſelves with Victuals, ſo that many, in one day only, for want of drink died of thirſt : others preferring death before the miſery they endured, fled to the Romans : of whom Cerealis learned that thoſe that yet remained on the Mount, were even diſ-heartned by the miſery they C endured. Wherefore he aſcended the Mountain, and compaſſing about the Enemies with his Army, he firſt exhorted them to yield, and promiſed them all their lives if they would caſt down their weapons : but nothing prevailing with them, he ſet upon them, and killed them all, in number 11600. How Jotapata was Taken.

THe Citizens of Jotapata having endured this hard Siege, beyond all expectation, ſeven and fourty dayes ; the Romans Mounts were now raiſed higher than their Walls. On the ſame day one of the City fled to Veſpaſian, and told him in what caſe the City ſtood, and how few Citizens were left, and that with daily watchings and fighting they were far ſpent, ſo that they were not able to reſiſt any more, and that they might be taken by policy if they were followed : for in the laſt part of the night, being weary, they ceaſed from their labour, and ſlept till the Morning : wherefore he perſwaded E Veſpaſian to aſſanlt them at that time. But Veſpaſian knowing how faithful the Jews were one unto another, and how they contemned all puniſhment, gave little credit to this Run-away : For a little before, one of Jotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confeſs or diſcloſe the Eſtate of the City ; the fire nothing moved him, and ſo at laſt he was crucified, laughing and ſcorning death. Yet a probable conjecture which he had, perſwaded him to give ſome credit to this Traitors words : and for that he knew no great harm could befall him, if he ſo aſſaulted the City as the Traitor adviſed, he commanded the man to be kept, and put all his army in readineſs to aſſault the Town. At the hour appointed, he made towards the Wall with ſilence : Titus marcht firſt, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus, a Tribune, F and ſome choice men of the fifteenth Legion : who killing the Sentinels, entred into the City ; and after them entered Sextus Cerealis and Placidus, with their Companies ; ſo the Caſtle was taken, and the Enemies were in the midſt of the Town ; and it was fair day-light, and yet the Townſmen knew nothing, being now faſt aſleep after their great labours and watchings : and they that watcht could ſee nothing, there was ſo thick a miſt by chance that Morning, and the reſt never wakened till Death was at their door, and that they perceived their Calamity and Deſtruction. The Romans mindful of all that had befallen them in the time of the ſiege, neither ſpared nor pitied any one : but driving the people out of the higher part of the City into the lower, they maſſacred them all. They that would have fought could not for the narrowneſs of the G place ; and ſo being cumbred for want of room, and ſliding down the banks for haſte, their

and the number of them who were ſlain during the ſiege, and at ſuch time as the

CHAP. XIV.

How Joſeph was taken, and how he redeem'd his Life with Deeds and Words.

BUT eſpecially, above all others, the Romans made diligent ſearch for Joſeph, both for the animoſity they had againſt him, and alſo becauſe Veſpaſian greatly deſired to get him into his hands, conceiving he being taken, the greateſt part of the War would then be ended; ſo they ſought him among the dead, and amongſt thoſe that were L hid; but he (fortune favouring him) when the City was taken, eſcaped from the midſt of his Enemies, and leapt into a deep Well, which had a large Cave on the one ſide, which they above could not perceive) where he found fourty of the braveſt of his men, who had proviſion there for many days. There in the day-time he lay hid, and in the night he went forth to ſee if he could eſcape; but perceiving that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned again into the Cave, and lay there two days; the third day, a certain woman that had been with them in the Cave, diſcovered him. Then Veſpaſian ſent two Tribunes to him, to promiſe him ſafety, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanethus. But Joſeph would not accept the offer, fearing that becauſe he had been the Author of all M the Evils that the Romans had endured, they ſought him out to puniſh him; till Veſpaſian ſent Joſeph Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of Joſephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted to him how mild the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman Generals rather admired him for his Virtue, than hated him.
Moreover, that his General intended not to puniſh him, which if he pleaſed he might do, (whether he yielded himſelf or no) but to ſave him, being ſo valiant a man: adding alſo, that if Veſpaſian meant ill, he would never have imployed his Friend in ſuch a meſſage, to uſe friendſhip (ſo noble a Virtue) to ſo evil a purpoſe as to work Treaſon; and that he, though Veſpaſian had been ſo minded, would never have conſented to have betrayed his friend Joſeph. For all Nicanors words, he ſtill heſitated, as unreſolved what to do. Whereat the Roman Souldiers being angry, began to caſt fire N into the Cave: but Veſpaſian hindred them, being deſirous to take Joſeph alive. Nicanor ceaſed not to intreat him; and he perceiving how his Enemies began to be enraged, and calling to mind the dreams he had had, wherein God had fore-ſhew'd him all the Jews calamities, and what happy ſucceſs ſhould befal the Romans (for he could interpret dreams, and whatſoever God obſcurely ſhewed, being inſtructed in the Holy Books of the Prophets, and himſelf a Prieſt, as his Parents were) being as it were now filled with the Spirit of God, and the Dreams and Viſions coming into his mind, he prayed ſecretly to God after this manner: O great Creator of the Univerſe, Seeing it pleaſeth thee to ruin the Nation of the Jews, and to ſend all good Fortune to the Romans, and that thou haſt choſen me to foretell future events, I ſubmit to thy will, and render my ſelf to Joſeph conſents to Nicanor. The Jews violence and expoſtulation againſt Joſeph.

Country, but as thy Miniſter. And having thus ſpoken, he yeilded himſelf to Nicanor. H But they who were in the Cave with Joſeph, perceiving that he yeelded himſelf to the Romans, flocked about him, and cryed out, What is become of all our love for our Laws? Where are thoſe generous Souls and true Jews, to whom God when he created them, inſpired ſo great a contempt of Death? Art thou, O Joſeph, ſo deſirous to live, as to become a vile Bond-ſlave? How ſoon haſt thou forgotten thy ſelf? How many haſt thou perſwaded to embrace death for the ſake of their liberty? Truly, thou haſt but a ſhadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou doſt hope that they will ſave thy life, againſt whom thou haſt ſo behav'd thy ſelf; or if they would ſave thee, to deſire life at their hands. But ſeeing the Romans offer hath made thee forget thy ſelf; yet we, to preſerve the honour and credit of our Country, will lend thee our Arms and Swords, and ſo if thou be willing to die, die like the General of the I Jews: which if thou refuſe to do, thou ſhalt whether thou wilt or no, die like a Traitor to thy Country. When they had thus ſaid, they all threatned to kill him with their Swords, if he yeilded to the Romans.

Joſeph fearing their violence, and being perſwaded that if he died before he had revealed to his Nation the things which God had declared to him, [illegible] ſhould fail in his duty to God, he had recourſe to the reaſons which he thought moſt likely to prevail, and ſpoke to this effect.

Joſephs Oration to his Countrymen.

Wherefore, O my Friends (ſaid he) are you become murtherers of your ſelves? Wherefore are ye ſo eager to divide things ſo united as the Soul and the Body are? If any man imagine that my mind is changed, the Romans know whether that be true or no. I confeſs K it is a thing moſt honourable to dye in War; not any way, but according to the Law of Arms, to wit, by the Conquerours hand. If I entreat the Romans to ſpare my life, then I am worthy to periſh with mine own ſword and hand: But if they think good to ſpare their Enemies, ſhould we not think it good likewiſe to ſpare our ſelves? Truly, it is meer folly to do that to our ſelves, to avoid which we fight againſt them. I confeſs it is a commendable thing to die for liberty, but that is to die in fight, and by their hands only who took away that liberty: But now, neither do they war againſt us nor kill us. He is not only to be judg'd a Coward, who refuſeth to die when need requireth, but he alſo who will die when no need urgeth. Moreover, what with-holdeth us from offering our ſelves to the Romans? Truly, fear of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our ſelves, which we fear at the Romans hands? But ſome will ſay, if L they ſpare us, we are made Captives. I pray conſider, what liberty we have now.

It is a goodly matter to die for liberty, but yet to die fighting.

If it be ſaid, that it is a pa[illegible] of courage to kill ones ſelf; I maintain on the contrary, it is the part of a very Coward. For I think him to be a very timerous Sea-man who perceiving a Tempeſt comiug, ſinketh the Ship wherein he is before it comes. Moreover, it is againſt the Law of Nature, and the Sentiments of all Creatures to kill our ſelves, and thereby we alſo commit a heinous crime againſt God. There is no living creature that of his own ſeeking would willingly dye: For every one feeleth in himſelf the ſtrong and forceable Law of Nature, whereby they deſire to live: and for this cauſe we judge them our Enemies, that ſeek to take life from us, and puniſh them that take it indeed: And do you not think it a great contempt for a man to deſpiſe life which is Gods gift? For we of him receive our firſt being, and from M him let us expect our ending. The Body is mortal, framed of corruptible matter; but our Souls are immortal, and in ſome ſort partake of the Nature of God: If any one abuſe that which another putteth him in truſt with, we think him a perfidious and wicked man: and ſhall we think that if we remove out of our Bodies that which God hath placed in the ſame, that he ſhall not know of it whom we have ſo abuſed? We hold thoſe ſlaves worthy to be puniſhed that run away from bad Maſters: and ſhall not we then be held for impious, who flee from ſo good a Maſter as God is? Do ye not know that they, who according to the Law of Nature depart out of this Life, and render that to God which they received of him when he who gave it requires it, ſhall leave behind them a perpetual Name to their Poſterity and Family? And that unto thoſe ſouls who are obedient to their Creator when he calls them, he gives a holy N and ſacred manſion in Heaven, from whence, after a revolution of the Heavens, they are again remanded to animate Bodies pure as themſelves. And that on the contrary, they who cauſe their own death, go into dark hell? and that God puniſheth this their offence upon all their poſterity? Hence it is that our wiſe Law-maker forbiddeth it, who knew how God abhorreth this crime. For if any amongſt us kill themſelves, it is decreed that till the Sun go down they ſhall be unburied, though we hold it lawful to bury before thoſe that have been killed in War.

The ſimilitude of a Sailer. It is againſt the common courſe of Nature for a man to kill himſelf, yea, and a heinous ſin againſt God.

The ſoul is immortal, and a portion of God placed in our bodies.

God revengeth him on the author of injuries The cuſtom of the ancient Jews, and how they dealt with thoſe that ſlew themſelves.

Other Nations cauſe their right-hand to be cut off, who have killed themſelves: judging, that as the ſoul thereby was ſeparated from the body, ſo the hand deſerves to be ſeparated from it. Wherefore, O Companions, think on that which is reaſonable, and add not to your miſery, O impiety againſt God who created us. If we deſire to be ſaved, let us ſave our ſelves: for Joſephs Peroration.

A it is no diſgrace to receive our lives at their hands, who are witneſſes of ſo many valiant deeds of ours. If we deſire to die, let us die by their hands who have overcome us. I will not go into my Enemies Camp to be a Traytor againſt my ſelf. For I bear not their mind who forſake their own company to fly to their Enemies: for they fly to them to ſave their lives, but I go to them to cauſe mine own death. And I would to God that the Romans would break promiſe with me: for if they kill me after they have promiſed to ſave my life, I ſhall willingly die, and with great courage, ſeeing their breach of promiſe and perjury as a blemiſh to their late victory.

Joſeph is in great danger to be ſlain.

Another policy of Joſeph.

Joſephs fellows dye by lots, and Joſeph and another are reſerved.

Joſeph ſpoke more to this effect, to diſſwade his Companions from killing themſelves: But they ſtopping their ears with deſperation, wherewith they had armed themſelves to die, came furiouſly towards him with their ſwords drawn, upbraiding him that B he was a Coward, and every one was ready to ſtrike him. Then Joſeph calling one by his Name, and looking upon another with a countenance like a Governour, holding anothers hand, and intreating the reſt diſtracted in ſuch danger, by this means diverted the blows they intended him, for ſtill as one came near to ſtrike him, he turned his face upon him, like ſome wild beaſt encompaſſed with the hunters. Some of them who remembred he had been their Captain in their extremity, with reverence of his perſonage trembled, ſo that their ſwords fell out of their hands: and many lifting up their arms to ſtrike him, of their own accord let their weapons fall. Joſeph, notwithſtanding his deſperate eſtate, yet was not void of judgement, but truſting in Gods aſſiſtance, he hazarded his life, and ſpake unto them as followeth: Seeing ye are all determined to C die, let us caſt lots who ſhall kill one another; and he to whom the lot falleth, ſhall be killed by him who ſhall next follow, and ſo the lot ſhall be caſt upon every one of us, and none of us ſhall be forced to kill our ſelves. For it were injuſtice, that when ſome of us are ſlain, the reſt ſhould repent themſelves, and ſo eſcape. They all liked well of this, and always he upon whom the lot fell, was ſlain by him that followed, for death was more acceptabe, becauſe they thought Joſeph ſhould die with them. Now it hapned, by the providence of God, that Joſeph remained alive only with one other; and he perſwaded him who was left alive to live, and not to ſeek death, leſt either the lot ſhould fall upon himſelf, and ſo he be ſlain, or upon the other, and ſo he ſhould be polluted with the murder and ſlaughter of one of his Friends. Joſeph being thus delivered from extream danger both from the D Romans, and from thoſe of his own Nation, went with Nicanor to Veſpaſian.

Joſeph reſorteth to Veſpaſian with Nicanor.

An example of Titus grace and mercy towards Joſeph.

All the Romans came about him to ſee him; and preſſing about their General, they made a great noiſe, ſome rejoycing that he was taken, others crying out to puniſh him, others ſtriving to come near to behold him better: and they who were afar off cryed out to kill that Enemy of the Romans Fame. But thoſe who were near and beheld him, remembring his great Actions, were aſtoniſhed at his change of Fortune: No Captain or Ruler, but although before they were all moved againſt him, yet now beholding him, they begin to pity him: eſpecially Titus, who being of a gentle diſpoſition, admired Joſephs valour, his conſtancy in adverſity, and conſidered his Age, and thereby was moved to take compaſſion upon him, remembring what a manner of man he had been during E the Wars, and what he now was, being fallen into his Enemies hands: calling alſo to mind the power and force of Fortune, and how uncertain the chance of War is, and that humane affairs have no ſtedfaſtneſs. His Example drew many minds to pity him, ſo that Titus was the chief author of Joſephs life: Yet Veſpaſian cauſed him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to ſend him to Cæſar. Which Joſeph hearing, requeſted that he might ſpeak a word or two with him alone. Whereupon, all but his Son Titus departing, and two of his Friends, Joſeph ſpoke to him in theſe terms.

Joſeph hath private conference with Veſpaſian.

Joſeph foretelleth Veſpaſian of his future honours.

Joſephs truth in all things.

You think only, that you have Joſeph for your Captive, but I am a Meſſenger to you of greater matters from God. Otherwiſe, I knew my Country Laws, and how it behoved the Generals of our Nation to die, and not to be taken alive by their Enemies. You will ſend me F to Nero; Wherefore: ſince Nero and thoſe that are to ſucceed him before you, have ſo little time to live, you, O Veſpaſian, ſhall be Cæſar, and Emperor of Rome, and Titus your Son after you: keep me therefore in bonds with you, for you are not only my Lord, but Lord of all the World, Sea and Land, and all Man-kind. And if I now fain theſe things in this ſtate of mine own mind againſt God, let me be reſerved to greater puniſhment. Ater he had thus ſpoken, Veſpaſian gave ſmall credit to his words, thinking that Joſeph fained theſe things of himſelf to ſave his Life: yet by little and little he began to give credit to him, becauſe God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire, and fore-told him of his Reign by many ſigns and tokens, and he alſo found Joſeph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Veſpaſians friends ſaying, that it was ſtrange that he knowing this, G could not propheſie of the event of the War againſt Jotapata, and what was like to befal himſelf, that ſo he might avoid thoſe evils. Joſeph anſwered, that he had foretold the Citizens of Jotapata, that after ſeven and fourty dayes they ſhould be deſtroyed, and that the Romans ſhould keep him alive in hold. Veſpaſian ſecretly enquired of theſe H matters, and finding by the relation of the Captives that it was true, he began to give more credit to that which Joſeph had told him concerning himſelf. So he commanded Joſeph to be kept Priſoner, yet he gave him apparel and divers other things in moſt courteous manner: and Titus greatly honoured him. The fourth day of July, Veſpaſian returned to Ptolemais, and from thence he came to the Sea-coaſt to Cæſarea, which is the greateſt City of Judæa, whoſe Inhabitants are for the moſt part Greeks. The Inhabitants received the Army and the General with all friendſhip poſſible, both for that they loved the Romans, and eſpecially alſo for that they hated the Jews; ſo that many intreated Veſpaſian to put Joſeph to death. But Veſpaſian, judging this a raſh Petition, would make no anſwer to it: and he left two Legions to Winter at Cæſarea; I becauſe he ſaw it was a fit place; and he ſent the tenth and fifth to Scythopolis, becauſe he would not over-charge Ceſarea with the whole Army. This place is warm in Winter, and exceeding hot in Summer, by reaſon it is ſituate on a Plain by the Sea-coaſt.

A huge tempeſt drowneth thoſe of Joppa in the Sea.

Four thouſand and two hundred bodies caſt out.

Veſpaſian taketh Joppa, and encampeth in the Caſtle.

Fame it ſelf declareth the deſtruction of Jotapata.

IN the mean time a great multitude being gathered together, who either were ſeditious perſons, or thieves, or ſuch as had eſcaped out of the taken-Cities, re-edified Joppa for their refuge, which Ceſtius formerly had deſtroyed: and ſeeing they could not find proviſion in the Countrey, which was already waſted and left deſolate by the War, they purpoſed to become Pirates; and ſo building Ships for that purpoſe, they robbed the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Ægyptians, not ſuffering any to paſs thoſe Seas without danger. Veſpaſian underſtanding their practices, ſent Horſe and Foot againſt Joppa, who finding the City not guarded, got into it in the night: which the Inhabitants perceiving, were ſo terrifi'd that they durſt not make any reſiſtance to expel L the Romans; but they all fled to their Ships, and there ſtayed all night, a flight-ſhot from the ſhore. Joppa is naturally no road for Ships (for it is ſituated upon a turbulent Shore) and on every ſide hath very high and eminent Rocks, which trouble the Seas, and make huge Waves. In this place (if we may believe the fable) one may ſee the ſigns of Andromeda's Chains. When the North Wind blows, it ſtriketh the Waves againſt the Rocks, and ſo cauſeth a dangerous Sea, that it were far more ſafe to be in the midſt of the Seas than at that Shore when the ſaid Wind bloweth. The Inhabitants of Joppa rode there all night, and by break of day the North Wind began to blow fiercely, and drove ſome of the Ships one againſt another, and others againſt the Rocks: and many ſtriving againſt Wind and Weather, and ſeeking to get into the midſt of the Sea for fear of the Rocky Shore, and their Enemies there, were drowned. M They that eſcaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of ſafety; for the tempeſt drove them from the Sea, and the Romans from the City, ſo that the air was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noiſe and ſound of the Ships beating one againſt another. By this means ſome of the Inhabitants of Joppa were ſwallowed up by the Waves, others ſuffered ſhipwrack; ſome killed themſelves rather than to be drowned: many with the Waves were ſtricken againſt the Rocks, ſo that the Sea was bloody, and all the ſhore covered with dead Bodies: and whoſoever eſcaped the Sea, and got to ſhore, the Roman Souldiers there ſtanding ready, killed them. Four thouſand and two hundred dead Bodies were caſt upon the ſhore. So the N Romans having without any fight taken the City, deſtroyed it: and thus was Joppa taken, and twice deſtroyed by the Romans in a ſhort time. Veſpaſian built there a Caſtle, and placed in it ſome few Horſemen and Footmen, to the end that none of the Jews might come thither again to play the Pirates; and that the Footmen might keep the Caſtle, and in the mean time the Horſemen might go forth, and ſpoil all the Towns and Villages, and Territories belonging to Joppa: which alſo they did. When the news of the deſtruction of Jotapata was brought to Jeruſalem, many gave ſmall credit to it, partly for the greatneſs of the Calamity, partly for that no man could ſay, he had ſeen the deſtruction of the City: for none eſcaped the Maſſacre to carry the news, but only report thereof was ſpread abroad. But at the laſt it was confirmed to O be true by thoſe that dwelt near the place, and then they believed it; Many things alſo which were falſe, were reported as true: For it was bruited that Joſeph was ſlain in

A in the deſtruction of the City. All Jeruſalem was ſo afflicted his for death, that whereas others were lamented only by their Kindred, all the City bewailed his ſuppoſed Death. They mourned for him thirty days, and hired Muſicians to ſing Funeral Songs for him. At laſt, truth diſcovered it ſelf, and the true news of the deſtruction of Jotapata with the accidents there: alſo how Joſeph was not ſlain, but was living in the hands of the Romans, and that the Romans honoured him more than a Captive could expect. Then the Jews began as much to hate him now living, as before they had mourned for him when they ſuppoſed him dead. Some ſaid he was a Coward, others that he was a Traitour to his Country, and the whole City vented reproachful ſpeeches againſt him. Theſe heavy tydings encreaſed their rage and their adverſity (which to wiſe B men had been a warning to provide leſt the like ſhould befal themſelves) made them more outragious; ſo that always the end of one miſchief was the beginning of another. To be ſhort, now they were more incenſed againſt the Romans than before, in the thought that by revenging themſelves of them, they might alſo be revenged of Joſeph. And this was the Eſtate of the Citizens of Jeruſalem.

How Tiberias was yielded.

VEſpaſian was deſirous to ſee the Kingdom of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him to go thither, partly to the intent to feaſt him and his whole Army, partly that he might repreſs ſome troubles ariſing in his Kingdom in the time of his abſence) And ſo he departed from Ceſarea upon the Sea-coaſt, and went to Cæſarea Philippi, where he ſtayed and refreſhed his Souldiers twenty dayes; and himſelf alſo feaſted, giving God thanks for his proſperous ſucceſs in the War. This done, he had Intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were revolted (both which Cities belonged to Agrippa's Kingdom) whereupon determining utterly to deſtroy the Jews which inhabited there- D abouts, he thought good to lead his Army againſt theſe two places, eſpecially that he might reward Agrippa for his good entertainment, by ſurrendring theſe Cities to him. In order whereunto he ſent his Son Titus to Cæſarea to bring the Souldiers there to Scythopolis, which was the greateſt City of all Decapolis, and was near Tiberias; whither himſelf being come, he expected his Son's coming: and departing from thence with three Legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the ſeditious people of Tiberias might behold his Army; this place was thirty Furlongs from Tiberias. From thence he ſent Valerianus a Captain to exhort them to peace, and he ſent fifty Horſmen to accompany him: for he underſtood that the people deſired peace, and againſt their will were forced to War, by ſome of the Seditious amongſt E them. Valerianus coming near the City Walls, lighted from his Horſe, and commanded all his Company to do the like, that they of Tiberias might not think that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: before he ſpoke a word, the boldeſt of the ſeditious perſons iſſued out againſt him, having one Jeſus the Son of Tobias, who had been a Captain of Thieves, for their Leader. Valerianus not preſuming to fight without Authority from his General, although he had been certain of the Victory; and conſidering that it was great danger for ſo few to fight againſt a whole multitude, and withal terrified with the boldneſs of the Jews, contrary to his expectation, he fled away on Foot, accompanied only with five other, leaving his Horſe and the reſt behind him, whom Jeſus and his followers took, and brought into the City, rejoycing F as though they had taken them in fight, and not by treachery. But the Senators and chief of the City, fearing what might enſue upon this fact, went to King Agrippa, who preſented them to Veſpaſian; they proſtrated themſelves at his feet, beſeeching him to have compaſſion on them, and not to think the whole City partakers with thoſe few wicked perſons, that ſo had merited his diſpleaſure; but to ſpare the people who always had honoured the Romans, and only puniſh the Authors of that revolt and miſdemeanour, who alſo had with-held the whole City till now from yielding it ſelf to the Romans. Veſpaſian moved by their entreaties, pardoned the City, (though he was exaſperated againſt them all for taking of Valerianus Horſe) and becauſe he perceived Agrippa was Solicitous for fear that the City ſhould be deſtroyed; and G ſo Veſpaſian promiſed the Citizens pardon. Then Jeſus and his aſſociates thinking it not ſafe for them to abide there, fled to Tarichea. The next day Veſpaſian ſent before before him Trajanus with certain Horſemen into the Caſtle, to ſee if all the people deſired peace: and finding them to be peaceably deſpoſ'd, he with his whole Army came to the City. The Inhabitans opening the Gates of the City, went to meet him with great joy, all crying out that he was the Author of their welfare, and Benefactor, and wiſhing him all proſperity and felicity. The Gates of the City were narrow, ſo that the Army could not quickly enter in: wherefore Veſpaſian commanded a part of the Wall on the Southſide to be pull'd down, and ſo entred; forbidding to ſpoil the Citizens, or ruine the Walls, for Agrippa's ſake, who promiſed that from thenceforth the Citizens ſhould be quiet: And indeed this King ſpared no pains to repair the miſchiefs which Diviſion had cauſ'd amongſt them.

CHAP. XVII.

How Tarichea was beſieged.

Veſpaſian beſieged Tarichea.

The Romans drive the Jews to their Ships.

Titus Oration to his terrified Souldiers.

Jews are not to be feared.

Victory conſiſteth not in the multitude, but in the courage of a few that fight valiantly.

VEſpaſian departed from Tiberias, and encamped near Tarichea, and fortifi'd his Camp: foreſeeing that the Siege of this place would coſt much time: for all Rebels that had deſired War were got thither, truſting both to the ſtrength of the City, and the Lake adjoyning to it, called Geneſareth. For this City was built like Tiberias, upon a Mountain: and Joſeph had incloſed it with a Wall where it was not compaſſed by the Lake. But the Wall, though ſtrong, yet was not ſo ſtrong as that of Tiberias: for Joſeph built that in the beginning of the Revolt, having men and money at will; but that of Tarichea was built only by the remainder of his liberality. The Taricheans had great ſtore of Ships in the Lake adjoyning, to the end that if they were overcome by Land, they might flie by Water: to which end they had prepared their Ships for Battel by Water, if need ſhould be. Whilſt the Romans entrenched themſelves, Jeſus and his followers not diſmayed either with the multitude or Military Diſcipline of his Enemies, iſſued out of the City, and ſlew the Workmen, and deſtroyed part of the Work; till perceiving the Romans aſſembled together againſt him, he fled again to his Company without any loſs or harm received. But the Romans purſued them ſo faſt, that they forced them to take their Ships: and ſo being gone ſo far from the ſhore, as that yet they might eaſily reach them with the ſhot of an Arrow, they caſt Anchor and diſpoſed their Ships in Warlike manner, and fought againſt the Romans who were on Shore. Veſpaſian underſtanding at the ſame time that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neer the City, ſent his Son Titus againſt them with 600 Horſe; who finding the number of his Enemies too great to encounter, he certified his Father that he needed more Forces: Yet perceiving many of thoſe Horſemen of good courage, before any more aid came, (though ſome of them were afraid of the Jews) he got upon a high place where all might hear him, and ſaid, O ye Romans, I will firſt put you in mind who you are, and of what Nation, that ſo conſidering what your ſelves are, you may alſo conſider who they are with whom we are to fight. As for you, was there ever any Enemy in any part of the World that could eſcape our hands? And as for he Jews though they endure and manfully bear out their miſery, yet they look upon themſelves as vanquiſht. If therefore they conſtantly endure miſery, and fight valiantly being in adverſity; what ſhould we do who are in proſperity? I rejoyce to ſee you ſhew good Countenance; yet I fear leſt ſo great a multitude of our Enemies may diſcourage ſome of you. Let every one therefore once again conſider, who himſelf is, and with whom he is to fight: and that although the Jews be bold and valiant enough, yet they obſerve no warlike order, and are unarmed, and ſo are rather to be termed a multitude than an Army. I need not ſpeak of your knowledg and skill in War: ſince for this only cauſe we are trained up in Warlike diſcipline in time of Peace, to the end that our courage ſhould anſwer the number of our enemies when we are to joyn Battel: for what fruit ſhall we ſhew of this our perpetual warlike order and diſcipline, if we dare only fight with a rude multitude that are no more in number than our ſelves? conſider that you being armed are to fight with men unarmed, and being Horſemen are to fight with Footmen, and being guided by good Officers, with thoſe who have no Head or Ruler. All which things ſupply in us the want of more men; and the contrary in our Enemies doth much deminiſh their number. Victory doth not depend on the multitude of men, be they never ſo warlike; but in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, ſo are they eaſily kept in order, and may eaſily come to help one another, not being peſtered; whereas great multitudes do more hinder one another than do good, and oftentimes do themſelves more harm than their Enemies. The Jews indeed are led with Deſperation, Rage and Fury, which when good fortune ſeconds them are of ſome force, but the leaſt ill fortune quickly extinguiſhes that order: But we are led by Vertue, and Obedience, and

A and fortitude, which are of force in proſperity, and alſo are good in adverſity. Moreover we have greater reaſon to fight than the Jews have: for they fight only for their Country and Liberty, but we fight for Renown and Empire; that ſince we have already gained the Empire of the whole World, it might not be thought that our Enemies the Jews are Adverſaries able to match us. Conſider moreover, that ye need not fear any great danger, for we have many to help us, and that hard by: let us therefore atchieve the Victory before any more ſuccour come to us; ſo ſhall our honour and our Victory be greater. Now there will be a trial made of me, my Father, and you; whether he deſerves the reputation he enjoys? whether I am worthy to be his Son? and whether I may eſteem my ſelf happy in commanding you? For he is wont to be victorious, and ſhall I return to him being conquered? and are you not aſham'd to be diſmayed, B ſeeing that I your Captain offer my ſelf, and will undergo the greateſt perils? my ſelf will bear the brunt of the Enemies, and firſt encounter with them, and let none of you depart from me: perſwade your ſelves that God will aſſiſt me in this fight, and boldly preſume that we can do much more being in the midſt of our Enemies, then if we ſhould only fight with them at diſtance.

It becometh Souldiers to obey their Captain.

Titus having thus ſpoken, as it were by Gods providence, all his Souldiers took heart and courage, ſo that now they were ſorry to ſee Trajan come with 400 Horſmen more before the fight began, as though their Victory would be leſs renowned, becauſe he came to help them. Veſpaſian alſo ſent Antonius and Silo with 2000 Archers, to take the Mountain that was juſt oppoſite to the Town, and to beat them that defended the City off from the Walls: and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force poſſible C charg'd with his Horſe upon the Enemies: and all followed him with an huge cry, ſpreading themſelves in ſuch order that they occupied as much ground as the Jews, and ſo appeared more than indeed they were. The Jews, though terrified by their fierceneſs, yet ſtood the firſt aſſault: but in the end diſmaied, and put out of order with their Lances, and trampled on by the Horſmen, every one fled as faſt as he could into the City. The Romans killed ſome as they fled, others as they overtook them, many for haſte tumbling one upon another; and they prevented all that fled to the Walls and drove them back again into the field, ſo that of this great multitude a very few were ſav'd who got into the City. Now at their return into the City, there fell a great diſſention: for the Inhabitants conſidering their own Eſtate, and the event of all former Wars, and eſpecially D of this laſt fight, miſliked the War, and deſired peace: but the ſtrangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great number, would needs continue it; and ſo one part began a conteſt againſt the other, which proceeded ſo far that by their outcries they ſeem'd ready to take Arms. Titus being not far from the Wall, heard theſe tumults within the City, and cried out to the Romans; This is the hour (fellow Souldiers) wherein God hath given the Jews into our hands: why do we defer the time any longer, why do we not take the Victory offered? do you not hear the cryes within? they who eſcaped our hands, are at variance amongſt themſelves: the City is ours, if we make haſte, and take courage.
Nothing worthy renown can be atchieved without danger. Let us not only prevent our enemies concord, which neceſſity will ſoon effect, but alſo our own Forces before any freſh aid come to us; E that beſides the Victory, being ſo few over ſo huge a multitude, we may alſo divide the ſpoil of the City among us. No ſooner had he thus ſpoken, but preſently he mounted upon his Horſe, and rode into the Lake, and ſo paſſed into the City, and all the Souldiers followed him. They that defended the Walls, were ſo amazed at his boldneſs, that none made reſiſtance againſt him as he came: but Jeſus with his followers leaving the quarter which was his to defend, fled into the fields: others flying towards the Lake, fell into their Enemies hands, who came that way againſt them, and ſo were ſlaughter'd as they were getting into their Ships; others were ſlain as they were ſwimming to overtake the Ships that were new lanch'd from the Shore: and there was a great ſlaughter of men all over the City. For the ſtrangers that fled not, made ſome reſiſtance, but the Townſmen did F not offer to defend themſelvs; for they abſtained from fight, hoping for pardon, becauſe they had not approved the War: At laſt Titus having ſlain the factious, took compaſſion upon the Citizens and ſaved their lives, and cauſed the Slaughter to ceaſe.
They who eſcaped to the Lake, ſeeing the City taken, remov'd as far as they could from their Enemies. Titus ſent Horſemen to let his Father underſtand what he had done.
Veſpaſian was very glad of his Sons glorious ſucceſs, whereby a great part of the War was ended. He commanded the City to be Guarded round about, to the intent that none might ſcape away alive. And the next day he came down to the Lake, and commanded Ships to be built to purſue thoſe that had eſcaped by it: and having many workmen, and great ſtore of matter to build them withal, his command ſoon effected.

The Deſcription of the Lake of Genezareth, and the Fountain of Jordan.

The Fountain of Jordan.

The Deſcription of Genezareth. The fertility of Genezareth

The length and breadth of Genezareth.

THE Lake of Genezareth taketh its name from the Country adjoyning to it; the breadth thereof is fourty furlongs, the length a hundred. The Water of this Lake is ſweet and good to drink, and more ſubtil than ordinarily the Waters of other places are; and it is very clear near the ſhoar, and more cool to drink, than either that of the River or Fountain; yea it is always more cold than one would judge ſuch a Lake B to be of that largeneſs: for the Water being ſet in the Sun, doth not loſe its coldneſs, when the Inhabitants expoſe it to the Sun in Summer to allay the natural coldneſs thereof. There are in it many ſorts of Fiſhes, nothing like the Fiſhes of other places, either in ſhape or taſte. The River Jordan paſſeth through the midſt of it. It is thought that Panium is the head and Fountain of it, but in truth it hath its Original from Phiala, from whence it paſſeth under ground a hundred and thirty Furlongs from Cæſarea, towards that way which leads unto Trachonitis on the right-hand. This Source is called Phiala, by reaſon of its roundneſs, for it is as round as a Wheel, and the Water ſtill keepeth within the brink of Phiala, never encreaſing nor diminiſhing. No man knew that this was the head of Jordan, till Philip the Tetrarch of Traconitis found C it to be ſo; for he caſting ſtraws into Phiala, found them afterward carried to Panium, which before that time was thought to be the Fountain of Jordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa's coſt and charges it was much more adorned. Jordan beginneth with a deep River out of this Den, and paſſeth along the Mariſh places, and dirty Lake of Semechonitis, and from thence 120 Furlongs to the City Julias, and in the way divideth the Lake Genezareth, and paſſing a great way further into the Wilderneſs, at laſt it falleth into the Lake called Aſphaltites. Upon the Lake Genezareth there bordereth a Country of the ſame Name, naturally beautiful and admirable; for there is no kind of Plant which will not grow there, and the Inhabitants have repleniſhed it with Plants and Trees of all ſorts, and the temperature of the Air well agreeth D with all ſort of Fruit-Trees: for there are an infinite Company of Nut-trees, which of all Trees eſpecially require a cold ſoil: there are alſo abundance of Palms, which deſire great heat: likewiſe great ſtore of Figs and Olives, which require a temperate Air: ſo that one may juſtly ſay, that through the bounty of Nature, ſo different and oppoſite qualities are here together united; and at one time, as it were, all difference of ſeaſons of the year conjoyn for good purpoſe. And it doth not only nouriſh theſe Fruits, but alſo conſerveth for ten whole Moneths Figs, Grapes, and all other Fruits all the year long. Beſides the temperature of the Air, it is alſo watered by a plentiful Fountain called Capernaum: Many think it to be an Arm of Nilus, becauſe it hath Fiſhes like the Corbe bred only in a Lake near Alexandria. The length of this E Country along the Lake bearing the ſame Name, is thirty Furlongs, and the breadth twenty.

A Sea-Fight againſt the Taricheans.

VEſpaſian having built his Ships, and furniſhed them with as many men as he thought ſufficient againſt thoſe whom he was to purſue, he embarqued upon the Lake, and himſelf alſo went againſt them. The Taricheans could not poſſibly make any eſcape by Land, although they would; and they were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their ſmall Pyrate Boats could not withſtand their Enemies great Veſſels; and beſides they were not ſufficiently manned, ſo that they feared to encounter the Romans, who preſſed altogether upon them: yet notwithſtanding ſometime they came about the Roman Ships, and caſt Stones at the Romans afar off, and ſometimes alſo they came near, and skirmiſhed with them: yet they themſelves always had more harm than the Romans; for their Stones which they caſt did only rattle G againſt the Romans Armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romans Arrows:

H Arrows: and if at any time they were ſo bold as to come near the Romans, they were ſlain before they could do them any harm, or elſe ſunk with their Boats. And as many as attempted to aſſault the Romans, were ſlain with their Javelins and Swords, the Romans leaping into their Boats; and many were taken with their Boats, the Ships meeting one another. They that were in the water and lift up their heads to ſwim, were kill'd with Arrows, or over-taken with Roman Boats: and if in deſperation they came ſwimming towards their Enemies, their Hands or Heads were preſently cut off. Thus ſome periſhed one way, ſome another, till at laſt they fled, and arrived upon the ſhoar, where their Ships were compaſſed round about. So the Romans kill'd many upon the Lake, and many upon the Land, and one might then have ſeen all the Lake ſtained I with blood, and full of dead Bodies, for not one eſcaped alive. A few dayes after, theſe dead Bodies corrupted the Air by their ſtench, in ſuch ſort, that the whole Country was annoyed with it: and this ſpectacle was ſo hideous that it cauſed horror not only in the Jews, but even in the Romans themſelves, who had been the cauſe of it. And the Shores were all full of Boats that had ſuffered Ship-wrack, and dead Bodies ſwollen in the water: And this was the end of that War by water. The number of them that periſhed here and in the City, was 6500. The Fight being ended, Veſpaſian ſate in a Tribunal Seat, and ſeparated the Strangers from the Inhabitants, for that the former ſeem'd to be the Authors of that War: Yet he deliberated with the Captains and Governours, whether he ſhould likewiſe pardon them: but they told him that their lives K might endamage him; for, ſaid they, if you ſend thoſe men away and let them live, they cannot live peaceably, becauſe they want abiding places, and they are able to diſturb and diſquiet thoſe to whom they ſhall fly. Veſpaſian for this cauſe judged them unworthy to live, preſuming that if they were let go, they would fight againſt them who pardoned their Lives; it remained to conſider what death to put them to. But he thought with himſelf, the Inhabitants would not patiently abide ſo many to be maſſacred, who had fled to them for ſuccour; wherefore he ſought to uſe no violence to them, becauſe he had promiſed them ſecurity. But at laſt he was overcome by the perſwaſion of his Friends, who told him that all things againſt the Jews were lawful, and that profit was to be preferred before honeſty, ſeeing both could not be had: ſo Licence being L granted to them to depart, they ſuſpecting nothing, were commanded to take only that way that leadeth to Tiberias. They willingly obeyed as they were commanded, not miſdoubting the ſafety of their goods or money: But the Romans had placed themſelves on every ſide the way even to Tiberias, to the intent that none might eſcape, and ſo ſhut them all in the City. Preſently after came Veſpaſian and encloſed them all in an Amphitheater, and ſo killed 1200 perſons, who were all old men, or young and unable for ſervice. Of the reſt, that were all ſtrong young men, he ſent 6000 to Nero to work at Iſtmos, near Corinth. The reſt of the multitude he ſold, in number 30400, beſides others that he gave to Agrippa, whom alſo he permitted to do what he would with thoſe that were of his Kingdom: But Agrippa ſold all thoſe that were given him. M The reſt of them were fugitives and ſeditious perſons of Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whoſe contempt of Peace procured the War. They were taken the ſixth of the Ides of September.

CHAP. I.

How Gamala was Beſieged.

The Victory ot the Romans againſt the Jews.

1 AFter that Tarichea was taken, all thoſe Cities that from the time that Jotapata was ſurprized till this inſtant had revolted from the Romans, did now again unite themſelves unto them: ſo that the Romans had now gotten into their hands all Caſtles and Towns of Galilee, Giſcala only excepted, and Itaburium, a Mountain ſo called. L With theſe two rebelled Gamala, a Town over againſt Tarichea, and ſcituate upon the Lake, belonging to the Kingdom of Agrippa; and alſo Sagane, and Seleutia; which two laſt belong'd to Gaulanitis, Sagane to the higher part, called Gaulana, and Gamala to the lower; Selucia unto the Lake Semechonitis, which is thirty furlongs in breadth, and threeſcore large, whoſe Marſhes reach even to Daphne, which Country is very pleaſant of it ſelf, and famous for that it entertaineth the ſtream called little Jordan, and at the foot of the Golden Mountain, drives it into the great Jordan. M Agrippa in the beginning of the Revolt had made a Treaty with Sagane and Seleucia: but Gamala, truſting to its ſcituation, would not enter into the Treaty. It is far ſtronger than Jotapata. It ſtands on a hill which riſeth up in the midſt of an exceeding high Mountain, ſo that it repreſenteth the figure of a Camel, which the Hebrews call Damel, and thereof it took the name, which the Inhabitants have corrupted into Damal. Before it, and on either ſide are deep Vallies, into which a man can hardly deſcend; only it may be aſſaulted on that ſide where it joyneth to the Mountain, which alſo the Inhabitants have made inacceſſible, by cutting there a deep Ditch. In that place the City was very well inhabited on the deſcent of the Hill, and towards the South part it ſtood on ſo ſteep a Hill, that it ſeemed as if it would have fallen every hour, N and there another Hill ſerved the Inhabitants inſtead of a Caſtle, being unwalled: for it was exceeding high, and reached down to the bottom of the Valley. In the Town within the Walls thereof there was alſo a Fountain. Although this City were of its own nature invincible, yet Joſeph compaſſing it with a Wall, and with Ditches and Mines made it ſtronger. Wherefore the Inhabitants of this place put far more confidence in their Walls, than they of Jotapata did; yet they were fewer in number, and not ſo Warlike people; but on account of the ſcituation of the City, they eſteemed themſelves above their Enemies: for the City was full of men that fled thither by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place: ſo that for ſeven Months they reſiſted the forces that were ſent by Agrippa to beſiege them. O Veſpaſian having decamped from Ammaus, pitched his Tents before Tiberias, and ſo went to Gamala, (Ammaus ſignifies Hot-Water, for there is a Fountain of Hot-Water there, which cureth many Diſeaſes.) The City was ſo ſcituate

A ſcituate, that he could not beſiege it round about : wherefore he placed men to keep watch in ſuch places as were paſſable, and poſſeſſed the higheſt Mountain, where his Souldiers pitching their Tents, entrenched themſelves. On the Eaſt part of the City in the moſt eminent place there was a Caſtle, where the fifteenth and fifth Legions lay againſt the Town, and the tenth Legion filled up the Ditches and Vallies. King Agrippa went to the Walls, and ſpake to thoſe that defended them, willing them to yield to the Romans ; but one of them with a Sling ſtruck him on the right Arm, and hurt him ; which much troubled his familiar Friends. And the Romans for anger that the King was hurt, and for fear of ſuch miſchances to themſelves, now became earneſt to aſſault the Town, perſwading themſelves that they would uſe ſtrangers and their Enemies hardly B if it lay in their power, ſeeing they had ſo ill entreated a Prince of their own Nation, for perſwading them to what was profitable for them.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Christ 69.

One with a ſling woundeth Agrippa.

The Romans having quickly intrenched themſelves by reaſon of the multitude that laboured in buſineſs, who were accuſtomed to ſuch work, began to place their Engines againſt the Town-Walls. Chares and Joſeph who were two of the moſt potent men in the Town, animated and armed their Citizens, and led them to the Walls to defend them ; but they had not much courage to the buſineſs. And although they well perceived that the City could not long hold out, ſeeing they wanted Water, and many other things neceſſary to ſtand a Siege ; yet notwithſtanding they exhorted the Townſmen to be valiant, where a while they reſiſted, notwithſtanding the ſhot : but at laſt, C they were therewith ſo terrified, that leaving the Walls, they fled into the City. Then the Romans battered the Walls with Rams in three ſeveral places, and where the Wall fell, there they iſſued in with Trumpets and a great ſhout, and fought with the Townſmen, who in the firſt conflict ſo valiantly reſiſted them, that they permitted them not to enter further into the Town. But at laſt being overcome both in ſtrength and number, they all fled into the higheſt part of the City, and from thence they turned again upon the Romans, who purſued them, and drave them down into the Vallies, and killed many ; and divers in that ſtrait paſſage were trodden to death by their fellows. Whereupon, ſeeing that they neither could flie, nor reſiſt their Enemies above their heads, they fled into the houſes, which adjoyned unto the Plain, and ſo filled them, that being D over-charged, they fell down upon other houſes beneath them, and beat them down alſo, and they likewiſe others ſcituated beneath them. Many of the Romans this way periſhed ; for being amazed, and not knowing what to do, they got into their houſes, notwithſtanding they ſaw them ſhake and totter : and many ſeeking to eſcape, were maimed by ſome part of the Ruines that fell upon their Bodies, and many were choaked in the duſt. The Citizens of Gamala rejoyced thereat, thinking that this aid was ſent from God : and not regarding their private loſſes, they ceaſed not to force the Romans into their houſes ; and if any were in the narrow ſtreets, them they ſlew with Darts from the high places. The ruines afforded them Stones enough, and their ſlain Enemies Swords and Armour, which they took from them, being half dead, and uſed E againſt themſelves : many died, who caſt themſelves headlong from off the houſes being ready to fall, and thoſe that ſought to flie could not eaſily eſcape ; for being ignorant of the wayes, and there being ſuch a duſt that one could not ſee another, they kill'd one another : till with much ado, finding paſſage, they got out of the City.

The Romans beſiege Gamala and aſſault it.

The Romans fall down with the ruines of the Jews houſes.

Many Romans ſlain and ſpoiled.

Veſpaſian, who was alwaies in the midſt of theſe encounters, was greatly moved to ſee the Buildings fall ſo upon his Souldiers, and forgetting his own ſafety, he retired himſelf with only a few to the higher part of the City, where he was left in great danger, having very few about him (for Titus his Son was not there, being before this time ſent to Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flie ſafely, nor yet had it been for his honour, if he could. Wherefore remembring all his great Actions from his Child-hood, and his F own Virtue, he encouraged his men, and with them joyned Arms, and covered themſelves with their Shields, and ſo as it were aſſiſted with ſome divine Aid, defended themſelves from all Darts, Arrows, and Stones, which were caſt from above upon them ; and ſo they remained there, not terrified either with the number or might of their Enemies, till at laſt, wondring at his Valour and Courage, they abated their fury. And now perceiving his Enemies to aſſault him but faintly, he retired back, till ſuch time as he got without the City Walls.

Veſpaſian's fortitude and warlike valour.

Veſpaſian's fight with the Jews.

Many Romans periſhed in this Fight, and among the reſt Ebutius a Centurion, who not only in this fight ſhew'd himſelf valiant, but alſo in many battles before, and had done the Jews much harm. Alſo in that fight a certain Captain named Gallus, accompanied G with ten Syrian Souldiers, hid himſelf in a houſe, and at ſupper-time he heard the people of that houſe talk, what the Citizens of Gamala were purpoſed to do Veſpaſian comforteth his Souldiers.

The inconſtancy and mutability of fortune.

The Roman Souldiers do all things with diſcretion.

againſt the Romans, and in the night time he ſlew them all, and eſcaped ſafe unto the H Romans. Veſpaſian perceiving his Army dejected at this diſadvantage, and ſo much the more, for that they never yet had ſo bad ſucceſs, and eſpecially, for that they had forſaken their General, and left him in danger, thought good to comfort them, ſpeaking nothing concerning himſelf, leſt he ſhould ſeem to find fault with ſome. In the begining of his ſpeech, he told them, That it behoved them patiently to bear that which was common to all men, becauſe there was no Victory without blood-ſhed, and that Fortune was mutable; that he had already ſlain many thouſand Jews, and now had paid a ſmall Tribute for his happy ſucceſs to adverſe Fortune. That as it did not become any but vain-glorious people to boaſt in their Proſperity, ſo none but Cowards feared and trembled in Adverſity. For, ſaid he, Fortune is very mutable both to the good and bad; and he is a valiant Man that is I not moved by Adverſity: for he, having all his wits about him, can even in the midſt of his troubles, ſee where any fault is and amend it. Yet (ſaid he) this hath not befaln us through want of Courage, or by the Valour and Proweſs of the Jews; but the difficulty of the place has been the only obſtacle of our Victory. If you are to be blamed, tis only for venturing too far; for when you ſaw your Enemies flie to the higher places, you ſhould then have held your hands, and not have purſued them with ſo manifeſt danger to your ſelves, as every one might fore-ſee in this purſuit: ſo having gain'd the lower part of the City, you might in a little time have drawn them to a more equal conflict: but you, being eager of the Victory, did not reſpect your own ſafety. It is not the manner of the Romans raſhly and unadviſedly to fight; they are wont to do all things orderly and adviſedly. Timerity is fit only for barbarous People; K and, as you ſee, proper to the Jews. Wherefore, let us call our own virtue to mind, and rather be angry for this that hapned (and ſo incite our ſelves to revenge) than ſorrowful. And let every valiant Souldier with his own ſword comfort himſelf: ſo ſhall we both revenge the death of our Friends, and be revenged of them by whom they were ſlain: and I my ſelf (as alſo now I did) will expoſe my ſelf to all dangers with you, and go firſt to fight, and come laſt from it. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches he comforted his Souldiers.

The Romans once more attempt the aſſault of Gamala.

The People of Gamala were at firſt very joyful for their proſperous ſucceſs; which notwithſtanding did not happen through their Valour: but ſoon after conſidering, that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to eſcape, they became very ſorrowful, and their hearts relented (for now Victuals failed them) yet L they omitted not to provide for their own ſafety as well as they could; for the moſt Valiant among them kept the Breach, and the reſt the ſtrong Places about the Walls which were yet unbattered. The Romans again built Mounts, and attempted to aſſault the City, and many of the Citizens fled by the Vallies where no guard was, and by ſecret Vaults underneath the ground; and they who for fear of being taken, remained in the City, periſhed for hunger: for all the Victuals were reſerved for them that fought, who, by the extremity whereinto they were reduced, had not loſt their Courage.

Placidus Victory.

DUring this Siege, Veſpaſian made another attempt againſt thoſe that kept the Mountain Itaburium, ſcituate between the great field and Scythopolis, being thirty Furlongs high, and inacceſſable on the North ſide. In the very top of this Mountain there is a Plain twenty Furlongs over, encloſed with a Wall: which Wall though of ſo huge a compaſs, Joſeph had built in fourty dayes. They received all neceſſary pro- N viſion from beneath, but they had only rain-water. Unto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Veſpaſian ſent Placidus againſt them with ſix hundred Horſe, who could no ways get up the Mountain: wherefore he exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: Many Jews came down towards him, but with intention to entrap him, and ſurpriſe him unawares. Placidus purpoſely gave them fair ſpeeches, hoping to get them down into the Plain: and they, as though they would have obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, ſuddenly to aſſault him: yet Placidus his device took place. For when the Jews aſſaulted him, he fained flight, and the Jews having purſued him a great way from the Mountain, he turned again upon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, killed ſome, and O hindred the reſt from aſcending the Mountain: ſo the remainder left Itaburium, and fled

How Gamala was Deſtroyed.

IN the mean time many of the Gamalians, that had appeared the moſt hardy, fled B and hid themſelves ; and the weaker ſort periſhed through Famine : yet a few of the moſt courageous that were left among them, defended the Wall till the twenty ſeventh day of October. Upon which day, three Souldiers of the fifteenth Legion, towards the break of day, undermined the higheſt Tower in their quarter, and entred into it , thoſe that kept it, neither perceiving them when they came in, nor when they went out (for it was in the night-time.) Theſe Souldiers being wary leſt any noiſe ſhould be made, removed five of the greateſt ſtones of the Foundation, and preſently leapt away ; and incontinently the Tower fell with a hideous noiſe, and with the fall killed thoſe that kept it ; whereupon many that kept watch in thoſe quarters fled through fear ; and they who ſought to eſcape the Romans, were killed ; amongſt whom C Joſeph was ſtrucken with a Dart from a part of the Wall that was fallen down, and there dyed. They who were within the City were terrified with the noiſe hereof, and ran up and down as though all the Enemies were already entred into it. And Chares Joſephs Companion, being ſick, yielded up the Ghoſt, fear encreaſing his Diſeaſe, and helping to ſhorten his life. The Romans remembring the bad ſucceſs at the laſt aſſault, did not enter the City till the twenty-third of the Month aforeſaid.

The Romans undermine a certain Tower and it falleth with a great noiſe.

Then Titus animated by reſentment of the misfortune of the Romans in his abſence, accompanied with 200 Horſemen, and ſome choſen Foot-men, entred the City, no man reſiſting him : the Watch-men then firſt perceiving it, cryed, To Arms. Thoſe within the City fearing that Titus was entred, ſome took their Children, ſome their Wives, D and fled into the Caſtle with pitiful Cries and weeping : others met Titus, and were all put to the Sword ; and they that could not get into the Caſtle, not knowing what to do, fell among the Roman Guards. Then the skies were filled with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the City flowed with blood. Veſpaſian led his whole Army againſt thoſe that fled into the Caſtle, which was of a great height, and ſcarcely acceſſible, ſtanding in a ſtony place full of Ditches and deep Dens, and compaſſed with ſteep Rocks. The Jews drove down the Romans that offered to come up to them, partly with Darts, partly with Stones, which they rowled down upon them ; and they were ſo high, that the Romans Arrows could not reach them. But at laſt, as it were by Gods providence, who would have it ſo, a Whirlwind aroſe which carried the Roman Arrows amongſt them in the Caſtle, and the Jews Arrows from the Romans ; E and the Wind was ſo violent, that it was not poſſible for them to ſtand upon thoſe high places : and ſo not being able to ſtand, nor to ſee thoſe that came againſt them, the Romans aſcended and took the Caſtle ; ſome reſiſting for their defence, others yielding themſelves. The Romans now call to mind their fellows that had periſhed in the firſt aſſault, and ſo became more cruel. Many deſpairing of their lives, caſt their Wives, their Children, and themſelves headlong down thoſe Precipices into the deep Vallies underneath. So that the Cruelty the Romans ſhewed againſt the people of Gamala, was not ſo great as that which they uſed againſt themſelves ; for there were only four thouſand that periſht by the Romans Sword, and the number of them F who ſo caſt themſelves down, was found to be five thouſand ; and not one eſcaped, but two Women that were Siſters, and Daughters to Philip Son of Joachim, a worthy Man, and General of Agrippa's Army ; and theſe two were ſaved only, becauſe at ſuch time as the City was taken, they hid themſelves : for they ſpared not Infants, but many took them and caſt them down from the Caſtle. And thus was Gamala deſtroyed the 23 day of October, having begun to Revolt the 21 day of September.

CHAP. IV.

How Titus took Giſcala.

John a Poyſoner and a deceitful man, inforceth the Citizens of Giſcala to Rebel.

Veſpaſian foreſeeth his no ſmall trouble in the Siege of Jeruſalem.

NOw all the Cities and ſtrong Places of Galilee were taken, Giſcala only excepted.
Part of the Inhabitants whereof deſired Peace, for that they were Husbandmen, and their riches conſiſted in the Fruits of the Earth; but there were many factious Freebooters in the City, and amongſt them many of the natural Inhabitants. Theſe people were incited to Revolt by one John, a very wicked and deceitful perſon, Son to one I Levias; he was of ill manners, bold to attempt any thing, and making no conſcience of any thing he took in hand; and he was known to all men for one that deſired War, to make himſelf mighty. This man was a Ring-leader of the Seditious perſons in Giſcala:
and for fear of him, the People, who perhaps otherwiſe would have ſent Legats to the Romans to requeſt peace, were hindred and forced to ſtay till the Romans came to fight againſt them. Againſt theſe People Veſpaſian ſent Titus, and with him a thouſand Horſemen; and the tenth Legion towards Scythopolis: Himſelf with the reſt went to Cæſarea, to refreſh them after their great labour, at the charge of the Towns adjoyning; judging it neceſſary to fit them to ſuſtain manfully the toyls that were to enſue: for he foreſaw that he ſhould have much ado to win Jeruſalem, both for that it was very K ſtrong, and was the Chief City of all the Nation. And his care in this point was ſo much the more, for that he perceived many out of all parts fled thither; and that it was compaſſed with almoſt invincible Walls: and beſides this, the boldneſs and deſperate courage of the Inhabitants, who although that they had had no Walls at all, yet had been ſcarcely to be Conquered: and therefore he thought it neceſſary to refreſh his Souldiers before this Enterpriſe, as Champions are prepared for the Combate.

Titus his compaſſion toward thoſe of Giſcala.

Titus his merciful Oration to thoſe of Giſcala.

Johns anſwer to Titus's Exhortation.

Titus having taken a view of Giſcala, judg'd that it might eaſily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the People would be deſtroyed by the Romans, he being weary of blood-ſhed, and commiſerating the innocent People, which were otherwiſe like to periſh together with the culpable, attempted to take it by ſurrender. L Wherefore the Walls being full of People, among whom were many of the Seditious, he told them that he marvelled what help they expected, or by whoſe advice, all other Cities being now taken, they alone would reſiſt the Roman Forces, eſpecially whenas they had already ſeen many Towns, far ſtronger than theirs, overthrown at the firſt aſſault: and that contrariwiſe thoſe who had yielded themſelves to the Romans, lived in peace, and enjoyed all that was theirs. Which offer (ſaid he) I now alſo make to you, and am not yet incenſed againſt you, becauſe that which you do is in hope of your liberty: but if you ſtill perſevere in your rebellious courſe, and refuſe this kind offer, you ſhall preſently perceive the Roman Sword drawn out for your deſtruction, and incontinently find your Walls but a mockery, and no wayes able to reſiſt the Roman M Engines: whereas contrariwiſe if you yield your ſelves, and truſt to the fidelity of the Romans, you ſhall be the moſt happy people of all Galilee. None of the Townſmen were admitted to make anſwer, nor to come to the Walls; for the Seditious were Maſters of them: and a Guard was placed at every Gate, leſt any ſhould go out to ſubmit themſelves, or any Horſemen ſhould be received into the City. John made anſwer for all, That he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perſwade or compel the Inhabitants to accept them: but he requeſted that that day might be granted to the Jews, being the Seventh day, wherein it was not lawful for them to treat of Peace, or make War. For (as the Romans knew) the Jews every ſeventh day ceaſe from all work: and if they profaned it, they who cauſed them to do N ſo, were guilty of impiety. Moreover, ſo ſhort time could not prejudice the Romans, being but one nights ſpace: for nothing he could effect in that time to endamage them, except only by fleeing out of the City (which Titus might prevent by placing a ſtrong Guard and Watch in every place about it.) That Titus might make advantage of it, ſince it being his deſign to offer them Peace and Safety, it was an action no leſs worthy of him, to have regard to the obſervation of their Law, than a duty indiſpenſable in them not to violate it.

With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches John ſought to delude Titus, being not ſo religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as careful for his own ſafety: for he feared that the City would preſently be taken, and himſelf left alone; and ſo he determined in the O night to flee, as the only way to ſave his Life. And truly God would have it ſo, that

A John ſhould then eſcape to be the overthrow of Jeruſalem, and that Titus ſhould not only grant him the time he requeſted to deliberate, but alſo that night remove his Camp near Cydeſſa, a great Village, and the ſtrongeſt of all that Country, belonging to the Tyrians, which the Galileans alwayes hated.

The year of the World, 4032. after the Nativity of Christ, 70.

In the night time John perceiving no Romans to keep watch about the Town, and having now opportunity, fled not only with the armed men about him, but alſo with many of the Chief of the City, and whole Families, whom he promiſed to conduct to Jeruſalem. But John fearing either Death or Slavery, and careful for his own ſafety, carried them twenty Furlongs out of the City, where being ſo deſolate, they began grievouſly to lament. For every one thought himſelf as near his Enemies, as he was B far from the City and his friends : and ſtill every ſtep they thought their Enemies at hand, ready to take them ; and frequently they lookt back, as though their Enemies heard the noiſe they made as they went, and were coming againſt them ; inſomuch that many crowded forwards in heaps, and were killed in the way with the preſs of them that followed : ſo that the Women and Infants periſhed miſerably : and if they ſpake any thing, it was only to entreat their Parents or their Kindred to ſtay for them.

John reserved, by Gods providence, to be at the Siege of Jeruſalem.

The fear of thoſe Jews that fled with John

But Johns exhortation took effect, who cried to them to ſave themſelves, and haſten to ſuch a place where they might be ſafe, and revenge themſelves of the Romans, for the out-rages which they that remained behind were like to endure : and ſo the multitude C that fled, every one as he was able, diſperſed themſelves.

Titus early in the morning came to the Walls to know whether they accepted of his Offer. Then the people ſet open the Gates, and with their Wives and Children came to meet him, all crying that he was their Benefactor and Deliverer : Alſo they told him that John was fled, and beſought him to pardon them, and execute Juſtice upon thoſe Malefactors that remained in the City. Titus, at their requeſt, ſent certain Horſemen to purſue John, but they could not take him, for before they came, he had gotten to Jeruſalem ; yet they ſlew almoſt two thouſand of them that fled with him, and brought back again 3000 Women and Children. Titus was angry that John by deceit had eſcaped unpuniſhed : yet his anger was ſomething appeaſed, when he perceived Johns D purpoſe prevented, in that ſo many of his Company were ſlain, and ſo many brought back Captives. Thus he peaceably entred the City, commanding the Souldiers to break down a little piece of the Wall, as it were to take poſſeſſion of it, and ſo puniſht the Seditious rather with Threats than Torments. For he thought that many were accuſed only for private hatred, and ſo were in danger to ſuffer being innocent : and he thought it better to let the wicked live in fear, than with them to deſtroy the guiltleſs : and that perhaps hereafter they would be more quiet, either for fear of puniſhment, or for ſhame of falling again into their former offence, for which they were pardoned : whereas if any man ſuffered undeſervedly, he could not afterwards help it. He placed there a Garriſon both to repreſs the Seditious, and alſo to confirm them that deſired E Peace. And thus was Galilee Conquered after it had coſt the Romans much toil.

The Citizens of Giſcala entertain Titus with all obedience.

Titus mercy to his Enemies. It is better to leave an Enemy in ſuſpence through fear, than with the guilty to confound the innocent.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

AS ſoon as John was entred into Jeruſalem, all the People flocked about him, and thoſe that came with him, enquiring what new Calamities had befallen their F Nation. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to ſpeak, thereby diſcovered their diſtreſs. Yet amidſt theſe their miſeries ſome boaſted that it was not the Roman power that forced them to flie, but that of their own accord they fled thither to fight againſt the Romans in a ſafer place, than that from whence they fled was ; for none but unadviſed and raſh-headed men would fight for ſuch a City as Giſcala, and other places that were not able to reſiſt ; and that it behoved them all to reſerve their Vigour and ſtrength to defend their Metropolitan City. They alſo told them how Giſcala was taken by the Romans, and that they departed in good ſort away, though ſome reported that they fled. The People of Jeruſalem hearing what theſe men reported, and how many were Priſoners to the Romans, fell into a great fear, as though that G which had hapned portended their own ruine. But John, nothing aſhamed he had ſo ſhamefully forſaken them of Giſcala who fled with him, went firſt to one, and then to another, inciting them all to War, with vain hopes, alledging the weakneſs of the Romans , H and extolling their own Puiſſance, deceiving the ſimple ; and perſwading them, that though the Romans ſought revenge,yet could they never enter the Walls of Jeruſalem, having had ſo much ado, and endured ſuch difficulties in entering the little Bourgs and Villages of Galilee, againſt whoſe Walls they had broken all their Engines.

Theſe diſcourſes of his incited many young men to Sedition ; but all the wiſer ſort foreſaw what was like to enſue, and already mourned for the loſs of the City. In this caſe were they of Jeruſalem : yet before this Sedition in the City, the Country People began to be at diſcord among themſelves. For Titus departed from Giſcala to Cæſarea, and Veſpaſian went from Cæſarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and took them both ; and leaving there Garriſons, he returned to Cæſarea, bringing with him a great multitude I of thoſe that had yielded to him. All the Cities had Civil diſcords among themſelves, ſo that when the Romans did not ſet upon them, one part of the Jews in every City fought againſt another, and there was a great diſſention between thoſe that deſired peace, and the Seditious People. At firſt, this Diſcord began only in private houſes ; but in the end, thoſe of one mind united, and began in Companies to Rebel openly. Thus every place was troubled with civil diſcord : and every where raſh young men, who deſired War, prevailed againſt grave and wiſe old men, who foreſeeing the calamity like to enſue, deſired Peace. At firſt, the Inhabitants one by one robb'd and ſpoil'd what they could ; but at laſt in whole Troops they joyned together and robb'd openly, and waſted all the Country about : and in their Robberies they K ſhewed ſuch cruelty, that the harm and injury they did to their own Country-men, was equal to the miſeries which befel them by the Romans ; and they who by theſe miſcreants were ſpoiled, wiſh'd rather to have fallen into the Romans hands. But the Gariſons in theſe Cities, either becauſe they were loth to trouble themſelves, or elſe for that they cared not for their Country-men, did nothing, or very little, ſuccour them that fell into theſe Thieves hands. At laſt the Thieves aſſembled themſelves together from all places, and joyning Companies brake into Jeruſalem. This City had no Governour, and according to the ancient Cuſtom of their Anceſtors, was open to all that came thither that were their Country-men ; and ſo much more willingly at that time, becauſe they thought they that came thither, came of good will to help them : which L was afterward the only cauſe that the City was deſtroyed, and of the more civil diſſention.
For a great multitude of people unapt to fight being there, conſumed the Victuals that would have ſufficed for the fighting men : and beſides the War, they brought upon it Famine and Civil diſſention. Then other Thieves came out of the fields thereabout, and joyning themſelves with thoſe that were within the City, omitted no kind of Villany : for not content to rob and ſpoil, they alſo attempted to commit Murders, not only privily, or in the night upon mean men, but even in the day time they publickly ſet upon thoſe of the chiefeſt quality. For firſt of all they took Antipas, who was of the blood Royal, a man ſo eminent amongſt them, that the publick Treaſure was committed to his charge, and put him in Priſon : and after him they took Sepha a M worthy man Son to Raguel, and Levias, both of them of the Kings Houſhold ; and after them all that ſeemed to bear any ſway or Authority amongſt the People. Great fear fell upon the Inhabitants, and every one provided to ſave himſelf, as though the City were already ſurprized by the Enemies. But theſe people were not content thus to have impriſoned theſe great men, they thought it not ſafe for themſelves any longer to keep them alive : for many went daily to viſit them, who were able to revenge their injuries ; and moreover they feared that the People would make head againſt them, being moved with their Inſolencies. Wherefore they determined to kill them : and to effect their purpoſe they ſent one John a cruel Murderer, who was the Son of Dortas : he accompanied with ten more, all having ſwords went to the Priſon, and ſlew as many N as they found there. To excuſe this cruel fact of theirs, they alledged, That all they who were ſlain in Priſon had conference with the Romans concerning the betraying of the City into their hands ; and that for this Cauſe they had ſlain them as Traytors to their Country : They alſo boaſted that this Fact of theirs had preſerved the City, and that therefore they had deſerved well by it. The People were brought to ſuch ſlavery and terrour, that the chooſing the High Prieſt was in their hands, to elect whom they pleaſed ; ſo much was their Inſolence increaſed. Thus they not reſpecting the Families, out of which it was only lawful to chooſe the high Prieſt, they elected Strangers and baſe perſons to that ſacred Dignity, and ſuch as would be partakers of their Villanies and Impieties ; for they, who not deſerving it, attained to ſuch dignity, O were bound in all things to the Will of thoſe by whom they were ſo exalted. They

A alſo deviſed many lies to ſet thoſe that were in Authority at variance one with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to reſiſt their Enterprizes, till from ſhedding the blood of the Citizens, they proceeded to commit impiety againſt God himſelf, and with profane and impure feet to enter into the Sanctuary. Then the People were incited againſt them by the perſwaſion of Ananus, who was one of the Prieſts, and the moſt ancient and wiſeſt of them all, who perhaps had ſaved the City, had he eſcaped the hands of theſe Miſcreants. But they uſed the Temple as a Caſtle and defence for themſelves againſt the People, and made the Sanctuary a place for them to exerciſe Tyranny in. And that which increaſed the ſorrow of the Citizens, was, that amidſt theſe Calamities, their Religion was alſo contumeliouſly abuſed: for theſe B Thieves, to try of what ſtrength and courage the People were, and their own Forces, elected by Lot a high Prieſt contrary to their Law: which, as we have already ſaid, requireth that the Office of high Prieſt be by Succeſſion. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient Cuſtom, alledging that in time paſt the high Prieſt was choſen by Lot; but indeed this their fact was a violation of the moſt firm Cuſtom that was amongſt the People; and was only a device to get all Government into their hands, by eſtabliſhing Magiſtrates at their pleaſure.

Phanes a Country Clown made a high Prieſt.

Then calling one of the holy Tribes, named Eniachin, they caſt Lots, and the Lot fell upon one, whereby their iniquity was diſcovered. This man whoſe Lot it was to C be high Prieſt was named Phanias, who was the Son of Samuel; a man not only unworthy of that Dignity, but who had been ſo ill brought up, that he never knew what the high Prieſt meant. This Phanias was born in a Village called Apthaſis. Him, againſt his will, they fetcht out of the field, and as it had been in a Stage-Play, they graced him with the Sacerdotal habit, and gave him inſtructions how he ſhould behave himſelf, as though ſo great impiety had been but a ſport. The reſt of the Prieſts, beholding a far off the holy Laws thus ſcorned, ſcarcely contained themſelves from tears, and groaned for ſorrow, that their ſacred Dignities were ſo abuſed. The People could no longer endure this their Tyranny, but every one bethought himſelf how to ſuppreſs theſe Tyrants. And thoſe that were moſt earneſt herein, were Gorion, Joſephs Son, D and Simeon the Son of Gamaliel; who firſt went about the City in private, and afterwards in a publick Aſſembly exhorted the People to be revenged upon thoſe Tyrants, who took from them their Liberty; and to addreſs themſelves to purge the holy Temple from ſuch vile and unclean Perſons. Likewiſe the beſt diſpoſed among the Prieſts, to wit, Jeſus the Son of Gamala, and Ananus, the Son of Ananus, often in publick Sermons reprehended and upbraided the People with their ſloth, that they made no more haſte to deſtroy thoſe Zealous; for ſo thoſe wretches termed themſelves, as though they had been devout promoters of God's Glory, and not impious malefactors.

The beſt Citizens exhort the people to revenge.

The people being all aſſembled together, grieved to ſee the holy place ſo made a Den of Thieves, and ſuch Robberies and Murthers committed openly; yet did they E not go about revenge, thinking themſelves too weak to deal with theſe Zealots, as indeed they were. Whereupon the high Prieſt Ananus ſtood up among them: and having often turned his Eyes to the Temple, and beheld it with tears in his Eyes; Oh, ſaid he, How far better were it for me to die, than live to ſee the Houſe of God thus filled with Impiety, and the Sanctuary wherein none ſhould come but the high Prieſt, prophaned with the wicked feet of impious perſons, clothed in Prieſts apparel, and bearing the greateſt Authority? Why do I yet live, and to be gray-headed, abſtain from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will go againſt theſe Murderers, and as though I were in a Wilderneſs where there were no man beſides my ſelf, I alone will go and offer my ſoul in the preſence of God. For what doth it avail me to live amongſt a People that have no feeling of their own calamity, and which F ſeeketh not to redreſs their own preſent miſeries? For you being robbed and ſpoiled bear all patiently, and being beaten you hold your peace, and there is none amongſt you that dare openly mourn for them that are moſt cruelly murthered. O tyrannous Government! But why ſhould I exclaim againſt the Tyrants? Do not you your ſelves make them great, and nouriſh their power and authority by your patience? Do not you, by deſpiſing thoſe who were before in authority, being but a few, make all theſe, who are many in number, Tyrants over your ſelves? Have not you by keeping your ſelves quiet whilſt they are armed, drawn their ſwords upon your own heads? and whereas it behoved you to reſiſt their enterpriſes, when firſt they injured your Kindred; you by ſuffering, have made them Thieves, becauſe at firſt you made no account, when they deſtroyed Houſes and whole Families. And this was the cauſe, that at laſt G *the Rulers and chief Men themſelvs were ſet upon, and none would ſuccour them when they were drawn thorow the midſt of the City, and theſe Murtherers butchered them in Priſon whom you thus betrayed. eſt place in the whole City, called indeed a Temple, but now a Fortreſs or Caſtle of defence. What do you now think, ſuch a Tyranny being eſtabliſhed over you, and your Enemies being even upon you; what do you deliberate to do? Do you expect the Romans to come and help you to ſave the Temple and ſacred places, as if our City were at that paſs that our very Enemies could not but pity us? Will you not riſe, and as the very brute Beaſts do, I revenge your ſelves upon them that have thus wounded you? Why doth not every one of you call to mind the Maſſacre of his friends, and what Calamity he himſelf hath ſuffered, and ſo encourage your ſelves to be revenged? For ought I can ſee, you have all loſt that ſacred and ſweet, and natural deſire of Liberty; and now we imbrace Bondage, as though we had learned to be Bondmen even from our Anceſtors. But they endured many and hard Wars to live in Liberty, and yielded not to the Power of the Egyptians, or Medes, becauſe they would not be at their command. What need is there to recount to you the Wars of your Predeceſſors? to what end do we enterpriſe this War againſt the Romans (be it commodious for us, to our diſadvantage) if not to obtain our Liberty? And we, who cannot indure to be ſubject to the Lords of the whole World, ſuffer thoſe of our own Nation to tyrannize over us. It may be K adverſe Fortune to be once overcome by ſtrangers; but to be ſlaves to the baſeſt of our own Nation, argueth that we have no ſpark of Generoſity in us, and that we bear baſe and ſervile minds. And ſeeing I have made mention of the Romans, I will not ſtick to declare to you that which now cometh to my mind, to wit, that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet ſhall we ſuffer no greater miſery at their hands, than now we do under theſe baſe Tyrants.
And how can you abſtain from tears, beholding this Temple, enriched by the gifts of the Romans, robbed and ſpoyled by them of our own Nation, this being our Mother-City? and to ſee thoſe men murthered whom the Romans (although they had conquered us) would not have touched? The Romans never durſt paſs beyond the limits of prophane places, nor ever violated our ſacred Laws and Cuſtoms, but always reverenced the Sanctuary, be- L holding it only afar off: yet now ſome born and brought up amongſt us who are called Jews, tremble not to walk in the Sanctuary, having their hands bathed in the blood of their Country-men and brethren. Who will now fear forreign Wars, ſeeing theſe civil broils are ſuch? Much better were it for us to fall into our Enemies hands; yea, if you will call every thing by ſuch a name as it deſerveth, we ſhall find that the Romans have not violated our Laws, but have been the Protectors thereof; and they within our Walls are the Violators of them. What puniſhment is there that thoſe that have thus tyrannized over us deſerve not? yea, what puniſhment can be deviſed great enough for their offence? I know that all of you were ſo perſwaded before I ſpoke, and you were incited againſt them by that which you have endured at their hands: but yet ſome fear their multitude and their courage, M and moreover that they are in a higher place than you: yet as all this came by your negligence and ſuffering, ſo by your delaying they will grow ſtronger. For their number daily increaſes, and every wicked perſon flyeth to his like; and they are ſo much the more emboldened, for that as yet no man hath once offered to reſiſt their enterprizes: and be ſure that if they have time, they will make uſe of the higher place, and that to your dammage. But (believe me) if you would but once offer to go againſt them, their very conſciences would abate their haughty minds, and the remembrance of their miſdeeds would put them ſo far out of heart that they will not make any benefit of that higher place. Perhaps God in his vengeance will turn their own darts againſt them for their impiety, and conſume them therewith. Let us but only ſhew our ſelves, and we ſhall diſmay them. Yet it is an N honour for us, if need be to ſacrifice our lives for the defence of the holy Temple. My ſelf will aſſiſt you with the beſt advice I can; and you ſhall ſee that I ſhall not only aſſiſt you with words, but expoſe my ſelf to the greateſt dangers, and endeavour to animate you by my own example.

Ananus thus exhorted the people againſt the Zealots; yet he knew well that it was great difficulty to overcome them, being luſty young men, many in number, of great courage, and the more deſperate by the remorſe of Conſcience for the horrible crimes and execrable deeds which they had committed; for they deſpaired of all hope of pardon for their miſdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable that the Common-wealth ſhould be ſo over-ruled. After this exhortation the people cryed out, that they were ready to go againſt the Thieves, and to do as they were exhorted. O Whilſt that Ananus ſelected out the moſt able men for War, and ſet them in order, the

A the Zealots iſſued out upon him, (having intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certain Spies which they had appointed on purpoſe) and they ſallied out ſometimes in companies, ſometimes all at once, other times in Ambuſhes; ſparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number than the Thieves, but not ſo armed as they; but what they wanted in arms, their courage ſupply'd. For the Citizens were armed with fury, ſtronger then Arms; and they which were gone out of the Temple, with a more deſperate boldneſs than all the multitude how great ſoever. For the Citizens thought it no abiding for them in the City, except they could drive away the Zealots: and the Zealots thought they could not eſcape torments and death it ſelf, except they were Victors.
B So at laſt they joyned battel, each party under their Captains and Leaders; and firſt of all both parties caſt ſtones one againſt another: and if any fled, the Conquerours purſued them with ſwords, and many were wounded and ſlain on both ſides. Thoſe Townſmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houſes; but the Zealots that were hurt, went into the Temple, and polluted the ſacred pavements with their bloud: ſo that their Religion was prophaned by bloudſhed. Alwayes the Thieves in making excurſions got the upper hand. Whereat the Citizens being angry, ſeeing their number every day decreaſed, reproved the cowards: ſo that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zealots, they made him ſtand and reſiſt whether he would or no, not permiting him to paſs away: and thus they bent all their forces C againſt their Enemies. At laſt, the Thieves not able to make any longer reſiſtance, by little and little retired themſelves into the Temple, and Ananus with his Company entred the Temple by force with them, and brake the body of his Enemies. Then they in the outer Temple were in great fear, and fled into the inner Temple, and ſhut the Gates with all ſpeed. Ananus would not offer violence to the ſacred Gates; and beſides the Enemies caſt Darts from above: for he thought it a great offence againſt God, although he might have got the victory, to introduce the people not being purified.
Wherefore he elected ſix thouſand of the chief of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keep the Porches, and others to ſucceed in their places while they took reſt.
And many of the better ſort of the Citizens being placed to keep watch there, hired D other poor people to watch in their ſteads. But John, who as before we declar'd, fled from Giſcala, wrought the ruine of them all. This man being full of deceit, and above all meaſure deſirous of rule, long ago intended to overthrow the Commonwealth.
To which end, from that time he counterfeited himſelf to be againſt the Thieves, and ſo day and night accompanied Ananus and the reſt, both in their Conſultations, and when they went to viſit the Watch; and he diſcloſed all their Counſels to the Zealots: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gave the Thieves intelligence thereof before it was put in practice; yet he ſeemed to be very reſpectful to Ananus, and the reſt of the Nobility, hereby hoping to conceal his Treachery.
But it fell out contrary to his expectation; for this his too much reverence cauſed him E to be ſuſpected, becauſe they noted him to play the Paraſite: and for that uncalled, he daily intruded himſelf into their Conſultations, he was miſdoubted to betray their ſecrets. For Ananus perceived that the Enemies knew all their deſigns; and though Johns deeds carried ſuſpicion of Treaſon, yet could they not eaſily remove him, his craft was ſuch: beſides this, he was upheld by many noble-men who were imployed in theſe affairs. Wherefore they thought good to requeſt of him an oath of friendſhip; which he denied not, but added moreover that he would be true to the people, and neither diſcloſe any deed or ſecret Counſel of theirs to the Enemies, but with heart and hand would truly endeavour to ſuppreſs the Rebels. So Ananus did no more miſtruſt him becauſe of his oath, and admitted him afterward to all their Counſels, F nothing ſuſpecting him. Nay, they now truſted him ſo far, that they ſent him as Agent to the Zealots, to perſwade them to peace: for they were very careful leſt the Temple through their deeds ſhould be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Jews ſhould there be ſlain. But he, as though he had ſworn to the Zealots and not to the Citizens, entred boldly amongſt them: and ſtanding in the midſt of them he recounted to them that he had often for their ſakes undergone great danger, by ſuffering none of the Townſmens ſecrets to be concealed from them, but declared unto them all that ever Ananus and his Confederates determined againſt them; and that even now he was like together with them to fall into extream Danger, except it pleaſed God as it were miraculouſly to aſſiſt them. For, ſaid he, now Ananus without delay will G ſend to Veſpaſian, who will come with his Army in all haſte and take the City: and that he had appointed the day following for Purification, to purifie the people, that ſo under pretence of piety he might let them into the City, or elſe they might enter in by force: and that he could not ſee how either they were able to endure a long ſiege, or encounter with ſo huge an Army: adding moreover, that it was Gods providence that he ſhould be ſent to them to make a peace, when Ananus purpoſed ſo ſoon as they were unarmed to ſet upon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themſelves, they ſhould either entreat the Watchmen that beſieged them to be favourable to them, or elſe get ſome ſuccour from ſome place without the Temple. For (ſaid he) he that amongſt you hopeth for pardon if you be overcome, doth not remember what hath paſt, and what he hath done; but let them perſwade themſelves as they pleaſe, they that have been injured, will not forget and forgive ſo ſoon, as he that injured them is ſorry for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated than before, and the wrath of men that are injured, is increaſed by Authority, and licence to do what they pleaſe. And they might be ſure that the friends and kindred of them that were ſlain, would always lay wait to require the injuries; and that all the people were incenſed againſt them for breaking the Laws: ſo that although ſome few would take pity upon them, yet the greater number would prevail. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches John terrified the Zealots; yet durſt he not openly tell them what he meant by forreign help, notwithſtanding he meant the Idumeans. And that he might more enflame the Thieves, he went to the chiefeſt of them, and ſecretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent againſt them, and breathed out many threatnings againſt ſome in particular.

CHAP. VI

How the Idumeans came to Jeruſalem, and what they did there.

Eleazer one of the Zealots cauſeth the Idumeans to be ſent for AMongſt the Zealots there were two principal, Eleazer the Son of Simon, who above all the reſt was thought moſt fit both to give counſel, and to execute that which was conſulted upon: and Zacharias the Son of Amphicalus; who both were deſcended from the Line of the Prieſts. Theſe two, underſtanding, that beſide the general threatnings, their death was eſpecially reſolved, and that the faction of Ananus, to get him into Authority, had ſent to call the Romans (for this John had fained) deliberated with themſelves what to do, having ſo ſhort time to provide. For they ſuppoſed that preſently the people would aſſault them; and they bethought themſelves that now it was too late to ſeek forreign help: for they might endure all calamity, before they could give notice hereof unto any that would help them. Yet at laſt they determined to call the Idumæans to aid them, and ſo they write a ſhort Epiſtle to them, letting them underſtand how Ananus, having ſeduced the people, meant to betray the Mother-City of their Nation to the Romans; and that they fighting for their liberty, were by him beſieged in the Temple; that the time wherein they expected ſafety was very ſhort; and that if they were not preſently ſuccour'd, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the City to be brought in ſubjection to the Romans: they alſo order'd many things to be ſpoken by word of mouth to the Rulers of Idumea. For which purpoſe were choſen two principal men, eloquent, and apt to perſwade; and that, which was in this caſe required, ſwift of foot. It was certain that the Idumeans would preſently aid them, being a bruitiſh rude Nation, and prone to ſedition and alteration, much rejoycing therein, and by flattery eaſily entreated to War, and would make as much haſte to them, as if they went to ſome feſtival ſolemnity: ſo that there only was requiſite two ſpeedy meſſengers. Which two were ready and quick men for ſuch an exploit, and were both called by the name of Ananias. Theſe preſently went to the Governours of Idumea, who reading the Epiſtle, and hearing that which the meſſengers were to ſay to them, like Mad-Men aſſembled all the people together in great haſte, and proclaim'd War: ſo the people in an inſtant gathered themſelves together, and were all armed to fight for the liberty of their Mother-City; and twenty thouſand being aſſembled together under the Government of four Captains, came with all ſpeed to Jeruſalem: the names of them were John and James, the Sons of Soſa, and Simon the Son of Cathlas, and Phineas the Son of Cloſoth. Ananus and his Watch knew not of the going of thoſe two Meſſengers, nor of the Watches in the City, but they underſtood of the Idumeans coming, and ſo ſhut the Gates, and placed watchmen upon the Walls: yet they thought not good to go out Jeſus Oration and exhortation to the Idumeans.

Though many and divers tumults and troubles have moleſted this City, yet I never ſo much wondred at any of them, as that you are come with ſuch fury and readineſs to help theſe wicked people, againſt all expectation: for (ſaid he) you are come againſt us to help moſt vile perſons: and ſo raſhly, as it behoved not you to have done, if your Metropolitan City had requeſted your help againſt barbarous people. If I judged your manners like theirs that have requeſted your help, I ſhould then think you had ſome reaſon to come: for nothing cauſeth firmer friendſhip than agreement or ſympathy in manners. But they, if their actions be conſidered, B have every one deſerved a thouſand deaths. For they are the outcaſt and baſeſt of all the Country people; who having ſpent their patrimonies riotouſly, and played the thieves in all places and Cities about them, now at laſt have got into this holy City, moſt religious of all Cities, and have profaned the holy-Place by their impiety: they tremble not to be drunk even in the holy Temple, and there they conſume in banqueting the ſpoils they had gotten from them whom they maſſacred. And you come to help theſe men with as great an Army and Proviſion, as though that this your Mother-City had by publick conſent requeſted your help againſt forreign Enemies. Is not this a great injuſtice of Fortune, that your whole Nation hath conſpired and bent all their forces againſt us, to help theſe miſcreants? Till now I knew not what moved you ſo quickly and ſo ſuddenly to arm your ſelves to aſſiſt Thieves a- C gainſt your native Countrymen. What? Have you been informed of the Romans coming, and of the betraying of the City? For even now I heard ſome of you mutter, that you came to deliver your Mother-City. Is it not a wonder to ſee this device and invention of theſe malefactors? But they could deviſe no other way to incite others againſt us (who even naturally deſire liberty, and are ready for the ſame to ſpend our deareſt blood in conflict with the enemy) but to fain us to be enemies of Liberty. But it behoves you to conſider who are theſe Calumniators, and againſt whom theſe Calumnies are deviſed; and then to gather the verity of the matter, not from forged tales, fained at mens pleaſures, but from the thing it ſelf. What ſhould move us now to yield to the Romans, having endured as yet nothing to conſtrain us thereunto? when if we had liked to live under their obedience, we needed not at D firſt to have revolted; and beſide that, if we had repented our ſelves, we might have again ſubmitted our ſelves, and obtained their favour before this time that all the Country round about us is deſtroyed. Nay, if we now would yield, it is not eaſie for us: for the ſpoils of Galilee, which they have already conquered, hath made them proud; and by humbling our ſelves to them being now near us, ſhould we not incur an infamy worſe than death it ſelf. True it is, I think peace better than War; yet being once provoked to War, and the War once begun, I had rather die a glorious death, than live in Captivity. Do they inform you that we have ſecretly ſent the chief of our City to the Romans, or that by common conſent of all the people we have done it? If they ſay we did it ſecretly, let them then tell what Friends of ours were ſent, or what Servants of ours were Miniſters to effect this Trea- E ſon. Did they take any Meſſenger of ours and find Letters about him? How can that be hid from all our Citizens, with whom we do every hour converſe? And is it poſſible that a few, ſhut up in the Temple, who could not come into the City, ſhould know our ſecrets, and all the whole City know nothing? or do they now firſt know it when they are like to be puniſhed for their impiety? never ſuſpecting any of us to be Traytors, ſo long as they were in no fear. If they ſay that it was done by common conſent of all the people; then all men were there when the ſpeech was made to the people, to exhort them thereunto, and requeſt their conſent, and ſo the news thereof would quickly have come to your ears. But what need had we to ſend Ambaſſadors if we had been now already certain to come to compoſition with the Romans? Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embaſſage. Theſe are but devices and contrivances F of them, who fear to have a death according to their deſert, and ſeek ſhifts to eſcape puniſhment.

The diſproof of the Zealots faction, who intended the overthrow of the City and betraying thereof.

Peace is better than War.

If Fate had ſo decreed that our City ſhould be betrayed to the Enemy, aſſure your ſelves they who thus accuſe us, would have betrayed it themſelves; having commited already all ſort of impieties, Treaſon only excepted. It is your part, ſeeing you are come hither in Arms firſt (as Reaſon and Juſtice requireth) to aſſiſt your Mother-City againſt them who tyranniſe over us, and violate our Laws, make all that Juſtice, which they can effect with their Sword. Firſt of all they took Noble-men and caſt them into priſon, having drawn them from amidſt the publick aſſembly; and never being accuſed nor condemned, nothing reſpecting their entreaties, they put them to death. If it pleaſe you to come in peaceably and not in hoſtile manner into our City, your ſelves ſhall plainly behold evident tokens of this that I G ſay to you; to wit, Houſes ruinated and made deſolate by their Robberies, the Wives and Families of them that are ſlain in mourning apparrel, and weeping in every part of the City;

Jeſus exhorteth the Idumeans that ſince they are come, they ſhould oppoſe themſelves againſt the Zealots.

Jeſus requireth the Idumeans to judge the diſerences between the Zealots and them.

The end of Jeſus Oration to the Idumeans.

for there is none amongſt us, that hath taſted the perſecution of theſe wretched men, who are H gone ſo far, that not content to make this City their refuge (which is the chief, and a Spectacle to all others for Sanctity ) and to have robbed and ſpoiled all the Country and Villages, and Cities hereabout; now laſtly they have made the ſacred Temple a refuge and place to carry all their ſpoils unto, which they have impiouſly gotten it this City. This Temple they make their Fortreſs, to iſſue out and to retire unto: from thence they make incurſions upon the Citizens: and this is the place where they practiſe their villanies againſt us. This ſacred Place, which all the World, even the moſt barbarous and ſavage people reverence, is now defiled by the horrible Robberies which thoſe born amongſt us have committed. And now being in deſperation, they rejoyce to ſee Nation againſt Nation, and City againſt City, and People againſt People, and our own Countrymen to turn themſelves againſt their own I bowels: when contrariwiſe, (as I have aleady ſaid) it had been your parts and duties to joyn with us, and help us to exterminate theſe malefactors; and be revenged of them for this lie by which they preſumed to call you to help them, whom they had juſt reaſon to fear as revengers of their impieties. Wherefore if you make any account of theſe mens prayers, vouchſafe (laying your Weapons aſide) to come into our City like Friends, and be your ſelves Judges between us and them whom you come to help.. And conſider what favour we ſhew them, who permit them to plead their own cauſes before you, they being guilty of ſo hainous crimes, and having put to death perſons of ſuch account, never accuſed nor permited to ſpeak for themſelves: yet this favour we will grant them for your ſake. But if you continue your indignation againſt us, and refuſe this offer to be our Judges, then let us entreat you, that L leaving both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor lend your aid to thoſe miſcreants againſt your Mother-City. And if you ſuſpect any of us to be Confederates with the Romans, you may keep all the paſſages; and then ſeek to defend your Metropolis, when you have proof of any ſuch matter as is alledged againſt us; and puniſh the Authors of that Treaſon, when you have convicted them. The enemies cannot prevent you, becauſe you are already planted ſo near the City. If you like none of theſe, marvel not that we ſhut our gates againſt you, coming in an armed and hoſtile manner. But the Idumeans being angry, were not moved hereby, and ſo much the more for that entrance into the City was denied them, and their Generals were exceedingly diſpleaſed, thinking it ſhameful to lay down their Arms at the command of others who had no Authority over them. K

Simons anſwer to Jeſus.

The Idumaans are diſpleaſed becauſe the City gates were lockt againſt them.

The reproaches the Idumaans object againſt the high Prieſt and Citizens

Then one of the Captains named Simon, the Son of Cathla, having with much ado gotten his Souldiers to be ſilent, ſtood up in a place where the High Prieſts might hear him, and ſaid, That he now did not wonder that thoſe who maintained Liberty, were beſieged in the Temple, ſince they of the City now ſhut their Gates againſt them, the City being common and free for all the Nation; and that perhaps they were ready to open the City Gates to receive the Romans. That they ſpake to the Idumeans from a Tower, and commanded them to caſt down their Arms, which they had taken only for the Liberty of the City, when they durſt not truſt their own Nation to keep the ſame, and yet would have them Judges of the diſcord: and that accuſing others for killing ſome not convicted, they themſelves would con- M demn all our whole Nation by the ignominy they did to their Country-men, againſt whom they had now ſhut the City gates, which were open to all ſtrangers to enter into for Religion-ſake. Did we make haſte (ſaith he) towards you, to fight againſt our own Nation, when we came only to preſerve your Liberty? But this is as true, as that they whom you thus beſiege have wronged you, and as the accuſation you forge againſt them. But your keeping in hold thoſe that are the defenders of the Common-wealth, ſhutting the City gates againſt Men of your own Blood, you impoſe upon us contumelious commands. Who can any longer endure this your mockery, that perceiveth how contradictory your allegations are? For who can juſtly accuſe thoſe that ye keep ſhut up in the Temple, becauſe they preſumed to puniſh Traytors whom you grace with the title of Noble and Innocent, becauſe they were your Confederates? Only in N this they are blame-worthy, that they did not begin with you firſt, but left alive ſuch members of that Conſpiracy. Except alſo you will ſay, that the Idumeans ſhut you out of your City, you your ſelves not permitting us to come and offer Sacrifice. But though they were too merciful, yet we the Idumeans will preſerve the Houſe of God, and will fight for the common good of our Country, and will be revenged both of the Enemies that are without the City, and the Traytors within. And here will we remain before the City till either the Romans come and deliver you, or till you change your minds, and bethink your ſelves what advantage it is to have Liberty.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Maſſacre of the Jews by the Idumeans.

The year of the World, 4032. after the Nativity of Christ, 70.

ALL the Idumeans aſſented with a loud cry to theſe ſpeeches of Simon. And Jeſus departed ſorrowful, ſeeing that the Idumeans would agree to no reaſon, and that thereby their City ſhould ſuffer a double War. For the Idumeans were no leſs diſquieted, who took the matter in great diſdain that they were not permitted to enter into B the City, and alſo becauſe they thought the Zealots ſo ſtrong as they had believed, and they themſelves were aſhamed that they could not help them ; ſo that many repented that they were come thither. Yet would they not for ſhame return, nothing being done by them : and ſo raſhly placing their Tabernacles near the City walls, they determined to ſtay there. But that night there aroſe a moſt furious Tempeſt ; for there was a great ſtormy Wind, and an exceeding great Rain, mixt with fearful Thunder and horrible Lightning, and an Earthquake, with ſtrange Noiſes ; ſo that all men thought this motion of the Earth would overturn the whole order of Nature, or at leaſt portend ſome great Calamity. The Idumeans and Townſmen were both of one mind : For they thought that God was angry with them for bearing Arms againſt their Metropolis, C and perſwaded themſelves that they could not eſcape death if they continued in their purpoſe. Ananus and his followers perſwaded themſelves that they had now overcome them without War, and that God had fought for them againſt the Idumeans. But they were falſe Prophets, and what they judged would befall their Enemies, fell upon themſelves. In the mean while the Idumeans lay as cloſe together as they could, and covered their heads with their Shields, by which means the Rain did them not ſo much harm. The Zealots were concern'd for the Idumeans more than for themſelves, and deviſed which way they might ſuccour them. The boldeſt amongſt them adviſed the reſt, by force to ſet upon the Guard, and ſo to get into the City, and open the Gates to the Idumeans that were come to help them: for it was eaſie to ſurprize the Watch, by D reaſon that many of them were unarmed, and unfit for War ; and the Citizens could not eaſily be aſſembled together, ſeeing every man, becauſe of the Tempeſt kept his houſe. And though there were danger in the attempt, yet were it better to endure all miſchiefs that might enſue, than to permit ſuch an Army ſhamefully to periſh, who came at their requeſt to help them. But the wiſer ſort diſſwaded the reſt from this, ſeeing both a ſtronger Watch placed to keep them in, and the City Walls diligently guarded becauſe of the Idumeans : and moreover they could not think that Ananus was careleſs, but went up and down, firſt from one Watch, and then to another ; yet this night he did not ſo, not for ſlothfulneſs, but becauſe that the Deſtinies had ſo decreed that thereby both he and the Watchmen ſhould periſh. For about midnight the ſtorm E increaſing, the Watchmen fell into a deep ſleep.

The Idumeans pitch their Tabernacles near the Walls.

A huge Storm.

The Zealots conſult to break open the Gates, to aſſail the Watch and let in the Idumeans.

The watchmen are oppreſſed with ſleep.

Then the Zealots determined to file the Bars and Bolts of the Gates aſunder; to effect which, they took the Inſtruments which were conſecrated to the Temple ; and this attempt was much furthered by the great Wind and Thunder, which made ſuch a noiſe that they could not be heard : So iſſuing out of the Temple, they went privily to the Walls, and opened that Gate near which the Idumeans lay : and ſuſpecting that Ananus would make ſome reſiſtance, they firſt of all drew their Swords, and then together with the Idumeans came in : and if at that time they had aſſaulted the City, they had without any let or hindrance deſtroyed all the People therein ; ſo great was their rage at that time. But firſt of all they haſtened to aſſiſt their fellows, whom they left F beſieged, and requeſted the Idumeans not to leave them in danger, for whoſe ſuccour they were come, nor permit them to incur greater damage : for having firſt ſurpriſed the Watchmen, it would be more eaſie for them to aſſault the City ; which if they did not, but firſt ſet upon the Citizens, they would preſently aſſemble together, and oppoſe themſelves againſt them, and not permit them to aſcend up into the Temple. The Idumeans conſented to this ; and ſo they paſſed thorow the City into the Temple : and the Zealots remaining in the Temple impatiently expected their coming ; at whoſe arrival they took Courage, and joyning with the Idumeans, came out of the inner Temple, and ſet upon the Watch : and ſome being ſlain who were faſt aſleep, the reſt were awak'd by the cries of others, and ſo betook themſelves to their Arms to defend G themſelves, being yet amazed. And at firſt, thinking that they were only the Zealots that gave the Alarm, they hoped only by their multitude to ſuppreſs them ; but ſeeing others without the Temple alſo aſſailing them, they judg'd that the Idumeans were broken H in : ſo the greater part of them being diſmayd laid down their Weapons, and cryed out : and only a few of them, young men, well armed, and of good courage, encountred with the Idumeans, and for a good ſpace defended their idle fellows ; others went and advertiſed the Inhabitants what was done, yet none durſt come to help them, becauſe they now knew that the Idumeans were got in, but every one lamented their hard fortune, and the Women made great lamentation when the Watchmen were ſlain.

The immanity of the Idumeans and Zealots againſt the Citizens of Jeruſalem.

The Zealots alſo anſwered their cries with the like, and the Tempeſt and Thunder made all more dreadful. The Idumeans ſpared none, becauſe they were naturally cruel and fierce to ſhed blood, and angry that they were ſo beaten with the Tempeſt, they uſed them moſt cruelly, by whoſe means they were ſhut out of the City, ſparing neither I thoſe who requeſted favour, nor thoſe who made reſiſtance, for they ſlew many as they were intreating them to remember that they were of their own blood, and requeſting them to ſpare them for reverence of the Temple. There was no way to flie, nor any hope of eſcape : and being driven up in a narrow room, they hurt themſelves more than the Enemies did, by crouding and treading one upon another ; for there was no place to flie, and their Enemies ceaſed not to kill them. Being in this deſperate eſtate, not knowing what to do, they caſt themſelves headlong into the City, and ſo died a more miſerable death than thoſe that died by the Enemies ſword. The next day there was found ſlain eight thouſand and five hundred ; and all the outer Temple flowed with blood. Yet this Maſſacre ſufficed not the Idumeans rage ; but turning themſelves K againſt the City, they robbed and ſpoiled all Houſes, and kill'd all they met, making no account of the lives of the multitude. They made diligent ſearch for the Prieſts, and many laid violent hands upon them, and killed them : and ſtanding upon their dead bodies, ſometime they upbraided Ananus with the Peoples favour towards him, ſometime Jeſus with the words he ſpake upon the Wall to them ; and they were ſo impious, that they caſt away their dead Bodies unburied ; notwithſtanding the Jews in this point are ſo religious, that after Sun-ſet they take down the dead bodies of Malefactors, who by ſentence have been adjudged to the Croſs, and bury them.

Ananus death the firſt cauſe of the deſtruction of the City.
The praiſe of Ananus the high Prieſt.

I think I ſhall not greatly miſs the mark if I affirm Ananus his death to have been the beginning of the deſtruction of the City, that the Walls of Jeruſalem were overthrown, L and the Common-wealth of the Jews periſhed in that day, when this their High Prieſt and Governour was ſo cruelly maſſacred in the midſt of the City. He was of a laudable and juſt Life : and though Great in Dignity, Birth and Reputation, yet would he not exalt himſelf above any one, were he never ſo baſe. He was a man who thirſted to preſerve Liberty to his Country, and Authority to the Common-wealth.
He continually preferred the Publick Intereſt before his own Private Gain, and was always deſirous of Peace, becauſe he foreſaw that the Romans could not be withſtood, and that if the Jews did not quickly accord with them, their Ruine was inevitable : and I doubt not but if Ananus had lived, he had ſucceeded in his deſign. For he was an eloquent Orator, and could perſwade admirably : and he had already reduced to extremity M thoſe falſe Zelots who cauſed the War : and if the Jews had had him for their Captain againſt the Romans, it had not been ſo eaſie for the Romans to have Conquered them. He was ſeconded by Jeſus, who next him excelled all the reſt. But I think Almighty God having decreed the total ruine of the City, which was now polluted and filled with Iniquity, and meaning by fire as it were, to purifie the holy Temple, which was prophaned, he firſt took up the Defenders thereof, and thoſe that loved it moſt dearly. So they who a little before were cloathed with the ſacred apparel, and reverenced of all that from the furtheſt parts of the World came to Jeruſalem, now lay murthered and naked in the open ſtreets, left as it were a prey to be torn in pieces by Doggs and wild Beaſts. Was Virtue ever more inſolently outraged ! And could ſhe N without ſhedding Tears, behold Vice thus triumph over her ?

CHAP. I.

Of another Maſſacre; and of the Return of the Idumeans, and the Cruelty of the Zealots.

SUch was the end of Ananus and Jeſus: After whoſe death the Idumeans and E the Zealots maſſacred the People, as though they had been a flock of pernitious Beaſts, and very few eſcaped the Butchery. The Nobility and chief ſort of men were put in Priſon, in hope that by deferring their death, ſome of them would become partakers with them; Yet none was hereby moved, but every one deſired to die, rather than impiouſly to joyn with theſe Wretches againſt their own Country: Whereupon they were moſt cruelly whipped before they were put to Death, their Bodies being made as it were one ſore place by Whipping and Stripes: and when they could not endure theſe Torments any longer, they were killed. Who ſo was taken in the day time, was in the night carried to Priſon; and thoſe that died in Priſon and Torments, they caſt their dead Bodies out, F that they might have place to impriſon others in their room. The People were ſo terrified, that none durſt weep openly for his Friend, nor bury the dead Body of his Kinſman; yea thoſe that were in Priſon durſt not openly weep, but ſecretly; looking about them, leſt any of their Enemies ſhould ſee them. For whoſoever mourned for any that was afflicted, was preſently himſelf uſed in the ſame manner, as he had been for whom he lamented. Yet ſometimes ſome in the night ſcraped up a little earth with their hands, and therewithal covered the dead body of their Friend; and ſome bolder than the reſt did the like in the day-time. And in this general ſlaughter were twelve thouſand young Noblemen ſlain in this manner. After which, being hated for theſe Maſſacres, they mocked and flouted the Magiſtrates, and made no account of their Judgments. So that when they determined to put to death Zachary the Son of Baruch, one of the chief of G the City, becauſe he was an Enemy to their wickedneſs, and loved the virtuous, and one that was rich, by whoſe death they hoped not only to have the ſpoil of his goods, but alſo to be rid of one who might be able to reſiſt their bad purpoſes) they called ſeventy of H the beſt amongſt the common People together, as it were in Judgment, with a pretended Authority; and before them they accuſed Zacharie, that he had betrayed the Common-wealth to the Romans, and for that intent had ſent to Veſpaſian: but they neither ſhewed any evidence or proof thereof, but only affirmed it to be ſo; and therefore would have credit given to their words.

Zacharie condemned to death by the Zealots.

When Zacharie perceived that under pretence of being called to Judgement, he was unjuſtly caſt into Priſon; though he had no hope of Life, yet he ſpared not to ſpeak freely his mind, and began to ſcorn the rage and pretence of his Enemies, and purged himſelf of the crimes whereof he was accuſed; and converting his ſpeech againſt his Accuſers, he laid open all their Iniquities, and much lamented the miſeries and troubles I of the City.

Seventy Judges abſolve & acquit Zacharie.

In the mean-while the Zealots gnaſhed their teeth, and could ſcarcely contain themſelves from drawing their Swords, and were deſirous that their pretended Accuſation and Judgment might be ended. He alſo requeſted them, who by theſe Miſcreants were appointed his Judges, to remember Juſtice, notwithſtanding the danger they might incur by it. The ſeventy Judges all pronounced that he was to be abſolved and freed as guiltleſs, and rather choſe to die, than to cauſe his death who was Innocent.

Zacharie ſlain in the midſt of the Temple.

This Sentence being pronounced, the Zealots began to ſhout and cry with a loud voice; and they all were angry at the Judges, who did not underſtand to what end that counter- K feit Authority was given them. Then two of the boldeſt amongſt them ſet upon Zacharie and killed him in the midſt of the Temple, and inſulted over him ſaying, Thou haſt now our Sentence and Abſolution, far more certain than the other was: And preſently they caſt him down from the Temple into the Valley below: and then contumeliouſly with the Hilts of their Swords they beat the Judges out of the Temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being diſperſed thorow the whole City, they might tell the People, as Meſſengers from them, of their miſerable condition.

The Idumeans were now ſorrowful for their coming, for they miſliked theſe proceedings: and being aſſembled together, one of the Zealots ſecretly told them all that their Faction had done from the beginning; that it was true the Idumeans had taken Arms, L becauſe they were informed that the Metropolitan City was by the Prieſts betray'd to the Romans: but they might perceive, there was no proof nor ſign of any ſuch matter; and that indeed the Zealots who pretended themſelves Defenders of the Liberty of the City, were indeed Enemies, and had exerciſed Tyranny over the Citizens even from the beginning. And though they had aſſociated themſelves with ſuch wicked perſons, and made themſelves partakers of ſo many Murthers, yet they ought now to ceaſe from ſuch wickedneſs, and not aſſiſt men ſo impious to deſtroy their Country and Religion. For though they took it in bad part, that the City Gates were ſhut upon them, yet now they were ſufficiently revenged of thoſe that were the cauſe thereof. That Ananus himſelf was ſlain, and almoſt all the People in one night (whereof M many of them ere long would repent) and that they might now themſelves perceive the cruelty of thoſe who requeſted their aid, to be more than barbarous, had not bluſht to commit ſuch Villanies openly, in the ſight of them who had ſaved their lives: and that their miſdemeanours and impieties would be imputed to the Idumeans, becauſe they neither hindred their miſchievous Practices, nor forſook their Society. That therefore it was their part (ſeeing it was now evident that the report of Treaſon was only Calumny, and that no aſſault by the Romans was to be feared; and that the City was impregnable, provided there were no domeſtick diviſions) to depart home, and by forſaking the Society of the Impious, to acquit themſelves of their Impiety, as being by them deceived, and ſo againſt their Wills made partakers thereof. N

The Idumeans depart out of Jeruſalem.

The Idumeans were hereby perſwaded, and firſt of all they freed thoſe that were in Priſon, in number two thouſand of the Vulgar; and preſently leaving the City, they went to Simon, (of whom we will ſpeak hereafter) and ſo they departed home.

Their ſudden departure was againſt the expectation of both parts: for the People not knowing that the Idmmeans were ſorry for what they had done, rejoyced as now delivered from their Enemies: and the Zealots grew more inſolent and proud, as though they never had needed help, and now were delivered from thoſe, in conſideration of whom they abſtained from ſome Villanies. Whereupon they uſed no delay to effect all their Villany: for they ſpent not much time in taking advice; but whatſoever ſeemed beſt to them, preſently without any delay they put it in practice. But O eſpecially they murthered thoſe men that were wiſe and valiant; for they envied the

A Nobility for their Virtue : they thought it a principal point firſt to be effected, not to leave any one man of account alive. Wherefore they ſlew amongſt the reſt Gorion, a Noble-man of great Birth and Dignity, who loved his Country, was very bountiful, and a lover of Liberty ; ſo that there was none amongſt the Jews like him ; but for his deſire of Liberty, and his other Virtues he was put to death. Neither could Niger Peraita eſcape their hands, a man who in War againſt the Romans had ſhewed himſelf valiant : and although he often cried out and ſhewed the ſcars of his Wounds received in defence of his Country ; yet they ceaſed not for all this moſt ſhamefully to drag him thorow the City : and being led out of the City, deſpairing of life, he entreated that B he might be buried. But the barbarous People denied his requeſt and ſlew him. At his death he beſought God that the Romans might come and revenge it upon them, and that Plague, Famine and Civil Diſcord might light upon their City.

Gorion's Death and Niger Peraita.

Niger's Prayers took effect as the end teſtifieth.

God heard his Prayers, and ſent upon them all which he imprecated ; and firſt of all, they were plagued with Civil Wars amongſt themſelves. Niger being thus ſlain, they were freed from the fear they had of him, that he would reſiſt their wickedneſs. Many of the Common People were by ſome forged tale or other put to death. Some were ſlain, becauſe they had formerly born Arms againſt them ; and they who were innocent in all points, were put to death for ſome occaſion deviſed in the time of peace : and they who did not converſe with them, were murdered as thoſe that contemned them ; and they C that freely and friendly converſed with them, were ſlain as thoſe that ſought to betray them. In ſhort, the greateſt offenders and the leaſt were all puniſhed alike, to wit, with death : for no man eſcaped, except he were either poor, or of very baſe condition.

CHAP. II.

The Civil Diſcords amongſt the Jews.

D IN the mean while the Roman Officers had their Eyes open upon what paſſed in the City of Jeruſalem ; and ſeeing the Citizens at great variance among themſelves, they thought this to be for their great advantage. Wherefore they preſſed Veſpaſian their General not to loſe this opportunity, affirming that it was Gods providence (who fought for them) that the Jews ſhould be at Civil Diſcord among themſelves ; and that therefore he ſhould not overſlip ſo good an occaſion, leſt the Jews ſhould quickly be friends again one with another, either by the wearineſs of Civil War, or elſe repenting themſelves of that which they had done. To whom Veſpaſian anſwered, That they were ignorant what was to be done, and deſirous rather as it were in a Theater to ſhew their forces and ſtrength, than with him to conſider what was profitable and expedient. For E (ſaid he) if we preſently aſſault them, our coming will make concord amongſt our Enemies, and ſo we ſhall bring upon our ſelves their forces yet firm and ſtrong ; but by expecting a little while, we ſhall have leſs ado to conquer them, their chiefeſt forces being deſtroyed by their own Civil War. God is more our friend than you are aware of, who without our labour and pain will deliver the Jews into our hands, and will give us the Victory without endangering our Army. Wherefore it is rather our part to be beholders of the Tragedy, than to fight againſt men deſirous of death, and troubled with the greateſt evil poſſible, to wit, domeſtical Sedition, and Civil War. And if any think that the Victory is not glorious, becauſe gotten without fight, let him know and conſider the uncertain events of War : and that it is better, if it be poſſible, to get a Victory without bloodſhed, then therewith to hazard a Defeat. For they who by F Counſel and Advice do any worthy Act, deſerve no leſs praiſe than they who by force of Arms atchieve a Victory. Moreover, in the mean time that the Enemies deſtroy one another, our Souldiers may take reſt, and ſo be ſtronger and better able to fight when need ſhall require. Beſides, it ſeems not that there is much haſte required to get the Victory : for the Jews neither prepare Arms nor Engines of War, nor levie any Forces, nor ſeek for Aid ; and ſo by delay no damage can enſue ; but they will Plague one another more by Civil War, than our Army can by attacquing their City. And therefore whether we conſider Prudence or Glory, we have nothing to do but let them ruine themſelves ; for in caſe we ſhould even at this preſent make our ſelves Maſters of that great City ; ſo it would be juſtly ſaid, that the Victory was not to be imputed to us, but to their diſcord.

The Souldiers incite Veſpaſian to reſort to Jeruſalem.

Veſpaſian expecteth Victory by the civil diſſention of his Enemies.

G The Captains all conſented, and thought this advice of Veſpaſian beſt : and preſently it appeared how profitable this Counſel was. For every day many Jews fled to him to eſcape the hands of the Zealots ; though it was dangerous to flie, becauſe all the ways

Many Citizens to fly the Zealous, reſorted to Veſpaſian.

were guarded with Watch-men. And if any man upon any occaſion whatſoever were H taken upon the way, he was preſently killed, as one who intended to have fled to the Romans: Yet if any one fee'd the Watch-men with money, he eſcaped away ſafely; and he that did not, was counted as a Traitor: ſo that only rich men could eſcape, and the poor were left to the ſlaughter. The multitude of the dead bodies that lay on heaps together was innumerable, and through the horror of which ſight, many of thoſe who had fled to the Romans, returned again into the City, chooſing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their native ſoil, made death there ſeem more tolerable. But the Zealots became ſo cruel, that they neither permitted them who were ſlain within, nor them without the City to be buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their County-Laws to aboliſh the Law of Nature, yea and by I their impiety to deſy God himſelf, let the dead Bodies rot above ground; and whoſoever attempted to bury any of them that were ſlain, whether Friend or Kinſman, he was preſently put to death, and left unburied; and to give Sepulchre to another, was crime enough to deſerve it.

The Zealots tyrannize both over the living and the dead.

To be brief, nothing ſo much increaſed their indignation as Mercy: for the wicked People were herewith provoked to wrath; their diſpleaſure and cruelty was extended from the living to the dead, and from the dead to the living. And ſuch fear fell upon the whole City, that thoſe that were left alive, deemed them happy, that being dead, were at reſt, and free from thoſe miſeries: and they that were in Priſon, in reſpect of the torments they endured, thought themſelves more unhappy than they who lay unburied. K All humane Juſtice was perverted, and they ſcorned and mocked at all divine and holy things, and proudly derided the Oracles of the Prophets, eſteeming them as Fables and Jeſts. But having now contemned all Laws, eſtabliſhed by their fore-fathers for the puniſhment of Vice and increaſing of Virtue, at laſt they found that true which was fore-told, concerning the Deſtruction of themſelves and their Country: For there was an old Propheſie, that when Sedition reigned amongſt them, and their own hands had violated the Temple of God and holy things; then their City ſhould be deſtroyed by War, and their holy Places burned with fire, according to the manner and cuſtom of War. L

CHAP. III.

How Gadara was yielded: and of the Maſſacre there.

John's Pride and Ambition

But John who long ago aſpired to be Tyrant over all the reſt, could not endure that others ſhould partake in Authority with him; wherefore by little and little he divided himſelf from their union and fellowſhip, after he had drawn to himſelf ſuch as by their impious life were capable of the greateſt crimes, M ſo that now every one perceived (in that he always neglected what others commanded, and imperiouſly commanded what himſelf thought good) that he affected Principality. Many joyned to him for fear, ſome for favour (for he had a ſmooth tongue, able to perſwade to what he would); many alſo followed him, thinking it better that all the impiety before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, than upon them all. Moreover, being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to give politick counſel, he wanted not followers, notwithſtanding that many of the contrary faction left him, envying that he, who before was their equal, ſhould now be their Maſter and Commander. Fear alſo terrified them from living under the Government of one man; for they thought that if he once prevailed, he could not eaſily be overcome: and again, if he N were depoſed, that he would pick quarrels againſt them in the end, becauſe that they reſiſted him in the beginning. So every man determined rather to ſuffer all miſery in War, then to ſubmit himſelf, and become a Slave. Thus the parties were divided, and John was chief of one Faction*: ſo between them they appointed Guards in every place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or no hurt to one another: but the chief contention was, who ſhould bear moſt ſway amongſt the People, and who ſhould have the greateſt part of the Spoil. Thus the City at one time was vexed with three intolerable miſchiefs and evils, to wit, War, Tyranny, and Sedition: and yet the War ſeemed a leſs evil than the reſt to the Commonalty. Wherefore many leaving their native ſoil, fled to ſtrangers for ſuccour, and found among the O Romans ſafety, who with their own Nation lived in continual danger. There was

The greater part of the contrary faction fall from John.

The tempeſt of of three miſeries aſſailed Jeruſalem at once.

alſo

A alſo added a fourth evil, which wrought the ruine of the whole Nation. Not far from the City there was a Caſtle called Maſſada, built by the ancient Kings of Jeruſalem, very ſtrong, to lay up their treaſure and munition for War, and to retire themſelves thereunto in time of need, for the ſafety of their perſons. This Caſtle was taken and kept by that ſort of Thieves that were called Sicarii, by reaſon of their ſmal number durſt Rob no more openly. Theſe Thieves ſeeing the Roman Army now idle, and the people in Jeruſalem at civil War and Sedition among themſelves, took courage, and again fell to their Villanies. And ſo on that day, which is the Feaſt of unleavened Bread (which the Jews keep holy, in memory of their deliverance from the Ægyptian Captivity) deceiving the Watchmen, they ſeized upon a Fort, called Engaddi: B and before the Townſmen could arm and unite themſelves together, they were by theſe perſons driven out of the Town; who alſo killed them that could not flie, to wit, Women and Children, to the number of more than ſeven hundred; and ſo ſacking the Houſes, and taking the Fruits that were now ripe, they carried all to Maſſada: and ſo they waſted all the Villages and whole Country round about them, many wicked perſons daily flocking unto them, and joining with them: and by their example, other Thieves that a while had been quiet, now robbed again, and ſpoiled in every part of Judea. And as in a body, if the principal member thereof be ſick, all other parts of it are afflicted; ſo Jeruſalem being filled with tumults and diſcord, thoſe that were without the City found licence to rob and ſpoil: and all thoſe that had C their Towns deſtroyed where they were wont to inhabit, went into the Wilderneſs; where aſſembling and uniting themſelves together, not ſo many as an Army, yet more than a Company of Thieves, they broke into the Towns and Temples; and, as in War it cometh to paſs, the Country people purpoſed to aſſault them, by whom they had ſuffered ſuch injury: but they were prevented; for the Thieves underſtanding their coming, fled with the ſpoil they had gotten. And there was no part of Judea, that did not ſuffer together with Jeruſalem their Mother-City. Thoſe that fled to the Romans, certified Veſpaſian hereof: for although the ſeditious perſons kept and obſerv'd all paſſages, and kill'd them that offered to fly, yet many ſecretly ſtole away from them, and beſought Veſpaſian, both to help the oppreſſed City, and D to take compaſſion upon the reliques of their Nation: affirming, that many had been butchered for wiſhing well to the Romans; and many being yet alive, were yet in great danger. Veſpaſian moved to compaſſionate their calamities, came with his Army nearer Jeruſalem, as though he would have beſieged it, (but indeed his intent was to deliver it from the oppreſſion of theſe wicked perſons, who in a manner kept it continually beſieg'd,) hoping in the mean time to conquer that part of the Country that was yet untoucht, and ſo to leave nothing to hinder him when he ſhould begin the ſiege. Wherefore coming to Gadara, the ſtrongeſt of all the Cities beyond the River, he entred into it the fourth day of March: for the Chiefeſt of the City, unknown to the ſeditious people, had ſent Embaſſadors to him to deſire Peace; and to ſave E their goods and lives, they promiſed him to yield the Town into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: but their Enemies knew not of their Embaſſage, till they ſaw Veſpaſian at the City Gates. And ſo deſpairing that they were able to keep the City, by reaſon they had in the Town many Enemies more in number and ſtronger than themſelves; and moreover, ſeeing Veſpaſian even now almoſt at the City: and thinking ſhame to flie, and not to be revenged of their Enemies, they took Doleſus (a Noble-man and chief of the City, and alſo the Author of that Embaſſage) and killed him; and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the City. Now the Romans Army approaching near the City, the people of Gadara went forth and received Veſpaſian joyfully, who alſo confirmed a League betwixt F them and him, and left them a Company of Horſe and Foot to defend them againſt the incurſions of the Fugitives their Enemies: for they themſelves, before the Romans requeſted it, deſtroyed the City Walls, that ſo they might ſhew their deſire of Peace; becauſe having deſtroyed their Walls, if after they deſired to rebel, they could not.

Veſpaſian then ſent Placidus with five hundred Horſemen, and three thouſand

Army returned to Cæſarea. But the Fugitives perceiving themſelves to be purſued by Placidus, before he could overtake them, got into a Town called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arm themſelves, and ſo raſhly they came againſt Placidus.
G Placidus and his Army ſeemed a little to give back, to the intent to draw them further wounded them afar off with Darts and Arrows. The Jews ſeeking to flie, were H prevented by the Horſemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Romans Footmen all put to the Sword, never ſhewing any ſign of valour. For the Jews aſſaulted the Romans, who were all covered with their Shields as with a Wall; and not being able to break into their battle, they were ſlain by the Romans Darts: but their Darts could do the Romans no harm: and ſo like fierce and Savage Beaſts they wilfully ran upon their Enemies Swords, and all were either ſlain, or diſperſ'd by the Horſemen. For Placidus was careful to intercept their paſſage to the Town; and to hinder their recourſe unto it, and forc'd thoſe back again that fled towards it, uſing his Darts, and killing thoſe that were next him; till at laſt the ſtrongeſt amongſt them broke away, and got to the Town Walls. Thoſe that were within the City knew I not what to do, for they would not ſhut the Fugitives of Gadara out of the City, becauſe they deſired to let their own Citizens in; and again they perceived that if they let theſe in, the other thereby would work the overthrow of the City, as it fell out indeed they did. For the Gates being ſet open for them to come in, the Roman Horſemen almoſt broke into the Town with them; yet the Gates were ſhut before they could get in. Then Placidus with all his Souldiers aſſaulted the Town, and after a ſore fight which continued till the Evening, at laſt he got the Walls, and the Town, and ſlew the weaker ſort, for the ſtronger fled: ſo the Souldiers firſt ſacked the Houſes, and then fired the Town. They who eſcaped thence, incited the whole Country to fly with them, reporting their Calamities with the moſt, and K affirming that all the Roman Army was at hand: and ſo they put all the Inhabitants there in great fear, and having aſſembled a great multitude, they fled to Jericho, in which place they put their confidence, for that it was ſtrong and populous. Placidus having Horſemen, and incouraged with his former Victory, purſued them to Jordan, and whomſoever he overtook he ſlew, and at the River he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; becauſe that the River being grown deeper by abundance of Rain that had lately faln, they could not paſs over it.

Placidus taketh and burneth Bethenabris.

Wherefore neceſſity forced them to fight, becauſe they could not flie: and placing themſelves along the Banks of the River, they there received the Horſemen, and warded their Darts. Many for fear fell into the River; and the Romans ſlew L there 13000; and the reſt not able to reſiſt, caſt themſelves into the River; which were an infinite number: alſo the Romans took 2200 men alive, and a great booty of Sheep, Aſſes, Camels, and Oxen. This Slaughter though it was no greater than the former, yet it ſeemed to the Jews far greater, becauſe that many all over the Country flying were killed, and Jordan was ſo filled with dead Carkaſſes, that none could paſs over it: and alſo the Lake Aſphaltites, was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of divers Rivers. Placidus having ſo good ſucceſs, went to the Towns and Villages adjoyned, and took Abila, Julias, Beſemoth, and all the Towns even to the Lake Aſphaltites, and placed in them Gariſons of the Jews that had fled to him: and afterward preparing Ships and furniſhing them with Souldiers, he purſued M them that were fled by Water, and overcome them. So all the Country beyond Jordan as far as Macharon, was reduc'd under the Power of the Romans.

How certain Towns were taken; the Deſcription of Jericho.

Troubles in France.

At this time came news of the troubles in Gallia; and how that Vindex, together N with the Nobility of that Country had revolted from Nero; whereof we have made mention in another place. This news cauſed Veſpaſian to be more earneſt to end the Wars of the Jews: for even then he foreſaw the Civil War that enſued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of thoſe troubles end the Wars in the Eaſt part of the World, that then Italy was not in ſo much danger. But Winter hindring him, he in the mean time placed Gariſons in all Towns and Villages about the whole Country, and appointed Officers in every City, and repaired many places, which he had before deſtroyed. And firſt of all, he with his whole Army that was at Ceſarea marcht to Antipatris; and having ſetled the Eſtate of that City, after his abode there two dayes, the third day O he departed, ſpoiling and burning all the Country: as alſo all the Country about

Tham-

A of Thamnia the Toparchy, and ſo went to Lydda and Jamnia. But ſeeing that thoſe two places ſubmitted themſelves unto him, he left there ſuch Inhabitants as he thought good, and went thence to Ammaus; and placing himſelf in the way to Jeruſalem, he there entrenched his Camp, and leaving the fifth Legion there, with the reſt he went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout, as alſo the Borders of Idumea: but he reſerved certain Caſtles in fit places and fortified them.
And having taken two Towns in the midſt of Idumea, to wit, Begabri, and Caphartopha, he ſlew there above ten thouſand men, and took almoſt a thouſand; and driving out the reſt of the Inhabitants, he left a great part of his Army there, who made Incurſions, and waſted all the High Places thereabout: with the reſt he returned to Jamnia; and B from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the Inhabitants Nabortha. The ſecond day of June, he came to Corea; and pitching his Tent there, the next day he came to Jericho, where one of his Captains, named Trajan, met him with the Souldiers he brought from beyond Jordan, which place he had conquered. But before the Romans came, many fled from Jericho into the high Country over againſt Jeruſalem; and many that ſtayed behind were there ſlain. So he found the City deſolate, being ſcituate in a Plain, under a great barren Mountain, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the North ſide, to the Borders of Sythopolis, and on the South to the Borders of Sodom and the Lake of Aſphaltites. It is Rocky, and not inhabited, becauſe it beareth no fruit. Over againſt this, near Jordan, is ſituate another Mountain, beginning on the C North-ſide at Julias, and reaching to Bacra on the South, which is the Limits of Petra, a City of Arabia. In this place is that Mountain which is called the Mountain of Iron, reaching to the Country of the Moabites.

Veſpaſian viſiteth all Judea

Veſpaſian cometh to Jericho.

The Country between theſe two Mountains is called the Great Field, reaching from the Village Gennabara to the Lake of Aſphaltites, being in length two hundred and thirty Furlongs, and in breadth a hundred and twenty; in the midſt it is divided by the River Jordan. Theſe are alſo two Lakes of contrary natures, Aſphaltites, and Tiberias; for one of them is Salt and hath no Fiſh, but that of Tiberias ſweet and abounds with Fiſh. This Plain in Summer time is burnt with the heat of the Sun, and the Air is infected in all places thereabouts, ſave only about Jordan: and this D is the cauſe that the Palm-trees that grow about the River ſide do flouriſh moſt, and are more fertil than the reſt. Near Jericho there is a large great Fountain, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and riſeth with a great ſtream out of the ground near the old City: which Joſhua the Son of Nun, General of the Hebrews, took by War, the firſt of all that he took in the Land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning, the Waters of this Fountain deſtroy'd all Fruits of the Earth, and alſo made Women be delivered before their time, and infected all places with diſeaſes, and the plague; but afterward by Eliſha, the ſucceſſour of Elias, was made ſweet and good for conception, which happened in this manner: That admirable perſon being once courteouſly entertained by the Inhabitants of Jericho, did thus reward them, and E all the Country for that their kindneſs, and going unto the Fountain, he caſt a Pitcher full of Salt into the Water; and lifting up his hands to Heaven, and tempering with this Fountain-Water certain ſweet Waters, he prayed God to amend the ill qualities thereof, and to make it flow with more ſweet Streams: which both might cauſe plenty of Fruits, and alſo of Children, to the Inhabitants: and that the Water might have the vertue to make Women Fruitful, ſo long as they perſiſted in piety. Theſe prayers had the Power to alter the Fountain: and from that time, this Fountain which before was the cauſe of Famine and Sterility, became the cauſe of Plenty and Fertility. And ſo it watereth the ground, that where a little of it cometh, it doth more good than all other waters which lie long upon it: F and ſo they that water their grounds but a little with it, receive much Fruit; and they that water their Grounds with it much, do not receive them in that meaſure; yet it watereth a greater compaſs of ground than other Fountains: and in length it runneth through a Plain ſeventy Furlongs long, and twenty broad. Here are moſt pleaſant and goodly Orchards, and many ſorts of Palm-trees growing by brooks ſides, which are divers in the taſte of their Fruits; the fatteſt whereof being preſſed, yield a juice like Honey, nothing inferiour to other Honey: yet there is great ſtore of Honey in the Country, and the juice of Balm, which is more precious than all other Fruits whatſoever. Here grow alſo Cypreſs-Trees and Myrabolans: ſo that one may juſtly ſay that this part of the Earth hath ſomething Divine, where G what Fruit ſoever is moſt dear and precious, is in moſt abundance. Alſo in all other Fruits it ſurpaſſeth all Countries in the World: for all things multiply and increaſe ſooner there. The cauſe hereof I judge to be theſe pleaſant Waters, and the H warm nouriſhing Air, which gently inviteth all things to ſpring up, and then encreaſeth them : as the moiſture cauſeth all things to take firm root, and alſo defendeth them from drought in Summer time, when the Country is vexed with ſuch intollerable heats, that all things are ſcorched, ſo that nothing then will grow ; yet if they be watered with Water drawn before Sun-riſe, by the blowing of a mild and temperate wind, it is refreſhed, and it receives a contrary nature : In Winter-time it is almoſt luke-warm and temperate to them that go into it. The Air here is ſo temperate, that when it ſnoweth in other parts of Judea, and is extreme cold, the Inhabitants in this place only wear a linen Garment. This Country is diſtant from I Jeruſalem a hundred and fifty Furlongs, and threeſcore from Jordan ; and all the ground betwixt it and Jeruſalem is deſart and ſtony, and ſo likewiſe between it and Jordan and Aſphaltites, though it be lower ground than the other. Thus we have ſufficiently declared the fertility of Jericho.

CHAP. V.

The Deſcription of the Lake Aſphaltites.

An admirable property of the Aſphaltite Lake.

The Land of Sodom is near unto the Lake Aſphaltites.

Tertul. Apolog. c. 39.

IT is worth the labour to deſcribe the Lake Aſphaltites, which is Salt and uncapable K of feeding Fiſh, yet what ever is caſt into it, how weighty ſoever it be, it ſwimmeth above the Water : ſo that one, though he would on purpoſe, cannot ſink to the bottom.
Veſpaſian coming thither to ſee it, took men who could not ſwim, and cauſ'd their hands to be bound behind them, and caſt them into the midſt thereof, and all of them came up to the Top of the Water, as if ſome Wind had forc'd them from the bottom. Moreover, it is admirable, how this Lake thrice in every day changeth colour, and ſhineth diverſly, according as the beams of the Sun ſundry ways fall upon it. And in many places it caſteth up pieces of black Bitumen, in greatneſs and ſhape like a Bull without a head ; and theſe float above the Water. They that get L their living upon this Water by gathering this Bitumen, draw it to their Boats, and it is ſo tough and clammy, that having filled their Boats herewith, it is not eaſie for them to get them away, but their Boat is as it were faſtened, and hangeth upon the reſt of that maſs of bituminous matter, till it be ſeparated from it by the terms or urine of a Woman. This bitumenous matter is good to cloſe the rifts of Ships, and alſo to cure many diſeaſes. This Lake is five hundred and eighty Furlongs long, extending to Zoar which is in Arabia ; and it is a hundred and fifty Furlongs broad.
Near this Lake is the Land of Sodom and Gomorrah, ſometime both fertil and rich: now all burnt, having been for the impiety of the Inhabitants conſumed with lightning and thunder. To be ſhort, one may here behold as it were the reliques of that M fire that by Gods appointment deſtroyed the place : for one may yet ſee ſome remainders of thoſe five Cities, and Trees and Fruits ſpringing up in the aſhes : which fruit to the Eye ſeemeth like other fruits ; but if you handle them, they fall into aſhes and ſmoak. And ſo the Hiſtory of the deſtruction of Sodom is verifi'd to the Eye of them that behold it.

CHAP. VI.

How Geraſa was deſtroyed : of Nero's Death, and of Galba and Otho. N

L. Annius taketh Geraſa.

VEſpaſian deſirous to beſiege Jeruſalem on every ſide, built Caſtles at Jericho and Adida, and left there Gariſons of the Souldiers that came to aſſiſt him, and alſo Romans with them. And he ſent L. Annius to Geraſa with a Body of Foot and Horſe ; who at the firſt aſſault took the City, and ſlew a thouſand young men, who had not time to flie, and made whole Families Slaves, giving the Souldiers the ſpoil of their goods : and ſo firing their Houſes, he went to other places adjoyning. They who were able, fled; and the weaker ſort who could not flie, were ſlain: and whatſoever came in their way they conſumed with fire. Thus all places both Mountains and Plains O being waſted and ruined with War, the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem had no whither to go, when

A when they deſired to flie from the Zelots by whom they were kept in. And they themſelves who were againſt the Romans, were alſo kept in; the City being on every ſide encloſed and encompaſſed with the Roman Army.

The year of the World, 4033. after the Nativity of Christ, 71.

After Veſpaſian was returned to Ceſarea, and with all his Army purpoſed to go to Jeruſalem, news was brought him that Nero was ſlain, having reigned thirteen years and eight dayes. Touching whom I will not recount how he diſhonour'd the Empire, committing the whole ſway of all the Common-wealth to two moſt wicked men, to wit, Nimphidius and Tigillinus, who were of leaſt worth amongſt all his Freed-men: and how being betrayed by theſe two men, he was forſaken of all his Guards; and ſo fled only with four truſty Freed-men into the Suburbs, and there kill'd himſelf: And how that B ſometime after, they that depoſed him were puniſhed for that offence: And how the Wars ended in Gallia; and that Galba being created Emperour, returned to Rome out Spain: and how he was accuſed of Cowardize by the Souldiers, and by them killed in the Market-place, as one of baſe condition: and how Otho was declared Emperour, and led his Souldiers againſt Vitellius: alſo Vitellius his troubles and his fight before the Capitol: and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus ſlew Vitellius, and ſo appeaſed the German Troops and the Civil War. Of all theſe I have forborn to ſpeak, becauſe I preſume both the Greeks and Romans have written theſe things at large; yet I have briefly recapitulated this to continue my Hiſtory.

Veſpaſian hath tydings of Neroes death.

Galba.

Otho.

Vitellius.

After Veſpaſian heard this news, he deferred the Siege of Jeruſalem, expecting who C ſhould be created Emperour after Nero. And when he was certified that Galba reigned, he determined to do nothing, but lie quiet till ſuch time as he ſhould write to him his mind, whether he would have him proceed in the War againſt the Jews. And he ſent to him his Son Titus, both to ſalute him, and alſo to know his pleaſure concerning the Jews. Likewiſe, King Agrippa went with Titus for the ſame cauſe to Galba. But as they were paſſing by Achaia with long Ships in Winter time, as the Cuſtome is, news was brought that Galba was ſlain, having reigned ſeven Months and ſeven dayes: After whom ſucceeded Otho, who governed the Empire three Months. Agrippa not diſmayed with this alteration, ſtill kept on his Journey to Rome. But Titus (as God would have it) returned from Achaia to Syria, and ſo to Ceſarea to his Father. They D both were in ſuſpence what would enſue, and who ſhould be Emperour, the Empire being ſo full of trouble: and ſo they neglected the War againſt the Jews, fearing for their own Country, and therefore thinking it an unfit time to invade Strangers.

Veſpaſian deferreth his ſiege at Jeruſalem.

Galba is ſlain, and Otho governeth.

CHAP. VII.

Of Simon of Geraſa, Author of a new Conſpiracy.

E IN the mean time a new War broke out at Jeruſalem among the Jews; For there was one Simon the Son of Giora born in Geraſa, young in years, and inferiour to John in ſubtilty, who now already had gotten the dominion over the City; yet in Vigor and Boldneſs exceeded John. This Simon having been for this cauſe alſo driven out of the Country of Acrabatena, where he was Governour, by the means of Ananus the high Prieſt, came to the Thieves that ſeized upon Maſſada. At his firſt coming he was ſo ſuſpected by the Thieves, that they only permitted him, and the Women that came with him, to dwell in the lower part of the Caſtle, and they themſelves kept the higher part: yet afterwards, his manners and behaviour was ſuch that they put confidence in him, and he became their Captain always when they went to ſpoil and rob any part of F of the Country about Maſſada. After which he did all that he could to perſwade them to attempt greater matters: for being deſirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, he departed into the high Places of the Country, and with the voice as of a Crier proclaimed, that all Bond-ſlaves that would follow him ſhould have their Liberty, and all others ſhould be richly rewarded; by which means he gathered together all the wicked and deſperate People in the Country. And having now a conſiderable Army, he robbed and ſpoiled all the Towns and Villages thereabout; and his number daily encreaſing, he alſo preſumed to come into the plain Countries: ſo that now Cities ſtood in awe of him, and many conſiderable perſons fearing him for his ſtrength and proſperous ſucceſs, joyned with him. So that his Army did not only conſiſt of Thieves and G Slaves, but many People of the Country came to him, reverencing him as their Prince and King; and they made Excurſions into the Toparchy of Acrabatena, and into the greater Idumea. For he had fortified a Town called Nain, wall'd about, which he uſed H for his Retreat. And in the Valley called Pharan, he made many Caves, and found many already made, and in theſe Caves he kept his Treaſure, and the Booties he got:

alſo all Fruits of the Earth that he robbed and ſtole, there he laid up in ſtore; as alſo Ammunition for many Companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furniſhed with Men and Ammunition he would go to Jeruſalem. The Zealots fearing this, and deſirous to prevent him who they ſaw every day encreaſed his number, and grew more potent againſt them; they armed many of their Company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly encountred them, and gave them ſo ſharp a Battle, that he ſlew many of them in fight; and forced the reſt to retire themſelves into the Town; yet not having men ſufficient, he would not beſiege the I Town; but firſt of all he purpoſed to ſubdue Idumea; and ſo accompanied with 20000 armed men, he haſted towards the borders thereof.

The Princes of Idumea underſtanding this, preſently aſſembled five and twenty thouſand armed men: and leaving at home ſufficient Gariſons to defend their Country againſt the Sicarii, who held the Fortreſs of Maſſada, they accompanied with theſe Forces, went out and expected Simons coming into the borders of their Country, where having met him they joyned battle, and fought a whole day; yet it appeared not which part got the Victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumeans home. Not long after Simon with a greater Army than before, aſſaulted the borders of their Country, and pitching his Tents in a Village called Thecue, he ſent one of his Companions, L named Eleazar, to them that kept the Caſtle Herodium, not far from that place, to ſollicite them to yield it to him. The Gariſon there preſently received him into the Caſtle, not knowing the cauſe of his coming. But ſo ſoon as he began to perſwade them to Treaſon, they drew their Swords to kill him: and he not having any place to flie to, caſt himſelf from off the Caſtle Wall into the Valley underneath, and ſo died.

Eleazar Simon's fellow caſteth himſelf headlong into the trench, and preſently dieth

James of Idumea the Betrayer of his Country.

The Idumeans ſomething fearing Simons Forces, before they would offer him Battle, thought beſt to eſpie what number of men he had: to effect which buſineſs, one Jacob a Captain among them offered himſelf, meaning indeed to betray his Country to Simon.
So departing from Olurus, where the Idumean Forces were aſſembled, he went to Simon, and promiſed him to betray his Country to him, receiving of him an Oath, that for reward K of this deed he ſhould be alwayes next in dignity to Simon himſelf, and ſo he preſently promiſed to help ſubdue all Idumea. For this cauſe he was welcome to Simon, and feaſted liberally, and had great Promiſes if he performed that which he offered; and then returned to the Idumeans; and fained that Simons Army was far greater than indeed it was. And ſo terrifying the Governours of his Country, and the People, he by little and little perſwaded them to receive Simon, and without any more fight to yield to him the Sovereign Authority over them.

Jacob ſtudying to bring this his purpoſe to paſs, privily ſent Meſſengers to Simon, willing him to come with his Forces, and promiſing him to diſſipate the Idumeans for M him, which he alſo did. For when Simons Army drew near, he firſt of all got upon his Horſe, and together with his Aſſociates that were partakers of his Treaſon, fled to the Enemy. Then fear fell on the Idumeans; and every one without any more ado fled home.

Simon beyond all expectation enters Idumea without blood-ſhed.

Hebron an ancient City where Abrahams houſe was.

Thus Simon againſt his own expectation entred Idumea without blood-ſhed: and firſt of all aſſaulting a little Village called Chebron, he took it, and in it an exceeding great Booty, a great quantity of Corn, and many Fruits; all which he carried away. The Inhabitants report that this Chebron is not only more ancient than all Cities of that Land, but alſo than Memphis in Ægypt; for they affirm it to have been built two thouſand three hundred years ſince. They alſo ſay, that this was the place where Abraham N the Father of the Jews dwelt, after he forſook Meſopotamia; and that his Poſterity departed from hence to Ægypt. Indeed there are yet ſeen Monuments in the City, richly wrought in fine Marble.

A Turpentine Tree, that hath continued ever ſince the Creation of the World.

Six Furlongs from the Town there is an exceeding great Turpentine Tree, which they affirm to have endured ever ſince the Creation of the World, until this day.

Simon having obtained this place, from hence invaded all Idumea, and not only robbed and ſpoiled all the Towns and Cities thereof, but alſo waſted and deſtroyed much of the Country: for beſides his Army, there followed him fourty thouſand men, ſo that he could not find Victuals for ſuch a Multitude. Moreover, beſides this Calamity that he brought upon Idumea, he exerciſed great Cruelty and Out-rage upon the Country, and cauſed great ſpoil therein. And as after great ſwarms of Locuſts, the Trees and O Woods are diſpoiled, ſo whereſoever Simon had been, all the Country was left deſolate.

And

The year of the World, 4033. after the Nativity of Christ 71.

A And either by fire, or by ruinating places where he came, or elſe by treading upon the Corn-Fields with the feet of his Army, or by deſtroying ſuch as they found, they left nothing ſtanding or growing either in Field or Town : and only by paſſing thorow fertile places, he made the fields harder than barren ground ; and left no ſign, in places which he had deſtroyed, that ever they had been tilled.

Simon ſpoiled all Idumea.
The Zealots take Simons Wife.

¶ Hereat the Zealots were again animated againſt him ; yet durſt they not fight with him in open field : but placing Ambuſhes in the way he was to paſs, they took Simons Wife, and many of her Servants, and ſo came again into the City, rejoycing as though they had taken Simon himſelf. For they perſwaded themſelves, that Simon would preſently lay down Arms, and come in humble manner to entreat them to re-B ſtore him his Wife. But Simon was not moved with compaſſion for the loſs of his Wife, but with fury : and coming to the Walls of Jeruſalem , like a cruel Beaſt that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he killed all he met. And taking them that went out of the City to gather Herbs and Wood, he cauſed them to be whipt to death, whether they were young or old : This cruelty ſeemed only wanting in him, that he did not eat the fleſh of the dead Bodies. Alſo he took many and cut off their hands, and ſo ſent them into the City, thereby to terrifie his Enemies, and to cauſe the People to abandon the Zealots : and he bad them tell the Citizens, that except they preſently reſtored his Wife to him, he ſwore by God who governed all, that he would break down their Walls, and uſe all he found in the City after that C faſhion, and that he would ſpare no age, nor reſpect the innocent more than the guilty.
Theſe his threats did not only terrifie the People, but alſo the Zealots, inſomuch that they ſent him his Wife again ; and ſo his anger being ſomewhat aſſwaged, he ceaſed a while from his Murders.

The Zealots ſend back Simons Wife.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Galba, Otho, Vitellius and Veſpaſian.

D NOT only in Judea, but alſo in Italy at this time was Civil War : for Galba was ſlain in the midſt of Rome ; after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought againſt Vitellius, who affected the Empire, being choſen Emperour by the German Legions. The Battel was fought near Bebrias, a Town in Gallia Ciſalpina ; the firſt day, Otho got the Victory againſt Valens and Gecinna, the Generals of Vitellius his Army.
But the day following they overcame Otho : and ſo many being ſlain on both parts, and news being brought that Vitellius his Army had gotten the Victory, Otho being at Brix-els ſlew himſelf, when he had held the Empire three Months and two days. Otho's Souldiers turned to Vitellius his Captains, and joyned with them, and ſo Vitellius came E to Rome with his Army. In the mean time Veſpaſian the fifth day of June departed from Ceſarea, and went to thoſe parts of Judea, which were yet unconquered : and firſt of all he went into the high Countrys, and ſubdued the two Toparchies of Acrabatena and Gophnitis, and after them two Towns called Bethel and Ephrem, and placed Gariſons in them, and ſo went to Jeruſalem, killing many that he found in the way, and taking many Captives.

Sedition thorow the whole Roman Empire.
Veſpaſian once more invades Judea.

One of his Captains, called Cerealis, with a party of Horſe and Foot, waſted all the higher Idumea : and in the way as he went, he took Caphetra a Caſtle, and burnt it, and beſieged another called Capharis, encloſed with a ſtrong Wall : by reaſon of which he deemed he ſhould have made long abode there : but contrary to his expectation, the F Inhabitants opened the Gates to him, and yielded themſelves, beſeechicg him to be good to them. When he had overcome them he went to Hebron, an antient City, and ſet it on fire ; this Hebron, as I have already ſaid, was ſcituated upon the Mountains, and near Jeruſalem : and breaking into it by force, he ſlew all them that he found there, and fired the City. And having ſubdued all places, ſave only three Caſtles, to wit, Herodium, Maſſada and Macheron, which were kept by the Thieves, now only Jeruſalem remained to be Conquered.

CHAP. IX.

Of Simons Acts againſt the Zealots.

The Zealots fill the whole City with iniquity.

AFter Simon had recovered his Wife from the Zealots, he went into Idumea, to rob and ſpoil that which was left: and chaſing the Inhabitans up and down, at laſt he forced them to flie to Jeruſalem, and he himſelf purſued them thither; and at the foot of the Walls, he killed all the People he took, that returned out of the fields from their labour. Thus Simon without the City, was more terrible to the People than the Romans, and the Zealots within the City crueller than them both, being incouraged and incited thereto by the counſel of the Galileans. For they had put John in Authority: and John in reward thereof permitted all things to be done as they requeſted. There was no end of robbing and ſpoiling rich mens Houſes, and of ſlaughtering both of Men and Women, and to kill Men and Women was but a Paſtime. And having with blood bedew'd their prey, and without all fear gotten what they liked, they now began to luſt after Women: yea they became effeminate and laſcivious, they curl their Hair, and clothed themſelves in Womens Apparel, and anointed themſelves with ſweet Ointments, that their beauty might be pleaſing and alluring; they now not only imitate the Attire of Proſtitutes, but alſo their impudency, and became ſo ſhameleſs, that they thirſted after unnatural pleaſures, as though Jeruſalem were become a Stews, and ſo profaned the whole City with their execrable impurities. Yet though they effeminated their Faces, their Hands were prone to blood-ſhed; and though they lived in ignominious manner, as People given over to pleaſure, yet could they quickly become Warriors, and in the habits of Women, drawing their Swords they killed whomſoever they met. Whoſoever eſcaped Johns hands, Simon the more cruel murthered; and whoſover eſcaped the Tyrant within the City, was ſlain by the Tyrant without; and there was no way to flie to the Romans.

The way of flight was quite cut off.

The diſcord between the Zealots and the Idumeans.

The flight of the Zealots with the Idumeans into the Temple.

Furthermore, the Army of John began to be divided, for all the Idumeans ſeparated themſelves from the other People, and there roſe a mutiny againſt the Tyrant, partly through envy of his Power, partly through hatred of his Cruelty. And ſo aſſaulting him, they ſlew many of the Zealots, and compelled the reſt to fly into the Kings houſe, built by Grapta, Father of Izat, King of Adiabena. The Idumeans alſo broke in thither with them, and drave them from thence into the Temple, and ſeized upon Johns Treaſure: for John lived in the Palace, and had carried thither all his Spoils. Then thoſe Zealots that were diſperſed in the City, came to thoſe that were in the Temple, and John purpoſed to ſend them againſt the Townſmen and the Idumeans. But they feared not ſo much their Forces (although they knew them to be the better Warriors,) as they did, leſt now being deſperate, they ſhould ſteal out of the Temple in the night, and ſo ſlay them, and fire the City. Wherefore aſſembling themſelves, they deliberated with the Prieſts how to avoid their aſſaults: but it pleaſed God to turn their own Counſel to their deſtruction, and that they ſhould provide a Remedy of ſafety, far worſe than Death it ſelf. For to depoſe John, they deviſed to introduce Simon, and as it were to intreat another to Tyrannize over them. This counſel was thought beſt; and Matthias the Prieſt was ſent to Simon (of whom before they ſtood in great fear) to requeſt him to come into the City. With him alſo came ſuch as had fled from Jeruſalem for fear of the Zealots, intreating him in like manner, becauſe they deſired to return to their Wives and Families. So he entred into the City proudly, promiſing them to be their Deliverer; and all the People made Acclamations as he entered into the City, that he was their Preſerver. Simon being now within the City, preſently deliberated with thoſe about him, to eſtabliſh his Dominion, thinking as well thoſe that called him into the City, as thoſe againſt whom he was called, his Enemies. John and the Zealots with him finding no way to come out of the Temple, and having loſt all that he had in the City (for Simon and his Followers, at their entrance, took all that belonged to him) began now to deſpair of his ſafety. And Simon, being aſſiſted by the Citizens, aſſaulted the Temple, and the Zealots placing themſelves upon the Porches, and in Towers of Defence, made reſiſtance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zealots were upon the higher ground on the right hand, and ſo had the advantage againſt Simon. And although by reaſon of the place wherein they were, they prevailed againſt Simon, yet they raiſed four high Towers, that from hence they might ſhoot Darts and Arrows againſt Simons Men. One of theſe Towers they built upon the Eaſt ſide

In theſe Towers they placed all kind of Engines to caſt Stones, and Men with Slings. Then Simon perceiving many of his Souldiers languiſh, was more remiſs in his buſineſs; yet when his number increaſed, he came nearer; for a-far off many of his men were ſlain with the Shot of thoſe Engines.

CHAP. X.

How Veſpaſian was Elected Emperor.

AT this time Rome alſo ſuffered the Evils of Civil War; for Vitellius was now arrived out of Germany with his Army, bringing beſides them an infinite multitude with him; ſo that his Army was ſo great, that the places appointed for quartering his Souldiers could not contain it: inſomuch that his Army occupied all the whole City, C and every Houſe was filled with Souldiers. And they beholding the Romans wealth greater than ever they ſaw any, and admiring their abundance of Gold and Silver, not able to contain themſelves, began to rob and kill every one that ſought to hinder them.
And this was the eſtate of the affairs in Italy. Veſpaſian having waſted all about Jeruſalem, returned to Cæſarea, where he underſtood the troubles at Rome, and how Vitellius was Emperour. Hereat, though he knew as well to obey, as to be obeyed; yet he was moved with indignation, and diſdained to call him Lord, who had invaded the Empire being deſtitute of a Ruler. And much grieved hereat, he could not conceal his grief, nor follow the Wars againſt Strangers whilſt his own Country was ſo endangered. But the diſtance between him and Rome did as much repreſs him, as anger incited him to D ſeek revenge: for he conſidered that Fortune might cauſe many alterations before he could get to Rome, eſpecially, it being Winter: and ſo he ſought to bridle his wrath, which yet daily increaſed. But his Officers and Souldiers began openly to conſult of a Change, and with Indignation exclaimed againſt the Souldiers at Rome, who lived in pleaſure, and never heard ſo much as the report of War; and notwithſtanding took upon them to create whom they pleaſed Emperour, and in hope of gain diſpoſed of the Common-wealth at their own pleaſure: whereas they on the contrary after ſo many labours and dangers, ſtill continued in Arms till they became old and gray-headed, and ſuffered the Authority due to themſelves, to be enjoyed by others; when notwithſtanding they had amongſt them one who deſerved the Empire more than any other; and E what recompence could they ever after make him? Or what occaſion could they find hereafter to ſhew themſelves grateful to him for the benefits from him received, if they now omitted this occaſion? And they thought that Veſpaſian was ſo much more worthy of the Empire than Vitellius, by how much they who created Vitellius Emperor, were in very many reſpects much inferiour to themſelves. For (ſaid they) we have endured no leſs toyl than thoſe that came out of Germany: neither are we leſs Valiant than they, who bring a Tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would reſiſt Veſpaſian: For the Senate, and the People of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his unſatiable Luſt, than Veſpaſian's Chaſtity and Temperance, nor a cruel Tyrant rather than a good and courteous Emperour, whoſe Son alſo was of extraordinary Merit, and deſerved the Empire. For true F Valour in an Emperour is a great defence of Peace. Therefore if the Empire were due to aged Experience, they had Veſpaſian; if to Valiant Youth, they had amongſt them Titus: that they might reap commodity by both their Ages: and that they would not only aſſiſt him with the Forces of the Empire, having there three Legions, beſides the Auxiliary Troops of the King; but alſo all the Eaſt part of Europe was out of fear of Vitellius. Moreover, they had in Italy ſome that would aſſiſt Veſpaſian, to wit, his Brothor and his Son, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was Prefect of the City, an Office very conſiderable, eſpecially in the beginniug of ſuch an Enterpriſe. Laſtly, it might ſo fall out that the Senate would declare him Emperour, whom now the Souldiers, being as it were their Preſerver, had Elected.

cept this Dignity for preſervation of the Empire, being in great danger to be loſt. Albeit H Veſpaſian had alwayes been careful of the Publick-Good, yet he refuſed to be Emperour: deeming himſelf indeed to have deſerved it, but he rather, choſe to live a Private Life, wherein was ſecurity, than in the height of Fortune and Honour with perpetual danger. The Captains were the more earneſt becauſe he refuſed it; and the Souldiers flocked about him with drawn Swords, threatning his death, except he would conſent to live as he deſerved: but after long time ſtriving to avert this their determination to make him Emperour, at laſt, ſeeing he could not avoid it, he accepted their offer.

Multianus and the reſt of the Captains that had elected him to the Empire, together with the whole Army, with great Acclamations deſir'd Veſpaſian to lead them againſt their common Enemy. But Veſpaſian thought it beſt, firſt to make ſure of Alexandria, knowing that Ægypt for the ſupply of Corn was the greateſt and beſt part of the Empire: which if he once were ſure of, he hoped that although Vitellius were K ſtronger than he, yet he could bring him under, becauſe the People would not endure that for his ſake the City ſhould be famiſh'd: which would have come to paſs, except they had ſupply of Corn out of Ægypt.

Moreover, he deſired to joyn to himſelf thoſe two Legions that were at Alexandria; and he conſidered that that Country might be a defence and refuge for him, if any adverſe Fortune ſhould betide him: for it is not eaſie to be entred by an Army, and the Sea-coaſts have no Havens, nor Harbours to receive Ships. On the Weſt it bordereth upon the dry and barren part of Lybia; on the South upon the Frontiers which ſeparate Syene from Æthiopia, and the Cataracts of Nilus hinder the entering of it by Ships. On the Eaſt it bordereth upon the Red-Sea, which defends it as far as the City Copton; L on the North it reaches to Syria, and is defended by the Ægyptian Sea, wherein there is no Haven. Thus Ægypt is ſtrong on every ſide, and reacheth in length 2000 Furlongs from Peluſium to Syene: and from Plinthia to Peluſium, they ſayl 3600 Furlongs. And Nilus is navigable even unto the City Elephantine. Moreover the Haven of Alexandria is dangerous to enter into even in a Calm, for the entrance into it is very ſtrait; and beſide that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great ſtony Rocks, and the left ſide is compaſſed artificially with a ſtrong Dike, but on the right ſide is the Iſle Pharus, having a Tower upon it exceeding great: ſo that a Light in it is ſeen by Mariners 300 Furlongs off, to the end that before they come near it, they may provide to bring their Ships in with ſafety. M

This Iſle is incloſed with high Walls made by Art, againſt which the Sea beating, and ſo returning back again, maketh the entrance into the Haven more dangerous. Yet this Haven within is very ſafe, and 30 Furlongs long: ſo that whatſoever this Country wants, it is brought them into that Haven; and whatſoever aboundeth amongſt them, and which other Nations need, is carried from thence all over the whole World. So that Veſpaſian did not unadviſedly ſeek to make himſelf Maſter of Alexandria, and to diſpoſe thereof for his own profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore he ſent Letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was Governour of Alexandria and Ægypt, and told him of the Souldiers Reſolution: and how that ſeeing he could not avoid it, but was forced to N take upon him the Empire, he now requeſted him to help him what he could. Alexander receiving Veſpaſians Letters, agreed willingly thereto, and preſently cauſed his Army and the People alſo to ſwear to Veſpaſian: which they all did willingly, having underſtood Veſpaſians Virtue, by reaſon that he Governed ſo near them. And ſo Alexander having now engaged himſelf, prepared all things neceſſary for the reception of this Prince.

CHAP. XII.

How Veſpaſian delivered Joſeph out of Captivity.

Veſpaſian by Common voice is created Emperour, and Crowned.

IT is incredible how quickly the news was carried into all parts of the World, that Veſpaſian was declared Emperor in the Eaſt; and how all the Cities rejoyced and made Triumphs, and offered Sacrifices for his fortunate ſucceſs. Moreover, the Legions in Mæſia and Pannonia, who not long before revolted from Vitellius, by reaſon of his cruelty, now willingly ſwore obedience to Veſpaſian. Veſpaſian returned by Berytum to Cæſarea; where many Embaſſadours came to him, offering him Crowns, B and applauding and rejoycing at his good fortune; they came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. Thither came alſo Mutianus, Governour of Syria, who brought tidings how joyfully all the People received him for their Emperour, and had ſworn obedience to him. So all things falling out proſperouſly on Veſpaſians ſide, and Fortune ſeconding what he deſired, he began to think with himſelf, it was God's providence that he was made Emperour, and brought to that eſtate. And ſo he called to mind all tokens and ſigns (as there had hapned many, which foretold that he ſhould be Emperor) and among the reſt, he remembred that which Joſeph had told him; and though Nero was yet alive, preſumed to call him Emperour; and he admired the man, who was yet in hold. But calling Mutianus and the reſt of his friends C together, firſt of all he told them how Valiant Joſeph had been, and what difficulty he had to win Jotapata, only becauſe of his Valour; and then his Prophecies, which at that time he eſteemed only Fables, fained for fear; but now time and event had proved them true. Wherefore it ſeemed an unreaſonable thing, that he, who had been the foreteller of his Exaltation, and a Meſſenger to him from God, ſhould ſtill continue in bonds like a Captive, and be left in adverſity. So calling for Joſeph, he commanded him to be ſet at liberty. This fact of his made the Captains under him hope for great reward at his hands, ſeeing he had been ſo kind to a ſtranger. Titus being there preſent, ſaid; It is meet, O Father, that as you acquit Joſeph from Captivity, ſo you alſo take away the ſhame of that which he hath already endured. For if we D not only unty his Chains, but alſo break them in ſunder, he ſhall be as though he had never been in bondage: for this is the manner uſed for redreſs, when any one being guiltleſs is commited to bonds. Veſpaſian hereto agreed: and ſo one came with an Axe, and hewed his Chains in pieces. Thus was Joſeph rewarded for his Prophecy; and thenceforward he was eſteemed worthy to be believed.

Of Vetellius his Death and Manners.

WHen Veſpaſian had anſwered the Embaſſadors, and diſpoſed of all the Commands of his Army according to every ones merit, he went to Antioch, and there deliberated whither to go firſt; and it ſeemed beſt to him to go to Rome, rather than to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet & firm, but Rome was held by Vitellius.
Wherefore he ſent Mutianus into Italy, with many Troops of Foot and Horſe: who fearing to go by Sea, went thorow Cappadocia and Phrygia; for it was Winter-time.
Antonius Primus, who was Governour of Mæſia, brought from thence the third Legion remaining there, and march'd againſt Vitellius. Vitellius ſent Cacinna to meet him with a great Army: who departing from Rome, met with Antonius at Cremona, a Town of Lombardy, F ſituate upon the confines of Italy; but beholding the diſcipline & order of his Forces, he durſt not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flie, deſign'd to revolt; and ſo calling to him the Centurions and Tribunes of his Army, he perſwaded them to go and joyn with Antonius, after he had extenuated Vitellius his Power, and extolled that of Veſpaſian: affirming the firſt to have only the bare name of the Emperour; and the laſt to have alſo all Vertues meet for an Emperour. Moreover, that it would be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwiſe they ſhould be compelled to; and ſeeing themſelves already ſurpaſſed in number, it was Prudence to prevent all danger. For Veſpaſian was able without their aſſiſtance to ſubdue all the reſt: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had. And ſpeaking to this effect, he perſwaded G them to all that he would have done. And ſo with his whole Army joyn'd with Antonius.

Many Merchants of other Countries, & many Townſmen were ſlain, & all Vitellius Army, conſiſting of 30200 men. Antonius loſt in this battel 4500 of thoſe whom he brought out of Mæſia: And delivering Cecinna from Priſon, he ſent him to carry the news hereof to Veſpaſian: who praiſed I him for his fact, and honoured him above his expectation, in reward of his Treaſon.

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly rejoyced, and took courage: and gathering together the Companies of the City-watch, in the nighttime he ſeiz'd on the Capitol; and in the morning, many of the Nobles joyned with him, amongſt others Domitian, his Brothers Son, who was a great cauſe and help to obtain the Victory. Vitellius little eſteeming Primus, turned his anger againſt Sabinus, and thoſe that had revolted with him: as it were naturally thirſting after the blood of the Nobility, he ſent all the Army he brought out of Germany with him, to aſſault the Capitol, where many valiant deeds were ſhewed on both parts: and at laſt the Germans, being moſt in number, got the Capitol Hill. Domitian with many brave Noblemen, as it K were by Gods providence, eſcaped ſafe; the reſt of the multitude were there ſlain. Sabinus was carried to Vitellius, and by his commandment inſtantly put to death: and the Souldiers taking away all the gifts and treaſure in the Temple, ſet it one fire. The day after Antonius arrived, and Vitellius his Souldiers met him; there was fighting in three ſeveral places of the City, the forces of Vitellius were all defeated: whereupon Vitellius came out of his Palace drunk and full gorged with delicate meat; he was imediately ſeiz'd upon, and drawn thorow the midſt of the ſtreets, and after many contumelies, ſlain; having reigned Eight months, and five days: if he had lived longer, the whole Empire had ſcarce been ſufficient to have maintained his Gluttony. There were ſlain above 50000 of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after, L Mutianus with his Army entred Rome, and repreſſed the Souldiers of Antonius, who ſtill ſought about in every place for Vitellius's Souldiers, and many of his favourites, and ſlew whom they thought good, not examining any matter, by reaſon of their fury: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to govern the City till his Father came. The people being delivered from fear, proclaimed Veſpaſian Emperour, and made Feaſts and Triumphs both under one, for his eſtabliſhing in the Empire, and for joy that Vitellius was depoſed.

Titus repairs to Jeruſalem.

Titus comes to Ceſarea, and gathers his Forces there.

WHen Veſpaſian came to Alexandria, news was brought to him of what was done at Rome. And Embaſſadors came to him from all parts of the World to congratulate him. And although next after Rome, this City was the greateſt in the World, yet was it ſcarcely able to receive the people that came thither to him. Veſpaſian being now eſtabliſhed Emperour of all the World, and the Common-wealth of the Romans being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think upon the reliques of Judea. And he himſelf, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, and in the mean time he haſted to diſpoſe of all things at Alexandria. Moreover he ſent his Son Titus N with his beſt Troops to deſtroy Jeruſalem. Titus departed by land from Alexandria to Nicopolis, which is diſtant from it 20 furlongs, and there he ſhip'd his men, and ſailed along the River Nilus by Medenſia to Thumin; here landing his men, he came to the City called Tanis. The ſecond place he reſted in was the City Heraclea, and the third Peluſium; where having refreſh'd his Souldiers two days ſpace, the third day he paſt the borders of Peluſium, and having gone one days journey through the wilderneſs, he pitcht his Camp at the Temple of Jupiter Caſſian, and the next day at Oſtracine, where there is no water, but all that the Inhabitants uſe, they have from other places. After this, he reſted at Rhinocolura, and from thence in four dayes he went to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria; and the fifth day he lodged at Gaza; and from thence going to Aſcalon O and ſo to Jamnia and Joppa, he arrived at Ceſarea, purpoſing to gather ſome other Forces there.

Of the three ſorts of Sedition in Jeruſalem.

Titus being thus come out of Ægypt by the Deſart into Syria, he departed for Cæſarea, purpoſing there to ſet his Army in order. And whilſt he was with his Father Veſpaſian at Alexandria, diſpoſing of the Empires that God had given him, it happened that the Sedition at Jeruſalem divided into three parts, and fought one againſt another: and well it was they were ſo equally divided.

A threefold Sedition in Jeruſalem.

We have already ſufficiently declared who were the Authors of the Faction of the Zealots, whoſe tyranny over the City was the ruine thereof: and this may be ſaid to F be a Sedition out of a Sedition; which, like a hungry wild Beaſt, wanting his prey, turned his cruelty againſt his own bowels. So Eleazar the Son of Simon, who was the firſt that in the Temple divided the Zealots from the People, faining himſelf to be diſpleaſed with that which John every day did; yet in Truth, for that he envied that a greater Tyrant than himſelf ſhould be Ruler, deſirous to be Chief, and make himſelf Mighty, he revolted from the reſt: and with him Judas the Son of Chelcias, and Simon the Son of Ezron, two of the moſt potent amongſt them. Beſides them, was alſo Ezechias the Son of Chobarus, a Nobleman, all of which had many of the Zealots following them: and poſſeſſing themſelves of the inner part of the Temple, they ſet a Guard in the entrance, and in the ſacred Gates, preſuming upon the fulneſs of their Stores: for there was great quantity of ſacred Proviſion, which they thought it no impiety to make G uſe of; yet fearing their ſmall number, they permitted many of the Company that were killed, to remain in the places where they were ſlain. John was ſuperiour in number, but but inferiour in the quality of the place : for having his Enemies above his head, he H could not without danger make incurſions ; yet his Rage would not ſuffer him to forbear infeſting his Enemies, though thereby his party had more harm than thoſe of Ele- azars, and he ſtill aſſaulted them to his own coſt : Thus many Aſſaults were continually made, and many Darts caſt, and the Temple was prophaned with murders. Simon the Son of Giora (incited by the People to be their Leader, in hope he would have aſſiſt-ed them, having in his hands both the higher part of the City, and greater part of the lower) did now more boldly than before aſſault John and his followers, becauſe they were aſſailed by thoſe above : yet he being as it were beneath John and his party, ſuſtained as much loſs at their hands, as John himſelf did from them who were above him. Thus John was doubly engaged with Eleazar, who infeſted him from above, and I Simon from below : But Simons aſſaults from below were eaſily repulſed, and it was not a little miſchief he did thoſe who gaul'd him with their Darts from above, by certain Engines that he invented, by which he caſt Stones and Darts among them, and ſlew ſeveral both of their Souldiers and Prieſts, as they were offering Sacrifice to their God.

For though they were generally too prone to all manner of wickedneſs, yet thoſe that would were permitted to offer Sacrifice, watching and diligently guarding thoſe of their Nation. For Strangers which came thither for devotion, were not miſtruſted : But after theſe wicked People had permitted them to Sacrifice, when they had finiſhed their devotions, they were made a prey, and conſumed by this Sedition. For Darts and other ſhot with force of the Engines came into the Temple and Altar, and ſlew the K Prieſts at the Altar. And many who came from the uttermoſt parts of the World unto that holy place, were ſlain as they offered ſacrifice, and imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greeks and barbarous People did reverence : The ſtrangers and Prieſts were forced to remain promiſcuouſly among the dead Bodies, and the place about the Altar was full of Blood. O miſerable City! What didſt thou ſuffer at the Ro- mans hands, to be compared to this, although they ſet thee on fire to purge thee from Iniquity?
Now thou wert ſeparate from the ſervice of God, and couldſt not ſubſiſt long, being made a Sepulchre of thine own Inhabitants, and thy Temple by thy Civil Wars become a Grave of dead Bodies. Nevertheleſs, It is not impoſſible but thou mayſt be reſtored to thy former Eſtate, if firſt thou appeaſe Gods wrath that hath made thee deſolate. But I muſt not give place unto ſor- L Hiſtory of all things that paſt there. Wherefore I will recount the reſt of the Impieties of theſe Seditious.

John aſſaulted on both ſides.

They of Jeruſalem had welnigh burnt all their Corn.

The ſeditious People being divided into three Companies ; Eleazar and his followers who had the keeping of the holy firſt-fruits, and all the ſacred Oblations, came againſt John when they were drunk. And they who followed John ſpoiling the People, aſſaulted Simon, who was ſuccoured by the City. Wherefore when John was aſſaulted on both ſides, he turned ſome of his Souldiers againſt Simon, and the reſt againſt Eleazar : againſt Simon he uſed Darts to caſt from the Porches of the Temple ; and againſt Ele- azar he uſed Engines for ſhot. And alwayes, ſo often as they above his head ceaſed (as often they did, being either weary or drunken) he fiercely aſſaulted Simon and his men. M Alſo as far as he drave them into the City, ſo far did he fire all, and burnt Houſes full of Corn and other Neceſſaries ; and that which he left unburned, Simon at his return (when John was gone into the Temple) ſet on fire ; as if on purpoſe to give the Romans an advantage, they had conſumed all their Proviſions for the Siege.

A wretched calamity in Jeruſalem.

To be ſhort, all was conſumed with fire about the Temple, and the City was levelled and made plain ground to fight in, and the Corn burnt that might have ſufficed for many years ; by which means they were reduced by a Famine of their own making, which could not have been brought upon them had they not cauſed it themſelves. The Citizens were in every place a prey to thoſe that were Seditious on one ſide, and to them N that beſieged them on the other ; and like a great Body torn in pieces betwen theſe two.
The old Men and Women aſtoniſhed with theſe Calamities, prayed for the good ſucceſs of the Romans, and deſired their forreign Enemy might deliver them from their Civil Diſſentions.

This was the occaſion of great fear and terrour among them all ; and the more, becauſe it was no time now to conſult, and no hope left of accommodation, or flight to them that deſired it. For all places were kept, and the Rebels within kill'd whoever they perceived well-wiſhers to the Romans, or did endeavour to fly to them, as common

Lamentation and mourning in Jeruſalem

A fear was far more miſerable, who every day had new cauſes and occaſions of ſorrow given them; yet durſt they not publickly lament, for fear; and ſo not daring to ſhew their grief, they ſecretly ſorrowed: no man obſerved any reverence to them that were alive amongſt them, nor took any care to bury the dead. The cauſe of both which was, that every man deſpaired of himſelf. For whoſoever were not joyned with the Seditious, grew to be careleſs of all things, as making account preſently to die a thouſand deaths. But the Seditious gathering the dead bodies upon heaps, continued their fighting, and trod upon them; and as it were encouraging themſelves by the dead under their feet, they became more cruel, ſtill deviſing new ſtratagems one againſt another, and immediatly executing whatſoever they deviſed without any B commiſeration; omitting no kind of Murther, and leaving no cruelty unpractiſed: ſo that John prophan'd the holy things of the Temple, and made them Engins of War. For formerly the Prieſts and People had determined to underprop the Temple, and build it twenty Cubits higher, and King Agrippa, with great labour and expence, had ſent them in Timber for that purpoſe from Mount Libanus. Which being put off by the Wars, John took the Timber and made uſe of it: for that deſign he erected a Tower to fight againſt thoſe that aſſaulted him from off the Temple; and this Tower he built along the Wall over againſt the Chapter-houſe that ſtandeth on the Weſt ſide of the Temple; for he could build it in no other place ſo conveniently. And having thus impiouſly furniſhed himſelf with Engines, he hoped hereby to have deC ſtroyd his Enemies. But God made his labour in vain, and before he could prevail againſt them, brought the Romans againſt the City.

The cruelty of the Seditious in Jeruſalem.

John made uſe of the Wood, that was kept for holy uſes, to make Engines of.

For after that Titus had gathered together part of his Army, and ordered the reſt to meet him at Jeruſalem, he departed from Cæſarea, having three Legions that lately under the conduct of his Father Veſpaſian had waſted all Judea, and the twelfth Legion that ſometime under Ceſtius were overcome, and put to flight by the Jews: who being valiant enough of themſelves, were impatient to be imploy'd again againſt the Jews, to revenge themſelves of their former diſgrace. Titus commanded the fifth Legion to meet him at Jeruſalem, and to march by Emmaus, and the tenth Legion by Jericho: the reſt he took with himſelf, accompanied with the Kings forces that came D to help him, having been reinforced with conſiderable Supplys out of Syria. Titus alſo brought forces with him to ſupply the number that was wanting, which forces were ſent by Veſpaſian under Mutianus into Italy: for he brought two thouſand ſelect men from the Legions at Alexandria, and three thouſand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his cheifeſt friend, and one next him in Authority, who before was Governour of Egypt, and thought a fit man to be Governour of the Army; for that he was the firſt that entertain'd the Emperour being new elected, and joyn'd faithfully with him before he knew what ſucceſs he ſhould have: he was preſent with him in all his affairs as his chiefeſt Counſellor, and was renowned both for his Wiſdom and Experience.

pitched his Tents in a place, which in the Jews language [illegible] called Acanthonaulona, H that is, the Valley of Thorns, neer unto a Village named Gabah Saul, which ſignifieth the Valley of Saul, which is almoſt thirty Furlongs from Jeruſalem. From thence accompanied with 600 choſen Horſemen, he went to Jeruſalem, to view how ſtrong it was, and of what courage the Jews were, to ſee if peradventure at ſight of him they would yield without any further adoe. For Titus underſtood (and it was true) that the people deſired Peace, but were overpowerd by the Seditious, and ſo durſt not attempt any thing. Titus riding along the high-way that went to the Walls, ſaw no man : but turning aſide towards the Tower Pſephinos with his Horſemen, an infinite number preſently iſſued out by the Towers of Women, at a Gate oppoſite to Helens Tomb; brake his Guard of Horſemen into two parts, and advanc'd to hinder I thoſe Horſemen that were yet in the high way, from joyning with the reſt that had croſt the way, by which means they had divided Titus from the reſt of his company, in ſo much as he could proceed no further for the Ditch of the Town-Wall on one ſide, and for the Garden Pales on the other ſide : and there was no way for him to return unto his Souldiers, the Enemies being between him and home. Many of his Souldiers not knowing their General was in any danger, but ſuppoſing him amongſt them ſtill, fled away. Titus ſeeing that he had only his own valour to truſt to, turned his Horſe againſt his Enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to do the like, and ſo he brake violently into the midſt of them, haſting to get unto his Company. It was evident at that time that God giveth the Victory, and hath a K particular care of Kings, Princes and Emperours. For notwithſtanding that an infinite number of Darts and Arrows were ſhot at Titus, and he had no Armour at all (for as we have already ſaid, he came to view, not to fight) yet had he not one wound, but all paſt him; as though purpoſely every one had ſtriven to miſs him. But Titus with his Sword made way, cut down many that oppoſed themſelves againſt him, and with his Horſe paſt over them. The Jews ſeeing Titus his valour, cried out and exhorted one another to ſet upon him; but whitherſoever he turned, the Jews fled, and would not abide by it : likewiſe thoſe Souldiers that were with him, encompaſſed him round. For every mans hope lay in charging through with Titus, before they were cloſed in and oppreſſed. Two of the moſt valiant amongſt them L were ſlain, the Horſe of the one was killed with his maſter, but the others Horſe was taken by the Jews. But Titus and the reſt came ſafe into the Camp. And thus the Jews being ſucceſful at firſt, were mightily encouraged, and that encouragement being of moment, made them confident, or rather raſh, a long time after.

Titus Camp was 7. ſtades off the City.

The Seditious agree among themſelves.

THe Legion that was to paſs by Emmaus, being joyned to the reſt of the Army over night, Ceſar the next morning removed, and came to Scopos, where he had a full view of the City and Temple on the North part, the ground adjoyning unto the City being very low, and not improperly called Scopos, being diſtant ſeven Furlongs from the City : in that quarter Titus commanded two Legions to encamp themſelves, and the fifth Legion to retire three Furlongs off, to the intent that the Souldiers who were wearied with travelling all night, might entrench themſelves without fear or danger; no ſooner had they begun their work, but preſently the tenth Legion came, N who were to paſs by Jericho; which Veſpaſian had already ſubdued, and placed a Gariſon there. This Legion was commanded to encamp ſix Furlongs from Jeruſalem, near Mount Olivet, on the Eaſt part of the City, and is encloſed with a deep Valley called Cedron. This great Army ſo ſuddenly arriving reconciled the diſſentions within the City for ſome time : and the three Factions beholding with admiration the Roman Camp, became friends, and all differences were compoſed. They began to examine and conſider what madneſs had cauſed them to ſuffer themſelves to be encloſed with three Walls, to their prejudice, and loſs of their lives : and that they ſhould ſtand ſtill, and be ſpectators as it were of ſuch dangerous preparations, without making the leaſt Countermine or proviſion to defeit them; O whilſt ſome cried, We are only valiant againſt our ſelves, by our ſedition maſſacring and murdering

The Citizens aſſail the Romans.

Thus being aſſembled they exhorted one another: and betaking themſelves to their Arms they iſſued out of the City, firſt upon the tenth Legion, and with a great ſhout ſet upon the Romans that were entrenched in the Valley. The Romans being all at work in the Trenches, and moſt of them having laid down their Weapons (preſuming the Jews durſt not have made any ſalley by reaſon of the variance amongſt themſelves) were ſo much ſurprized, that great part of them immediately fled; ſome of them ſtood to their Arms, but were ſlain before they could get into a poſture of defence. The number of the Jews was daily increaſed by their firſt ſucceſs, and B though yet their number was but ſmall, they thought themſelves many, and ſo did the Romans think them too, becauſe of their good Fortune. The Romans, who always obſerve Military diſcipline, were that time by their ſudden aſſaulting, ſo troubled, they obſerved no order, and fled: yet whenſoever they turned again upon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Jews, partly becauſe their eagerneſs was ſuch that they did not much ſeek to defend themſelves, inſomuch that they eaſily ſtayed the Jews from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtill increaſing, they were much diſordered and at laſt forced to forſake the field, and leave their tents: and the whole Legion had been in great danger, had not Titus upon the news thereof ſpeedily reliev'd them, and upbraiding their cowardlineſs recalled C them from flight; who with them, and the choſen men he brought, encountring the Jews on one ſide, ſlew many of them, wounded divers, put the reſt to flight, and forced them into the Valley. The Jews being now in the lower ground, and having endured much at the Romans hands, ſince fortune frowned upon them, turned again, and having the Valley between them, they fought with the Romans; And the fight continued till noon.

The Jews drive the Romans from their Camp.

The fight of the Jews with the Romans.

A little after mid-day, Titus guarding the the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others to prevent the excurſions of the Jews, commanded the reſt to entrench themſelves in the top of the Mountain. The Jews thought the Romans had fled, and their Sentinel upon the Walls, making a ſign to them by ſhaking his Garment up and down, a great multitude of them ran violently upon the D Romans, as though they had been Savage Beaſts, ſo that none of their enemies were able to withſtand them; but as though they had been ſtricken with ſome Engine; ſo all of them were diverſly ſcattered and forced to fly into the Mountain. But Titus on the ſide of the Mountain remained with but few with him; notwithſtanding his friends, who for their love to their Emperour ſtayed with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to fly from the Jews, who deſperately charged them, and not to endanger himſelf for them, who ought rather to abide it than he: That he ſhould think upon his quality and condition, who was not a private Souldier, but General of them all, and Lord of the whole World, and not abide where there was ſuch E danger. But he pretended he heard them not, oppoſed himſelf againſt them that aſſaulted him, ſtriking them upon the faces, killed thoſe that made reſiſtance, and purſued the reſt down the Hill, and forced them to retire. The Jews were amazed at his Valour, yet did not flie into the City, but avoided him both ſides, and fled into the Valley: and he purſuing them hindred their flight. In the mean time thoſe that were encamping above, ſeeing their Comrades beneath put to flight, fled likewiſe, thinking themſelvs not able to reſiſt the Jews, and imagining that Titus was likewiſe fled: for had they thought he had made head, they never would have forſaken their quarters; but now in diſorder, they knew not wherefore, ſome fled one way, and ſome another, till perceiving the Emperour ingaged, and fearing what might befal him, they with F loud cries ſignified it unto the whole Legion. Whereupon the Romans turning again, and upbraiding one another for deſerting their Emperor in ſuch danger, they rallyed and came with all the violence they could upon the Jews, and driving them down the Mountain, forced them to retire; yet the Jews fought in their retreat, and ſeeing the Romans too hard, becauſe they were upon the higher ground, they drew down into the Valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were drawn up againſt him, and commanded the reſt to go and finiſh their Trences. And he with thoſe that were with him to defend the workmen, kept the Jews from moleſting them. So, if I may ſpeak without flattery or envy, Cæſar himſelf did twice preſerve the whole Legion from deſtruction, and gave the Souldiers opportunity to entrench themſelves.

hands, to be compared to this, although they ſet thee on fire to purge thee from Iniquity?
Now thou wert ſeparate from the ſervice of God, and couldſt not ſubſiſt long, being made a Sepulchre of thine own Inhabitants, and thy Temple by thy Civil Wars become a Grave of dead Bodies. Nevertheleſs, It is not impoſſible but thou mayſt be reſtored to thy former Eſtate, if firſt thou appeaſe Gods wrath that hath made thee deſolate. But I muſt not give place unto ſorrow, L and write a Lamentation of my miſerable Country, ſeeing I have undertaken to write a Hiſtory of all things that paſt there. Wherefore I will recount the reſt of the Impieties of theſe Seditious.

John aſſaulted on both ſides.

They of Jeruſalem had welnigh burnt all their Corn.

The ſeditious People being divided into three Companies ; Eleazar and his followers who had the keeping of the holy firſt-fruits, and all the ſacred Oblations, came againſt John when they were drunk. And they who followed John ſpoiling the People, aſſaulted Simon, who was ſuccoured by the City. Wherefore when John was aſſaulted on both ſides, he turned ſome of his Souldiers againſt Simon, and the reſt againſt Eleazar : againſt Simon he uſed Darts to caſt from the Porches of the Temple ; and againſt Eleazar he uſed Engines for ſhot. And alwayes, ſo often as they above his head ceaſed (as M often they did, being either weary or drunken) he fiercely aſſaulted Simon and his men.
Alſo as far as he drave them into the City, ſo far did he fire all, and burnt Houſes full of Corn and other Neceſſaries ; and that which he left unburned, Simon at his return (when John was gone into the Temple) ſet on fire : as if on purpoſe to give the Romans an advantage, they had conſumed all their Proviſions for the Siege.

A wretched calamity in Jeruſalem.

To be ſhort, all was conſumed with fire about the Temple, and the City was levelled and made plain ground to fight in, and the Corn burnt that might have ſufficed for many years ; by which means they were reduced by a Famine of their own making, which could not have been brought upon them had they not cauſed it themſelves. The Citizens were in every place a prey to thoſe that were Seditious on one ſide, and to them N that beſieged them on the other ; and like a great Body torn in pieces betwen theſe two.
The old Men and Women aſtoniſhed with theſe Calamities, prayed for the good ſucceſs of the Romans, and deſired their forreign Enemy might deliver them from their Civil Diſſentions.

This was the occaſion of great fear and terrour among them all ; and the more, becauſe it was no time now to conſult, and no hope left of accommodation, or flight to them that deſired it. For all places were kept, and the Rebels within kill'd whoever they perceived well-wiſhers to the Romans, or did endeavour to fly to them, as common Enemies. However theſe wicked perſons agreed in this, to put the juſt Men to death, who beſt deſerved to live. Day and night nothing could be heard but the noiſe of them O that fought one againſt another ; yet the condition of them that lived in perpetual

A fear was far more [illegible]rable, who every day had new cauſes and occaſions of ſorrow given them ; yet durſt they not publickly lament, for fear ; and ſo not daring to ſhew their grief, they ſecretly ſorrowed : no man obſerved any reverence to them that were alive amongſt them, nor took any care to bury the dead. The cauſe of both which was, that every man deſpaired of himſelf. For whoſoever were not joyned with the Seditious, grew to be careleſs of all things, as making account preſently to die a thouſand deaths. But the Seditious gathering the dead bodies upon heaps, continued their fighting, and trod upon them ; and as it were encouraging themſelves by the dead under their feet, they became more cruel, ſtill deviſing new ſtratagems one againſt another, and immediatly executing whatſoever they deviſed without any B commiſeration ; omitting no kind of Murther, and leaving no cruelty unpractiſed : ſo that John prophan'd the holy things of the Temple, and made them Engins of War.
For formerly the Prieſts and People had determined to underprop the Temple, and build it twenty Cubits higher, and King Agrippa, with great labour and expence, had ſent them in Timber for that purpoſe from Mount Libanus. Which being put off by the Wars, John took the Timber and made uſe of it : for that deſign he erected a Tower to fight againſt thoſe that aſſaulted him from off the Temple ; and this Tower he built along the Wall over againſt the Chapter-houſe that ſtandeth on the Weſt ſide of the Temple ; for he could build it in no other place ſo conveniently. And having thus impiouſly furniſhed himſelf with Engines, he hoped hereby to have de-C ſtroyd his Enemies. But God made his labour in vain, and before he could prevail againſt them, brought the Romans againſt the City.

Lamentation and mourning in Jeruſalem

The cruelty of the Seditious in Jeruſalem.

John made uſe of the Wood, that was kept for holy uſes, to make Engines of.

For after that Titus had gathered together part of his Army, and ordered the reſt to meet him at Jeruſalem, he departed from Cæſarea, having three Legions that lately under the conduct of his Father Veſpaſian had waſted all Judea, and the twelfth Legion that ſometime under Ceſtius were overcome, and put to flight by the Jews : who being valiant enough of themſelves, were impatient to be imploy'd again againſt the Jews, to revenge themſelves of their former diſgrace. Titus commanded the fifth Legion to meet him at Jeruſalem, and to march by Emmaus, and the tenth Legion by Jericho : the reſt he took with himſelf, accompanied with the Kings forces that came D to help him, having been reinforced with conſiderable Supplys out of Syria. Titus alſo brought forces with him to ſupply the number that was wanting, which forces were ſent by Veſpaſian under Mutianus into Italy: for he brought two thouſand ſelect men from the Legions at Alexandria, and three thouſand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his cheifeſt friend, and one next him in Authority, who before was Governour of Egypt, and thought a fit man to be Governour of the Army ; for that he was the firſt that entertain'd the Emperour being new elected, and joyn'd faithfully with him before he knew what ſucceſs he ſhould have : he was preſent with him in all his affairs as his chiefeſt Counſellor, and was renowned both for his Wiſdom and Experience.

CHAP. II.

How Titus went to Jeruſalem to ſee their ſtrength, and how he was in great danger.

TItus being now to go into the Enemies Country, cauſed all his Auxiliaries to march in the Van : after whom followed the Pioneers and thoſe appointed to F pitch the Tents : after them the baggage of the Rulers and Governours of his Army, & with them the armed Souldiers. Next theſe came Titus himſelf accompanied with his choice men, and many that bare his Colours : next, the Horſemen march'd immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certain choſen men, and their Companies followed. After them the Eagle, with many other Enſignes : and the Trumpets went before them. And after them followed the Army marching ſix in a rank : then the multitude of Servants that followed every Legion did drive their baggage before them : laſtly came the Hirelings, and thoſe that were appointed to guard them. Marching in ſuch comely and warlike manner, as the Romans are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered G by his Father, and then alſo was under the cuſtody of the Roman Gariſons. Staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day : and after a days journey

Titus in danger.

Titus fighteth valiantly with his Enemies pitched his Tents in a place, which in the Jews language [illegible]lled Acanthonaulona, that is, the Valley of Thorns, neer unto a Village named Gabah Saul, which ſignifieth the Valley of Saul, which is almoſt thirty Furlongs from Jeruſalem. From thence accompanied with 600 choſen Horſemen, he went to Jeruſalem, to view how ſtrong it was, and of what courage the Jews were, to ſee if peradventure at ſight of him they would yield without any further adoe. For Titus underſtood (and it was true) that the people deſired Peace, but were overpowerd by the Seditious, and ſo durſt not attempt any thing. Titus riding along the high-way that went to the Walls, ſaw no man: but turning aſide towards the Tower Pſephinos with his Horſemen, an infinite number preſently iſſued out by the Towers of Women, at a Gate oppoſite to Helens Tomb; brake his Guard of Horſemen into two parts, and advanc'd to hinder thoſe Horſemen that were yet in the high way, from joyning with the reſt that had croſt the way, by which means they had divided Titus from the reſt of his company, in ſo much as he could proceed no further for the Ditch of the Town-Wall on one ſide, and for the Garden Pales on the other ſide: and there was no way for him to return unto his Souldiers, the Enemies being between him and home. Many of his Souldiers not knowing their General was in any danger, but ſuppoſing him amongſt them ſtill, fled away. Titus ſeeing that he had only his own valour to truſt to, turned his Horſe againſt his Enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to do the like, and ſo he brake violently into the midſt of them, haſting to get unto his Company. It was evident at that time that God giveth the Victory, and hath a particular care of Kings, Princes and Emperours. For notwithſtanding that an infinite number of Darts and Arrows were ſhot at Titus, and he had no Armour at all (for as we have already ſaid, he came to view, not to fight) yet had he not one wound, but all paſt him; as though purpoſely every one had ſtriven to miſs him. But Titus with his Sword made way, cut down many that oppoſed themſelves againſt him, and with his Horſe paſt over them. The Jews ſeeing Titus his valour, cried out and exhorted one another to ſet upon him; but whitherſoever he turned, the Jews fled, and would not abide by it: likewiſe thoſe Souldiers that were with him, encompaſſed him round. For every mans hope lay in charging through with Titus, before they were cloſed in and oppreſſed. Two of the moſt valiant amongſt them were ſlain, the Horſe of the one was killed with his maſter, but the others Horſe was taken by the Jews. But Titus and the reſt came ſafe into the Camp. And thus the Jews being ſucceſful at firſt, were mightily encouraged, and that encouragement being of moment, made them confident, or rather raſh, a long time after.

Titus putteth his Enemies to flight, and returns in ſafety to his Camp.

CHAP. III.

How the Jews ſallied out upon the Romans as they were pitching their Tents.

Titus Camp was 7. ſtades off the City.

The Seditious agree among themſelves.

THe Legion that was to paſs by Emmaus, being joyned to the reſt of the Army over night, Ceſar the next morning removed, and came to Scopos, where he had a full view of the City and Temple on the North part, the ground adjoyning unto the City being very low, and not improperly called Scopos, being diſtant ſeven Furlongs from the City: in that quarter Titus commanded two Legions to encamp themſelves, and the fifth Legion to retire three Furlongs off, to the intent that the Souldiers who were wearied with travelling all night, might entrench themſelves without fear or danger; no ſooner had they begun their work, but preſently the tenth Legion came, who were to paſs by Jericho; which Veſpaſian had already ſubdued, and placed a Gariſon there. This Legion was commanded to encamp ſix Furlongs from Jeruſalem, near Mount Olivet, on the Eaſt part of the City, and is encloſed with a deep Valley called Cedron. This great Army ſo ſuddenly arriving reconciled the diſſentions within the City for ſome time: and the three Factions beholding with admiration the Roman Camp, became friends, and all differences were compoſed. They began to examine and conſider what madneſs had cauſed them to ſuffer themſelves to be encloſed with three Walls, to their prejudice, and loſs of their lives: and that they ſhould ſtand ſtill, and be ſpectators as it were of ſuch dangerous preparations, without making the leaſt Countermine or proviſion to defeit them; whilſt ſome cried, We are only valiant againſt our ſelves, by our ſedition maſſacring and murdering

A ing one another, till at laſt we ſhall betray our City into the hands of the Romans.

Thus being aſſembled they exhorted one another : and betaking themſelves to their Arms they iſſued out of the City, firſt upon the tenth Legion, and with a great ſhout ſet upon the Romans that were entrenched in the Valley. The Romans being all at work in the Trenches, and moſt of them having laid down their Weapons (preſuming the Jews durſt not have made any ſalley by reaſon of the variance amongſt themſelves) were ſo much ſurprized, that great part of them immediately fled ; ſome of them ſtood to their Arms, but were ſlain before they could get into a poſture of defence. The number of the Jews was daily increaſed by their firſt ſucceſs, and B though yet their number was but ſmall, they thought themſelves many, and ſo did the Romans think them too, becauſe of their good Fortune. The Romans, who always obſerve Military diſcipline, were that time by their ſudden aſſaulting, ſo troubled, they obſerved no order, and fled : yet whenſoever they turned again upon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Jews, partly becauſe their eagerneſs was ſuch that they did not much ſeek to defend themſelves, inſomuch that they eaſily ſtay-ed the Jews from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtill increaſing, they were much diſordered and at laſt forced to forſake the field, and leave their tents : and the whole Legion had been in great danger, had not Titus upon the news thereof ſpeedily reliev'd them, and upbraiding their cowardlineſs recalled C them from flight ; who with them, and the choſen men he brought, encountring the Jews on one ſide, ſlew many of them, wounded divers, put the reſt to flight, and forced them into the Valley. The Jews being now in the lower ground, and having endured much at the Romans hands, ſince fortune frowned upon them, turned again, and having the Valley between them, they fought with the Romans ; And the fight continued till noon.

The fight of the Jews with the Romans.

A little after mid-day, Titus guarding the the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others to prevent the excurſions of the Jews, commanded the reſt to entrench themſelves in the top of the Mountain. The Jews thought the Romans had fled, and their Sentinel upon the Walls, making a ſign to them by ſha-D king his Garment up and down, a great multitude of them ran violently upon the Romans, as though they had been Savage Beaſts, ſo that none of their enemies were able to withſtand them ; but as though they had been ſtricken with ſome Engine ; ſo all of them were diverſly ſcattered and forced to fly into the Mountain. But Titus on the ſide of the Mountain remained with but few with him ; notwithſtanding his friends, who for their love to their Emperour ſtayed with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to fly from the Jews, who deſperately charged them, and not to endanger himſelf for them, who ought rather to abide it than he : That he ſhould think upon his quality and condition, who was not a private Souldier, but General of them all, and Lord of the whole World, and not abide where there was ſuch E danger. But he pretended he heard them not, oppoſed himſelf againſt them that aſſaulted him, ſtriking them upon the faces, killed thoſe that made reſiſtance, and purſued the reſt down the Hill, and forced them to retire. The Jews were amazed at his Valour, yet did not flie into the City, but avoided him both ſides, and fled into the Valley : and he purſuing them hindred their flight. In the mean time thoſe that were encamping above, ſeeing their Comrades beneath put to flight, fled likewiſe, thinking themſelvs not able to reſiſt the Jews, and imagining that Titus was likewiſe fled: for had they thought he had made head, they never would have forſaken their quarters ; but now in diſorder, they knew not wherefore, ſome fled one way, and ſome another, till perceiving the Emperour ingaged, and fearing what might befal him, they with F loud cries ſignified it unto the whole Legion. Whereupon the Romans turning again, and upbraiding one another for deſerting their Emperor in ſuch danger, they ral-lyed and came with all the violence they could upon the Jews, and driving them down the Mountain, forced them to retire ; yet the Jews fought in their retreat, and ſee-ing the Romans too hard, becauſe they were upon the higher ground, they drew down into the Valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were drawn up againſt him, and commanded the reſt to go and finiſh their Trences. And he with thoſe that were with him to defend the workmen, kept the Jews from moleſting them. So, if I may ſpeak without flattery or envy, Cæſar himſelf did twice preſerve the whole Legion from deſtruction, and gave the Souldiers opportunity to entrench themſelves.

Of the ſight within the City upon the feaſt of unleavened Bread.

John entreth and ſeizeth the inward Temple and all the furniture thereof, putteth the Zealots to flight, and raiſeth a mighty ſedition.

DUring the intermiſſion of the Foreign Wars, they fell to their former ſedition again, which cauſed Civil Wars among them. And againſt the feaſt of Unleavened bread, which is the fourteenth day of April (for upon this day the Jews ſay that they were delivered out of the Bondage of Egypt) Eleazer and his Companions opened the Gates, to the intent that all that would might come in to adore and do their devotion. I But John uſed this Feſtival-day as a means to effect his deceit; and cauſed many of his Company that were unknown, to enter in among the people with Weapons under their Garments, giving them charge when they were entring to poſſeſs themſelves of the Temple: and ſo ſoon as they were within, they caſt off their Garments, and ſhewed themſelves in Armour. Preſently a great tumult aroſe within the Temple; for all the people that were not of the Sedition, thought themſelves betrayed: and the Zealots thought this Treaſon only practiſed to prejudice them; ſo that leaving the Gate which they kept before, and leaping down from the Towers without offering to fight, they fled into the Vaults of the Temple. The people flock about the Altar, and others were driven with them into the Temple, and killed with Clubs K and Swords, and trodden under-foot. Many were ſlain upon private hatred, under pretence of ſiding with the Enemy. And whoſoever formerly had offended any of thoſe Traitors, he was put to death, as though he had been one of the Zealots. But they who had cruelly raged againſt the Innocent, gave the wicked leiſure to eſcape out of thoſe Caves whereby they had no harm: and having gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging thereunto, they did now more confidently than before fight againſt Simon: Thus the Sedition that was before divided into three parts, was now reduced into two. Titus being deſirous to bring his Army nearer the City, ſent out a commanded party of Horſe and Foot, which he thought ſufficient to hinder the excurſions of the Jews from Scopos, and another Company he ſent to plain all the L grounds betwixt him and Jeruſalem, who cut down all Hedges, and Pales, and Fences, and Wood (though they were fruit-trees) filled the Valleys, and made it plain ground; levelling the Rocks and Mountains that made the Country unequal; by doing of which all the way was plain'd from Scopos to Herods Monument, which is not far from the Lake of Serpents, called formerly Bethora.

A threefold Sedition divided into two parts.

Whatſoever about Jeruſalem is hollow or troubled with Valleys, is filled up.

CHAP. V.

The Jews ſtratagem againſt the Roman Souldiers. M

ABout this time the Jews deviſed this ſtratagem againſt the Romans. The moſt couragious among the Seditious people went out unto the places called the Womens Towers, and pretended to be driven thither by that party in the City that deſired peace; and that fearing the Romans, they were come thither for ſhelter; others got up on the Walls, and pretended themſelves Citizens, they called out for Peace and deſired their friendſhip; promiſing to throw open their Gates that the Romans might enter: and whilſt they were ſo doing they threw ſtones at their Companions aforeſaid, pretending to drive them from the Gates. They pretend likewiſe great earneſtneſs N and importunity to the people for their conſent, and as if that had fail'd they ſeemed to endeavour to force their paſſage to the Gates, ſometimes advancing as if they would have gone off to the Romans, and then again retreating as men in great trouble and confuſion. The Romans perceived not their deſigne but ſeeing the Seditious ready to fall into their hands, and the people (as they thought) ready to open the Gates, prepar'd in poſt-haſte to have entred into the City. But Titus ſuſpected their Kindneſs, as ſeeing no reaſon for it. For the day before, having by Joſeph offered them peace, he perceived their minds far from any ſuch thoughts: wherefore he commanded the Souldiers to keep their quarters and not remove; yet ſome of them, appointed to work in the Trenches, taking their weapons ran unto the Gates, and the Jews who O ſeemed to be driven out of the City, fled in appearance, but at laſt when they came unto

A the Gates of the Towers, faced about and encompaſſed the Romans, and aſſaulted them upon their backs: and they that were upon the Walls caſt all kind of Darts and Stones upon them, ſo that they ſlew many and wounded more; for it was not eaſie to eſcape being aſſaulted both behind and before. Moreover, they were conſcious that they had offended, and in fear of being puniſhed, cauſed them to reſiſt the more ſtoutly; ſo that after a long conflict, and many wounds given and received, at laſt the Romans were worſted, and the Jews purſued them to Herods Monument. And having done them much miſchief, the Jews returned with great joy, deriding the Romans for being ſo eaſily deceived, lifting up their Shields and Bucklers, by way of exultation.

The Victory of the Jews

The Roman Souldiers were highly threatned by their Captains, and Cæſar accoſted B them with this ſpeech: The Jews led only with deſperation, do all things with advice and counſel, deviſing deceits: and fortune favoureth their practices becauſe they are orderly, and true one to another. But the Romans (whom for their Obedience and Diſcipline fortune was wont formerly to favour) do contrariwiſe offend herein, and for their raſh and unadviſed fighting, are overcome: and which is worſt of all, in Cæſars preſence offering to fight without Orders, contrary to military Law and Diſcipline; which I am ſure my Father will be unſatisfied to hear. For he who from his infancy, hath been trained up in Arms, never offended in this ſort; and what ſhall we ſay to our Law that puniſheth the leaſt diſobedience with death, when our whole Army diſobey the Emperours command: But (ſaith he) they who ſo arrogantly have diſobeyed our command, ſhall preſently underſtand, that among the Ro- C mans, Victory againſt the Generals command, is but infamy. Titus having ſpoken in anger, declared what he would do, and how he purpoſed to puniſh them. Which ſtrook them ſo deeply, they looked upon themſelves as deſperate, and people appointed to die. But all the other Legions flocking about Titus, beſought him to pardon their fellow-Souldiers, and to remit the raſhneſs of ſome few, for the obedience of the reſt, aſſuring him that their future valour ſhould be a recompence for this their offence. Whereupon Cæſar was pacified, partly thinking it moſt profitable, partly to gratifie the reſt; for he purpoſed to puniſh one man only, but to rebuke all, and ſignifie his diſpleaſue, and ſo he was reconciled to his Souldiers; ſtrictly charging them to be wiſer for the future: after which he deviſed how he might be revenged on the Jews.

Cæſar's ſharp oration to his Souldiers.

The Romans Souldiers beſeech Titus for their fellows in Arms.

D When all the ground between the Walls of Jeruſalem and his Army was in four days made plain; Titus being deſirous to conduct the baggage, and the reſt of the multitude in ſafety, placed the beſt of his men in good order, and cauſed them to march from the North part of the City unto the Weſt, along by the Walls of the City, placing his Foot in the Front, his Horſe in the Rear, and between them both the Archers, whereby the Jews were diſabled to make any Salley. Titus Souldiers being thus diſpoſed, the baggage of the three Legions and the multitude paſſed along without any interruption. And Titus himſelf being advanced within two Furlongs of the City Walls, pitched his Tent againſt that Angle that is called Pſephynos, where the compaſs of the Wall from the North bends into the Weſt: the other part of the E Army entrenched itſelf againſt that part of the Wall that is called Hippicos, diſtant in like manner two Furlongs from the City. But the tenth Legion remained upon Mount Olivet where it was before.

CHAP. VI.

The deſcription of Jeruſalem.

F Jeruſalem was compaſſed round with a treble Wall, only on one ſide it was incloſed with Valleys inacceſſible: and on that ſide it had only one Wall. It was built upon two little Hills, oppoſit to one another, and ſeparated with a Valley, wonderfully thick built with houſes. One of theſe Hills is far higher and ſteeper than the other, inſomuch that becauſe of the ſtrength of it, King David in times paſt called it a Caſtle (this David was the Father of King Solomon, who firſt builded the Temple in that place) but we at this day call it the high Market-place. The other Hill called Acra, is the place where the lower part of the City ſtands. Oppoſite againſt this Hill, there was alſo another lower than this Acra, and divided from it formerly with a large Valley, but afterward when the Aſmoneans reigned, they fill'd up this G Valley, to joyn the City unto the Temple, taking down the top of Acra, and making it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The Valley, by which the two higher Hills

Agrippa's coſt in building the Wall.

Hills are ſeparated is called Tyropæon, and reacheth unto Siloa (which is a Fountain of ſweet Water.) Without the City were two Hills compaſſed with deep Vallies: which Hills being rocky and ſteep, were every way inacceſſible. The oldeſt of the three Walls, (by reaſon of the Valley about it, and the Hill whereon it ſtood) could not eaſily be taken; for beſide the difficulty of the ſituation, it was very ſtrongly built, and repaired by David, Solomon, and other Kings. This Wall, beginning at the Tower called Hippicos, paſſeth on to that called Xyſtus, and ſo to the Palace, and at laſt endeth in the Weſt porch of the Temple: on the other ſide towards the Weſt it begins at the ſame Tower; and paſſing by the place that is called Betiſo, it deſcends to the Gate of the Eſſeans, and ſo into the South, and from thence again it bendeth into the Eaſt, where is alſo Solomons Pond, and reacheth unto the place called Ophlan, where it is joyned unto the Eaſt Porch of the Temple. The ſecond Wall beginning at the Gate that is called Genath (which is a Gate of the former Wall) and encompaſſing the North part of the City, it reacheth to Antonia, a Caſtle ſo called. The third Wall beginneth at the Tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth to the North-part, and from thence to the Tower Pſephina, over againſt the Sepulchre of Helena, that was Queen of Adiabena, & Mother of King Izates: and paſſing along by the Kings Caves, it turneth towards the Tower near the Monument of Fullo, and in the Valley called Cedron it joyneth with the old Wall. Agrippa encompaſſed that part of the City that he built, with this Wall; it being before all open and without defence. The City grew afterwards ſo populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabit without the Walls: and this Wall reacheth a great way, being joyned unto the Hill next the City on the North ſide of the Temple. There was alſo a fourth Hill inhabited, named Bezetha, ſituate againſt Antonia, but ſeparated from it with very deep Ditches, made on purpoſe to render the approaches to the Fort Antonia more dangerous and difficult; the deepneſs of which ditches, made the Fort ſeem higher than it was. This place being added unto the City, is called in that Country-language Bezetha, which ſignifieth the new City. And the Inhabitants deſired it might be fortified, Agrippa, Father to this Agrippa that finiſht the Wall, begun the Wall aforementioned: But fearing Claudius Cæſar, hearing how ſumptuous a Wall he built, ſhould ſuſpect him for deſigning to revolt, he only laid the Foundation of it, and left it unfiniſhed.

The third Wall had 90. Towers.

Pſephina was 70. Cubits high.

The City could never have been taken by force, had he finiſhed that Wall as he began; it being built twenty Cubits long, and ten Cubits broad with hard Stone, which could neither eaſily be undermined, nor battered with Engines: and this Wall was built ten Cubits high, and no doubt had been raiſed higher, had not the liberality of the founder been checked. Yet afterwards by the Jews induſtry the ſame Wall was raiſed twenty Cubits high; the Battlements hereof were two Cubits high, and the Tower three Cubits, and in all it was twenty four Cubits high, as before. Upon the Wall were three Towers, twenty Cubits broad, and twenty Cubits high, built four-ſquare very ſtrong, and of as firm a foundation as the Wall it ſelf, which for the building and fair ſtone was not inferiour to the Temple above. Within this ſtrong Tower, which reacheth twenty Cubits high, were Rooms for men to lodg in, and Ciſterns to receive Rain-Water, and large turning ſtairs to every Room in it: and this third Wall had four-ſcore and ten of theſe Towers, and between every Tower were two hundred Cubits ſpace. The middle Wall had fourteen Towers, and the old Wall had threeſcore, and the compaſs of the whole City was three and thirty Furlongs. And although the third Wall was admirable, yet the Tower of Pſephina, which was built upon a Corner of the Wall, between the North and the Weſt part of the City, was more admirable, (againſt which part Titus had encamped himſelf) for it was ſeventy Cubits high, had eight Angles, and was ſo fair a Proſpect, that from thence upon a clear Sun-ſhine day, one might perceive Arabia, and ſee the uttermoſt parts of all the dominions of the Hebrews unto the Sea. Juſt oppoſite to this was the Tower Hippicos, and near unto it were other two, that King Herod builded upon the old Wall, which in bigneſs, beauty and ſtrength, ſurpaſſed all the reſt in the World.

Herod called three Towers by the names of three his moſt deareſt Friends.

For King Herod, beſides his natural liberality and deſire to adorn this City, pleaſed himſelf ſo much in beautifying theſe Towers, that they excell'd all other; and then he dedicated them to three moſt renowned perſons, whoſe names they alſo did bear, to wit, to his Brother, his Friend, and his Wife: ſhe (as is aforeſaid) having been put to death for jealouſie; and the other two been ſlain in the Wars, after they had fought and performed valiantly. The Tower Hippicos, called by the name of his Friend, had

A four Corners, and every one of them was five and twenty Cubits broad, as many in length, and thirty Cubits in height, being no place hollow; and above the high places and ſtone-work, there was a Well to receive Rain-water, twenty Cubits deep: above it were houſes with double roofs twenty five Cubits high, and divided into many rooms: and above them were Battlements two Cubits high: and Turrets three Cubits high: ſo that the whole height was accounted to be eighty five Cubits.
The ſecond Tower that by his Brothers name he called Phaſelus, was in breadth and length fourty Cubits, and ſo many Cubits high, in figure of a ſquare Pillar, all which height was ſolid, and not hollow within: and above this a Porch ten Cubits high, decked with Turrets and Pinacles. Over the midſt of this Porch he built another B Tower, diſtinguiſhed into goodly Rooms and ſumptuous Baths, that it ſhould not want any thing neceſſary for a Prince: on the Top it was beautified with Turrets and Pinacles, ſo that all its height was almoſt fourſcore and ten Cubits: And it reſembled the Tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continual light is kept to guide the Seamen that ſail thither, but this was of greater circumference. In this houſe at that time Simon lodged, and tyrannized over the people. The third Tower was, according to the Queens Name, called Mariamme, the Wife of Herod, twenty Cubits high, all ſolid, and other twenty Cubits broad, having more magnificent and beautiful Houſes and Lodgings than the reſt. For the King thought it meet, that the Tower called by his Wives name, ſhould be more beautiful than the other who only C bare the names of men, but they were ſtronger than this that bare the name of a Woman.
This Tower was in all fifty five Cubits high.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

Hippicos 85 Cubits high.

Phaſelus 90 Cubits high.

Mariamme a goodly Tower 55 Cubits high.

Theſe three Towers were of great height, yet by reaſon of their ſituation they ſeemed far higher: for the old Wall whereupon they were built was placed upon high ground, and the top of the Hill whereupon they ſtood was above thirty Cubits high, whereby their height was much increaſed. The richneſs alſo was admirable; for it was not ordinary ſtone, but all White Marble, every ſtone being twenty Cubits long, ten Cubits broad, five Cubits thick, and all ſo ingeniouſly contrived, that every ſtone by it ſelf ſeemed a Tower; and every Tower ſeemed to be but one Stone. Theſe were placed on the North ſide of the City; and adjoyning to them within the City D was the Kings Palace, ſurpaſſing all that can be ſpoken of it: being for greatneſs and excellent work to be compared to the richeſt buildings in the World. It was compaſſed about with a Wall thirty Cubits high, adorned with goodly Towers round about, every one of like diſtance from other, beautified with dwelling Houſes and Lodgings for a hundred of the Nobility. The variety of the Marble it was built withal was admirable, for there was no ſort, how rare or coſtly ſoever, but was there. The Ceiling of the Rooms for the length of the Beams and the beauty thereof, paſſed all credit; and then their number; and richneſs of their furniture was extraordinary. In every room there were many Veſſels of gold and ſilver, and many Porches round about, one anſwerable unto another, and Pillars in every one. There were many pleaſant Walks with E divers Trees, and many Allies with Fountains and Waters-works, and Ciſterns adorned with Brazen Images, from which ran out Water, and about the Water many Dovehouſes full of tame Pigeons. But it is impoſſible ſufficiently to declare the riches and beauty of the Kings Palace, and a grief to think what goodly things, and how rich, the Theives did there ſet on fire: for theſe things were not burnt by the Romans, but by the Seditious Thieves (as is before ſaid,) at the beginning of this Rebellion, who conſumed all with fire, even from the Caſtle Antonia from whence the fire came, and deſtroyed the Kings Palace, and the Covers and Tops of the three Towers. The Temple was, as is before ſaid, built upon a hard Mountain, and at the firſt, the Plain upon the top thereof was ſcarcely big enough to contain it and the F Temple-yard, the Hill being very ſteep. But when King Solomon, who alſo built the Temple, had compaſſed the Eaſt part thereof with a Wall, he alſo placed a Porch upon the Rampire, and ſo for many ages after, it lay unfenced on other parts: wherefore the People every day bringing earth thither, at laſt made it plain and large enough: and breaking down the North Wall, they took in all that ſpace which the Temple had formerly taken up: and the Hill being now incloſed with a threefold Wall, it was a work beyond all imagination. In the finiſhing whereof many Ages were ſpent, and all the holy Treaſure offered to God, even from all parts of the World, was employed therein, as well in the Buildings of the higher, as of the lower part of the Temple; the foundations whereof were laid three hundred Cubits deep, G and in many places more: yet could not all the Foundations be ſeen, being buried in Valleys, that were filled up to make them equal with the ſtrait ſtreets of the City.

The ſtones of this building were of fourty Cubits : for the abundance of treaſure and H liberality of the people did effect that which was ſcarcely poſſible ; and that which all men thought could never have come to paſs, in time and by induſtry came to perfection.

The Porches were built of white Marble-ſtone, ſuſtained by Pillars.

A peculiar place deſtinated for Women for Religion ſake.

Some of the Gates were of Gold, ſome of Silver, and one of Corinthian Braſs.

The Sacred Sanctuary.

The building was anſwerable unto theſe Foundations. For all the Porches were double, and every one was ſupported by Pillars, each of them being five and twenty Cubits high, and all of one piece, and of white Marble : the top whereof was all of Cedar, whoſe natural beauty, for the good joyning of the wood and poliſhing thereof, did aſtoniſh all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carved works. Theſe Porches were thirty Cubits broad ; and the compaſs of them altogether, with the Fort of Antonia, was ſix Furlongs. The Court was curiouſly wrought and paved I with all ſorts of ſtones. The way to the Second Temple was incloſed with ſtones of Lattice-work, which were three Cubits high, and moſt beautifully wrought : in which were placed certain Pillars equally diſtant one from another, to ſhew the Law of purification ; ſome being written upon in Latine letters, others in Greek, forbidding all ſtrangers to enter into the Holy-place: for the ſecond Temple is called the Holy-place. To go unto the ſecond from the firſt, we muſt paſs fourteen ſtairs, and it was fourſquare aloft, and encloſed with a Wall by it ſelf ; whoſe outſide being forty Cubits high, was all covered with ſtairs to aſcend up into it ; and within it was five and twenty Cubits high : for all the part of the inner ſide was unſeen, becauſe it was built on the deſcent of a Hill. After the fourteen Stairs, there was a Plain made level with the K Wall of three hundred Cubits : from thence paſſed on five other Stairs which lead to the Gates, whereof on the North-ſide and the South there were eight, four on each ſide, and two on the Eaſt. For it was neceſſary that there ſhould be a peculiar place for Women to exerciſe their devotion in, which alſo was encloſed with a Wall. And ſo it was neceſſary there ſhould be two doors : and againſt the firſt Gate there was oppoſite unto it, one Gate on the North-ſide, and another on the South, both ſeparated from the reſt, whereby we entred the Womens appartment, for it was not lawful for any to paſs by any other Gate unto the Women, neither could they go beyond their own door, becauſe of the Wall : for that place was common both to the Women of that Nation, and all ſtrange Women that came for Religion ſake. There was no L Gate on the Weſt part, but a Wall that reacheth along in that place. Between the Gates were Porches oppoſite one againſt another, reaching from the Wall unto the Treaſure-houſe, ſupported with great and goodly Pillars, being as plain, and as big as they below. The Gates were covered with Gold and Silver, as alſo the poſts and foreparts thereof were, one only excepted that was covered with Corinthian Braſs, far ſurpaſſing in beauty the other that were covered with Silver and Gold. In every Gate there were two doors, each one thirty Cubits high, and fifteen Cubits broad : and after the entrance where they were made larger, every one had on each ſide Seats thirty Cubits long, and large like a Tower, and fourty Cubits high, each one ſupported with two Pillars twelve Cubits thick. All the other Gates were M of the like greatneſs, but that which was covered with Corinthian Braſs, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the Women, and opened into the Eaſt Gate of the Temple, doubtleſs was bigger than the reſt : for it was fifty Cubits high (the Gates whereof were fourty Cubits) and was more richly adorned than the reſt : for the cover of Gold and Silver was thicker than it was in the reſt, which Alexander Tiberius his Father had melted, to cover all the nine Gates. And there were fifteen Stairs, that went from the Wall that ſeparated the Women, unto the great Gate of the Temple : for theſe Stairs were ſhorter by five ſteps than thoſe that went to the other Gates. The Temple it ſelf was ſituated in the midſt of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuary, and had twelve Stairs to go unto it. The Front whereof was in N height and breadth a hundred Cubits : and behind, it was fourty Cubits : and before it, was as it were two ſhoulders on each ſide riſing up in height twenty Cubits. The firſt Gate hereof was ſeventy Cubits high, and twenty five wide, and had no door : for it ſignified that Heaven was ſpread over all, and might be ſeen in every place : and all the foreparts were guilded with Gold, and all the firſt building did appear and might be ſeen without, and all that was within and about the Gate gliſtered with Gold. The inner part thereof was divided into two Rooms, whereof only the firſt Room might be ſeen ; which was in height fourſcore and ten Cubits, and in length fourty, and in breadth twenty. The inner Gate was (as is already ſaid) all guilded with Gold, and all the Wall about it ; and above it : it had a Golden Vine, whereon O were hanging Cluſters of Grapes of Gold, every Cluſter being as long as a man is high

A high. And becauſe it was ceeled above, the inner Temple did ſeem to be lower than it was without: and it had Golden Gates, fifty five Cubits high, and ſixteen Cubits broad.

The ear of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

The Hangings were alſo of the ſame length, being a Babylonian Vail, wrought with Violet, and Purple Silk and Scarlet, admirable to behold: the permixtion of which colours had a myſtical meaning, bearing as it were the ſignification of the whole World. For the Scarlet ſeemed to expreſs the Fire, the Silk the Earth, the Violet the Air, and the Purple the Sea; partly in their colours reſembling them, partly alſo as having their beginning from them: for the Purple is ingendred in the Sea, and the Silk is produced by the Earth. In this Tapeſtry work was curiouſly wrought, and deciphered all the Speculations of the Heavens, only the Celeſtial Signs excepted. Being B entred within, you come into a lower place of the Temple, which was ſixty Cubits high, and as many in length, and 20 in breadth. Which place was divided into two parts, whereof firſt contained fourty Cubits, having in it three moſt admirable things, famous throughout the World, to wit, a Candleſtick, a Table, and the Altar of Incenſe. Upon the Candelſtick ſeven Lamps were placed, ſignifying the ſeven Planets, (for ſo many did there come all out of one ſtem of the Candelſtick). Upon the Table were ſtanding twelve loaves of Bread, ſignifying the twelve Celeſtial Signs, and Revolution of the Year. By the Altar of Incenſe (out of which proceedeth thirteen Odours, coming partly from the Sea which is unhabitable, and partly from the Earth which is inhabited) is ſignified that all things are in the hands of God, and owe him C obedience. The inner part of the Temple contained 20 Cubits, which alſo was ſeparated from the other part by a Vail, and nothing was within it: this place was the Holy of Holies, and no man might enter, look into it, nor violate the ſame. On each ſide of the lower Temple there were many Lodgings and Doors to paſs into, every one of them having three roofs one above another; and there was a Gate which led unto both ſides of the Temple, and unto theſe Rooms: but the higher part of the Temple had not the like Rooms on each ſide, and therefore it was made ſo much narrower than the other, yet was it higher than it by 40 Cubits, neither was it ſo ſumptuous as the lower. For the whole height was 100 Cubits, and the ground thereof 60. The outermoſt part was ſo curious and richly wrought, it was impoſſible to imagine any D workmanſhip that it wanted: for it was all covered with a Maſſie Plate of pure Gold, which ſhined far brighter than the Morning Sun, ſo that it dazled the Eyes of the beholders, as doth the Sun when it is gazed upon. And afar off it ſeemed to ſtrangers that came thither, like a white Mountain: for where the Temple was not guilded with Gold, there was it Milk-white. The top hereof was all ſet full of Rods of Gold, very ſharp at the uper end like Pikes, leſt the Birds ſhould come and ſit thereon, and ſo defile it: ſeveral of the Stones wherewith it was Built, were fourty-five Cubits large, five Cubits in length, and ſix Cubits broad. Before the Temple there ſtood an Altar fifteen Cubits high, being fourty Cubits broad, and as many long, and four-ſquare, having Corners made like Horns. The way to this Altar was on the South E ſide, where by little and little it aſcended from below to the Altar. This Altar was built without any Iron, and never Iron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were encloſed with Stone-work very beautiful, which was a Cubit high, and ſeparated the People from the Prieſts. Thoſe that were troubled with flux of Seed, or Leproſy, were expulſed the City, Women alſo having their monthly courſes; but thoſe that were not unclean, might paſs this foreſaid limit. Likewiſe men that were not purified, were not permitted to come within the inner Temple; and thoſe that were, might not come among the Prieſts: thoſe alſo that deſcended from the line of the Prieſts, and for blindneſs did not adminiſter their function, were notwithſtanding admitted into the place appointed for the reſt of the Prieſts that were ſound, and had ſhare as they had; yet did they go attired as Lay-men, for only he that did Sacrifice, might wear F Prieſtly attire.

Three admirable works: The Candleſtick, the Table and Cenſer.

The outward Court of the Temple coveed with maſſy Plates of Gold.

The Prieſts that were admitted to the Altar and Temple had no infirmity, they were cloathed in fine Linen, abſtained from Wine, and lived in abſtinence for reverence of Religion, leſt they ſhould ſin whilſt they offered Sacrifice. The High-Prieſt alſo aſcended with the Prieſts into the Temple; yet not always, but every ſeventh day, and in the Calends of every month, or on a Feſtival, celebrated according to the cuſtom of their Country, wherein all the people were preſent. When he ſacrificed he was girded with a Vail, which covered his Thighs to his Privities, under which he wore a Linen Garment hanging down to his feet, and above it a round Violet Garment fringed at the Skirts, and adorned with Bells of Gold, and Pomgranats of the ſame; the G Bells ſignified Thunder, and the Pomgranats Lightning. Upon his breaſt he wore a Veſt of five colours; Gold, Purple, Scarlet, Silk and Violet, wherewith (as we have H ſaid) the Vails of the Temple were wrought. He had likewiſe a Rochet of the ſame enriched with pure Gold, and in ſhape like the Garment he wore on his Body to the Thighs: it was alſo buttoned with two Golden Buttons; made in the form of Aſps, wherein was incloſed the greateſt and moſt precious Sardonyx Stone that could be found, bearing the names of the 12 Tribes of Iſrael engraven. On the other ſide did hang 12 precious Stones, three and three in a rank, divided into four rows. In the firſt was the Ruby, the Topaz, and the Emerauld: in the ſecond the Carbuncle, the Jaſper, and the Saphire: in the third the Agate, the Amethyſt, and the Diamond: in the laſt the Onyx, the Beryl, and Chryſolite: in every one of which one name of the twelve Tribes was written. Upon his head he wore a Miter of Silk, which was I crowned with Hyacinth: and aloft of it was another Crown of Gold, wherein was engraven ſacred Letters, to wit, the four Vowels. The Garment that he commonly wore was not altogether ſo glorious; this he uſed only when he entred into the Sanctuary, which was but once a year, and that alone, the whole Nation obſerving a Solemn Faſt that day. But we will hereafter ſpeak more at large of the City and Temple, the Laws, Cuſtoms, Ordinances and Obſervations, for theſe things cannot be briefly declared. The Caſtle Antonia was ſituate between the two Porches of the firſt Temple, which looked unto the Weſt, and the North: and was built upon a Rock of Stone of fifty Cubits high, on every ſide was inacceſſible: it was built by King Herod, to ſhew the greatneſs and magnificence of his mind. For firſt of all the Rock K at the foot thereof was covered with thin and ſlender Stones like Slates. Which was both an ornament to it, and a ſecurity. Before the Battlements of the Fort there was a Wall three Cubits high, within which the Caſtle Antonia was built fourty Cubits high, being within richly furniſhed, and contrived like the Palace of a King, with all kind of Offices and other neceſſary Rooms. For there were Porches, Baths, and large Halls to place Tents in: ſo that in reſpect of the number and convenience of the Rooms it ſeemed to be a City, and for the magnificence thereof a Kings Palace. The Model of it was like a Tower invironed with four other Towers, at every Corner one, whereof they that were on the South and Eaſt-ſide were ſeventy Cubits high, the other two were but fifty. So that out of the two higheſt, there was a perfect view of L the whole Temple. Where it joyned to the Porches of the Temple, there was on either ſide a pair of Stairs for the Souldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For always the Roman Souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in their Arms upon feſtival days, leſt the people ſhould attempt any Rebellion. For the Temple was as a Check upon the Town, and the Caſtle Antonia commanded the Temple: and had its Guards likewiſe, as there were alſo in Herods Palace, which commanded the higher part of the City. The Hill Bezetha was divided from the City, as is before mentioned; and being the higheſt part of all, was joyned to part of the new City, which hindred the proſpect of the Temple on the North-ſide. And thus I have ſpoken ſufficiently of the City, and the Wall in this place, becauſe we mean hereafter to deſcribe M them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

How the Jews refuſed to yeild, and ſallyed out upon the Romans.

15000 follow Simon.

Simons Camp againſt John.

THe moſt warlike of the people joyned with Simon, being in number ten thouſand, beſide the Idumeans: and thoſe ten thouſand had fifty Captains, all ſubject unto N Simon. The Idumeans that took his part were five thouſand, and had ten Captains, the Chief of whom were Jacob the Son of Soſas, and Simon the Son of Cathla. John, who kept the Temple, had ſix thouſand Armed men, over whom were twenty Captains: to theſe there joyned two thouſand of the Zealots; and four hundred, who before had followed Eleazar, and Simon the Son of Jairus. So that warring one againſt another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that was not ſo Seditious as they, was their prey. Simon kept the upper part of the City, and the greater Wall as far as Cedron; and all that part of the old Wall which is between Siloa, and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the River Euphrates: he alſo kept all the Hill Acra (which is the lower part of the City) unto O Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his Mother. But John kept all the Temple

A ple and the ſpace about it, Ophla, and the valley of Gedron : and that which was between theſe two places which Simon and John kept, was conſumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans Tents were pitched near unto the Walls of the City, yet did not this Sedition ceaſe; for being fleſh'd with their ſucceſs at the Romans firſt coming, they returned preſently to their former animoſity.
And dividing themſelves again,every man fought for his own intereſt, doing all the Romans could have wiſh'd to be done. The Romans did them leſs harm than they did themſelves : for by them the City ſuffered no new calamity,but indured far more miſe-ry before it was taken and deſtroyed by the Romans than it did at that time. The Romans by deſtroying it,did rather end than increaſe their miſery. For the Seditious B did take the City, and the Romans did overcome and take the Seditious, and the City was far ſtronger than the Walls : ſo that all their miſeries may be aſcribed to their own Nation, and nothing but Equity and Juſtice imputed to the Romans, as every one ſhall clearly ſee by that which enſued.

The Seditious took the City and the Romans overcame and took the Seditious.

The City being in this eſtate, Titus with a ſelect body of Horſe went up and down without it,to eſpie where he might moſt eaſily aſſault the Walls. And being in doubt a long time what to do,for that by the Valley his Foot could not poſſible get up; and the Walls were not poſſible to be battered with Engines : at laſt he determined to aſſault it on that part where was the Monument of John the High Prieſt, for there the firſt Wall was lower than in other places; and not fortified with a ſecond C Wall,becauſe that thoſe parts of the new City were but little inhabited ; ſo that from this place the Wall might eaſily be aſſaulted : whereby Titus was perſwaded that the higher City, and the Temple, and Antonia, might eaſily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends, called Nicanor, came unto him ; being ſhot in the left ſhoulder with an Arrow,as he attempted to come near Joſeph, who went thither of purpoſe to perſwade the Jews which were upon the Wall to yield : for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cæſar perceiving their minds, by their violence to him who perſwaded them to that which was moſt expedient for them, was moved, and began with more eagerneſs to beſiege them : wherefore he permitted his Souldiers to demoliſh the Suburbs, and to gather all the Rubbiſh, Stones, and Wood, and other matter toge-D ther,and make therewith a Mount. Then dividing his Army into three parts, he ordered what each of them ſhould do, and in the midſt upon the Mounts he diſpoſed his Archers, and before them Engines for ſhot, wherewith he hindred the Salleys of his Enemies, leſt they ſhould annoy the Work, and beat thoſe off from the Wall, who made any reſiſtance from thence. After which all the Trees being cut down, the Suburbs appeared naked. The Romans having gathered the Wood together, were buſied in the Work, and the Jews were not idle : For the people being tired with Murthers and Robberies, did hope to have an end of their miſery, the Seditious people being buſied againſt their Enemies : and they now hoped that if the Romans did overcome, they might be revenged upon them. John ſtill kept where he was, fearing Si- E mon, yet were his followers very earneſt to aſſault the Romans. But Simon being next unto the ſiege, did not reſt, but placed all along that part of the Wall, men with Darts, which before were taken from Seſteis Governour of the Romans, and found in the Ca-ſtle of Antonia. But the Darts did the Jews ſmall pleaſure,by reaſon that few of them knew how to uſe them ; only ſome who were taught by ſome of the Fugitive Romans uſed them a little. Nevertheleſs they aſſaulted the Roman Souldiers that were building the Mounts with Arrows and Stones, made Salleys upon them by companies, and gave them diſturbance : But the Roman Pioneers were defended by Hurdles,that were of purpoſe ſet before them : and every Legion had ſtrange and admirable Engines againſt the excurſions of their Enemy, and eſpecially the Engines that the tenth F Legion had to caſt Darts, and others that caſt Stones ; which did not only repulſe them by whom they were aſſaulted, but alſo thoſe that ſtood upon the Wall : for every Stone though a Talent weight,was ſhot more than a Furlong,and ſlew not only thoſe that were firſt ſtruck, but alſo many that were ſtriken with the rebound. But the Jews always ſaw the Stones before they fell (for they were white) and avoided them : and they were not only deſcryed by the noiſe they made in flying, but they might eaſily be perceived : by which means the watchmen in the Towers gave warning always when theſe Engines were ſhot off, and when the Stones came, crying in their Country language, The Stone cometh : ſo the Jews upon the Walls knowing what they meant, avoided the Stones, and received no harm. Then the Romans de-G viſed to black the Stones with Ink, that they might not be ſeen as they flew, and do the more Execution. Yet the Jews were not ſo terrified, as to permit the Romans peaceably

For there were Porches, Baths, and large Halls to place Tents in: ſo that in reſpect of the number and convenience of the Rooms it ſeemed to be a City, and for the magnificence thereof a Kings Palace. The Model of it was like a Tower invironed with four other Towers, at every Corner one, whereof they that were on the South and Eaſt-ſide were ſeventy Cubits high, the other two were but fifty. So that out of the two higheſt, there was a perfect view of L the whole Temple. Where it joyned to the Porches of the Temple, there was on either ſide a pair of Stairs for the Souldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For always the Roman Souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in their Arms upon feſtival days, leſt the people ſhould attempt any Rebellion. For the Temple was as a Check upon the Town, and the Caſtle Antonia commanded the Temple: and had its Guards likewiſe, as there were alſo in Herods Palace, which commanded the higher part of the City. The Hill Bezetha was divided from the City, as is before mentioned; and being the higheſt part of all, was joyned to part of the new City, which hindred the proſpect of the Temple on the North-ſide. And thus I have ſpoken ſufficiently of the City, and the Wall in this place, becauſe we mean hereafter to deſcribe M them more at large.

How the Jews refuſed to yeild, and ſallyed out upon the Romans.

15000 follow Simon.

Simons Camp againſt John.

THe moſt warlike of the people joyned with Simon, being in number ten thouſand, beſide the Idumeans: and thoſe ten thouſand had fifty Captains, all ſubject unto Simon. The Idumeans that took his part were five thouſand, and had ten Captains, N the Chief of whom were Jacob the Son of Soſas, and Simon the Son of Cathla. John, who kept the Temple, had ſix thouſand Armed men, over whom were twenty Captains: to theſe there joyned two thouſand of the Zealots; and four hundred, who before had followed Eleazar, and Simon the Son of Jairus. So that warring one againſt another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that was not ſo Seditious as they, was their prey. Simon kept the upper part of the City, and the greater Wall as far as Cedron; and all that part of the old Wall which is between Siloa, and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the River Euphrates: he alſo kept all the Hill Acra (which is the lower part of the City) unto Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his Mother. O But John kept all the Tem-

A ple and the ſpace about it, Ophla, and the valley of Cedron : and that which was between theſe two places which Simon and John kept, was conſumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans Tents were pitched near unto the Walls of the City, yet did not this Sedition ceaſe; for being fleſh'd with their ſucceſs at the Romans firſt coming, they returned preſently to their former animoſity. And dividing themſelves again, every man fought for his own intereſt, doing all the Romans could have wiſh'd to be done. The Romans did them leſs harm than they did themſelves : for by them the City ſuffered no new calamity, but indured far more miſery before it was taken and deſtroyed by the Romans than it did at that time. The Romans by deſtroying it, did rather end than increaſe their miſery. For the Seditious B did take the City, and the Romans did overcome and take the Seditious, and the City was far ſtronger than the Walls : ſo that all their miſeries may be aſcribed to their own Nation, and nothing but Equity and Juſtice imputed to the Romans, as every one ſhall clearly ſee by that which enſued.

The Seditious took the City and the Romans overcame and took the Seditious.

The City being in this eſtate, Titus with a ſelect body of Horſe went up and down without it, to eſpie where he might moſt eaſily aſſault the Walls. And being in doubt a long time what to do, for that by the Valley his Foot could not poſſible get up; and the Walls were not poſſible to be battered with Engines : at laſt he determined to aſſault it on that part where was the Monument of John the High Prieſt, for there the firſt Wall was lower than in other places; and not fortified with a ſecond C Wall, becauſe that thoſe parts of the new City were but little inhabited; ſo that from this place the Wall might eaſily be aſſaulted : whereby Titus was perſwaded that the higher City, and the Temple, and Antonia, might eaſily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends, called Nicanor, came unto him; being ſhot in the left ſhoulder with an Arrow, as he attempted to come near Joſeph, who went thither of purpoſe to perſwade the Jews which were upon the Wall to yield : for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cæſar perceiving their minds, by their violence to him who perſwaded them to that which was moſt expedient for them, was moved, and began with more eagerneſs to beſiege them : wherefore he permitted his Souldiers to demoliſh the Suburbs, and to gather all the Rubbiſh, Stones, and Wood, and other matter toge- D ther, and make therewith a Mount. Then dividing his Army into three parts, he ordered what each of them ſhould do, and in the midſt upon the Mounts he diſpoſed his Archers, and before them Engines for ſhot, wherewith he hindred the Salleys of his Enemies, leſt they ſhould annoy the Work, and beat thoſe off from the Wall, who made any reſiſtance from thence. After which all the Trees being cut down, the Suburbs appeared naked. The Romans having gathered the Wood together, were buſied in the Work, and the Jews were not idle : For the people being tired with Murthers and Robberies, did hope to have an end of their miſery, the Seditious people being buſied againſt their Enemies : and they now hoped that if the Romans did overcome, they might be revenged upon them. John ſtill kept where he was, fearing Si- E mon, yet were his followers very earneſt to aſſault the Romans. But Simon being next unto the ſiege, did not reſt, but placed all along that part of the Wall, men with Darts, which before were taken from Seſteis Governour of the Romans, and found in the Caſtle of Antonia. But the Darts did the Jews ſmall pleaſure, by reaſon that few of them knew how to uſe them; only ſome who were taught by ſome of the Fugitive Romans uſed them a little. Nevertheleſs they aſſaulted the Roman Souldiers that were building the Mounts with Arrows and Stones, made Salleys upon them by companies, and gave them diſturbance : But the Roman Pioneers were defended by Hurdles, that were of purpoſe ſet before them : and every Legion had ſtrange and admirable Engines againſt the excurſions of their Enemy, and eſpecially the Engines that the tenth F Legion had to caſt Darts, and others that caſt Stones; which did not only repulſe them by whom they were aſſaulted, but alſo thoſe that ſtood upon the Wall : for every Stone though a Talent weight, was ſhot more than a Furlong, and ſlew not only thoſe that were firſt ſtruck, but alſo many that were ſtriken with the rebound. But the Jews always ſaw the Stones before they fell (for they were white) and avoided them : and they were not only deſcryed by the noiſe they made in flying, but they might eaſily be perceived : by which means the watchmen in the Towers gave warning always when theſe Engines were ſhot off, and when the Stones came, crying in their Country language, The Stone cometh : ſo the Jews upon the Walls knowing what they meant, avoided the Stones, and received no harm. Then the Romans de- G viſed to black the Stones with Ink, that they might not be ſeen as they flew, and do the more Execution. Yet the Jews were not ſo terrified, as to permit the Romans peaceably peaceably to build the Mount, but Night and Day they hindred them with Stratagemſs H and Salleys. When the Romans had finiſhed their Work, the Carpenter meaſured the ſpace between the Mounts and the Walls, with a Plummet faſtned to a line, which they caſt from one place to another (for they could not meaſure it otherwiſe, becauſe of the Darts from the Walls) and finding that they had Rams long enough, they ſet them up, and Titus commanded the Wall to be battered in three places; to the end that the Battery might not be hindred. The noiſe that theſe Rams made was heard round about the City, which was a great terror to the Citizens, and the Seditious were no leſs afraid. And ſeeing themſelves all in the ſame danger, they determined to joyn unanimouſly together againſt the Romans: the Seditious upbraiding one another that they rather aſſiſted the Enemy, than reſiſted them: and therefore I exhorted one another mutually, at leaſt for that time, to unite and make reſiſtance againſt the Romans. And Simon ſent an Officer unto the Temple, to proclaim leave for all ſuch as would, to come unto the Walls: which alſo John did permit, notwithſtanding he miſtruſted Simon: ſo forgetting their old quarrel, they joyned all together againſt the Romans, and placeing themſelves upon the Walls, they caſt fire upon the Engines of the Romans, and thoſe who manag'd them; throwing Darts againſt them without intermiſſion, whilſt the braveſt amongſt them in great companies leapt down, and deſtroyed that wherewith the Engines were covered, and aſſaulted thoſe that ſtood to defend them; by which means they did the Romans much harm, and more by their deſperate boldneſs than their skill. K

But Titus was ſtill at hand to ſuccor them that ſtood in need: and placing Horſemen and Archers about the Engines, he repulſed the Jews who come to caſt Fire, beat off them that caſt Darts and ſhot Arrows from the Towers, and ſo gave the Rams time and opportunity to play; yet theſe Rams did no great execution, only a corner of a Tower was ſhattered by the Ram of the fift Legion. But without any detriment to the Wall: for the Tower being much higher than the Wall, when the Tower tumbled, it fell over the Wall, and carried nothing along with it. The Jews being repulſed, and for ſome time diſcontinuing their Sallys, perceived the Romans were grown ſecure, and diſperſed carleſly over their Camp, as preſuming their late ill fortune would diſcourage the Jews from any new attack, but they were miſtaken in their account: for the L Jews Sallied privately at the Gate by the Tower of Hippicos, threw fire into their Trenches among their Engines, and aſſaulted them bravely when they had done. But the Romans being quickly ſenſible of their danger, got immediatly together, and with the excellence of their Diſcipline, repelled not only the firſt inſult and fury of the Jews, but beat back all their ſupplys. So there began a grievous Battle about the Engines; the Jews ſtriving to fire, and the Romans to hinder them; great noiſe and clamour there was, and many in the Front were ſlain on both ſides. At firſt the Jews had the better; and their fire did ſome miſchief upon the Engines: and all had been quite conſumed, had not the Souldiers from Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that M they had of themſelves, did fight ſtoutly (being accounted the moſt valiant of all in this Battle) till ſuch time as the Emperour with certain ſelect Horſemen fell violently upon the Enemies: and himſelf ſlew 12 men, for whoſe deaths the reſt fearing, fled, and were forced to retire into the City, and ſo the Engines were ſaved. It chanced that one of the Jews was taken alive, and Titus commanded that he ſhould be crucified before the Wall, that perhaps the reſt being terrified, might yield. After Cæſar was retired, John the Captain of the Idumeans talking upon the Wall with one of his friends, being ſtriken in the breaſt with an Arrow by an Arabian Souldier, preſently died: which cauſed great lamentation among the Jews, and ſorrow amongſt the Seditious, for he was very valiant, and wiſe. N

CHAP. VIII.

The fall of the Tower, and how the two Walls were taken.

A THE night following, there was a great tumult among the Romans: For Titus the Emperour had commanded to build three Towers, 50 Cubits high a-piece, each one upon a ſeveral Mount, that from thence he might the more eaſily beat the Enemies from the Walls: But one of theſe Towers in the midſt of the night fell down B without any aſſault. And making a great noiſe with the fall, fear fell upon the whole Army; who ſuſpecting it a Stratagem of the Jews, every one ran to his Arms, and ſo there was a great tumult in the Camp: and becauſe no man could tell what it was a long time, they ſtood amazed, every one asking his fellow what had hapned. But ſeeing no Enemy come, they began to apprehend Treaſon amongſt themſelves; till ſuch time as Titus underſtanding the matter, cauſed the truth thereof to be preſently proclaimed throughout the Camp; and the Tumult (with much ado) was appeaſed.

Nicon, that is to ſay, Victor, the Romans great Ram.

The Romans get the firſt Wall.

The Jews bore up courageouſly againſt all other dangers, but were much gauled from theſe Towers which Titus had erected; for they were ſlain and wounded from thence with ſmall Shot, Darts and Arrows, for they could build nothing to defend themſelves C ſo high, nor had they any hope to deſtroy them: for neither could they be thrown down for their weight, nor fired, being covered with Iron: therefore flying from the reach of the ſhot, they could not hinder the Ram from battering their Walls; which never ceaſing, at laſt prevailed ſomewhat. So the great Ram, which the Jews called Nicon, becauſe it overcame all, at laſt battered the Wall; and the Jews being weary with fighting, having watched all night before, out of ſleepineſs, or becauſe they perſwaded themſelves that the Wall was ſuperfluous, they having two more beſide it, they all forſook their quarters, and retired to the ſecond Wall; and the Romans entred the firſt, that the Ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romans that had paſſed and entered the firſt Wall, went and opened the Gates, and let in the whole Army. Having thus gotten D the Wall the ſeventh day of May, they deſtroyed the greateſt part thereof; and alſo the North-ſide of the City which before Ceſtius had waſted.

The Jews conflict with the Romans.

The Jews boldneſs.

Titus removed his Camp from thence, and went unto the place called the Aſſyrians Camp, and ſeized upon all betwen that and Cedron; and being without ſhot of an Arrow from the ſecond Wall, he began again to aſſault it. Then the Jews dividing the Wall betwixt them to defend each others part, reſiſted moſt valiantly: John and his partakers defended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders Tomb: and Simon defended all from Johns Tomb unto the Gate by the Tower Hippicos. And many times iſſuing out of the Gates, they fought hand to hand with the Enemy, but alwayes repulſed by the diſcipline of the Romans, only for want of knowledge in War-E like affairs; yet in all fights upon the Wall, the Jews had the Beſt; for though the Romans had the advantage in fortune and knowledge, yet the Jews being deſperate, attaqued them without fear; for they are very courageous in Adverſity. Moreover, the Jews were neceſſitated to fight to ſave their own lives; and the Romans were as haſty to conquer. Neither party was weary, neither party deſiſted in their aſſaulting of one another: In the day time the Jews in Commanded-Parties made their Salleys upon the Romans, who omitted no kind of fight from Sun-ſet, all the night long; which was more terrible to them both, than all the ſervice of the day before: The Jews feared, leſt the Romans ſhould get the Wall; and the Romans apprehended leſt the Jews ſhould have Sallied out upon their Camp. Thus all night long they ſtood to their Arms, F and early in the morning they were at it again. The Jews ſtrove one with another who ſhould undergo the moſt danger, and moſt deſerve his Captains favour. Simons followers were ſo much at his beck, that if he ſhould have commanded any of them to have killed himſelf, he would preſently have done it. The Romans were encouraged to fight, by their diſcipline and ſucceſs, as having never been uſed to be overcome. Again; their frequent Wars, continual Exerciſes, and large Dominions gave them great Courage, eſpecially Titus their General being preſent to provoke them; for it was thought a heinous crime to be a Coward in the preſence of ſuch a Captain as Cæſar was. Cæſar himſelf beholding and looking on, was a witneſs of their deeds that behaved themſelves valiantly, and rewarded every man as he behaved himſelf: It was an advantage G to be known unto the Prince for a Valiant man: ſo that many of them ſhewed their alacrity was far greater than their ſtrength.

The cuſtom of the Romans to Conquer.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Christ, 72.

Longinus breaketh into the midſt of the Jews army and diſturbeth it.

At this time Longinus one of the Horſemen coming out of the Roman Army, preſſed H into the midſt of the Jews Forces, and caſting them down that ſtood in his way, by violence ſlew two of the ſtrongeſt of the Enemies, ſtriking one of them over the Face, and ſlaying another with his own Dart which he took from him; who for this deed was greatly honoured, having broken through a ſtrong Body of the Jews that were placed before the Walls, and caſt Darts at him on either ſide. Many of the Romans by this his Example were inticed to do the like.

The Jews now regarded not what they ſuffered, but only deviſed which way to harm their Enemies; not regarding death, ſo that they might kill any of the Romans. But Titus had as much care to preſerve his Souldiers, as he had to get the Victory, attributeing theſe raſh Sallyes to the deſperation of the Jews, and accounting that only Virtue I which was done warily and with diſcretion.

CHAP. IX.

How Caſtor the Jew derided the Romans.

Caſtor a ſubtle and politick Jew.

THen Titus commanded the Ram to be ſet up againſt the Tower on the North part of the City, wherein a crafty and politick Jew with ten men had hid himſelf, all the reſt being fled: this Jew was named Caſtor. Theſe men having lain ſtill a while K in their Arms, at laſt being afraid, and the Tower beginning to ſhake, they lept up, and Caſtor ſtretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly crave favour at Cæſars hands, and with a lamentable voice beſought him to ſpare him. Titus ſeeing the mans ſimplicity, as he thought, and perſwading himſelf that the Jews did now repent of their Obſtinacy, he cauſed the Ram to ceaſe from battery, and the Archers to hold their hands; and permitted Caſtor to ſpeak his pleaſure. Caſtor ſaid, That he deſired to treat, and make a League of Peace.

And Titus anſwered, That he would grant it, if all the reſt would be concluded, and that he would preſently confirm a League of Peace between him and the City. Five L of Caſtors fellows ſeemed to be willing, but the other five ſeemed to oppoſe it; Crying out aloud, That they would never be ſlaves to the Romans, whilſt they could die in liberty. Whilſt Caſtor and his fellows were debating the matter, the battery ceaſed. In the mean time Caſtor privily ſent word unto Simon, willing him whilſt the Battery was ſtopt, to think of ſome expedient to be done in this neceſſity: for, for a while he would undertake to delude the Roman Emperour, and hold him in ſuſpence. In the mean time he ſeemed to exhort his Companions, to accept the kind offer of Titus: and they as it were angry thereat, drew their Swords and ſtruck upon their Corſlets, and fell down, as though they had been ſlain. Titus and his Souldiers were amazed at their obſtinacy, for being on the lower ground, they could not well perceive what was done; M they wondred exceedingly at their deſperation, and pittied their calamity. At the ſame time one ſtruck Caſtor in the Buttock with a Dart, and Caſtor pulling it out of his fleſh, ſhewed it unto the Emperour, and complained of it, as a breach of the Truce. Titus with ſharp words corrected him that ſhot it, and forthwith would have ſent Joſeph to promiſe Caſtor pardon and peace. But Joſeph denyed to go, affirming that Caſtor only diſſembled, and hindred his friends that would have gone. At laſt one Æneas, who had fled unto the Romans, offered himſelf to go. Caſtor invited him, as though he would give him ſomething to ſecure him of his true meaning. Æneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Caſtor would have caſt him down ſomething of worth; and when he came underneath the Tower, Caſtor took a great ſtone and threw it down upon N him, yet hurt him not, becauſe he was aware of it, and avoided the ſtone; but it wounded another Souldier ſtanding by. Then Cæſar conſidering this deceit, began to think that Pitty and Mercy in War was hurtful, and that Cruelty was not ſo eaſily deceived; and being very angry at this deceit, he cauſed the Wall to be beaten with the Ram more than before. Caſtor and his fellows perceiving the Tower to ſhake, they ſet it on fire, and ſo paſſed thorow the flame, and conveyed themſelves into a mine of the Tower; giving the Romans freſh occaſion to admire their Courage, in paſſing thorow the Flames.

Mercy in Wars hurtful.

Titus taketh the ſecond Wall.

Titus aſſaulting the Wall on his part, took it five dayes after, and forcing the Jews from thence, He, accompanied with a thouſand choice men, entred where the Woolmen, O Copper-Smiths, and Merchant-Taylors dwelt, which place was the new City,

A with narrow and ſtrait ways to go to the Wall. And had he preſently beaten down a great part of the Wall, or, as he might have done by the Law of Arms, deſtroyed what he had gotten, he had obtained the Victory without any loſs on his ſide. Yet hoping the Jews would yield, when they were in his power, he gave them more liberty to retire; for he did not think that they whoſe good he ſought, would have been Traitors unto him who came to relieve them.

CHAP. X.

How the Romans did twice take the ſecond Wall.

TItus having entred the City, ſuffered none of them that were taken, to be ſlain, nor the Houſes to be burned, but permitted the Seditious (if they were ſo minded) to fight, and that without prejudice to the People: he alſo promiſed the People to reſtore unto them all their Goods. For many beſought him to ſpare the City for them; and the Temple for the City. The People were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Jews thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and judged that Titus, for that he deſpaired to win the reſt of the City, did now Coward-like propound theſe C conditions. They likewiſe threatned the People, that whoſoever ſhould ſpeak one word concerning Peace, and yielding unto the Romans, ſhould preſently die: and ſome of them did reſiſt the Romans from out of their houſes, others in the narrow ways: and others going out at the higher Gates renewed the fight, wherewith the Watchmen being troubled, fled from the Wall, and forſaking the Towers, retired themſelves into the Camp. The Roman Souldiers within the City cryed out, becauſe they were incloſed with Enemies, the Gates being ſhut, and aſſaulted without, by thoſe who apprehended their Companions to be in great danger. The number of the Jews encreaſing, and prevailing, for that they knew the ways and turnings of the Streets, many of the Romans were ſlain and violently born down, when they offered to reſiſt in that neceſſity; D for a multitude together could not flie, by reaſon of the narrowneſs of the Streets that went unto the Wall: and all that entred into the City had been ſlain, had not Titus ſuccoured them. For placing at the end of every Street Archers, and himſelf being where moſt need was, he repulſed the Jews with Darts and Arrows, with the help of Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight proved himſelf a ſtout Warriour, and continued fighting with the Jews till all his fellow-Souldiers were got off.

They interpret warlike Titus's humanity for Cowardize.

The Romans are driven out by the Jews.

Thus the Romans having got the ſecond Wall, were beaten from it again; and the Citizens ſo encouraged, they were as it were drunk with their good fortune, thinking the Romans durſt no more attempt upon the City, and that they themſelves were invincible, when they were prepared to fight. God, becauſe of their Iniquity, had dark-E ned their underſtanding, ſo that they never conſidered the Roman Forces were far greater than thoſe they had encountred, and the Famine that hung over their heads; for as yet they lived upon the deſtruction of the People, and drank the blood of a City: but the good People did even ſuffer Famine already, and many of them periſhed for want of food; yet the Seditious did rejoyce at the death of the Citizens, as though thereby they were eaſed of a great burthen, only deſiring they might live that bear rebellious minds, and would joyn with them againſt the Romans, rejoycing at the death of the reſt; and this was the affection they bare unto their Citizens. In this manner they armed themſelves and reſiſted the Romans, who now again did attempt to enter the Breach: whilſt the Jews threw down Stones and part of the Wall upon them as they came up, F drave them back again, and valiantly ſuſtained them for three dayes. But the fourth day being unable to withſtand Titus his aſſault, they were forced to retire as before: and he having gotten the Wall, deſtroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a Garriſon in the Towers and Fortreſſes of the South part.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Mounts raiſed to batter the third Wall. A long Oration of Jeſephus to perſwade the People to yield: and of the Famine in the City.

Titus ſurceaſing the Siege, commandeth mony to be diſtributed to all his Souldiers.

TITUS now determined to batter the third Wall, conceiving the Siege would be now but ſhort: He thought it convenient to give the Seditious ſome time to bethink themſelves, to ſee that if either by the taking of the ſecond Wall, or terrified with Famine, they would repent. For there was little or nothing left in the City to I ſupply them, and he was poſted as he deſired. And the time being come, for every Roman Souldier to receive his proportion of Victuals, Titus cauſed them to be led every one in order into a place, where the Jews in the City might behold them; he cauſed his Captains to diſtribute money to every one, and the Souldiers (as their Cuſtom is) all armed, and drawing their Swords out of their ſheaths, marched along, the Horſemen leading their Horſes in great Pomp, and a great part of the Suburbs gliſtered with gold and ſilver. This Spectacle was grateful to their own Souldiers, and terrible to the Jews: for all the old Walls, and the North part of the City, and many Houſes were filled with the multitude of them who came to view this ſight; and there was no part of the City that was not filled with People to behold it. This Spectacle ſtruck a great K fear upon the very boldeſt among the Jews, and perhaps would have cauſed the Seditious People to have relented, had they not deſpaired to have found mercy and pardon at the Romans hands for their offences committed; wherefore they thought it better to be ſlain fighting, than to be put to death ſhamefully, if they deſiſted from fight. That Deſtiny hindred this reſolution, it being decreed that the innocent ſhould periſh with the wicked, and the City with the Seditious: hereupon for four dayes ſpace they diſtributed neceſſaries to the Souldiers; and on the fifth day, Titus perceiving the Jews were ſtill obſtinate, divided his Army into two parts, and about Johns Tomb he began to raiſe Mounts, and againſt Antonia, hoping by them to take the higher part of the City; and by Antonia to ſeize the Temple; which except he could effect, he could not ſafely take L the City; Againſt either of theſe places he raiſed two Mounts, each Legion making one.

Deſtiny had decreed that the innocent ſhould periſh with the nocent, and the City with the Seditious.

The Romans in their labour are hindred by the Jews.

The Jews and Simons followers oppoſed the work that was begun before Johns Tomb, and John likewiſe with a great number of the Zealots hindred them that made the Mounts over againſt Antonia: who not only fought with the advantage of the higher ground, but had learned alſo the uſe of Engines: for continual uſe by little and little made them skilful: and they had 300 Engines called Baliſtaes; and 40 Engines to caſt Stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romans, and obſtructed them in their work.

Titus bounty towards the Jews.

Titus foreſeeing that Fortune would favour him, and that the City would be taken, M preſſed it what he could, never ceaſing to perſwade the Jews to yield: adding many Arguments to his importunity, for he knew that many times words prevail more than violence, wherefore he exhorted them to ſave themſelves, and yield the City unto him, referring them to Joſeph, who ſhould make a ſpeech to them in their own Language, and he hoped they would hear their own Country-man.

Joſephs Oration to the Jews

Then Joſeph keeping himſelf out of the danger of their ſhot, called out unto them to commiſerate themſelves, the City, the Temple, the People, and not be more hard-hearted unto them than ſtrangers. For the Romans had a reverence for the Holy-places, notwithſtanding they had no ſociety or portion in them. That till that very day they had abſtained from violating of them: whereas they who were brought up among them, and might ſave them, N did wilfully cauſe their deſtruction. He adviſed them to conſider, that their ſtrongeſt Walls were battered down; and only the weaker remaining unbattered: He willed them to conſider how they were not able to withſtand the Roman Forces; and that it was no novelty to the Jews to be ſubject to the Romans. For although it be a good and commendable thing to fight for Liberty, yet that was to have been done in the beginning: for he that was once ſubject and rebell'd, having a long time lived under the obedience of the Romans, ſeemed rather to be deſirous of a ſhameful Death, than an honourable Liberty. Moreover, he reproached them that they ſhould chooſe rather to be ſubject to a baſe People, than to them whom the whole World obeyed. For (ſaith he) What habitable place is it that the Romans have not Conquered? They themſelves may perceive, how Fortune has ſtill favoured them: and that God had O ſetled the Univerſal Monarchy in Italy. That by the Law of Nature, and the Example of Beaſts was the cauſe that your Anceſtors (who were far more ſtrong aad politick than you, and had better means to reſiſt) did ſubmit themſelves unto the Romans : which if God had not been pleaſed withal, he would never have permitted. And how could they hope to reſiſt, ſeeing the City was as it were already taken, and the Citizens, whilſt their Walls were whole, moſt of them deſtroyed ? For the Romans well knew the Famine that was among them, how it every day waſted the people, and would in ſhort time devour their Souldiers. For ſuppoſe (ſaid he) the Romans would deſiſt, withdraw their Siege, and offer no violence; there is a Civil War within the City, which you cannot overcome, or avert ; unleſs you except they perſiſted in their obſtinacy. For they are (ſaid he) Kind, Courteous, Gentle to their Subjects, and prefer their Commodity before Revenge. They thought it their intereſt to have the City in their Power, and theCountry about it; and therefore the Emperour propoſed to make a league of Peace with them : but if he took the City by force, he would ſpare none, ſeeing they were admoniſh'd ſo kindly before, and in their greateſt neceſſity refuſed to obey him. He told them alſo, that the thirdWall would in a ſhort time be taken, as they might perceive by the other two : and though the City were inexpugnable, yet the Famine would force C it to yeild in deſpite of its Strength.

Famine in the City.

As Joſeph did thus adviſe them, thoſe upon the Walls rail'd at him, upbraided him, and ſhot at him. Joſeph ſeeing he could not avert them from their imminent calamities, recounted unto them out of their own Hiſtories whatever made for his purpoſe.

When doth God the maker of all things deny help unto us if we be oppreſſed ? Will you not remember your ſelves ? For what cauſe did you enterpriſe theſe Wars ? And how great a Friend and Protector do you daily offend ? Do ye not remember the miraculous Works of your Anceſtors in this Holy place, and how in times paſt it was by the Enemies deſtroyed ? But I Did he betake himſelf to Arms to revenge that injury? though he had under his command three this Holy-place, which now you have defiled and prophaned, implore the aſſiſtance of his invincible God ? And was not the Queen the ſecond night after ſent home again unto him

Shall I recount unto you the going of our Anceſtors into Egypt ? who having for four hundred years been ſlaves to the Fgyptian Tyrants and Kings, and able to have revenged themſelves by force of Arms, yet did they rather expect and ſtay Gods leiſure. Who knoweth not that then Egypt, in revenge of their tyranny to the Hebrews, was overrun with all kinds of that, depoſiting their Arms, they reſigned themſelves wholly to his pleaſure. Was Senacherib own Country. And continuing his aſſiſtance, they again (as the Prieſts in old time were H wont) did ſerve and reverence their helper. In brief, our Anceſtors did never atchieve any great matter by force of Arms, neither did they leave any thing undone wherein they expected Gods help, but ſtill remaining quiet at home, they overcome their Enemies wholly by his Providence : and when they truſted to their own ſtrength, they always miſcarryed. For when Zedechias our King, contrary to the admonition of the Prophet Jeremy, went forth to fight with the King of Babylon at that time beſieging the City, both he and his whole Party were taken, and this City deſtroyed. Yet conſider how far your Generals are inferiour to that King, and your ſelves to the people of thoſe times. For Jeremy declaring to the City, that God was offended at their iniquity, and that except they did yield, it ſhould be taken by force ; yet did not the King nor any of the people lay hands upon him. And you (that I I may omit your iniquity done within the City, which though I would, I could not ſufficiently decipher) do revile and attempt to kill me for giving you wholſom Counſel for your good ; only for that I put you in mind of your ſins, which you have not patience to hear. The ſame happened alſo when Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, beſieged the City, God was highly diſpleaſed at our Anceſtors, permited them to be ſlain, the Town ſpoiled, and this Holy-place for three years and ſix months to be made deſolate. What ſhould I ſhew unto you any more examples ? Who firſt incited the Romans againſt the Jews ? Was it not the impiety of our own Countrey-Men that did it ? Whence was our bondage at that time ? Did it not proceed from the Sedition of our Anceſtors, when the fury of Ariſtobulus and Hircanus brought Pompey into our City, and God ſubdued them by the Romans, being grown unworthy of K liberty ? and at length after a three months ſiege, though they were not ſo great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the ſiege, yet they yielded themſelves. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus, who invaded the Kingdom, and brought our Nation again into ſubjection ; God laying this bondage upon them being provoked by the iniquity of our Nation? Herod the Son of Antipater, brought Soſius and the Roman Army, and beſieged the City ſix months : and at laſt, for the greatneſs of our iniquity, it was, taken and puniſhed, and ſacked by the Enemies. Thus you evidently ſee that our Nation never prevail'd by force of Arms. And aſſure your ſelves that even now the City will be taken. It is meet therefore that you who keep this Holy-place commit your ſelves wholly to God, and then you need not fear the forces of your Enemies, when your piety aſſures L you of Gods help and ſuccour. But what one Article of Gods Law have you obſerved ?

Nay, what have you not done that he forbad ? How far greater is your impiety than theirs? and yet they ſuddenly periſhed for their ſins. For making ſmall account of ſecret ſins, as Stealing, Deceit, and Adulteries, you violently take away mens Goods by force, you murder whom you pleaſe, deviſe new ways to ſin ; have made the Holy Temple the place of your impieties ; and what the Romans themſelves did adore, is by your own Nation polluted and defiled, whilſt you derogate from the honour of our Religion by the impiety of your actions, and yet hope for his help, whom you have ſo heinouſly offended : you are very juſt people and obedient, and it is with pure hands you beg aſſiſtance of God. Did our King pray ſo unto God, when he obteined, that in one night ſo many of the Aſſyrians ſhould be deſtroyed ? Or M do the Romans commit ſuch impiety as the Aſſyrians did, that you may hope of the like revenge upon them. The Aſſyrian received a ſum of Money to ſave the City, and yet not regarding his Oath, indeavoured to deſtroy it. The Romans do only requeſt the ſame Tribute that was paid by our Anceſtors : and if they may have it, will never deſtroy the City, nor touch our Holy things. They will alſo permit you to enjoy freely your Familes and Poſſeſſions, and ſuffer your Laws to remain inviolate. It is madneſs for you to hope that God will puniſh juſt men, as he did ſinners and impious perſons, ſeeing he can puniſh as he pleaſes.
To be ſhort, he deſtroyed the Aſſyrians the firſt night they encamped before the City. And if he had purpoſed to deliver you, and puniſh the Romans, he would have done it, when Pompey and Soſius came againſt the City, or when Veſpaſian waſted Galilee, or now N when Titus made his aſſault. But neither Pompey nor Soſius ſuffered any harm, and both of them took the City. Veſpaſian proſpered ſo well in his Wars againſt you, that he hath got the whole Empire· And the Fountains which yielded you no Water before, do give it to Titus in abundance. For you know that before his coming, the Fountains without the City and Siloa were ſo dry that Water was ſold by meaſure, yet now they flow plentifully and do not only ſerve his Army, but water all the Gardens about. What this wonder foretelleth, you have already experienced, when the King of Babylon came with his Army and deſtroyed the City, took it ,and fired it, and the Temple ; notwithſtanding that (as I am perſwaded) the Jews at that time were not ſo wicked as now. I think therefore that God hath forſaken this Holy place, and is gone over to your Enemies. Will not a good man fly a wicked houſe, O and abhor the impiety of the Inhabitants. And do you think that God will abide your impiety,

A piety, who beholdeth all ſecrets, and knoweth all things that are hid? But what is ſecret amongſt you? Or what do you ſeek to find? Nay what do you that your Enemies do not know? All your iniquities are apparent: and your contention with one another is, who ſhall be moſt impious, and with as much labour endeavour to be Vitious as others do to be Vertuous. Yet for all this it is not too late to amend, God's wrath will be appeaſed, if ye acknowledg your ſins, and be penitent for your offences. Throw away your Arms then, and pity your Country now ruined by your own means. Turn your Eyes and behold the beauty of the Place, whoſe ruine you ſeek. How brave a City, how magnificent a Temple, how rich with the Gifts of all Nations! Who would fire theſe? who would deſire the ruin of theſe? Or what is there B in the World that better deſerveth to be preſerved? O hard-hearted people, more blockiſh and inſenſible than Stones! Or if you do not pity your Temple, let your Families move you; look upon your Children your Wives, and your Parents, all ready to be conſumed, either with Sword or Famine. I am ſenſible my Wife, my Children, and Family, muſt periſh with you (and there was a time when they would have been conſidered) and it may be thought it is to ſave their lives I give this advice; but kill them, and ſacrifice me for your welfare: I am prepared to die, if my death may be a means to preſerve you in being.

God is wont to ſhew mercy to thoſe who confeſs and be peditent.

Whilſt Joſeph made this ſpeech unto them the Tears trickled down his Cheeks; but the Seditious being nothing moved, replyed, that it was not ſafe for them to yeild. The people however were perſwaded to fly: and ſelling their poſſeſſions and what they C had at ſmall rates, they ſwallow'd down the Gold which they received, leſt the Thievs ſhould take it from them. And when they had eſcaped to the Romans Camp, they emptied their Bellies, and found it again, and had wherewithal to buy them neceſſaries. Titus alſo permitted many to go away whitherſoever they pleaſed: which cauſed divers to flie, thereby to be delivered from the calamity which they endured in the City. But John and Simon were as diligent to ſtop the ways, leſt the Citizens ſhould eſcape, as they were to hinder the Romans from entring into the City: ſo that upon the leaſt ſuſpition of any mans flight, he was preſently put to death. The richer ſort, whether they ſtayed or fled, were ſlain for their wealth and poſſeſſions. The Famine of the City, and the deſperation of the Thieves increaſed alike every day; and when no more Corn was to be found, the Seditious perſons brake into the houſes, D and ſearched every Corner to find Corn; if in their ſearch they found any, they beat the owners thereof for denying it at firſt: if they found none, they tortured them for having hidden it. Whoſoever was ſtrong of Body, and in good liking they killed; upon preſumption that he had ſome ſecret ſtores, or elſe he could not have been in ſo good plight and fat as he was. They that were pined with Famine, were ſlain; becauſe they thought it no offence to kill them, who in a ſhort time would die of themſelves. Many gave all they had for one buſhel of Corn, and ſhutting themſelves up privately in their houſes, eat their Corn as it was unground: others made bread thereof as neceſſity and fear required. No man in the whole City ſate down to eat his meat at the E Table, but ſnatch'd it greedily from the fire, and devoured it half raw and half roaſt.

Moſt miſerable was this manner of living, and a ſpectacle which none without Tears was able to behold; the ſtrongeſt ſtill got the moſt, and the weakeſt bewailed their miſery: for now Famine was their greateſt calamity. And nothing doth arm men more than ſhame; during this Famine, no reverence was had towards any man: Wives took the meat out of their Husbands mouths, Children from their Parents, and Mothers from their Infants, which was the ſaddeſt ſpectacle of all. No body had now any compaſſion, neither did they ſpare their deareſt Infants, but ſuffered them to periſh in their Arms, by taking from them the very drops of Life. Yet could they not eat in F ſuch ſecrecy, but ſome or other ſtill came to take away from them that whereupon they fed. For if in any place they ſaw a door ſhut, they conjectured that they who were in the houſe were eating meat, and forthwith breaking down the Doors, they came in, got them by the throat, and took the meat halfe-chewed out of their mouths as it was ready to be ſwallowed down. The old men were driven away, and not permitted to keep and defend their food: the Women were drawn up and down by the hair of the head, for that they hid between their hands ſome part of their meat, and would not forgo it. No pity remained either to old age or infancy; They took the young Babes, their mouths full of meat, and daſhed them againſt the ground. If any had prevented theſe Thieves, and eaten their meat before they could get at them, they were more cruelly and more tyrannouſly handled, as having committed a greater offence againſt them. They deviſed moſt barbarous and cruel torments to extort food from others: for they G thruſt ſticks or ſuch like into the cavity of mens yards, and ſharp thorny rods into their

CHAP. XII.

Of the Jews that were crucified, and the burning of the Rampires.

The poor peoples miſery.

THe Mounts and Rampires that Titus built, did greatly advantage him : Yet his M Souldiers endured ſome loſs by the Jews from the Wall, to recompence it what he could, upon intelligence that their rapine and plunder in the Town being not ſufficient to ſupply their neceſſities, the Jews were forc'd to ſeek out into the Valleys for food, he diſpoſed certain parties of Horſe, and other ſelect men in Ambuſh to intercept them ; for though their exigences were very great, yet being for the moſt part poor people with Families in the City they durſt not run over to the Romans, leſt their Wives and Children ſhould be murdered in their abſence, wherefore they were forc'd to make private excurſions in the night to conceal themſelves from the Enemy, and having fallen unexpectedly into this Ambuſcade, they fought it couragiouſly, as knowing it too late to expect mercy after ſuch untractable obſtinacy, but they were defeated, N many of them taken, and tortur'd, and afterwards crucified before the Walls of the City. Titus looked upon their condition as very deplorable, for ſcarce a day paſt in which there were not 500 Jews taken and ſerved in that manner by thoſe partys of Horſe, yet he thought it inexpedient to remove them, becauſe they were a great ſecurity to the reſt of his Army : But his great deſign was by the cruelty of that ſpectacle to terrifie the City and haſten its ſurrender. Wherefore the Souldiers in hatred to our Nation, crucified all they took, one after one faſhion, and a nother after another, in deriſion. And the multitude of the Captives was become ſo great, there was left no ſpace for the croſſes, nor indeed croſſes for their bodies to be crucified upon. But the ſeditious Jews within the City were ſo far from relenting by this maſſacre, that rather their hearts were more hardned ; ſo that herewith they terrified the reſt of the multitude : O for they *carried the relations of thoſe who were taken by the Romans to the Walls,

This deterred many who would otherwiſe have fled to the Romans; till ſuch time as the truth hereof was known. Yet ſome there were that ventured to the Enemy, as preferring Death and Torment at their hands, before the Miſeries and Famine which they endured at home.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

Hereupon Titus cut off many of the Captives hands, and ſent them into the City to Simon and John, that their Calamity might teſtifie them to be Captives, and not ſuch as had fled voluntarily to the Romans, willing them to admoniſh their Friends to yield, B and not compel him to deſtroy the City: and to aſſure them that in ſo doing, they might ſtill ſave their lives, their Country, and Temple, which had not the like in the whole World: and he continually went about the Rampires haſtning the workmen in their buſineſs, as though he preſently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words he had ſpoken. The Jews that ſtood upon the Walls, reviled both him and his Father, affirming that they contemned Death; and would chuſe rather to die, than become ſlaves: That whileſt they lived, they would to their power defend themſelves againſt the Romans, without any care either of themſelves or their Country; which Cæſar ſent them word were both in imminent danger. Moreover, they ſaid that the whole World was a Temple dedicated to God, far more excellent than theirs, C which notwithſtanding ſhould be conſerved by him that dwelt in it; whoſe help they hoped to enjoy, and did therefore deride all his threatnings, as things that could never come to paſs without his divine permiſſion. Thus did they opprobriouſly abuſe the clemency of the Romans.

The Jews both curſe Cæſar and his Father.

At this time arrived alſo Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him a conſiderable ſupply of Men, among which there was a company called the Macedonians, of equal years, and little older than young men, all trained up in Martial Diſcipline, and armed after the Macedonian manner, from whence they took their name: yet for the moſt part they did not anſwer the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagne was the moſt fortunate and happy of all Kings that were ſubject to the Roman Em- D pire, till ſuch time as he felt the frown of Fortune; who in his old age proved that none ought to be accounted happy before his death: whileſt Comagne was in proſperity, his Son ſaid, he marvelled that the Romans did delay to aſſault the City, and enter the battered Walls (for this young Man was a great Warriour, and of exceeding ſtrength, to the which he truſting too much, did many things raſhly.) Titus ſmiled, and anſwered, that that was a work too great for the Romans. Upon which young Antiochus, accompanied with his Macedonians, aſſaulted the Wall, and himſelf with his ſtrength and dexterity avoided the darts of the Jews, and caſt his darts at them: but his whole Party (a few excepted) were there ſlain: for obliged by their extravagant boaſting, they continued longer in fight than it was expedient for them: at laſt many E being wounded retired, perceiving that the Macedonians to win a Victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romans the twelfth day of May began to build their Rampires: and labouring ſeventeen whole days, with much ado they ended them the nine and twentieth of the ſaid Month. For they builded four vaſt Rampires, one of them over againſt Antonia, which was built by the fifth Legion oppoſit to the midſt of the Struthian Waters: another was built by the twelfth Legion, twenty Cubits diſtant from the other. But the tenth Legion, which was of more account than the two former, erected a Mount oppoſit to the Pond called Amygdalon on the North-ſide: and the fifteenth Legion made the fourth, thirty Cubits diſtant from the other, over againſt the Monument of the High Prieſt John.

The inſolence of Antiochus and the Souldiers.

The Romans in ſeventeen days build four huge bulwarks.

F The Mounts being thus finiſhed, John undermined that which was over againſt Antonia, and underpropped it with poſts of Wood, and filling the Mine with Wood, Bitumen and Pitch, he fired it: ſo the poſts that held it up, being burnt, the Mine fell, and the Mount alſo with a hideous noiſe fell into it: and firſt of all there aroſe a great ſmoak and duſt, for the Mines covered the flame: at laſt the fire having conſumed the matter that covered it, the flame appeared. The Romans at this ſudden and unexpected exploit were much amazed and diſordered: ſo that thereby thoſe who before made account of the victory as certain, began now to diſpair. Two days after Simon and his aſſociates ſet upon the other Rampires: for thereon were planted Rams, wherewith the Romans began to beat the Walls. Amongſt the reſt, a G man named Teptheus of Garſus a City of Galilee, Megaſſarus one of Queen Mariammes Servants, and with them one of Adiabena the Son of Mabateus, who for his fortune

Of the Jews that were crucified, and the burning of the Rampires.

The poor peoples miſery.

THe Mounts and Rampires that Titus built, did greatly advantage him: Yet his Souldiers endured ſome loſs by the Jews from the Wall, to recompence it what he could, upon intelligence that their rapine and plunder in the Town being not ſufficient to ſupply their neceſſities, the Jews were forc'd to ſeek out into the Valleys for food, he diſpoſed certain parties of Horſe, and other ſelect men in Ambuſh to intercept them; for though their exigences were very great, yet being for the moſt part poor people with Families in the City they durſt not run over to the Romans, leſt their Wives and Children ſhould be murdered in their abſence, wherefore they were forc'd to make private excurſions in the night to conceal themſelves from the Enemy, and having fallen unexpectedly into this Ambuſcade, they fought it couragiouſly, as knowing it too late to expect mercy after ſuch untractable obſtinacy, but they were defeated, many of them taken, and tortur'd, and afterwards crucified before the Walls of the City. Titus looked upon their condition as very deplorable, for ſcarce a day paſt in which there were not 500 Jews taken and ſerved in that manner by thoſe partys of Horſe, yet he thought it inexpedient to remove them, becauſe they were a great ſecurity to the reſt of his Army: But his great deſign was by the cruelty of that ſpectacle to terrifie the City and haſten its ſurrender. Wherefore the Souldiers in hatred to our Nation, crucified all they took, one after one faſhion, and another after another, in deriſion. And the multitude of the Captives was become ſo great, there was left no ſpace for the croſſes, nor indeed croſſes for their bodies to be crucified upon. But the ſeditious Jews within the City were ſo far from relenting by this maſſacre, that rather their hearts were more hardned; ſo that herewith they terrified the reſt of the multitude: for they *carried the relations of thoſe who were taken by the Romans to the Walls,

*The Jews carried the kindred of thoſe that were fled out of the City to the Romans, and ſhewed them the tortures they ſuffered.

A that they might ſee how thoſe were uſed that fled to the Romans: the ſame ſight they alſo ſhewed unto them that deſired peace; affirming that they whom the Romans had ſo uſed, were thoſe that fled unto them for ſuccour, and not captives by them taken. This deterred many who would otherwiſe have fled to the Romans; till ſuch time as the truth hereof was known. Yet ſome there were that ventured to the Enemy, as preferring Death and Torment at their hands, before the Miſeries and Famine which they endured at home.

Hereupon Titus cut off many of the Captives hands, and ſent them into the City to Simon and John, that their Calamity might teſtifie them to be Captives, and not ſuch as had fled voluntarily to the Romans, willing them to admoniſh their Friends to yield, B and not compel him to deſtroy the City: and to aſſure them that in ſo doing, they might ſtill ſave their lives, their Country, and Temple, which had not the like in the whole World: and he continually went about the Rampires haſtning the workmen in their buſineſs, as though he preſently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words he had ſpoken. The Jews that ſtood upon the Walls, reviled both him and his Father, affirming that they contemned Death; and would chuſe rather to die, than become ſlaves: That whileſt they lived, they would to their power defend themſelves againſt the Romans, without any care either of themſelves or their Country; which Cæſar ſent them word were both in imminent danger. Moreover, they ſaid that the whole World was a Temple dedicated to God, far more excellent than theirs, C which notwithſtanding ſhould be conſerved by him that dwelt in it; whoſe help they hoped to enjoy, and did therefore deride all his threatnings, as things that could never come to paſs without his divine permiſſion. Thus did they opprobriouſly abuſe the clemency of the Romans.

The Jews both curſe Cæſar and is Father.

At this time arrived alſo Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him a conſiderable ſupply of Men, among which there was a company called the Macedonians, of equal years, and little older than young men, all trained up in Martial Diſcipline, and armed after the Macedonian manner, from whence they took their name: yet for the moſt part they did not anſwer the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagne was the moſt fortunate and happy of all Kings that were ſubject to the Roman Empire, D till ſuch time as he felt the frown of Fortune; who in his old age proved that none ought to be accounted happy before his death: whileſt Comagne was in proſperity, his Son ſaid, he marvelled that the Romans did delay to aſſault the City, and enter the battered Walls (for this young Man was a great Warriour, and of exceeding ſtrength, to the which he truſting too much, did many things raſhly.) Titus ſmiled, and anſwered, that that was a work too great for the Romans. Upon which young Antiochus, accompanied with his Macedonians, aſſaulted the Wall, and himſelf with his ſtrength and dexterity avoided the darts of the Jews, and caſt his darts at them: but his whole Party (a few excepted) were there ſlain: for obliged by their extravagant boaſting, they continued longer in fight than it was expedient for them: at laſt many E being wounded retired, perceiving that the Macedonians to win a Victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romans the twelfth day of May began to build their Rampires: and labouring ſeventeen whole days, with much ado they ended them the nine and twentieth of the ſaid Month. For they builded four vaſt Rampires, one of them over againſt Antonia, which was built by the fifth Legion oppoſit to the midſt of the Struthian Waters: another was built by the twelfth Legion, twenty Cubits diſtant from the other. But the tenth Legion, which was of more account than the two former, erected a Mount oppoſit to the Pond called Amygdalon on the North-ſide: and the fifteenth Legion made the fourth, thirty Cubits diſtant from the other, over againſt the Monument of the High Prieſt John.

The inſolence of Antiochus and the Souldiers.

The Romans in ſeventeen days build four huge bulwarks.

F The Mounts being thus finiſhed, John undermined that which was over againſt Antonia, and underpropped it with poſts of Wood, and filling the Mine with Wood, Bitumen and Pitch, he fired it: ſo the poſts that held it up, being burnt, the Mine fell, and the Mount alſo with a hideous noiſe fell into it: and firſt of all there aroſe a great ſmoak and duſt, for the Mines covered the flame: at laſt the fire having conſumed the matter that covered it, the flame appeared. The Romans at this ſudden and unexpected exploit were much amazed and diſordered: ſo that thereby thoſe who before made account of the victory as certain, began now to diſpair. Two days after Simon and his aſſociates ſet upon the other Rampires: for thereon were planted Rams, wherewith the Romans began to beat the Walls. Amongſt the reſt, a G man named Tepthens of Garſus a City of Galilee, Megaſſarus one of Queen Mariammes Servants, and with them one of Adiabena the Son of Mabateus, who for his fortune

The Romans invironed with fire, loſe the Mounts they had built was named Agiras, which ſignified lame : theſe three taking fire-brands, ran unto H the Engines, and there was none found in all the Roman Army more valiant than theſe men, nor more terrible : for they ran amidſt the throng of their Enemies ſo boldly, as though they had gone amongſt their Friends, and never made any ſtay, but breaking through the midſt of their Enemies, they fired their Engines : and notwithſtanding that on every ſide they were aſſaulted with Darts and Arrows ; yet did they not give back, nor ſeek to avoid the danger, till ſuch time as the fire had taken hold of the Engines. The flame mounting on high, the Romans came running out their Camp to ſuccour their fellows : and the Jews upon the Wall with Darts and Arrows hindred them that ſought to quench the flame, expoſing their own Bodies. The Romans endeavoured to draw off the Rams: And the Jews were as earneſt to hinder them ; I however the Romans preſerved their Rams. From thence the fire caught hold of the Rampires, thoſe that oppoſed themſelves were burned : and the fire increaſed, ſo that it could not be extinguiſhed ; ſo the Romans invironed with the flame, and deſpairing to reſcue their Works, retired into their Camp, and left them on fire. But the Jews were ſo much the more earneſt, their number ſtill encreaſing by new ſupplies out of the City : and ſo encouraged by their Victory, they raſhly adventured unto the Romans Camp and aſſaulted the Guard there. Which guard was a Company placed round before the Camp in Armour ; with orders not to leave their ground upon pain of death. And theſe men eſteeming it better to die gloriouſly, than ignominiouſly to ſuffer, reſiſted very valiantly : ſo that many that had fled retired themſelves, K back again to fight, both for ſhame that they had forſaken their place, and for fear of puniſhment thereof : and placing new Engines upon the Rampire of their Camp, they ſtopt the Jews from Sallying any more : for they came out unarmed, without any Arms of defence. For the Jews without any conſideration came raſhly upon their Enemies Pikes, and aſſaulted them with their fiſts. So that the Jews prevailed more by their courage, than their Arms : and the Romans fled more for the Jews boldneſs than any harm they ſuſtained by them.

A moſt bitter Law among the Romans againſt thoſe that forſook their places.

Titus accuſed his Souldiers of negligence

Titus repairing with all ſpeed from Antonia, where he had been viewing a place for another Rampire, blamed the Souldiers exceedingly; who having gotten the Enemies Walls, did notwithſtanding ſuffer themſelves to be repell'd; and were forced to abide that, which L firſt the Jews did ſuffer being now as it were broken out of Priſon ; and ſo he with certain choſen men aſſaulted the Enemies on one ſide ; who though deſperately overpowered, yet ſtoutly reſiſted him : and ſo joyning the Battle, the duſt was ſo thick, that none could ſee one another, nor hear what was ſaid, for the cries and noiſe were ſo great, no man could diſcern his friends from his foes. The Jews perſiſted ſtill in the Battle, not for that they truſted to their force, or thereby prevailed, but becauſe they were deſperate. The Romans on the other part took courage, and fought ſtoutly for ſhame, and for that Cæſar himſelf was in danger amongſt them. So that I think, that had not the Jews retired into the City, the fury of the Romans had then conſumed the whole multitude. The Romans were now ſorrowful for the loſs of their Rampires, M who in one hours time had loſt that, which with ſuch labour they ſo long had been making
: and many of their Engines being now diſplaced, they diſpaired to take the City.

Of the Wall which the Roman Army built about Jeruſalem in three days ſpace.

Titus conſulteth with his Captains.

T*itus* deliberated with his Captains what was to be done ; and they that were moſt forward amongſt them, thought it beſt with the whole Army to aſſault the Walls; N for that as yet the Jews had only fought with a part, and were not able to withſtand the force of the whole Army, but would be all conſumed with Darts and Arrows. The wiſer ſort perſwaded Titus to repair his Rampires : but others counſelled the contrary, to hold themſelves quiet there, and only to keep all places about, that no food ſhould be conveyed into the City, and ſo famiſh it without fighting. For that the Jews being now deſperate, and deſirous to be ſlain, would not be overcome by force. But Titus thought it diſhonourable to lie idle with ſo huge an Army, and do nothing ; yet he deemed it ſuperfluous to fight with them who would willingly fight to be ſlain : and he could not make any Mounts, becauſe he wanted Materials, and it was moſt difficult of all to guard every place about the City, that none could go forth, for that it could O not be beleaguered round on every ſide, by reaſon of the difficult places and great com-

A paſs thereof, fearing alſo the dangers that might enſue, the Jews iſſuing out of the City.
For the Jews ſeeing their open ways poſſeſſed by the Romans, they would deviſe ſome ſecret ways, both urged thereunto by neceſſity, and alſo becauſe they knew all places thereabout very well. And if ſo be that the Jews ſhould ſecretly effect any thing to prejudice them, that then their Siege was like to continue ſo much the longer: ſo that he feared that the continuance of time would diminiſh the Glory of his Victory.
For though all thoſe ways might be taken, yet he preferred Speed before Certainty: and if ſo be he would uſe celerity and ſafety, then it was needful for him to compaſs the whole City round about with a Wall: for ſo all ways and paſſages might be blockt up, and the Jews ſeeing no hope of ſafety, ſhould be compelled either to yield the City, B or to be conſumed with Famine. Nor by any other means could be ſecure, but by erecting Mounts; having that Wall to defend them. And if any one think that work difficult, and not to be atchieved, let him conſider that it did not become the Romans to make a baſe and ſlender piece of work: and that no man in the World could without labour effect any great matter, but God only. Having with theſe ſpeeches encouraged his Captains, he cauſed them to lead the Souldiers, and diſpoſe them all about theſe buſineſſes. The Souldiers had as it were ſome divine vigour and courage faln upon them: for not only the Captains, parting the circuit amongſt them, but the Souldiers alſo ſtrove who ſhould firſt effect their part; and every Souldier laboured to pleaſe his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and Centurion C the Tribune, and the Tribune to pleaſe the chief Commander, and he to pleaſe Cæſar, who every day went round about and beheld the Work: and ſo beginning at the place called the Aſſyrians Camp, where he was encamped, he drew a Wall all about, even to the new City; and from thence by Cedron and Mount Olivet; and ſo turned toward the South, and encloſed the Mountain with the Rock called Periſtereonos, and the Hill next adjoyning thereunto which hangeth over Siloa: and from thence bending his Work to the Weſt, he brought it down all along the Valley of the Fountain: from whence aſcending to the Monument of Ananus the High-Prieſt, where Pompy pitched his Tents, he brought it about by the North ſide of the City, and coming along to the Village called Erebinthonicus, he compaſſed the Monument of Herod towards the Eaſt, D and ſo joyned the Wall to his Camp, where he began. This Wall was nine and thirty furlongs about. Without this Wall he built alſo thirteen Forts, every one ten furlongs in compaſs. And all this whole work was finiſhed in three days ſpace, which yet required Months to have been built in: ſo that the celerity in the building thereof makes it ſcarcely credible. The City being thus encompaſſed with a Wall, and Gaurds placed in every Fort, Titus himſelf continued to go round the firſt Watch, to ſee all things in good order: the ſecond Watch he allotted to Alexander; and the third to the Captains of the Legions, aud the Watchmen appointed every one his turn to ſleep: and ſo all night long ſome of them went about the Caſtle.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Famine in Jeruſalem*: and of the building of the ſecond Rampire by the Romans.*

THe reſtraint of liberty to paſs in and out of the City, took from the Jews all hope of ſafety; and the Famine now increaſing, conſumed whole Houſholds and Families: the Houſes were full of dead Women and Infants; and the Streets of the Carcaſes F of elder Men: and the young Men pale like Ghoſts, walked about the Marketplace, and fell down dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was ſo great, that they that were alive could not bury them; nor indeed cared they for burying them, being now uncertain what ſhould betide themſelves. And many endeavouring to bury others, fell down themſelves dead upon them as they were burying them. Many being yet alive, went into their Graves and there died.
Yet for all this Calamity, was there no weeping nor lamentation; for the Famine overcame all affections. And they who were yet living, without tears beheld thoſe, who being dead were now at reſt before them. There was no noiſe heard within the City, and the ſtill night found all full of dead bodies: and which was moſt miſerable of all, G the Thieves at night came and took away that which covered the dead bodies nakedneſs, went laughing away, and in their bodies they proved their Swords, and upon they denied him. And every one that died, as he was dying, fixed his Eyes upon the longer able to endure the ſtink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted on the ground, firſt commanded that all ſuch ſhould be buried at the charges of the City : and at laſt finding no place wherein to bury them all, they threw them over the Walls into the Ditch. When Titus, going about the Walls, beheld all the Ditch filled with dead mens bodies, he lamented ; and lifting up his hands to Heaven, called God to witneſs, that it was not his doing. Such was the eſtate of the City. But the Romans when none of the Seditious durſt make any more excurſions, paſſed their time in I joy and mirth : for they neither ſuffered Famine nor ſorrow, having abundance of Corn, and all other neceſſaries out of Syria, and the Provinces adjoyning, and many ſtanding before the Walls, and ſhewing their abundance of Victuals to the Jews, did ſo much more increaſe their miſery. Yet were not the Seditious people moved at theſe Calamities : wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the Nation, and minding at leaſt to ſave them that were left alive, haſted to take the City ; and ſo he begun anew to build Mounts, though he ſcarcely found matter to do it withal. For all the Wood neer the City was conſumed in the firſt works ; ſo that now the Souldiers were forced to fetch more Wood ninety furlongs off ; and only againſt Antonia were erected in four places, four Mounts greater than the former. Cæſar went about and haſtened K the Workmen ; and now ſhewed the Thieves that were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this, they would not repent : and being as it were deprived of the exerciſe of their Wits and Bodies, they uſed both as though borrowed, and not their own. For neither did any affection move their minds, nor any grief there bodies : for they rent and tore the dead Bodies like Dogs, and filled the priſons with weak and languiſhing people.

Of the Maſſacre of the Jews, both within and without the City.

Simon's cruelty againſt Matthias and his Sons.

AT laſt, Simon having tormented Matthias, put him to death notwithſtanding that by his means he had obtained the City. This Matthias was the Son of Boethus a Prieſt, whom the people for his fidelity towards them greatly eſteemed : he ſeeing the outrages of the Zealots towards the people after John was joyned with them, perſwaded the people to call in Simon to help them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they miſdoubed no evil. And when he was come into the City, he held him for his Enemy as well as the reſt ; notwithſtanding, that by his only advice he was received into the City, as though Matthias had only done it through weakneſs. M Wherefore calling him before the people, he accuſed him that he favoured the Romans, and ſo condemned him to die, not ſuffering him to clear himſelf. And he put to death likewiſe his three Sons with him, for the fourth was before this time fled to Titus. Matthias requeſted Simon that he might be put to death before his Sons : but Simon, in regard that by his means he had gotten the City, cauſed him to be executed laſt of all. And ſo he was killed upon the murthered bodies of his Sons, in a place where the Romans might behold him : for ſo Simon commanded Ananus his Executioner, who was the Son of Bamadus. This man was the moſt cruel of all Simon's followers ; who even when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking whether they could now help him, to whom he ſought to fly : and he permitted not their bodies N to be buried. After them Ananias a Prieſt, the Son of Masbalus a Nobleman, and chief Secretary to the Council, a valiant ſtrong man, born at Emaus, and with him fifteen of the chiefeſt men in the City were put to death. They took alſo Joſeph's Father and kept him in priſon, and with the publick voice of a Crier proclaimed, that no man ſhould talk with him, nor viſit him, pretending fear of Treaſon : and whoſoever bewailed his eſtate, he was put to death without any Tryal. It happened that a certain man called Judas, the Son of Judas, who was one of Simon's Captains, and Governour of one of the Towers of the City, being moved with compaſſion towards theſe that periſhed without deſert, and more with fear of his own life, aſſembled together ten of his moſt truſty Souldiers, and ſaid to them : *How long ſhall we endure

A Famine conſumes our City; The Romans are almoſt within our Walls, and Simon is cruel and faithleſs, even towards theſe that have well deſerved at his hands, and we are in daily fear of his cruelty. On the contrary, the Romans keep their Faith inviolably. Wherefore let us deliver this Tower to them, and ſo ſave our ſelves and our City. And what puniſhmnt can Simon ſuffer which he ha's not deſerved? The ten men to whom in this manner he brake his mind, agreed hereunto; and ſo he in the morning ſent the reſt of his Souldiers under his command into divers places, that they might not perceive his intent, and at the third hour of the day, ſtanding upon the Tower, he called the Romans and told them his deſign. But ſome of the Romans proudly contemned the offer; others ſcarcely believed them, and the reſt made no ſpeed to come. In the mean B time while Titus with certain armed men came unto the Wall, Simon had notice of the matter, and ſpeedily got to the Tower, and ſlew thoſe that were within, in the ſight of the Romans, and caſt down their bodies over the Wall. Joſeph going about the Wall, and coming thither (for he never ceaſed requeſting the Jews to remember their deſperate eſtate) was ſtruck on the head with a ſtone, and ſo amazed with the blow, that he fell down: whereupon preſently the Jews made a Salley out of the City, and had carried him away priſoner into the City, had not Titus ſent men to defend him: and whilſt they fought, Joſeph was carried away, ſcarcely knowing what was done. The Seditious with loud cries rejoyced, as having ſlain him whoſe death they chiefly deſired; and ſo they reported within the City. Hereupon the people C were moſt ſorrowfull, verily believing him to be ſlain, by whoſe interceſſion they had confidence of favour from the Romans.

Joſeph wounded in the head with a ſtone, the Rumour is ſpread through the City.

When Joſephs Mother, who was in priſon, heard this, ſhe ſaid to thoſe of Jotapata that were her Keepers, that ſhe had no hope ever to ſee her Son again; and with many tears lamenting to her Maidens, Is this the benefit (ſaid ſhe) of my having born a Son, that I ſhall not bury him, by whom I hoped to have been buried my ſelf? But this falſe report did not long grieve her, nor comfort the Thieves: for Joſeph was quickly healed of his wound, and recovered; and ſhewing himſelf, he cryed out to them, That ere long they ſhould find he would be revenged on them for his wound; And he ceaſed not to exhort the people to remain faithful to the Romans. But the D Seditious ſeeing him alive were aſtoniſhed, and the people conceived good hope. Many (preſent neceſſity urging them) leapt over the Wall, and fled to the Romans; divers with ſtones going forth under pretence to fight with the Romans, yielded themſelves; but they had worſe Fortune there, than within the City; being now more harmed by plenty of Victuals which they found amongſt the Romans, than with the Famine they ſuffered in the City: for being become by Famine all ſwollen, as though they had the Dropſie, upon the ſudden filling of their empty Bodies they burſt; and ſo all died, ſave only thoſe who being wary, did by little and little accuſtom their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus eſcaped, fell into another grievous misfortune: for one of the Jews that fled to the Romans, was found E amongſt the Syrians, gathering Gold (out of his own dung) which he had ſwallowed, as is before ſaid, for that the Seditious did ſearch all, and take that they could find from them: and there was very great ſtore of Gold in the City, ſo that that was ſold for twelve Atticks, which before was worth twenty five. This device being diſcovered in one, preſently a report was ſpread all over the whole Camp, that the Jews that fled from the City, came full of Gold. Whereupon the Arabians and Syrians ript up the Bellies of their poor ſuppliants, to ſee if they could find any Gold or Silver within them. And I am perſwded that there was no greater calamity befell the Jews than this: for in one night the Bellies of two thouſand Jews were ript up. Titus hearing of this cruelty, reſolved to cauſe the Authors hereof to be compaſſed round with Horſemen, F and ſlain with Darts; and he had done it, had not the multitude of offenders much exceeded that of the Jews that were ſo murthered. Wherefore, he called together the Leaders of theſe Auxiliary Troops, and the Roman Captains (for ſome of the Romans alſo had commited this fault) and ſaid to them in anger, Is it poſſible that any amongſt your Souldiers are ſo barbarous to commit ſuch horrid Acts for uncertain gain, and are not aſhamed to enrich themſelves after ſo execrable a manner? what? ſhall the Arabians in theſe Wars againſt Strangers do what they pleaſe, and preſently cauſe the infamy of their vile Facts to redound to the Romans, by committing ſuch murthers, and exerciſing ſuch cruelty againſt the Jews? (for now all that bare Arms under him, were defamed with this vile report) He declared to them, That ſuch as G hereafter were found in that guilt, ſhould be put to death. Alſo he commanded his own Legions to make enquiry, who were ſuſpected among them for this matter,

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Sacrilegde committed about the Temple, and the dead Bodies caſt out of the City, and of the Famine.

John falleth to Sacrildge and taketh away many Preſents out of the Temple.

WHen John could rob no more, nor get any ſpoil from the Citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, he preſently fell to Sacriledge, and took away many of the gifts that had been offer'd to God in the Temple, and of the Sacred Veſſels K appointed for Divine Service, as Cups, Plates, Tables, and the Cruets of Gold that Auguſtus and his Wife had ſent thither. Thus a Jew robbed and ſpoiled the Temple of thoſe tokens of reſpect, wherewith the Roman Emperours aud other Nations had honoured it: and he had the boldneſs to affirm to his Aſſociates, that without fear they might uſe the Holy things of the Temple, ſeeing they ſought for God and the Temple. Moreover, he dar'd to ſhare amongſt them the Holy Wine and Oyl, which the Prieſts kept for Divine Sacrifice in the inner part of the Temple. I will not ceaſe to ſpeak that which grief compelleth me: I verily think, that had the Romans forborn to have puniſhed ſo great Criminals, either the Earth would have ſwallowed the City up, or ſome deluge have drowned it, or elſe the Thunder and Lightning which L conſumed Sodom, would have light upon it: for the people of the City were far more impious than the Sodomites. In brief, their wickedneſs and impiety were the cauſe that the whole Nation was extinguiſhed. What need I recount every particular miſery?
Mannæus the Son of Lazarus, flying to Titus out of the Gate that was committed to his cuſtody, and yielding himſelf to him, related to Titus, that from the time that the Roman Army encamped near the City, from the fourteenth day of April until the firſt of July were carried out of that Gate he kept, a hundred and fifteen thouſand eight hundred and fourſcore dead bodies; and nevertheleſs, he had reckoned only thoſe, the number of whom he was obliged to know by reaſon of a Publick Diſtribution, of which he had the charge. For others were buried by their Parents; and this was their M burial, to carry them out of the City, and there let them lie. And certain Noblemen flying to Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the City ſix hundred thouſand poor people which were caſt out of the Gates; and that the others that died were innumerable: and that when ſo many died that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered the Bodies together in the greateſt houſes adjoyning, and there ſhut them up. And that a buſhel of Corn was ſold for a Talent, which is ſix hundred Crowns: and that ſince the City was compaſſed with a Wall by the beſiegers they could not go out to gather any more herbs, ſo that many were driven to that neceſſity, that they raked Sinks and privies to find old dung of Oxen to eat; and even the dung that was loathſome to behold, was their meat. The Romans hearing this, were moved N to compaſſion; yet the Seditious within the City, who beheld this miſerable ſight, were nothing moved, nor repented, but ſuffered them to brought to this Calamity: for their hearts were ſo blinded by God, that they perceiv'd not the precipice into which they were going to fall with all this miſerable City.

Six hundred thouſand dead carcaſes caſt out of the City.

Cow-dung and dirt gathered together is the Jews food.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the Walls : and how the the Mounts were burned : and how Sabinus aſſaulted the Wall.

THE miſery of Jeruſalem every day increaſed, the Seditious being by reaſon of their miſery more and more incited againſt the people : For now the Famine was not only amongſt the People, but amongſt them alſo. And it was a mi-
G ſerable ſight to ſee the multitude of dead Bodies heaped together in the City, (from which came a peſtilent and infectious ſmell) ſo that they hindred the Souldiers from making

The year of the World, 4034. After the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

The multitude of Carcaſſes heaped in the City, is hideous to behold. The Jews upbraided God, in that he ſo long delayed to puniſh them. Judea a deſart and deſolate.

making excurſions. For they were forced to tread upon dead bodies, as though there had been a Battel fought within the Walls. But the hardneſs of their hearts was ſuch, that ſo hideous a ſpectacle did not affect them, nor make them conſider, that very ſhortly themſelves ſhould increaſe the number of thoſe, whom they trampled on with ſo great inhumanity. After having in a Domeſtick War embru'd their hands in the Blood of thoſe of their own Nation, they thought of nothing but imploying them againſt the Romans in a foreign War : wherein they ſeemed to reproach God for delaying to puniſh them, ſince it was no longer hope of overcoming, but deſpair, which inſpir'd them with this Boldneſs. The Romans though much troubled to get Wood to build withal, yet in one and twenty days finiſht their Mounts, having cut down all the Woods near the City for ninety Furlongs. It was miſerable to behold that Country and place, formerly all beſet with Trees and Fertile plants, now lying plain like a Deſart : neither was there any ſtranger that before-time had ſeen Judea and the beautiful Suburbs of Jeruſalem, who now beholding it, could abſtain from tears, and not lament ſo woful a change. For this War extinguiſhed utterly all ſigns of beauty : neither could one coming ſuddenly know the place, which he well knew before

The Jews and Romans are equally afraid.

The Romans moſt of all fear the deſperateneſs of the Jews.

The Jews with fire-brands ſet upon the Engines : but loſing their hope return back again. The valour and violence of the Jews decreaſeth

The Jews retire, arguing one another of cowardize.

When the Mounts were finiſht, both the Romans and the Jews greatly feared : the Jews, for that except they were deſtroyed, their City would be preſently taken ; the Romans, for that if theſe were overthrown, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter : and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds diſcouraged with many incommoditis. But the Romans were more grieved at the calamity of the City, than the Citizens within : for the Jews, notwithſtanding theſe miſeries, did nevertheleſs ſtoutly defend their Walls : but the courage of the Romans failed, when they ſaw that the Jews policy made their Mounts unprofitable ; that the ſtrength of the Wall reſiſted the Engines, that the Jews boldneſs overcame their ſtrength in fight : and eſpecially, ſeeing that the Jews having endured ſuch Calamity, Famine, and Miſery, were ſtill more couragious than before : ſo that they deemed their ſtrength not poſſible to be overcome ; and that their minds were invincible, being hardned and encouraged by miſery. What would they do (ſaid they) if Fortune were favorable to them, ſince even now ſhe is contrary to them, all that ſhe does to abate their courage ſerves onely to confirm them in their reſolutions ? Wherefore the Romans made a ſtronger Watch about their Mounts. But Johns followers who were in the Caſtle Antonia, fearing what might enſue if the Wall were battered, endeavoured to prevent it what they could, before the Rams were ſet up : and taking fire-brands in their hands, they aſſaulted the Mount ; but deceived with a vain hope, they were forc'd to retreat. For firſt of all, they ſeemed to diſagree among themſelves ; ſo that they came from their Walls one after another in little parties, and by conſequence ſoftly and fearfully, and briefly, not after the manner of the Jews, but with leſs courage then they were wont. On the other ſide, they found the Romans better prepared : and more couragious than of late, who ſo defended their Mounts with their Bodies and Weapons, that it was not poſſible for the Jews to come and fire them ; and every one was fully determined not to ſhrink out of his place till he was ſlain. For beſides that, if this work were deſtroyed, they had no hope left to build more, they all accounted it a ſhame, that their vertue ſhould be overcome by ſurprize, or their valour by raſhneſs and temerity, or their skill by a multitude, or the Romans by the Jews. Alſo they had Engines to caſt Darts at them as they came down their Walls. And when any one of the Jews that was ſlain fell down, he hindred them that followed; and the danger of him that went before, terrified thoſe that came after. They alſo that raſhly adventured within the ſhot of a Dart, either were terrified with the diſcipline, and multitude of their Enemies, or elſe wounded with their Darts : and ſo they all retired one accuſing another of cowardlineſs, having atchieved nothing.

The aſſault of the City the firſt day of July.

The firſt day of July the City was aſſaulted ; and the Jews being now retired, the Romans ſet up their Rams, notwithſtanding that they were aſſaulted from Antonia with ſtones, fire and Sword, and whatſoever their Enemies in that extremity could find. For though the Jews had great confidence in their Walls, that they could not be battered, yet would they not permit the Romans to place their Rams againſt them. And the Romans being perſwaded that the Jews ſo laboured, becauſe they knew their Walls to be weak, and leſt Antonia by the breach of the Wall ſhould be hurt ; the Romans reſolutely and undauntedly (notwithſtanding that many Darts were caſt at them from off the Walls) perſiſted to beat the Wall with their Rams. But when they ſaw that their Rams, though unceſſantly playing, could make no breach, they reſolved to undermine

A undermine the Wall, and accordingly, covering themſelves with their bucklers againſt the Stones thrown by the Jews upon them, ſome with their hands pulled the ſtones out of the Wall; ſome digged under the foundation thereof, till four ſtones of the Tower with much labour were broken and ſhaken. But the night hindered both parties from doing any more at that time, but ſoon after the Wall ſhaken with the Ram (in the place which John had undetermined to deſtroy the Mounts) fell down. This fell out otherwiſe than either part expected : For the Jews, who had cauſe indeed to be ſorrowful for the fall of the Wall, and that they had not prevented this miſchance, yet were as joyful and couragious, as if Antonia ſtill remained firm and ſtrong : And the joy of the Romans for this unexpected fall ſoon ceaſed, when they ſaw the other Wall that B John had built within. Yet they judged it eaſier to be taken then the former ; but no man durſt aſcend it ; becauſe thoſe who firſt aſſaulted it could not hope to come off alive. Titus, thinking that by hope and perſwaſion his Souldiers might be encouraged, and knowing that many times promiſes and exhortations make men forget danger, and ſometime to contemn death it ſelf, he called together the moſt valiant of all his Army, and ſpake to them as followeth :

The year of the World, 4034. After the Nativity of Christ 72.

No man durſt aſcend the Wall that John built.

*Fellow Souldiers, It were a ſhamfull thing to exhort men to enterprize a thing without danger, both to them that are exhorted, and to him that exhorts : for exhortations are only to be uſed in doubtful Affairs, where it is praiſ-worthy for every man to adventure himſelf.
I confeſs it is a hardy attempt to aſcend the Wall : yet it is alſo a glorious death to die in* C ſuch a fight, and eſpecially, it becometh thoſe that are deſirous to win honour ; and that they that firſt adventure valiantly to do it, ſhall not go away unrewarded. And firſt let this move you, which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient mind of the Jews, and their conſtancy in adverſity. For it is a ſhame for the Roman Souldiers, who in time of peace exerciſe themſelves in Warlike Feats, and are accuſtomed in time of War to get the Victory, now to be overcome by the Jews, and that at the end of the War we having alſo God to help us : for all our harms proceed from the Jews deſperation ; and their deſtruction and calamity by Gods favour and your valour is every day promoted. For what elſe is betokened by their ſedition amongſt themſelves, their Famine, the fall of their Walls without our Engines to batter them, and the ſiege it ſelf, but the wrath of God towards them, and his favour toward us?
D *Wherefore it is unſeemly for you either to give place to your inferiours, or to neglect Gods favour and furtherance. Is it not a ſhame that the Jews, who, were they conquered, would ſuſtaine no great reproach, as being accuſtomed to ſerve and obey others, ſhould ſo valianty contemn death leſt they ſhould hereafter ſuffer or endure the like ; and many times boldly adventure and make excurſions even amongſt the midſt of us, not out of hope to overcome us but only to ſhew their valour? and that we, who have conquered almoſt the Earth and Sea, to whom it is an infamy not to be victorious, lie idle never make valiant aſſault upon our Enemies, but being thus armed, expect till Fortune and Famine, deliver them into our hands ?
Eſpecially, ſeeing that by undergoing a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into* Antonia, we have taken the City. For ſuppoſe that we were then to fight againſt them that are with-E in the City (which I do not think) then having gotten the higher part of the City) and being above our Enemies head we are aſſured of a perfect victory over them. I omit now the commendations deſerved of thoſe who have been ſlain in Wars, and whom immortal Glory keeps alive always in the memory of men of this life : and thoſe that do not ſo think, and whoſe Souls and bodies deſcend together into the grave, I pray, that they may die of ſome evil death in peace. For what valiant man knoweth not, that the Soul of him that dies in War, is preſently received into the moſt pure Airy Element, and from thence carried and placed among the Stars of Heaven, from whence their heroick Souls appear to their poſterity as bleſſed Spirits to animate them to vertue by the deſire of poſſeſſing the ſame Glory one day ? And that thoſe who in peace die of ſome diſeaſe and ſickneſs, their Souls are kept in F *the bowels of the Earth in darkneſs, notwithſtanding that they be moſt Juſt and Pure , and preſently they are forgotten, and their life and memory together with them extinguiſhed?
Seeing therefore that we are all certain to die, and that to die by the Sword is a more eaſie death, than to die by any diſeaſe, why ſhould we deprive our ſelves of this opportunity, ſeeing that at laſt we muſt neceſſarily quit our lives as a due debt to the deſtinies ? This I have ſpoken as though it were impoſſible to eſcape with life, but they that bear the minds of men, can find means to ſave themſelves even in the greateſt dangers. For firſt of all, that part of the Wall that is faln may eaſily be entred, and the Wall new-built is not hard to be thrown down : and many of you together enterprizing this work, may one exhort and help another, and your audacity and courage will quickly daunt the Enemies, and perhaps we may ſucceed* G without great loſs in ſo Glorious an enterprize. For they will no more reſiſt us if we once aſcend the Wall : and let us but effect any one exploit either ſecretly or openly, and the Jews will never more endure us, though we be but few in number. I engage my ſelf ſo to reward H him, that firſt enters upon the breach, that all the Army ſhall envy his happineſs: for if he ſurSurvive, he ſhall command thoſe that are now his equals; and who ſo is ſlain in this quarrel, I will do him great honour.

Sabinus a man of a low Stature, yet both in hand and heart valiant.

Sabinus with eleven men approacheth the Wall.

The power of Fortune.

Sabinus with three companions ſlain.

Though theſe words of ſo generous a Commander were enough to inflame the coldeſt breſts, yet the greatneſs of the danger had made ſuch an impreſſion in their minds, that no body preſented himſelf to go to the breah c but one Sabinus, a Syrian, a man of excellent courage; yet of ſo ſmall ſtature, that by his outward appearance one would have deemed him unfit to have been a Souldier: for he was of very ſmall ſtature and of black colour, but he had a mind far greater than his body, and ſtrength ſcarce able to be contained in ſo little room. Sabinus riſing up, ſaid; I offer my ſelf I to thee, O Cæſar, firſt of all to aſcend the Wall, and that with a willing mind; and I wiſh your good fortune may ſecond my affection. But though it ſhould not ſo fall out, but I happen to be ſlain before I get to the top of the breach, yet I ſhall have ſucceeded in my deſign; ſince I propoſe nothing to my ſelf but the Glory and happineſs of imploying my life for your ſervice. When he had ſo ſaid, he took his Shield in his left hand, and holding it above his head, with his drawn Sword in his Right hand, about the ſixth hour of the day, he went to the Wall: and eleven men followed him, who only imitated his vertue. But Sabinus with a divine fervour of Spirit went before them all; notwithſtanding, that on every ſide the Jews upon the Wall caſt an infinite number of Darts at him, and rowl'd down upon him huge Stones, which K ſtruck down ſome of the eleven that followed him. But Sabinus for all the Darts and Arrows ſtopt not, till ſuch time as he had got to the top of the Wall, and put the Enemies to flight: who, terrified with his boldneſs and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come up after him, fled. But who may not juſtly blame Fortune, as taking pleaſure to croſs heroick actions? Sabinus, after having ſo glorioufly executed his enterpriſe, was ſtruck with a Stone, and thrown down flat upon his face moſt violently with a great noiſe: ſo that now the Jews ſeeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned again, and ſhot at him on every ſide: and he kneeling upon his knees, and covering himſelf with his ſhield Strove to revenge himſelf upon his Enemies, and wounded many that came near him, till with wounding them, he was ſo weary, that L he could ſtrike no longer; and ſo at laſt he was ſlain: Thus the ſucceſs was anſwerable to the difficulty of the Enterpriſe, although his vertue merited one more happy. Of thoſe of his company, three having almoſt got to the top of the Wall, were ſlain with Stones; and the other eight being wounded, were carried back to the Camp. And this was done the third day of July.

CHAP. II.

How the Romans aſſaulted Antonia, and how they were driven back from thence by the Jews. M

The Romans invade Antonia.

A moſt ſtout fight about the entrance of the inner Temple. The Straitneſs of the place was incommodious for the fight.

TWo days after, twenty of the Souldiers which guarded the Mounts, two Horſemen, and an Enſigne of the fifth Legion with a Trumpeter, gathered themſelves together: and about the ninth hour of the night they aſcended by the ruines into Antonia without any reſiſtance: and finding the firſt Watch-men aſleep, they ſlew them and got the Wall, and commandedthe Trumpeter to ſound; by which ſound the reſt of the Watch-men being awak'd fled for fear, imagining that a great number of the Romans was gotten upon the Wall: Titus haueing notice of it preſently gathered his Souldiers together, and accompanied with his chief Captains, and his Guards, he aſcended the Wall. The Jews fled into the inner Temple, and the Romans broke in N amongſt them by the Mine that John had made to deſtroy the Mounts of the Romans. The followers both of John and Simon fought couragiouſly to drive them Back: for they thought it the utter ruin of all, if the Romans got into the Holy-place, which indeed was of importance to their victory. So they began a ſharp fight in the very entrance; the Romans ſtriving to get the inner Temple, and the Jews endeavouring to beat them back towards Antonia. And now Arrows, Darts, and Spears, nothing availed either part, but they fought it out at handy blows with Swords: and in the conflict no man could diſcern on which ſide any one fought; for the Souldiers on both parts were mingled together, and through the ſtraitneſs of the place, could not keep O their ranks: for there was ſuch a noiſe that no man could hear one another, and many were

A were ſlain on both parts: and the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlain on both parts, and their Weapons falling with them, hurt many that trod upon them; and whoſoever had the worſt they preſently cryed out pitifully, and the Victours ſhouted for joy: neither was there any place to fly, or follow, the fight was ſuch, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreover, they that ſtood in the foreſront of the Battel, were either of neceſſity to kill or be killed, for there was no void ſpace left between the two Armies. At laſt the rage and deſpair of the Jews overcame the valour of the Romans, and they were all beaten back (having fought from the ninth hour of the night, unto the ſeventh hour of the day.) The Jews were encouraged to fight for fear they ſhould be overcome. And this part of the Roman Army (for as yet the B Legions were not come) thought it ſufficient at that time to have gotten the Caſtle of Antonia.

CHAP. III.

Of the incredible valour of Julian a Roman Captain.

Julian's famous fortitude.

THere was one Julian, a Centurion, born in Bithynia, of good parentage, who C was the moſt valiant dextrous and ſtrongeſt man that I knew in all this War. This Julian ſeeing the Romans to have the worſt, as he was ſtanding by Titus in Antonia, he preſently leapt down, and all alone charged the Jews who had the Victory, and made them retire into the inner Temple. and the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force and courage, not to have been a man. But he amongſt the midſt of them, ſlew whomſoever he light on, one of them for haſte caſting down another. So that this his deed ſeemed admirable to Ceſar, and terrible to his Enemies. Yet did that deſtiny befall him which no man could foreſee, for having his ſhoes full of Nails, as other Souldiers have, and running upon the pavement, he ſlipt and fell down, his Armour in the fall D making a great noiſe: whereupon his Enemies, who before fled, turned again upon him. The Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cryed out: but the Jews many at once, ſtruck at him with Swords and Spears. He warded off many blows with his Shield; and many times attempting to riſe, they ſtruck him down again: yet as he lay, he wounded many; neither was he quickly ſlain, becauſe all parts of his body were very well armed, and he cover'd his head with his buckler, but no man helping him, his ſtrength failed. Ceſar was very ſorrowful to ſee a man of ſo great fortitude ſlain in the ſight of ſuch a multitude, and that the place wherein he was, hindred him from helping him: and that others that might have helped him, durſt not for fear.

Julian running, falls upon the pavement.

Julians death

At laſt, when Julian had a long time ſtriven with Death, and wounded many of E them that aſſaulted him, he was with much ado killed, leaving behind him a renowned memory, not only amongſt the Romans, but alſo amongſt his Enemies. The Jews took his dead body, and beat back the Romans, and ſhut them up within Antonia. In this Battel Alexas and Gypthæus, two of Johns faction, and of Simons faction Malachias and Judas, the Son of Merton, and James the Son of Soſa Captain of the Idumeans, and two brethren of the Zealots, the Sons of Jairus, Simon, and Judas, ſignaliz'd themſelves.

Valiant Souldiers amongſt the Jews

CHAP. IV.

Joſephs Speech, perſwading the Jews to yield the City: many of them fled unto the Romans.

AFter that Titus had commanded his Souldiers to ruine the foundations of Antonia, and make an eaſie entrance for the whole Army, he called Joſeph to him (for he underſtood, that that day, being the ſeventeenth of July, the Jews were wont to celebrate a certain Feaſt to God, which they called Entelechiſmus, that is to ſay, the breaking of the Tables; and that they were much troubled that they could not celebrate the ſame) and again commanded him to tell John, as he had formerly done, That if he G deſired to fight, he ſhould have liberty to come with what multitude he pleaſed, ſo that the City and the Temple might not both periſh with him; that he ought to de-ſiſt from prophaning the Holy-place, and from ſinning againſt God : and that if he ſo H pleaſed, he would grant him leave to Celebrate the Feaſt which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he would. Joſeph to the intent that not only John might hear this offer of Titus, but alſo the reſt of the people, got upon an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue declared to the Jews Cæſars pleaſure, earneſtly requeſting them to ſpare their Country, and prevent the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, and to offer the accuſtomed Sacrifices to God. When he had thus ſaid, the people were very ſorrowful, and all held their peace, not daring to ſpeak. But the Tyrant John, having uſed many railing ſpeeches againſt Joſeph, at laſt anſwered, that he need not fear the deſtruction of the Temple and City, ſeeing that it belouged to God. I

Then Joſeph with a loud voice cryed out, True it is, you have kept it pure and unpro- phaned for God, and the Holy-things you have kept inviolate, neither have you committed any iniquity againſt him, from whom you expect help, but have offered ſolemn Sacrifice unto him. If any man ſhould take from you your daily food, no doubt you would account him your Enemy : And can you then hope that God, whom you have deprived of daily Sacrifice, will aſſiſt you in this War ? Do you impute theſe offences to the Romans ? why they even now defend our Religion, and command the Sacrifice to be offered, which you have forbidden. Who doth not bewail this unexpected change, and lament our City ? Strangers and Enemies correct your impiety, and you a Jew born, and brought up in our Law, are more cruel than they. But conſider, John, it is no ſhame to repent your wickedneſs in extremity : and at K the laſt, If you be deſirous to ſave your Country; you have a good example of Jechonias, ſometime King of the Jews ; Who, when the Babylonians warred againſt him, of his own accord went out of the City before it was taken, and willingly endured Captivity with all his Family and Kindred only, to hinder the ruine of the City, the profanation of the Holy-things, and the burning of the Temple. And for this act of his, he is of Sacred memory among the Jews, and hath thereby gained immortal praiſe amongſt all poſterity. This is a good example, O John, now danger is at hand : and I will promiſe you pardon from the Romans, con- ſider that I your Country-man admoniſh you and promiſe this unto the Jews : and that in the name of Cæſar. God forbid, that ever I ſhould be ſuch a wretch as to forget whence I took my birth, and what love I ought to have for the Laws of my Country. Yet, you are incenſ- L ed againſt me, and exclaim on me, and curſe me. True it is, I deſerve worſe than this ; becauſe I ſeek to perſwade contrary to the determination of Gods providence, and ſtrive to ſave them whom his ſentence hath condemned. Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient Prophets and their Prophecies, wherein this wretched City is foretold to be deſtroyed by thoſe that being born Jews murther our own Nation : and now not only the City, but alſo the Temple is full of your dead bodies ? Certainly, it is God that joyns with the Romans, to expiate all theſe Abominations with fire.

Jechonias ſuſtained a voluntary baniſhment in Babylon.

The City, by the ordinance of fate and Gods will was to be overthrown.

Joſephs ſpeech is interrupted with ſighs.

Joſeph thus diſcourſing with Tears and Lamentations, could ſpeak no more for ſighing : And the Romans compaſſionating his ſorrow and affliction, were aſtoniſhed.
But John and his confederates were ſo much the more incited againſt the Romans, and M ſought to take Joſeph ; yet his ſpeech mov'd many of the Nobles ; and divers fearing the Seditious Guards remained ſtill where they were, making full account both of their own deſtruction, and the ſubverſion of the City. Yet ſome there were, who finding opportunity, fled to the Romans : amongſt whom were two Prieſts, Joſeph and Jeſus ; and three Sons of Iſmael the Prieſt, who was beheaded at Cyrena, and the fourth Son of Matthias the Prieſt, who eſcaped to the Romans before his father was put to death by Simon Giora, with his three other Sons, as is before related : many other Nobles alſo came away with the Prieſts, whom the Emperour received very courteouſly, and ſent them to Gophna ; knowing that it was a grief to them to converſe amongſt people of different manners from them ; and he willed them to remain there, N and promiſed every one of them great poſſeſſions after the War was ended. So they joyfully departed to the place appointed : but the Seditious, becauſe they were not ſeen, reported to the people, that they who had fled to the Romans were ſlain, deſigning hereby to terrifie the reſt from flying to them : and thus their device a while prevailed, as their former did ; and they that fain would, durſt not now fly for fear.
But afterward, when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the Walls with Joſeph, and ſhew themſelves to the people ; then many more of the Jews fled to the Romans.

Some of the Nobility among the Jews eſcape to the Romans.

Thoſe Jews that were fled beſought the beſieged with tears and ſighs to ſubmit themſelves.

And after they had gathered themſelves together, ſtanding all before the Romans, they beſought the Seditious with tears to receive the Romans into the City, and ſave O their Country : or if this pleaſed them not, at leaſt to depart out of the Temple, and to

A to deliver it up to them. For the Romans durſt not, except neceſſity urged them thereto, fire the holy Temple. But their malice againſt the Romans encreaſing, they fell to railing againſt thoſe that had fled to them, and planted all their Engines to caſt Stones, Darts, and Arrows upon their Holy-Porches. So that all the void ſpace about the Temple was filled with dead bodies like a Burying-place, and the Temple it ſelf reſembled a Citadel, and they now with their Weapons, having their hands imbrewed with the blood of their Country-men, preſumed to enter into the Sanctuary where none ought to come: and they became ſo injurious againſt their own Laws, that what indignation the Jews ought to have conceived againſt the Romans, if they had ſo pro-phaned the Holy-places, the ſame they cauſed the Romans to have againſt them for doing the like. For there was not one amongſt the Roman Souldiers, that did not with re-B verence behold the Temple, and adore it, and that did not heartily wiſh that the Thieves would repent themſelves before it was too late. Moreover, Titus pittying the Seditious, once again ſpoke to John, and his adherents, ſaying: O ye impious people, have not your Anceſtors invironed the Temple about with a Balleſter, and erected Pillars whereon are engraven Greek and Roman Letters, forbidding all men to enter into thoſe limits? and Did not we licence you to kill any man that ſhould paſs them, though he were a Roman? What rage then is it which carryes you wicked wretches, to pollute the Temple with the blood not only of ſtrangers, but of your Country-men? I call my Country Gods to witneſs, and him who ſometime dwelt in this Place, (I ſay ſometime, for now I am perſwaded there is none;) I call alſo my Army to witneſs, and proteſt to the Jews that are with me, and C to your ſelves, That I have no ſhare in this profanation: but that if your Army will depart this Holy-place, that then no Roman ſhall come into the Sanctuary, nor commit any thing of contumely of them, but I will preſerve this famous Temple for you againſt your wills.

CHAP. V.

Another aſſault given by the Romans to the Jews who defended the Temple.

D TItus having ſpoken thus, and cauſed Joſeph to tell them in Hebrew what he ſaid to them, the Seditious thinking that the ſame proceeded not of good will, but of fear, began to be more proud thereupon. Then Titus, ſeeing they neither pitied themſelves, nor the Temple, determined again to uſe force, though very loth ſo to do; yet could he not bring all his Army againſt them, the Room was ſo little.
Wherefore out of every Company he made choice of thirty of the ſtrongeſt among them, and over every thouſand he apointed a Tribune, and made Cerealis their Captain or General, commanding him at the ninth hour of the night to aſſault the Guard of the Enemy. Alſo he himſelf would have gone with them; but his friends, and the E Captains about him, conſidering the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him: but repreſented to him, that he might do more good by ſtaying in Antonia, and encouraging the Souldiers that fought, then if he ſhould go and endanger himſelf: for every man being in the view of the Prince, would fight more couragiouſly.
Titus was herewith perſwaded, and told the Souldiers that the only cauſe he went not with them was this, that he ſtayed behind to view and judg of every ones valour, to the intent that none that behaved himſelf valiantly might go away unrewarded, nor any Coward eſcape unpuniſhed; but that he himſelf might be a beholder of every mans vertue. Having thus ſpoken he commanded the aſſault to be given.

Then he went up a Watch-Tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was F done. But they whom Titus ſent did not find the Guards aſleep, as they hoped; but with a great ſhout they received the Romans that came againſt them: and at this noiſe they awaked their fellows, who came in whole Companies to aſſiſt them, and made a Salley upon their Enemies. So the Romans ſuſtained the violence of their firſt Companies: but the ſecond that came, fell upon their own fellows, and uſed them like Enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noiſe, neither could one ſee another by reaſon it was night: and moreover, ſome were blinded with fury, ſome with anger, ſome with fear; ſo that every one ſtruck him that met him, without any reſpect. The Romans received ſmall damage thereby, becauſe that they were defended with their Shields, and remembred one anothers Watch-word.
G But the Jews fell on every ſide, ſhewing themſelves raſh as well in the charge as in their rallying; ſo that many times one of them took the other to be his Enemy. And Titus choſe thirty out of every hundred, moſt ſtrong and able men, and bids them charge the beſieged.

falling upon thoſe that rallyed, as though they had been Romans, aſſaulting them in H the dark. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellows than by their Enemies, till, day breaking, every one knew his companion; and then falling into ranks they betook themſelves to their Darts and Arrows. Neither part gave back, nor was wearied with labour: but many Romans together and apart, did in the view of the Prince ſhew their courage, every man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaved himſelf valiantly. The Jews fought ſtoutly, both for that they feared their own Imminent danger, if they were overcome, and the deſtruction of the Temple: and John ſtanding by, encouraged them to fight, ſome with blows, and others with threatnings. They fought almoſt all with handy blows; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either far to fly, or any ſpace to follow thoſe that fled. I The Romans in Antonia cried to their fellows that fought the Battel, Now for the Victory: encouraging them to ſtand to it, when they began to give back; ſo that Antonia was as a Theatre for this Battel: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done. At laſt, in the fifth hour of the day the fight ceaſed, having continued from the ninth hour of the night, neither party forſaking the place where firſt they began Battel, nor any part having the Victory. Many Romans there fought couragiouſly, and amongſt the Jews theſe that follow: Judas the Son of Merton; Simon the Son of Joſias; and Jacob and Simon, Idumeans; this, the Son of Cathla, but Jacob the Son of Soſa: theſe were of Simons company: And of Johns followers, Gipthæus and Alexas; and of the Zealots, Simon the Son of Jairus. But on the ſeventh day, the Ro- K mans pulling down the Foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the reſt of the Army; and the Legions coming to the Wall, preſently began to raiſe Mounts; one againſt the corner of the inner Temple, which was ſituate between the North and Eaſt: another againſt the Gallery on the North ſide, betwixt the two Porches: and other two, one a-gainſt the Porch of the Weſt ſide of the outward Temple; and another againſt the North Porch. So with much toyl and labour they finiſht this work, fetching wood to build it with one 100 Furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by Ambuſhes, not being wary by reaſon of their confidence: and the Jews deſpairing of themſelves every hour, more and more were encouraged. For many of the Horſmen going to get either wood or hay, while they were about it, took the Bridles from off their Horſes, and permitted L them to feed till they had ended their buſineſs; and preſently the Jews iſſuing out in troops upon them took them away.

The fight of the Jews and the Romans; near unto the Mount Eleo.

Pedanius, a ſtrong and expert Horſeman

The captive puniſhed.

Titus ſeeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens Horſes were ſtoln rather by their negligence, than their Enemies valour: wherefore he thought by the ſevere puniſhment of one, to make others look better to their Horſes. And ſo he put to death one of the Souldiers that had loſt his Horſe: by whoſe puniſhment the reſt of the Souldiers being terrified, kept their Horſes better. For after that, when they went about any buſineſs, they never left their Horſes in the paſtures, but kept always with them. Thus the Romans aſſaulted the Temple, and built their Mounts. The day following, certain of the Seditious, who now could get no more booties in the City, M and alſo began to be pinch'd with hunger, aſſaulted the Romans that were placed towards Mount Olivet, about the eleventh hour of the day: for they hoped to take them unawares, as being at dinner. But the Romans perceiving their intent, came out of their places, and reſiſted them who attempted voilently to break in upon them over the Wall: ſo that there was a hot fight; and many other deeds were done on either party, the Romans having both courage & ſkill in warlike affairs. The Jews were led with deſperate fury: and neceſſity and ſhame forced the Romans to fight. For the Romans accounted it a ſhame not to overcome the Jews; and the Jews thought it the only way to ſave their own lives, to break down the Wall by force. One of the Horſmen called Pedanius did a thing almoſt incredible, the Jews being put to flight, and driven into the Val- N ley, he purſued them with his Horſe as faſt as he could gallop, and overtook a young man one of his Enemies, being heavy of body, and armed all over; and taking him by the ankle, he carried him violently away (thereby ſhewing the ſtrength of his arm & his ſkilful Horſemanſhip) and ſo brought the Captive to Cæſar, as a preſent. Titus amiring Pedanius his ſtrength, and puniſhing the Captive for having attempted to aſſault the Wall, he haſted to aſſail the Temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to diſpatch the Mounts. In the mean time the Jews being ill handled in the former encounters, which ſtill increaſing to the overthrow of the Temple, they did, as the cuſtom is in a putrified body, prevent the Plague from going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the Porch that reached from the North to the Eaſt, joyned to Antonia: which they O firing, ſeparated twenty Cubits from it, having now with their own hands begun to caſt fire into the Holy-place.

A Two days after, which was the 24 day of the aforeſaid Month, the Romans ſet the Porch on fire, and the fire having gone fourteen Cubits, the Jews pull'd down the top thereof, and not deſiſting from their accuſtomed works, they pull'd down all adjoyning to Antonia; when it was eaſie for them, and that they ought to have hindred the fire.
The Porch being on fire, they permitted ſo much to be burned, as they thought good for their purpoſe. The fight about the Temple never ceaſed, but many Excurſions were made each againſt the other.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

About this time a certain Jew of low ſtature, and in appearance a contemptible perſon, every way an abject, both by reaſon of his baſe Parentage, and otherwiſe, named Jonathan, going to the Monument of John the Prieſt, dared the ſtrongeſt amongſt the B Romans to come and fight a ſingle combat with him. The Romans that beheld him, diſdained him: Yet ſome amongſt them (as it is commonly ſeen) were afraid of him: others wiſely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was deſirous to dye: becauſe they that are deſperate, neither fight adviſedly, nor have the fear of God before their Eyes: and conſequently, that it was not a ſign of Valour, but of overmuch hardineſs, to fight with ſuch a one, whom though they overcame, yet they could win no credit, but only hazard themſelves to be vanquiſht. So a long time none of the Romans came againſt him; and he upbraided them of cowardlineſs. At laſt, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horſemen, named Pudens, diſdaining his inſolency, C and perhaps alſo for that he was of little ſtature, came againſt him: but in fighting with him Fortune was unfavourable to him, for hapening to fall down, Jonathan ſlew him; after which ſetting his foot upon the dead body, with his left hand he flouriſhed his ſhield, and with his right his bloody ſword; and ſtriking his weapons one againſt another, he inſulted over the dead body, and upbraided the Romans, till at length one Priſcus a Centurion, as he was thus vaunting, ſhot him thorow with an Arrow, and ſo he fell down dead upon the body of his Enemy; at which deed, both the Romans and the Jews raiſed a confuſed noiſe. So Jonathan was juſtly puniſht for having made too much Triumph for an advantage which he ow'd to Fortune, and not to his own Valour.

The Romans burnt the porches of the Temple.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romans by a Stratagem of the Jews were conſumed with Fire: And of one Artorius.

THE Seditious that kept the Temple, were now every day openly in fight engaged againſt the Romans that kept the Mounts; and on the twenty ſeventh day of the Month of July they deviſed this Stratagem: they filled the void part of the Eaſt Porch E of the Temple with dry Wood, Brimſtone and Bitumen; and when they were aſſaulted, they fled out of it as not able longer to reſiſt. Whereupon many of the Romans raſhly purſued the Jews that fled, and with Ladders got into the Galleries. But the wiſer ſort conſidering that the Jews had no juſt occaſion to fly, kept their place. The Porch being now full of Romans, that were got up into it, the Jews gave fire to the Wood and Brimſtone, and upon a ſudden all the Porch was encompaſſed with the flame: ſo that the Romans who were out of danger were amazed at it, and thoſe that were amid the flames became deſperate: and being invironed with the flames, ſome ſought to run back into the Town, and others to the Enemies, others killed themſelves, ſo preventing the fury of the fire: and preſently the flame overtook thoſe that ſought to flie. Cæſar F though offended at the Souldiers for having aſcended into the Porch unbidden, yet ſeeing them die ſo wofully in the flames he compaſſionated them. And although the fire could not be quenched, yet the poor Souldiers dying amongſt the flames were ſomewhat contented, that they perceived him to be extreamly ſorrowful for them, for whom they had hazarded their lives. For they beheld him crying to their fellows to help to extinguiſh the fire, and he himſelf laboured what he could to do it; ſo that every one eſteemed his ſorrow and lamentation for them as much as a ſumptuous funeral: but ſome eſcaped the fire and got into the largeſt part of the Porch: yet invironed round about with Jews, and having long reſiſted, though with many wounds, in the end they were all ſlain.

man, for that he was ſtrong, and willed him to come down to them, ſwearing unto him H to ſpare him. But his Brother Cornelius, who ſtood on the other ſide, intreated him not to blemiſh his own honour and that of the Romans, whom he obeyed: and ſo lifting up his Sword on high, that either part might ſee, he ſlew himſelf. Yet one Artorius from amidſt the fire eſcaped by this device; calling unto him one Lucius his fellow-Souldier and Chamber-fellow; I will (ſaid he) make thee heir of all my Inheritance, if thou wilt catch me in thy arms. Lucius willingly endeavouring to do it, Artorius caſt himſelf down upon him, and ſo eſcaped with his life, but Lucius, upon whom he fell, was bruiſed againſt the pavement, and ſo died. This Calamity a while greatly afflicted the Romans, yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Jews Subtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they ſuſtained great dammage. So the Porch was burnt I unto the Tower which John built during his Wars againſt Simon; and the Jews, after the Romans that were aſcended into it were conſumed, pulled down the reſt. The next day the Romans fired the North Porch, as far as the aforeſaid Eaſt-Porch, which contained the corners of the Wall built over the Valley Cedron, ſo that it was terrible to behold the Valley from thence, by reaſon of the depth.

Of the Famine amongſt the Jews.

The inteſtine Wars of the Jews that were well nigh famiſhed with hunger.

SUch were the affairs about the Temple: but an innumerable multitude periſhed within the City through Famine, for in every place where any ſhew or ſign of food was, preſently aroſe a Battel; and the deareſt friends of all fought one with another to take the food from each other; neither did they believe thoſe that were now a dying for Famine, when they ſaid, they had nothing left to eat; but the Thieves ſearched thoſe whom they ſaw yielding up the ghoſt, thinking that they had hid about them ſome food: but when they were deceived of their hopes, they became like mad-dogs; and the leaſt L thing made them fall againſt the doors like drunken men, ſearching the ſelf-ſame houſes twice or thrice together in deſperation, and for very hunger they eat whatſoever they light upon, gathering ſuch things to eat, as the moſt filthy living Creatures in the world would have loathed. In brief, they eat their Girdles, Shoes, and the ſkins that covered their ſhields, ſo that a little old Hay was ſold for four Attiques. But what need is it to ſhew the ſharpneſs of this Famine by things that want life? I will recount an act never heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous People, horrible to be rehearſed, and incredible; ſo that I would willingly omit this Calamity, leſt poſterity ſhould think I lie, had not I many witneſſes hereof, aud perhaps ſhould incur reprehenſion, M not fully recounting all accidents of thoſe that are dead.

The Jews eat their own girdels, ſhoes, the leather of their Targets, and old hay.

CHAP. VIII.

Of a Woman that for Famine killed her Son, and dreſſed him for meat.

A Certain Woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Jordan, the Daughter of Eleazar, of the Town of Bathechor, which ſignifieth the houſe of Hyſope, deſcended of N noble and rich parentage, flying with others to Jeruſalem, was there with them beſieged. Her richeſt goods the Tyrants had taken from her, which ſhe had brought from beyond the River into the City: and whatſoever being hid, eſcaped their hands, the Thieves daily came into her houſe and took it away: whereat the Woman greatly moved, curſed them, and with hard ſpeeches animated them the more againſt her; yet no man either for anger or compaſſion would kill her, but ſuffered her to live to get them meat: but now could ſhe get no more, and Famine tormented her with rage and anger more than danger. Wherefore by rage and neceſſity ſhe was compelled to do that which Nature abhorred, and taking her Son to whom ſhe then gave ſuck: O miſerable Child (ſaid ſhe) in War, Famine and Faction; for which of theſe ſhall I keep thee? If thou come among the Romans, thou ſhalt be made a ſlave; yet Famine will prevent Bondage, or elſe our own Tyrants O *worſe than them both. A Story to beſpoken of by Poſterity, and ſuch as is only yet unheard of among the Calamities of the Jews. Having thus ſpoken, ſhe ſlew her Son, and ſod the one half of him, and eat it; the reſt ſhe reſerved covered. In a little time after came the Seditious, who ſmelling the ſent of that execrable meat, threatned preſently to kill her, except ſhe forthwith brought ſome of that unto them which ſhe had prepared. She anſwered, That ſhe had reſerved a good portion thereof for them; and preſently uncovered that part of her Son which ſhe had left uneaten; at which ſight they trembled, and horror fell upon them. But the Woman ſaid, This is truly my Son, and my doing; eat you of it, for I my ſelf have eaten thereof. Be not more effeminate than a Woman, nor more merciful than a Mother. If Religion make you refuſe this my Sacrifice, I have already eaten of it, and will eat the reſt. The B Seditious departed hereat greatly trembling; and how great ſoever their ravenouſneſs was, they left the reſt of this deteſtable food to the wretched Mother. Preſently the report of this heinous Crime was bruited all about the City, and every man, having before his Eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himſelf had done it. And now all that were vexed with this Famine, wiſhed their own deaths; and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this Famine. This unnatural fact was ſoon after recounted to the Romans; ſome of them would not believe it, others pittied them within the City; and many hereat encreaſed their hatred towards the Nation.

The calamity recounted to the Romans.

Titus, to juſtifie himſelf before Almighty God, proteſted, That he was not the cauſe of this miſery; having offered the Jews Peace, General Pardon and Oblivion for all C their Offences paſt; but they rather choſe War than Peace, Sedition than Quietneſs, Famine than Wealth and Plenty, having with their own hands begun to ſet on fire the Temple, which he had preſerved for them; that therefore ſuch like meat was fit for them, and that he would bury this abominable Crime of eating their own Children in the Ruines of their Country, and that he would not in any part of the World ſuffer the Sun to ſhine upon ſuch a City, wherein Mothers eat their own Children; and where the Fathers were no leſs culpable than the Mothers, becauſe, for all their miſeries, they would not yet ceaſe from Arms. Having thus ſpoken, he conſidered the Deſperation of the Enemies, and that they would not recall themſelves, who had already endured all ſuch Calamities, which might, if it had been poſſible, have altered their Opinions, rather D than to have endured the ſame.

CHAP. IX.

How the Wall was taken, and the Temple burnt.

THE Eighth day of Auguſt, two of the Roman Legions having finiſhed their Mounts, began to place their Rams againſt the Eaſt-Galleries without the Temple, having E ſix days together without intermiſſion already beaten the Wall with their ſtrongeſt Rams, and nothing prevailed, the Stones being ſo ſtrong, that the Rams could not move them, Others of the Romans laboured to dig up the Foundations of the Porch, that was on the North ſide; and after much toyl, they only could pull away the outward Stones; but the inner Stones ſtill ſupported the Porch. At laſt the Romans ſeeing they could not prevail by their Javelins and other Inſtruments, ſet up Ladders to aſcend into the Galleries. The Jews did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting up: but when they were within the Galleries, then they came and fought with them, and caſt ſome of them down headlong, forcing them to retire; others they ſlew that ſtood in it; and others that were upon the Ladders going down, before they could defend themſelves F with their Shields, were with Swords ſtrucken down; they alſo thruſt down ſome Ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great Maſſacre of the Romans, who fought moſt to recover their Enſigns, which the Jews had taken from them, eſteeming the loſs thereof a great ſhame to them. At laſt the Jews kept their Enſignes, and ſlew thoſe that bore them; and the reſt terrified with their deaths, went down again; although not one of the Romans died, who before he was ſlain did not ſome valiant act. Beſides thoſe Seditious perſons, who in the former Battels had ſhew'd themſelves valiant, Eleazar, Son to the Brother of Simon, one of the two Tyrants, got great honour, Then Titus perceiving that he ſpared the Temple of the Jews to his loſs, and with the death of his Souldiers, commanded fire to be put to the Porches of the Temple; whereupon Ananus G of Emmaus the moſt cruel of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the ſon of Magadatus fled to Titus; who, for their Cruelties committed, determined to put them to death;

though they hoped for pardon becauſe they had now forſaken the Jews when they had H gotten the better. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for neceſſity, and that they did not deſerve to live, for forſaking their Country now ſet on fire by their Crimes: Yet his promiſe bridled his wrath, and he diſmiſſed them; but they were not ſo much eſteemed as the reſt. The Roman Souldiers had already put fire to the Temple Gates: and, the Silver plate wherewith they were covered being melted, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreaſing took hold preſently of the next Porch. The Jews ſeeing themſelves invironed with flames, were now altogether diſcouraged, and their hearts failed them; and being amazed, no man ſought to extinguiſh the flame; and ſo they ſtood ſtill beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was ſet on fire, nor endeavouring to ſave the reſt: and ſo that day and all the next night the fire encreaſed: I for the Porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

Titus counſel concerning the Temple.

Titus with his choſen horſemen cometh to reſcue the Romans.

The Temple was burnt by the Romans the tenth of the month of Auguſt; on which day beforetime it was burned by the King of Babylon.

The next day Titus cauſed part of his Army to quench the fire: and calling to him his Captains, and ſix that were the chifeſt among them, to wit Tiberius Alexander, his Lieutenant General, Sextus Serealis Commander of the fifth Legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, Æternius Fronto Commander of the two Legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Julianus Governour of Judæa, beſides ſome other Collonels and Captains; he deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the Temple. Some counſelled to uſe the right of War, for that the Jews would never live peaceably whilſt their Temple was ſtanding; for all their Nation whereſoever living, would aſſemble themſelves thither at certain times. Others perſwaded K Titus, to ſave it, if ſo be the Jews abandon'd it, and ceaſed to defend it; but if they ſought for it, then to burn it: for it was to be conſidered as a Caſtle, not a Temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it would not be imputed to the Romans or to their General, but to the Jews who conſtrained them to do it; and he ſhould not offend, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed, that although the Jews made uſe of their Temple as of a Fortreſs, yet it ſhould not be deſtroyed: for he would not ſo be reveng'd upon inanimate things, neither would he ever fire ſo goodly a building; for it would redound to the diſhonour of the Romans; as on the contrary it would be a credit unto them, if it were left remaining. Whereupon Alexander Fronto, and Cærealis perceiving Cæſar's mind became of his opinion; and ſo he diſmiſſed the Council, and commanded L the Souldiers and Captains to reſt, that they might be the more able to fight when need required: and preſently he appointed certain choſen men to make the Ways even and eaſie for the Army to paſs by the Ruines, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Jews being fearful and weary, made no reſiſtance. The day following takeing heart and aſſembling together, they aſſaulted the Guard that ſtood without the Temple, the ſecond hour of the day. The Romans valiantly received their firſt aſſault, defending themſelves with their ſhields as though they had had a wall before them; yet they could not long have born the ſhock, for that they were fewer in number than their Enemies, and not ſo deſperate, had not Cæſar (beholding the fight from Antonia) came with certain choſen Horſemen, before they retired to ſuccour them. Whoſe force the M Jews not ſuſtaining, but the firſt of them being ſlain, the reſt gave back, and the Romans likewiſe retiring, the Jews returned and charged them again; and when the Romans returned again, preſently they fled; till about the fifth hour of the day the Jews were forced to betake themſelves to the Temple, and there they ſhut themſelves up. Then Titus returned to Antonia, purpoſing the next day to aſſault them with all his Army, and win the Temple. But the providence of God had already determined, that it ſhould be conſumed with fire. And now the fatal day was come after many years, which was the tenth of Auguſt, upon which day alſo the King of Babylon once before burnt it; yet it was now firſt ſet on fire by our own Country-men, who were indeed the cauſe thereof. For the Seditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then again they aſſaulted the Romans, N and ſo fought with the Guard that were without the Temple, labouring to extinguiſh the flame; who putting the Jews to flight, purſued them to the Temple.

How the Temple was burnt againſt the Will of Titus.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Christ, 72.

A Souldier contrary to Cæſar's will burned the Temple.

THen a certain Souldier, who expected no Command, nor feared to do ſo execrable a Fact, moved with ſome divine fury, and liſted up by one of his fellows, took in his hand a flaming Firebrand, and caſt it into the golden window, which entred into the buildings on the North part of the Temple, and the flame preſently aroſe; which B cauſed a great cry amongſt the Jews, expreſſing their calamity; and every one haſted to extinguiſh the fire; neither accounting of their lives nor forces, if they loſt that for which they had fought ſo long. News hereof was preſently brought by one who came from the fight to Titus, who then was reſting in his Tent, and he preſently aroſe, and ran to the Temple to hinder the fire, and all the Captains after him; whereupon the Souldiers followed in great confuſion, and there aroſe a great cry and tumult in the Army being diſordered. Cæſar both with his voice and hand made a ſign to the Souldiers that were fighting, to quench the fire. But they did not hear him, there was ſo great a noiſe; neither did they perceive the ſign he made unto them with his hand, becauſe ſome were diſtracted with fear, and others with anger: and the Souldiers iſſued C in, not reſtrained either by commands or threatnings, but every one went whither his fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many preſſed one another to death; and many being amongſt the fiery ruines of the Galleries periſhed as miſerably as thoſe that were overcome. When they came to the Temple every one feigned not to hear Cæſars command, and ſo exhorted his fellows that were before him to fire the Temple. The Seditious now had no hope to withſtand them, but either fled or were ſlain: and many unarmed and unable people, whereſoever they were found, were ſlain: ſo that about the Altar were an innumerable company of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed down the Temple ſtairs; and their Bodies were rouled down.
Cæſar, ſeeing he could not reſtrain the fury of the Souldiers, and that the fire encreaſed, D entered into the Sanctuary, with his chief Officers, and beheld all the holy things there, and found its magnificence and riches far ſurpaſſing all report which ſtrangers had given of it, and equal to that of the Jews themſelves. The flame not having yet pierced into the inner part of the Temple, nor conſumed the Houſes and Roomes about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preſerved; wherefore himſelf went, and intreated the Souldiers to extinguiſh the fire, and commanded Liberalis, the Centurion of his Guard, to beat thoſe with a Trunchion that would not be obedient, and to drive them away.
But their fury, and the hatred they bare againſt the Jews, rendred them deaf to Cæſars commands, and regardleſs of puniſhment, many were carried on with the hope of ſome booty, thinking that all the Temple within was full of money, becauſe they ſaw the E Gates covered with plates of Gold. Moreover, a certain Souldier, when Cæſar ſought to quench the flame, fired the Poſts about the doors: and preſently the flame appearing within, Cæſar and the Captains departed out; and ſo every one ſtood looking upon it, and no man ſought to extinguiſh it. Thus the Temple was burnt againſt Titus his will.
And although every man will judge it a lamentable caſe, in ſuch a Building ſurpaſſing all that ever was ſeen or heard of, both for greatneſs, workmanſhip, coſtlineſs and plenty of all things; yet in this we may comfort our ſelves, that Providence had ſo determined.
For neither living Creatures, nor Places, nor Buildings, can avoid their Deſtiny.
One may alſo admire the exact and juſt revolution of time, for it was now deſtroyed in the ſame moneth, and on the ſame day, that the Babylonians firſt deſtroyed it.
F And from that time that Solomon began the firſt Temple, unto the deſtruction of the ſecond Temple, which happened the ſecond year of Veſpatians Reign, were a thouſand a hundred and thirty years, ſeven months, and fifteen dayes; and from the building of the latter Temple, which Haggai cauſed to be built in the ſecond year of the Reign of King Cyrus, unto the deſtruction thereof, were ſix hundred thirty nine years and five and forty days.

CHAP. XI.

A horrible ſlaughter continued in the Temple, of the Prieſts, the Treaſure-houſe, and the Porch.

The cry and howling of the murthered Jews.

The Temple filled with fire and blood.

Two Noblemen caſt themſelves into the fire.

WHen the Temple was thus conſumed with fire, whatſoever the Souldiers found there, they carried away, and put all to the Sword that were in it, which were an infinite number: they ſhewed pity neither to old age, nor infants: but old, young, Prieſts and common People, all were ſlain without reſpect, and all ſorts of perſons taſted the calamity of War, whether they reſiſted, or entreated for mercy. And now the flame increaſing grieved even thoſe that were yielding up the Ghoſt: and by reaſon of the height of the Hill, and the Building together, one would have thought the whole City had been on fire. Then a moſt lamentable cry was raiſed betwen the Roman Legions, and the Seditious now invironed with fire and ſword, and the people that were taken in the higher part of the City, and had fled to the Romans, lamenting their calamity. They of the City anſwered the cryes and tears of thoſe in the Hill, and many, whoſe Eyes death by Famine had almoſt cloſed, took ſtrength a while to bewail the Temple, which they now beheld on fire. The Country beyond Jordan, and the Mountains about did eccho to their Lamentations: and yet the Calamities ſurpaſſed all expreſſion. For one would have judged the Hill whereon the Temple was ſituate, to have been burnt up by the roots, it was ſo all over fire: Yet the great quantity of Blood-ſhed ſeem'd to contend with the fire. Many that were ſlain were covered with thoſe that ſlew them, and all the ground was over-ſpread with dead bodies; ſo that the Souldiers ran upon the dead bodies to purſue thoſe that fled. At laſt the Thieves having driven the Romans without the Temple, ran into the City; and the reſt of the People that were left fled into the outward Porch. And many of the Prieſts uſed Spits of the Temple in ſtead of Darts, and threw their Seats made of Lead, inſtead of Stones, againſt the Romans; at laſt nothing at all prevailing, and the fire falling upon them, they got to the Wall, which was eight Cubits broad, and there ſtayed a while. Yet two of the principal, when they might either have fled to the Romans, and have been ſaved, or elſe have endured like Fortune with the reſt, caſt themſelves into the fire, and ſo were burnt with the Temple: One of them was named Meierus the Son of Belga, the other Joſeph the Son of Daleus.

Six thouſand in the Porch conſumed by fire.

Falſe prophets. ſuborned by the Seditious.

The Romans thought it in vain to ſpare the Buildings about the Temple, ſeeing the Temple was already conſumed; and ſo they ſet fire on them all, the Porches, Galleries, and Gates; two only excepted, one on the Eaſt-ſide, and the other on the South-ſide; both which afterwards they razed to the ground. They alſo put fire to the Treaſury, which was full of an incredible quantity of Riches, as well in money as in rich clothing, and other things of great price; and indeed all the Jews treaſure; for the richeſt of the City had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the Porch that was left ſtanding, many Men, Women, and Children, to the number of ſix thouſand: And before Cæſar and the Captains determined any thing what ſhould be done with them, the furious Souldiers fired the Porch wherein they were, and ſo they all periſhed in the flames, ſave a few, who leaping down to avoid the fire, were ſlain in the fall; ſo that not one eſcaped of all that multitude. A certain falſe Prophet was cauſe of their deaths, who the ſame day preached in the City, and commanded them to go into the Temple, where he aſſured them they ſhould that day receive the effects of Succour from God; for many falſe Prophets were then ſuborned by the Tyrants, to perſwade them to expect Gods help, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romans, and to cauſe the Souldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their City. Men eaſily believe, and are credulous in adverſity; ſo that if any deceitful perſon promiſe deliverance out of Calamity, he that ſuffereth miſery becomes full of hope thereupon.

CHAP. XII.

Of the ſtrange Signes and Tokens that appeared before the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

THeſe miſerable People were thus eaſily perſwaded by Impoſtors who abuſed the Name of God; yet would they not believe, nor give any ear or regard unto certain Tokens and Signs of the ruine of their City: but as it were blinded, neither having B Eyes nor Souls, they counterfeited themſelves not to ſee what God foreſhewed them. One while there was a Comet in form of a fiery Sword, which for a year together hung over the City. Another time before the firſt Revolt and War, the People being gathered together to the feaſt of Unleavened-Bread (which was the eighth day of April) at the ninth hour of the night, there was ſo much Light about the Altar and Temple, as though it had been bright day; and it remained half an hour: This the ignorant People interpreted as a good Sign; but they that were skilful in holy Scripture, preſently judged what would enſue before it came to paſs. At the ſame Feſtival, a Cow led to be ſacrificed at the Altar, brought forth a Lamb in the middeſt of the Temple: and the inner Gate of the Temple, on the Eaſt-ſide, being of maſſie braſs, and which at night C had alwayes at leaſt twenty men to ſhut it, and was bound with Locks of Iron, and barred with bars, the ends whereof went into Mortice holes in the ſtones on either ſide the door, (the foreſaid ſtones being on each ſide one whole Stone) was ſeen at the firſt hour of the night to open of its own accord: which being preſently related to the Magiſtrate by the Keepers of the Temple, he himſelf came thither and could ſcarcely ſhut it. This alſo to the ignorant ſeemed a good ſign, as if God opened to them the Gate of his bleſſings, but the wiſer ſort judged, that the defence of the Temple would fail of its own accord, and that the opening of the Gate foretold, that it ſhould be given to the Enemies, and that this ſign ſignified Deſolation. A little while after the Feaſt dayes, on the one and twentieth day of May, there was ſeen a Viſion beyond all belief; and perhaps that which D I am to recount might ſeem a Fable, if ſome were not now alive that beheld it, and if that Calamity worthy to be ſo foretold had not enſued. Before the Sun-riſe were ſeen in the Air all over the Country, Chariots full of armed men in battel aray paſſing along in the Clouds, and begirting the City. And upon the Feaſt day, called Pentecoſt, at night the Prieſts going into the Inner Temple to offer their wonted Sacrifice, at firſt felt the place to move and tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which ſaid, Let us depart hence. And that which was moſt wonderful of all, one Jeſus the Son of Ananus, an ordinary Peſant, four years before the War begun, when the City flouriſhed in Peace and Riches, coming to the celebration of the Feaſt of Tabernacles, in the Temple at Jeruſalem, ſuddenly began to cry out thus; A Voice from the Eaſt; a Voice from the Weſt; E a Voice from the four Winds; a Voice againſt Jeruſalem and the Temple; a Voice againſt Men and Women newly married; a Voice againſt all this People: And thus crying night and day, he went about all the ſtreets of the City. Some of the beſt quality not able to ſuffer words of ſo ill preſage, cauſed him to be taken and ſeverely ſcourged; which he endured without ſpeaking the leaſt word to defend himſelf, or to complain of ſo hard treatment; but he continued repeating the ſame words. The Magiſtrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man ſpake thus through ſome divine motion, led him to Albinus General of the Romans, where being beaten till his bones appeared, he never entreated nor wept, but as well as he could, with a mournful voice he cryed, Wo, wo to Jeruſalem. Albinus asked him what he was, and whence, and wherefore he ſaid ſo; F but he made him no anſwer. Yet he ceaſed not to bewail the miſery of Jeruſalem, till Albinus thinking him to be out of his wits, ſuffered him to depart. After which till the time of War, this man was never ſeen to ſpeak to any one: but ſtill without ceaſing he cryed, Wo, wo to Jeruſalem. Neither did he ever Curſe any one, though every day ſome one or other did beat him; nor did he ever thank any one that offered him meat. All that he ſpake to any man was this heavy Prophecy. He went crying as is ſaid, chiefly upon holy-dayes; doing ſo continually for the ſpace of ſeven years and five months; and his voice never waxed hoarſe nor weary, till in the time of the Siege, beholding what he foretold them, he ceaſed; and then once again upon the Walls, going about the City, with a loud voice he cryed, Wo, wo to the City, Temple and People: and laſtly G he ſaid, Wo alſo to my ſelf. Which words were no ſooner uttered, but a Stone ſhot out of an Engine, ſmote him, and ſo he yielded up the Ghoſt, lamenting them all.

The Jews interpreting the ſigns to their own good liking, are their Countries ruine, and the cauſe of their own calamity.

If any one diligently conſider all theſe things, he will find that God hath a care of H mankind, and doth foreſhew betime, what is moſt expedient for them, and that they through their own madneſs, voluntarily periſh in their wickedneſs. For the Jews, when the Caſtle Antonia was taken, made the Temple four-ſquare: notwithſtanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple ſhould be taken, when the Temple was made four-ſquare. But that which chiefly incited them to this War, was a doubtful Prophecy likewiſe found in the holy Scriptures: That at the ſame time one in their Dominions ſhould be Monarch of the whole World; And many wiſe men were deceived in their Interpretation, making account that he ſhould be one of their own Nation; but indeed thereby was foretold Veſpaſian's Empire. But men cannot prevent Deſtiny, though they foreſee it. Thus the Jews interpreted ſome of the Signs I as they pleaſed, and at others they laughed, till by the ruine of their Country, and their own woful overthrow, their error was diſcovered to them.

The Prieſts crave pardon, but Titus commands them to be led to execution.

The Seditious ſummon Titus to a Parley.

The Romans humanity incited the Jews againſt them.

AFter the Seditious were fled into the City, whilſt all the Temple and places there K about were ſtill on fire, the Romans placing their Engines over againſt the Eaſt-gate of the Temple, and there offering ſacrifice to God, with great ſhouts they declared Titus Emperor. The Romans got much Spoil and Booty, ſo that they ſold Gold in Syria for half the value. And among thoſe Prieſts that kept on the Wall, a Child being thirſty, deſired drink of the Roman Watchmen, ſaying, that he was thirſty. They, pitying both his years and his need, gave him their hands that he ſhould have no harm, and then he came down and drunk, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, he ran up again to his fellows, and none of the watchmen were able to overtake him; and they could only upbraid him with falſhood. But he anſwered, That he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not give him their L hands to ſecure him to remain with them, but only to come down and take water, which he had done. The Roman watchmen greatly admired the ſubtilty of one that was but a Child. The fifth day, the Prieſts being almoſt famiſhed came down, and the watchmen carried them to Titus, whom they beſought to grant them their lives. But he anſwered them, That the time of pardon was paſt, ſeeing that was deſtroyed, for the ſake of which he might have pardoned them, and that it was meet that the Prieſts ſhould periſh with the Temple: and ſo he commanded them to be put to death. Then the Tyrants with their followers being on every ſide beſet by the Romans, and having no way to flee, they being thus beleagured round, requeſted to ſpeak with Titus; who out of his natural gentleneſs, yielded to their requeſt, his friends alſo perſwading him thereto, that at leaſt he might M ſave the City (judging indeed that now the Seditious had already their minds) and ſo he went to the Weſt part of the Inner Temple: for there was a Gate built above a Gallery, and a Bridge that joyned the Temple and City together, which was then between Titus and the Tyrants. Many Souldiers on both parts flocked about their Generals; the Jews about Simon and John, hoping for pardon: the Romans about Titus, deſirous to hear what he would ſay unto them: and Titus having commanded his Souldiers to be quiet, and to forbear ſhooting Arrows, ſpoke to them firſt (in token of his Victory) by an Interpreter to this effect: Are ye not wearied (ſaid he) with the Calamities ſuffered by your Country? You who without conſidering our power, and your own weakneſs, have with raſh fury deſtroyed your People, City and Temple: Your ſelves alſo have juſtly deſerved N to periſh, who ſince Pompey firſt Conquered you, have never ceaſed to be Seditious, and at laſt have openly declared War againſt the Romans. Did you truſt to your multitude? You have ſeen that a ſmall parcel of the Roman Army hath ſufficiently reſiſted you. Or did you expect forreign aid? What Nation is not under our Dominion? And who would rather make choice of the Jews than of the Romans? Did you truſt in your ſtrength of Body? Why you know the Germans ſerve us. Or in the ſtrength of your Walls? What Wall, or what greater hinderance than the Ocean, wherewith the Britains invironed have yielded to the Roman Forces? Or to your Courage, and politick Counſel of your Captains? You have already heard that the Carthaginians have been by us ſurprized. It was therefore the Romans humanity that incited you againſt themſelves, who firſt of all permitted you to poſſeſs your Country, and gave you Kings of O your own Nation: and after all this, we kept your Laws inviolate, and ſuffered you to live

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Christ, 72.

A as your ſelves deſired, not only in your own Country, but alſo amongſt other Nations; and which is the greateſt of all our benefits beſtowed upon you, we permitted you to gather Contributions and Gifts to the maintenance of your Temple and Sacrifices to God; of all which, we neither forbad any to be brought unto you, nor hindred any that would offer to your Temple, but ſuffered you our Enemies to be made richer than our ſelves; ſo that you have uſed our own money againſt us. Having received ſo many benefits at our hands, you have now diſgorged your ſelves upon us, and like ſpiteful Serpents, ſpit your poyſon upon them that made much of you. Let us omit that by Nero's negligence you became forgetful of your duty, and like ſome Member in the Body broken or ſhrunk, you being ſtill tumultuous, at laſt were taken in a greater offence, and were encouraged with immoderate deſires to hope for unlawful liberty. My B Father came into your Country, not to puniſh you for your Revolt againſt Ceſtius, but by good counſel and gentleneſs to reduce you to good order. And whereas if he had come to deſtroy your Nation, he ought firſt to have cut down the very Root, to have come to this City and deſtroyed it with the Inhabitants: he rather choſe firſt to enter Galilee, and the places adjoyning, that in the mean time you might repent you, and conſider of your Eſtate. But this his mercy towards you was held for cowardlineſs and weakneſs in him, and by our long-ſuffering you were emboldned againſt us: and when Nero was dead, you did as treacherous ſubjects are wont to do, and took occaſion by our civil diſſention to revolt from us: and whilſt my Father and I were gone into Ægypt, you prepared your ſelves for a War againſt us: neither were you aſhamed to oppoſe us, when my Father was declared Emperour, whom notwithſtanding you had found moſt C gentle Captains unto you. At laſt, when the Empire fell to us, and all things being now quieted, all Nations with gifts and preſents came to congratulate us, behold again, the Jews ſhewed themſelves our Enemies, and you ſent an Embaſſador beyond Euphrates, only to get aid to your Rebellion: You wall'd and fortified your Towns anew, and falling into factions among your ſelves, at laſt you came to a Civil War: all which none but the moſt vile people in the world would have committed. Wherefore being commanded by my Father, who was now urged thereunto, I came againſt this City with a heavy charge; yet did I rejoyce when I heard that the People deſired Peace. Before I exerciſed Hoſtility againſt you, I exhorted you to Peace: after the War was begnn, I deſiſted a while from uſing ſeverity; I ſpared all thoſe that of their own accord fled to me, and kept my Promiſe to them, pitying thoſe that were Cap- D tives. I puniſhed only thoſe that drew you into this War; and till forced ſo to do, I ſet not the Rams againſt your Walls; but alwayes reſtrained my Souldiers ſo much deſirous of your blood. As often as I overcame you, ſo often did I exhort you to peace, as though I had been vanquiſhed. Again, when I approached the Temple, I (willingly omitting the Law of Arms) requeſted you to ſpare both it and the holy things; offering you leave to depart, and promiſing you ſafety, or licenſing you to fight another time in another place, if ſo you thought good. All theſe my Offers you refuſed, and with your own hands fired your Temple. And now you wicked wretches dare to preſent your ſelves before me in Arms. What thing can you now preſerve ſo excellent, as that which is already periſhed? What pardon can you expect, ſeeing your Temple is deſtroyed? nay even now you ſtand armed, not ſo much as counterfeiting E ſubmiſſion at the laſt caſt. O wretches, with what hope? Is not your People dead? Is not your Temple deſtroyed, and your City now in my hands, yea, and your lives too? And can you imagine after this to end them by an honourable death? I will not ſtrive with your obſtinacy: yet if you will caſt down your weapons and yield to my diſcretion, I will ſpare your lives; and I ſhall reſerve the reſt to my ſelf to uſe as a good Maſter, who puniſhes not but with regret even the moſt unpardonable crimes.

Titus grants the Jews life, on condition they ſhould lay aſide their weapons, and ſubmit themſelves

To this they anſwered, That they could not yeild themſelves to him, though he gave them his word, having vowed the contrary, but they requeſted licence to depart with their Wives and Children into the Deſart, and leave the City to the Romans. Titus was greatly enraged that they being in a manner already his Captives, ſhould impoſe upon him Con- F ditions, as though they were Victors; and he commanded a Herald to tell them that henceforth they ſhould not flie to him, nor hope that he would receive them; that he would pardon none; and that they might employ all their force to fight and ſave themſelves as they could, for he would now in all things uſe the Law of Arms: and ſo he permitted the Souldiers to ſack the City and ſet it on fire. The ſame day they did nothing; but the next day following they fired the Councel-houſe, the Palace Acra, and Ophia, the place of Juſtice, and the fire came to Queen Helens Palace, which was ſcituate in the midſt of Acra: alſo the houſes and ſtreets of the City full of dead Bodies were ſet on fire. The ſame day, the Sons and Brethren of King Izates, and with them many Perſons of quality aſſembled together, and ſupplicated Cæſar to pardon them: G and he, though incenſed againſt them all, yet not changing his manner, received them to mercy, and put them all in Priſon, and afterward carried that Kings Sons and Kinſmen to Rome, there to remain as Hoſtages.

The Seditious get into the Palace, pillage it, and kill there 8400 of the People, who had fled thither for refuge.

The Seditious reſorting to the Kings houſe take away the treaſure.

The puniſhment of a Roman Souldier taken by the Jews.

The Jews are arrogant in the midſt of their calamity

The Jews refuſe to ſubmit themſelves to the Romans, yet are they unable to wage war with them.

THE Seditious went to the Kings Palace, where many had left their wealth, becauſe it was a ſtrong place: and driving the Romans from thence, they ſlew all the people there aſſembled, amounting to the number of 8400, and carried away all the Money; and they took there two Roman Souldiers alive, one a Horſeman, and the other a Foot- I man; and they ſlew the footman and drew him all along the City, as it were in the Body of that one revenging themſelves upon all the Romans. But the Horſeman affirming that he had ſomething to ſay to them, which would greatly profit them, and ſave their lives, he was carried to Simon; and not having there any thing to ſay, Simon delivered him to one of his Captains called Ardala to be ſlain; and he brought him where the Romans might behold him with his hands bound behind him, and a veil before his eyes, meaning there to behead him: but he, whilſt the Jew drew out his Sword, eſcaped to the Romans. Titus would not put him to death, becauſe he had eſcaped from the Enemies: yet deeming him unworthy to be a Roman Souldier, who ſuffered himſelf to be taken alive, he took from him his arms, and diſcharged him from bearing them any more, K which to a man of Courage was worſe than Death. The next day, the Romans putting the Seditious to flight that were in the lower City, fired all as far as Siloa; rejoycing that the Town was deſtroyed: yet they got no booties, becauſe the Seditious had already robbed and ſpoiled all, and carried it into the higher City. For they nothing repented them of their wickedneſs, but were as arrogant as though they had been in proſperity: ſo that with joy they beheld the City on fire, and ſaid, That they deſired death, for that the People being ſlain, the Temple deſtroyed, the City on fire, they ſhould leave nothing to their Enemies. Yet Joſeph in this extremity laboured to ſave the Reliques of the City, much inveighing againſt their cruelty, and earneſtly exhorting them to ſave themſelves: but he nothing profited by all this, being only derided for his labour: for neither L would they yield to the Romans for their Oaths ſake, nor were they able to fight with the Romans, being now as it were beſieged round by them; yet their accuſtomed murthers encouraged them to more.

The Tyrants uttermoſt hope was in their Vaults.

Rapine and ſlaughter in the Vaults.

Thus diſperſed all over the City, they lurked in the ruines, lying in wait for thoſe that ſought to flee to the Romans; many of them were taken and ſlain; for Famine had ſo weakned them that they could not flie: and any death was more elegible than Famine. So that many fled to the Romans, having no promiſe, nor hope to be ſpared by them; and feared not to expoſe themſelves to the fury of the Seditious, who never ceaſed from murther. And now there was no place in the whole City void, but was fill'd with dead bodies, who either periſhed by Famine or Cruelty. But the Tyrants and M factious Thieves placed their laſt refuge in the Vaults, where they hoped, whatſoever hapned, to hide themſelves that they could not be found, and ſo, after the City was deſtroyed, to eſcape; which was only their vain fancy: For they could neither be hid from God, nor the Romans: yet at that time they truſted in thoſe Caves, from whence they fired the City more than the Romans, and cruelly murdered thoſe, that having eſcaped the flames, fled into ſecret places, and ſpoiled them: alſo if in any place they found any meat, though all bloody, yet they took it and eat it; and now they fell to fight one with another about the ſpoil they got. And I doubt not, but if they had not been prevented by the deſtruction of the City, their cruelty would have been ſuch, that they would have eaten the bodies of dead men. N

CHAP. XV.

How the higher part of the City was aſſaulted: and how ſome of the Jews fled unto Titus.

T*Itus* perceiving that the higher part of the City could not be won without Mounts, being ſituate in a ſoil, round about which were high and deep Precipices, on the twentieth day of Auguſt he ſet all his Souldiers on work: and the carrying of Wood for B that purpoſe was very painful, all Trees within 100 furlongs off the City being already cut down, and uſed in the former Work, as is before-ſaid. So the four Legions raiſed a Mount on the Weſt ſide of the City; and the Auxiliaries made a Mount againſt the Porch, Bridge and Tower, which Simon, during his War with John, had built.
About this time the Captains of the Idumeans aſſembling together, deliberated to yield themſelves, and ſent five of their Company to Titus, beſeeching him to receive them to mercy: and he hoping that the Tyrant would yield after them, who were the greateſt part of his Army, with much difficulty granted them Life, and ſo ſent them back to their fellows. But Simon having notice of their deſign, preſently ſlew thoſe five that were ſent to Titus; and taking the Captains (the chief of whom was James the Son of C Soſa) he put them in Priſon, and carefully watcht the Idumæans, who now having no chief Commanders, knew not what to do. But the Guard could not hinder them from fleeing; for although many of them were killed, yet divers fled and eſcaped, and were all received by the Romans; Titus's courteſie being ſuch, that he remembred not his former Orders to the contrary. And now the Souldiers abſtained from murthers, and minded only the getting of Wealth; the common People they ſold with their Wives and Children for a ſmall price; many being expoſed to ſale, and few coming to buy them. Titus having publiſhed that none ſhould flie unto him without their families, yet now received thoſe alſo that came alone, appointing ſome to enquire who had deſerved puniſhment, and to inflict it on them. So an infinite number was ſold; and D more than 40000 of the People were ſaved, whom the Emperour diſmiſſed, and permitted to go whither they pleaſed.

At the ſame time a certain Prieſt, Jeſus the Son of Thebathus was promiſed pardon on Tables, Goblets, Cups, all made of ſolid and maſſie Gold: alſo the Veil and the Ornaments of the Prieſt, ſome precious Stones, and many Veſſells made for ſacrifice. Moreover, all things that belonged to the Prieſts, and much Purple and Scarlet, which were laid up in ſtore, to make Tapeſtry or Hangings, among which alſo was ſome Cinnamon, Caſſia, E and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded ſweet Odours to be offered were that fled to Cæſar.

How the reſt of the City was taken.

F

THE ſeventh day of September the Mounts being finiſhed, which was the Eighteenth day after they were begun, the Romans planted their Rams and Engines for battery, whereupon ſome of the Seditious, deſpairing to keep the City, left the Walls, and fled to the Mountain Acra; others hid themſelves in Vaults; but the moſt reſolute endeavoured to hinder the Romans from placing the Rams againſt the Walls. The Romans, beſides that they were more in number, had their Courage encreaſed by Victory.
But on the contrary, the Jews being now all diſ-heartned and ſorrowful, ſo ſoon as any part of the Wall was broken down or ſhaken by the force of the Rams, ſtraightways fled; and the Tyrants were ſurprized with greater fear than needed. For even before ſuch time G as the Enemies had entered the Wall, they ſtood in doubt whether to flee or no: and they who a little before were ſo proud and arrogant, now trembled and quaked, ſo that it was

Some of the ſeditious kept in Acra, the reſt in the vaults of the City.

pittiful to ſee ſuch a change in them, though they were wicked perſons. But in order to ſave themſelves, they endeavoured to aſſail the Wall that Titus had built to compaſs the whole City withall: but ſeeing themſelves forſaken of all thoſe that were wont to be truſty to them, every one fled whither neceſſity drove him. In the mean time news was brought that all the Weſt-wall of the City was beaten down; others affirmed that the Romans had entred, and that they had ſeen the Enemy in the Towers, fear troubling their Judgment, and making them think they ſaw things which were not, whereupon they bewailed their misfortune; and as though they had been lame, they ſtood ſtill and ſought not to flie. From whence one may plainly perceive Gods juſtice towards the impious, and the Romans Fortune; for the Tyrants deprived themſelves of their ſtrong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their Towers, wherein they could never have been taken but by Famine: and the Romans having ſo much laboured at the lower Walls, now by Fortune took theſe, which their Engines could never have ſhaken; for there were three inexpugnable Towers that could not be battered with the Engines, whereof before we have made mention. So the Tyrants having forſaken theſe, or rather being by Gods will driven from thence, they fled towards the Valley of Siloa: where after the fear was paſt, they again took heart, and attaqued the new Wall that was in that place, yet not uſing ſuch courage and vigor as need required, they were beaten off by the Guards that defended it, their ſtrength now failing, and being wearied with labour, fear, famine, and calamity. Some were driven one way, and ſome another, and they were forced to hide themſelves in Vaults and Sinks. The Romans having obtained thoſe Towers placed their Colours upon them, and clapping their hands and ſhouting for joy, they cryed, Victory, finding the end of the War nothing ſo terrible as the beginning. Yet they did not believe that this was the end, becauſe they got the Wall without any bloodſhed; but they admired that no man offered to reſiſt them. Whereupon iſſuing into every Street, they ſlew whomſoever they found without any reſpect, and fired Houſes, and kill'd all the People that had fled into them; and where they entered to get prey, they found whole Families dead, and houſes full of Carcaſſes conſumed by Famine. Thus terrified with the heavy ſight, they departed, not taking any thing away; yet for all that they pittied not thoſe that were left alive, but ſlew whomſoever they met, whereby they filled the narrow ſtreets ſo full of dead bodies, that none could paſs that way for them: all the whole City flowed with blood; ſo that many places ſet on fire, were quenched with the blood of thoſe that were ſlain. At evening they ceaſed from killing, but all night long the fire encreaſed: and ſo in the morning, which was the eighth of September, all was ſet on fire; the City in the time of the Siege having endured more miſery and calamity, than ever it received joy and happineſs from the time of the firſt foundation, notwithſtanding that the ſame had been ſo great, that all Cities might juſtly envy it; and it no wiſe deſerved to be ſo oppreſſed with ſuch miſery, ſave only for that it foſtered and bred ſuch impious perſons as wrought the overthrow thereof.

The Romans enter the town and obtain the Victory.

The houſes and families of beſt reckoning are left full of dead bodies.

These munitions of the City and defence of the Tower which the Tyrants abandoned for fear, impregnable, Fortunes monument.

The old and weak Jews are ſlain, and the ſtrong and luſty reſerved.

Titus entering into the City amongſt the reſt, admired the ſtrong holds thereof, and the rocky Towers, of which the Tyrants like mad-men deprived themſelves; and ſeeing the heigth, firmneſs, bigneſs, and the joyning of the Stones together, and their breadth, and heigth, he ſaid, Surely God hath aſſiſted us in this War, and he it was that drove the Jews from theſe Fortreſſes. For what could mens hands and Engines prevail againſt them? And having ſpoke much to this effect to his Friends, he ſet thoſe at liberty whom the Tyrants had left priſoners in the Towers: and when he deſtroyed the reſt of the City and Walls, he left thoſe Towers ſtanding, as a Monument of his good fortune and victory, by which he had gained them, though inexpugnable. The Souldiers now being weary with killing the miſerable Jews, and yet a great multitude remaining alive, Titus commanded that only the armed Jews, and thoſe that reſiſted ſhould be ſlain, but the reſt left alive. But the Souldiers alſo killed old and weak perſons; all the able and luſty men they carried into the Temple, and ſhut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cæſar left one Fronto a Libertine, and his friend to keep them, giving him alſo charge to make enquiry who had deſerved puniſhment. Fronto ſlew all the Thieves and Seditious, who accuſed one another; and reſerved certain men of large ſtature and beautiful for the Triumph: And all the reſt that were above ſeventeen years old, he ſent bound into Ægypt, to be imployed in certain works there, as digging, delving, manuring the fields, and other publick buſineſſes.

Titus diſtributeth the Jews.

Titus alſo ſent many of them into divers Provinces, to ſerve in the Theaters for the fights with Beaſts or Sword-players; and thoſe that were under ſeventeen years of age were ſold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, ten thouſand died for hunger; partly, A partly for that their Keepers hating them, would not give them meat; partly, for that ſome refuſed meat when it was offered them. For there was now great ſcarcity of Corn, by reaſon of the great multitude of People.

CHAP. XVII.

B Of the number of the Captives, and thoſe that were ſlain.

The number of the Captives and ſuch as died during the ſiege of the City.

THE number of all the Captives that were taken during the whole time of the War, was 97000; and the number of all that died and were ſlain during the Siege, was 110000, moſt of them Jews by Nation, but not natives of Judæa. For being aſſembled together from all parts to the Feaſt of unleavened bread, on a ſudden they were involved in the War; and firſt of all a Plague fell among them by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the place, and immediately after, Famine, worſe than it. That the City was capable of ſo many men, it is evident; for Ceſtius deſirous to ſignifie the flouriſhing C eſtate, and ſtrength of Jeruſalem to Nero, who contemned our Nation, requeſted the High-Prieſts, that if poſſible they could, they ſhould number all the People in their City: and upon the Feaſt of Eaſter, when they killed Offerings from the ninth Hour of the day until the eleventh (and to eat a Lamb not fewer than ten perſons were aſſembled; for it is not lawful to feaſt alone, yea, many times twenty are in a Company) they numbered two hundred fifty ſix thouſand five hundred Oblations, or Lambs to be killed; ſo that if we reckon to every Lamb ten men, the number amounts to two Millions ſeven hundred thouſand men, all purified, whole and ſound: for it was not lawful for any that were Lepers, or had a flux of ſeed, nor for Women that had the monthly D Terms, to eat of that Sacrifice; nor yet for any Stranger that came thither for Religion's ſake.

So this great multitude was aſſembled together from other places, and was there by the providence of God ſhut up as it were in a Priſon. And the City being filled with men of War, was beſieged; ſo that the number of thoſe that were ſlain ſurpaſſed all that ever periſhed, either by any Plague ſent from God, or by the means of men; they were partly openly ſlain, partly taken by the Romans: who ſearching the Vaults, and opening the Sepulchres, ſpared none they met with. There alſo were found more than two thouſand, whereof ſome ſlew themſelves with their own hands, others were kill'd by others, the reſt periſhed by Famine. The ſtink of dead bodies was ſo great, that E many minding to ſearch the foreſaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire: yet others for lucre ſake treading on the dead Carcaſes, ſearched the dead Bodies, if they could find any thing; for great Riches were hid in the Vaults; and covetouſneſs omitted no way to gain.

The Romans ſearching the Graves and Vaults, find much treaſure.

Moreover, many were taken out from thence, whom the Tyrants, who even in their extremity ceaſed not to tyrannize, kept Priſoners: yet God plagued them both according to their deſerts: for John being almoſt famiſhed with his Brethren in a Vault, beſought the Romans to ſave his Life. And Simon, having long ſtriven with neceſſity, as we ſhall hereafter relate, at laſt yielded himſelf, and was kept for the Triumph; but John was condemned to perpetual priſon. The Romans beat down the Walls, and F fired the remaining parts of the City.

CHAP. XVIII.

A brief Hiſtory of the City of Jeruſalem.

Jeruſalem being five times ſpoiled, was at that time once more ſackt.

THus was Jeruſalem taken in the ſecond year of Veſpaſian's Reign on the eighth day of September. It had been formerly five times taken, and was now finally deſtroyed. Firſt, Aſocheus King of Ægypt; after him, Antiochus; then Pompey; and after them, Herod with Soſius took the City, and yet deſtroyed it not: But before them Nabuchodonoſor King of Babylon deſtroyed it, when he had enjoyed the ſame, a thouſand I three hundred and threeſcore years, eight moneths and ſix dayes after it was firſt built. He that firſt built it, was one of the Princes of the Canaanites, ſurnamed the Juſt, by reaſon of his Piety. He firſt conſecrated this City to God, by building a Temple to him, and changed the Name Solyma, into that of Jeruſalem: But David the King of the Jews having driven out the Canaanites, gave it to his own People to be inhabited: and after four hundred threeſcore and four years and three moneths, it was deſtroyed by the Babylonians. From King David, who was the firſt Jew that reigned there, till the time that Titus deſtroyed it, were a thouſand one hundred ſeventy and nine years; and from the time that it was firſt erected, until it was by him deſtroyed, were two thouſand one hundred and ſeventy ſeven years: yet neither the Antiquity, nor Riches, K nor the Fame thereof, now ſpread all over the World, nor the Glory of Religion did any thing profit or hinder it from being deſtroyed. Such was the end of the Siege of Jeruſalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the Souldiers to get to exerciſe their outrage againſt (for they would have ſpared nothing that they could ſpoile) Cæſar commanded them to deſtroy the City and Temple, leaving only ſtanding certain Towers, that were more beautiful and ſtrong than the reſt, to wit, Phaſelus, Hippicos, and Mariamme; and the Wall that was on the Weſt ſide; meaning there to keep a Garriſon, and that they ſhould be Monuments of the Valour of the Romans, who had maſtered a City ſo well fortified as by theſe it appeared to have been. All the reſt of the City they ſo plained, that thoſe who had not ſeen it before could not L believe that it had ever been inhabited. This was the end of their madneſs, who were alwayes given to Sedition in Jeruſalem, a moſt beautiful City and famous amongſt all Nations.

The Romans wholly ruinate both the City and the Temple.

CHAP. XIX.

How the Souldiers were rewarded.

M

CÆſar determined to leave the tenth Legion for a Gariſon in Jeruſalem, with ſome Troops of Horſe, and other Companies of Foot: and all Wars being now ended, he purpoſed to give ſolemn praiſe to the whole Army for their valiant Acts, and to reward the moſt Couragious for their deſerts. Wherefore placing a great Tribunal in the midſt before the Camp, and ſtanding up in it with the chief Officers about him, from whence the whole Army might hear him, he gave them hearty thanks that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during thoſe Wars; praiſing them for their loyalty during all the time, and that in many actions they had ſhewed themſelves valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their Country: N likewiſe that they had now given all Nations to underſtand, that neither the multitude of Enemies, nor ſtrong holds, nor greatneſs of Cities, nor the raſhneſs or barbarous cruelty of their Adverſaries could ever reſiſt the Forces of the Romans, or eſcape their hands; notwithſtanding that in many things fortune favoured them: adding, that it was glorious for them to have ended this War that had continued ſo long; which was all they hoped for at their coming; and eſpecially that his Father and himſelf, whom they had elected to be the Roman Emperors, were approved and imbraced by all men, all ſtanding to their appointment, and acknowledging themſelves beholding to them that elected them. Moreover, that he admired them and loved them all, for that they had ſhewed themſelves valiant and couragious: and that he would now recompence thoſe with honours, O and due rewards, who had behaved themſelves moſt valiantly, moſt hazarded themſelves, and

A and effected worthy deeds; and whoſoever had been forwarder than the reſt, ſhould have reward according to his deſert; and that he would be more carefull in honouring thoſe that had been his Companions in that War, than in puniſhing their offences; then preſently he willed them to whom it appertained, to nominate thoſe who had valiantly behaved themſelves in this War, and had performed any worthy exploit: which being done, he called them by their names and praiſed them, in ſuch ſort as teſtifi'd that he was no leſs affected with their Glory than with his own, he Crowned them with Crowns of Gold, and put Chains of Gold about their necks, and gave them Spears pointed with Gold, and Silver Medals; he alſo diſtributed to every one of them Gold and Silver money, rich Garments, and other things of value which were part of the B booty; and thus having rewarded every one according to his merit, he deſcended with great applauſe from the Tribunal: all the Army making vows for his proſperity, and went to offer Sacrifices for the Victory. He cauſed a great multitude of Oxen to be Sacrificed, and diſtributed the fleſh to his Army; and during three days he feaſted all his principal Officers, after which he diſmiſſed all the Troops to the places deſign'd for them, appointing the tenth Legion to keep Jeruſalem, and not ſending it back to Euphrates, where before it was. He alſo remov'd the twelfth Legion out of Syria, remembring that under Ceſtius his Government they had fled from the Jews, being before at Raphanæas; which he ſent unto Malta that is ſituate by Euphrates, in the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia; the other two he kept with himſelf, as ſufficient to C guard him into Ægypt, which were the fifth and fifteenth Legions. And coming to Cæſarea by the Sea-coaſt, he there laid up all his ſpoils, and cauſed the Captives to be kept, becauſe the Winter-Seaſon permitted him not to ſail into Italy.

How the Emperour Veſpaſian went from Alexandria into Italy during the ſiege of Jeruſalem; and Titus went to Cæſarea Philippi, where many captive Jews were ſlain in the Spectacles which he gave to the people

WHilſt Titus was buſied in the ſiege of Jeruſalem, Veſpaſian in a Merchants Ship ſailed to Rhodes, and from thence departing in a Galley he viſited all the Cities by which he paſſed, being joyfully received of them all, and went from Ionia into Greece, from thence to Corcyra, and into Slavonia, and afterwards by Land.
Titus being returned from Cæſarea on the Sea-Coaſt, came to Cæſarea Philippi, and there made a long abode, proclaiming all ſorts of paſtimes: wherein many Captives periſhed, ſome being caſt to wild Beaſts, others forced in great Companies to fight E one againſt another. Being in this place, he underſtood that Simon the Son of Giora, was taken. This Simon at ſuch time as Jeruſalem was beſieged was in the higher part of the City, when the Roman Army entered the Walls, and begun to waſte it: and with his moſt truſty Friends, and certain Maſons, having provided them all neceſſary Tools, and Victuals that might ſuffice them all for many days, he went into a ſecret Cave, unto the end thereof, and there he cauſed them to dig further, hoping ſo to get out at ſome place where he might ſafely eſcape away. Yet this his hope had not ſo good ſucceſs as he expected: for they had digged but a little way, before their Victuals failed them: notwithſtanding that they had made very great ſparing thereof.
Then Simon thinking to deceive the Romans, cloathed himſelf in white, and put on a F purple Cloak about him, and ſo came out of the Earth in that place where the Temple had formerly ſtood. They that did ſee him, were aſtoniſhed a while, and ſtirred not, but let him alone: yet at laſt they came to him, and demanded what he was; but Simon would not tell them, willing them to call their Captain unto him, and pre-ſently ſome of the Souldiers run to call him, and ſo he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was Captain of the Souldiers. Terentius having learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related to Cæſar the manner of his taking; and thus Simon was by the will of God delivered into his Enemies hands, who hated him above meaſure, and ſo he was juſtly puniſhed, for having ſo cruelly tyrannized over his own Country-men, not taken by their force, but yielding himſelf unto them, having cruelly butchered many force, but that it can at one time or other puniſh thoſe that violate it; and it many H times inflicteth grievous puniſhment upon men, when they think they have eſcaped all, & are not preſently puniſhed; which alſo Simon felt, after he fell into the Romans hands: his comming out of the earth cauſ'd a great many more of the Seditious at that time to be taken in the Caves. When Cæſar was returned to Cæſarea by the Sea-Coaſt, Simon was preſented bound to him; and he commanded that he ſhould be reſerved for his Triumph, which he purpoſed to make at Rome. After making ſome abode in that place, he celebrated his brother Domitian's birth-day with great ſolemnity: & in this ſolemnity he brought forth divers Jews, whoſe puniſhment he had of purpoſe deferred till this time; the number of all that periſhed there with fighting againſt Beaſts, and amongſt themſelves, and by fire, amounted to more than 2500 men. Yet the Romans thought all I theſe puniſhments too light and eaſie for them. After this Titus went to Beritus, which is a City in Phœnicia, (and a Colony of the Romans:) and here alſo he made ſome long abode, and celebrated the birth of the Emperour his Father, with far greater Solemnity then the former, as well in giving divers Shews to the people, as in great expence and Sumptuouſneſs, and cauſing many Captives to periſh, as before.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Calamity of the Jews at Antioch. K

The Nation of the Jews intermixed among the people of the World.

A number of Jews in Antioch.

A Jew called Antiochus, is the cauſe of their mighty miſery in Antioch.

Antiochus perfidious to his Citizens.

Antiochus forbiddeth to Sanctifie the ſeventh day.

AT the ſame time the Jews who liv'd at Antioch were in great miſery; for the whole City was incited againſt them, both for ſome new crimes laid to their charge, and for certain offences before committed; which neceſſarily I muſt recount before I proceed. The Nation of the Jews was mixed amongſt almoſt all Nations of the World; and eſpecially amongſt the Syrians, by reaſon of their vicinity; and many of them were at Antiochia, becauſe it was a great City: and the Kings that ſucceeded Antiochus permitted them freely to inhabit there, and to injoy all the liberties of the City.
For Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, deſtroyed Jeruſalem and ſacked the Temple; but L his Succeſſors reſtored all the Braſs veſſels that were taken from the Temple to the Jews, to be uſed in their Synagogue at Antioch, and permitted them to have the ſame liberties in the City, that the Greeks enjoyed; and the other Kings alſo of latter times uſed them after the like ſort: ſo that their number greatly encreaſed, and they enlarged their Temple, and enriched it with ſundry offerings, and oftentimes gain'd ſome Pagans to be of their Religion; and ſo rendred them alſo a part of their Nation. Now about the time that the War broke out, and Veſpaſian arrived in Syria, the Jews begun to be generally hated of all men: and one of them named Antiochus, of conſiderable parentage, whoſe Father was chief of all the Jews in Antioch, at ſuch time as the people of Antioch were aſſembled in the Theater, came in amongſt them, and accuſed M his own Father, and the reſt of the Jews to have conſpired together to burn the City in the night time; and he nam'd ſome other Stranger-Jews to them, as Conſpirators with the reſt. The people hearing this, could not repreſs their rage, but preſently cauſed thoſe that were accuſed, to be burnt in the Theater; and made great ſpeed to ſet upon all the Jews, hoping that by ſpeedy diſpatch they might preſerve their Country, which otherwiſe was like to periſh. Antiochus, to enrage them the more, offer'd to ſacrifice according to the cuſtom of the Pagans, thereby as it were aſſuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Jews and their cuſtoms; moving them alſo to compel all the reſt of the Jews to do the like, and whoſoever refuſed ſo to do, were to be judged Traitors. The Antiochians followed his counſel: but few Jews would obey; and they that denied to ſacrifice, were ſlain. Then Antiochus receiving a N party of Souldiers from the Roman Governours, became moſt cruel againſt his Country-men, and would not permit them to keep holy the Seventh day; but in it obliged them to do all labour and buſineſs, that they were acuſtomed to do upon any other day; and he ſo urged them hereto, that within ſhort time the ſeventh day was not only violated among them of Antioch, but alſo in other places and Cities round about.

Another calamity at Antioch.

The Jews at Antioch having endured this perſecution, fell into another as great calamity, whereof I intend to ſpeak. It hapned that the fourſquare Market and the publick Places, where all Writings and Regiſters were kept, as alſo the Kings Houſe, were burnt: and the fire ſo encreaſed, that with much ado it was hindred O from firing the whole City. Of this fact Antiochus accuſed the Jews, thereby inciting

A ting the Antiochians, againſt them ; and it was not hard for him to believe his calumnia-tions although they had not hated them before, by reaſon of that which lately paſt : ſo that now they almoſt perſwaded themſelves, that they had ſeen the Jews put fire to the houſes ; and ſo in a great rage all of them ſet upon thoſe that were accuſed. Wherefore Collega the Lievtenant-Governour, had much ado to pacifie the people, notwithſtanding that he reqeuſted them to permit him to inform Cæſar of all that was paſt. For Veſpaſian had already ſent Ceſennius Portus to be Governour of Syria, but he was not as yet arrived there. Then Collega making diligent enquiry of the matter, found out the truth ; and not one of the Jews accuſed by Antiochus was prov'd guilty : for certain impious people had done all this miſchief, being indebted ; thinking that if they burnt B the market-place, and the publick writings, then their debts could not be required at their hands. Nevertheleſs the Jews lived in great fear, and expected the event of theſe forged accuſations.

CHAP. XXII.

How Veſpaſian at his return was received by the Romans.

C AFter Titus had received Letters from his Father, that he was arrived in Italy, and that all the Cities where he came welcomed him very joyfully, and that eſpecially Rome had entertained him with great pomp and triumph, he was eaſed of the care he had before, and very joyful for his Fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy reverenc'd Veſpaſian, though abſent, as though he had been preſent with them, deſiring to ſee his arrival, whoſe coming they ſo heartily wiſhed for. The Senate, remembring what calamities had befaln the City in the change of Princes, deſired to receive their Emperour honorable for his old age, and martial renown, whoſe preſence alone would be to his ſubjects advantage and ſafety. And the vulgar ſort alſo troubled before with civil Wars, long expected his arrival, aſſuring themſelves thereby D to have an end of their calamity, and to recover again their wonted affluence. Eſpe-cially he was expected by the Souldiers, who knowing his skill in martial affairs, by that which himſelf had already done, and finding their other Emperours ignorant and unskilful, much wiſhed his coming ; in hope thereby to be delivered from the diſgrace wherein they lived, and to be both honoured, and preſerved from danger. The Nobility ſeeing him ſo beloved of all men, could no longer wait his coming, but went and met him at ſome diſtance from the City, and accompanied him ; and no man ſtay-ed his coming, but in whole multitudes they went to meet him, they were ſo deſirous to ſee him : ſo that more went to meet him, then ſtayed at home.

The City of Rome entertaineth Veſpaſian with all willingneſs and pomp.

The Romans iſſue out to meet with Veſpaſian.

When news was brought that he approached near the City, and how friendly and E courteouſly he had entertained all men, the people with their Wives and Children ſtay-ed in the way he came, to ſalute him : and whereſoever he came, with joyful applauſes and acclamations they ſhouted, calling him their Conſerver and Benefactor, and he who alone was worthy to be the Roman Emperour ; and the whole City was as it had been a Temple, all hung with Garlands, and full of ſweet odours and perfumes : and the multitude of the people being ſuch that he could ſcarcely get into the Palace, he offered Sacrifices to his houſhold gods for his ſafe return ; and all the people were feaſted by their Tribes, Kindred, and Neighbours, and made vows to their Gods, that Veſpaſian might long continue their Emperour, and his Son after him, and that the Empire might never depart from his lineage. The City of Rome having F thus received Veſpaſian, it was ſoon after bleſſed with all happineſs and proſperity.

Cerealis compelleth the Germans to ſubjection.

Domitianus Titus Brother.

SOme time before Veſpaſian went to Alexandria, and whilſt Titus beſieged the City of Jeruſalem, a great part of Germany was revolted, with whom the French that bordered upon them, were conſederated, renouncing their allegiance, in hope to free themſelves from the Yoke and Government of the Romans. The firſt motive that cauſed the Germans to revolt, and to war againſt the Romans, was their temerity I and raſh nature prone to fight having but very little hope of ſucceſs, together with the hatred of the Romans, who they knew alone could by force bring them into ſubjection; and they were chiefly thereunto encouraged by the preſent opportunity. For ſeeing the Empire greatly afflicted with civil Wars, by reaſon of the often changing of Emperours, and knowing that all the World under their dominion was now in ſuſpence, they thought that by reaſon of their troubles and Civil Wars, fit opportunity was offered them to recover their freedom; and they were hereunto perſwaded by Caſſius and Civilis, two of the moſt potent amongſt them, who long before deſired alteration, and now finding opportunity, ſhewed what minds they bare. Whereupon taking courage they made tryal what the common people thought of this point; and the greateſt part of K them manifeſtly condeſcended hereunto, and perhaps the reſt were not unwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods providence, Veſpaſian ſent Letters to Petilius Cerialis (who before had been Governour of Germany) and declared him Conſul, commanding him to go into Britain and take the Rule of the Country. He ſorthwith obeyed Veſpaſians command : and hearing that the Germans had revolted, he went againſt them, they having now levied an Army, and gave them a great overthrow, killing many of them, and forcing them to return to their obedience to the Romans. Notwithſtanding, if he had not come thither, not long after they had aſſuredly been puniſhed for their offence. For ſo ſoon as news of their Rebellion was brought to Rome, Cæſar Domitianus, Veſpaſian's Son (who although very young underſtood matters of L War beyond his age) hearing of it, and being led by the courage which was hereditary to him, undertook the Expedition to go and conquer them : The Barbarians terrified with the report of his coming, ſubmitted to him, thereby gaining this, that without bloodſhed they were brought under ſubjection as before. And all things in Gallia being well diſpoſed of, ſo that it was not eaſie for them, although they would, to rebel any more, Domitian returned again to Rome, having gain'd great Credit to his Age and Country.

The Sythians Rebellion againſt the Romans.

At the ſame time alſo the Scythians rebelled; and aſſembling in great multitudes, paſſed over the River Iſter, and with great violence and cruelty coming unexpected, ſlew many Roman Gariſons, whom they ſound in ſtrong holds : and Fonteius Agrippa Lieutenant-General, who had been Conſul, meeting them, gave them M Battel, and was ſlain : which done, they went all over the Countries adjoyning, waſting, robbing, and ſpoiling them. When Veſpaſian heard thereof, and how Mæſia was all waſted, he ſent Rubrius Gallus to chaſtiſe them; he having ſlain many of them in fight, forced the reſt to retire into their own Country. This General having thus ended that War, provided to prevent them if hereaſter they attempted the like; for he built far ſtronger Forts than were before, ſo that the Enemy could no way paſs out of their own Country; by which means the Wars in Mæſia were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIV.

The year of the World, 4036. after the Nativity of Chriſt 74.

Of the River Sabbaticus, and the Famous triumph of Veſpaſian and Titus.

T*Itus* having ſome while remained at Berytus (as is before ſaid) returned from thence, and ſhewed many ſpectacles in all the Cities of Syria, where he came, reſerving for that purpoſe the Jews that were Captives, to let all men underſtand their
B overthrow; in his Journey he beheld a River worth the mentioning; it runneth in the midſt between Arcas aud Raphaneas, two Cities of the Kingdom of Agrippa, and hath a miraculous nature: for when it floweth, it is very full of Water, and runneth with a ſwift ſtream; but having flowed ſix days, it is on the ſeventh day ſo dry that you may ſee the bottom, and the next day it coutinueth his courſe; for which cauſe the Jews call it Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Jews Sabbath, which is the ſeventh day. When the Antiochians underſtood, that Titus was coming to their City, they could not contain themſelves within their Walls for joy, but all went out to meet him; and not only Men, but alſo Women and Children expected his coming thirty Furlongs off; and when he approached near them, they holding up
C their hands to him, Saluted him with great joy; and having received many courteſies from him, they returned with him; and amongſt other acclamations, they often beſought him to baniſh the Jews out of their City. But Titus returned no anſwer, making as though he heard not what they requeſted. Yet the Jews doubtful what he would do, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great fear. Titus tarried not at Antioch; but paſſed from thence to Zeugma towards Euphrates, where the Ambaſſadors of Vologeſus King of the Parthians came to him, and preſented him a Golden Crown for his Conqueſt of the Jews: which he receiving, feaſted the Ambaſſadors, and ſo returned to Antioch, where the Senate and people beſought him to come into the Theater, all the people being aſſembled there expecting him, and he accorded ſo to do: D and again they beſought him to expel the Jews out of their City; but he anſwered, that their Country, whereunto he might have baniſhed them, was now deſtroyed, and there was no place that would recive them. The Antiochians, ſeeing they could not obtain their firſt petition, requeſted another thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the Brazen Tables, wherein were engraven the Jews priviledges. But Titus would not grant that; but leaving the Jews in the ſame Eſtate he found them, he departed from thence into Egypt. And as in the way he paſt by Jeruſalem, comparing the deſolation of that place with the beauty & goodly buildings it had before it was deſtroyed, he lamented and pitied the overthrow thereof, not inſolently rejoycing as another would have done, for having deſtroyed ſo fair and ſtrong a City, but curſing the Seditious
E who forced him to deſtroy it, and being ſorry he had made his virtue known by the calamity of that miſerable people. For ſtill great part of the Treaſure of the City was found in the Ruins; and ſome the Romans found of themſelves; but the moſt they got, the Captives told them of, which was Gold and Silver, and other precious things buried by the owners in the Earth being uncertain what would betide them. Titus going forward in his journey ſpeedily paſt through this deplorable Solitude, and came to Alexandria: and determining now to ſayl in to Italy, he ſent the two Legions, that accompanied him, unto the places from whence they came, the fifth into Mæſia, and the tenth into Pannonia, commanding John and Simon, the two chief of the Priſoners, and others, to the number of ſeven hundred, all of goodly ſtature and beautiful, to be F carried into Italy, in order to uſe them in his triumph. When he arrived at Rome, as he deſired, the people were affected towards him, as if he had been their Father, and went out to meet him. Veſpaſian alſo honoured his Son Titus, meeting him in his own perſon with great joy: all the Citizens likewiſe received him with exceeding joy, ſeeing that now the Father and his two Sons were met. Within a few days after they purpoſed to make but one Triumph for both, though the Senate had decreed to each a peculiar Triumph for their valiant deeds; and in the day prefixed for the ſame no man in all the City remained at home, but every one got a place to ſtand in, that they might ſee the Emperours, leaving only Room between them for their paſſage. All the Souldiers before day-light with their Captains in the head of the Companies came and expected the Emperour, not at the Palace Gate, but near the Temple of Iſis, where G the Emperours that night lodged: and at day-break Veſpaſian and Titus came forth, both crowned with Lawrel, and in Purple Garments made after their Country faſhion ; H and they went to Octavian's walks, where the Senate, Nobles and Roman Knights expected their coming. Before the Porch was raiſed a Tribunal, and in it were placed Seats of Ivory, on which they aſcending ſat down, and preſently all the Souldiers with a loud voice ſhouted forth their praiſes. The Emperours were unarmed, and cloathed in Silk, and crowned with Lawrel. Veſpaſian having received their praiſes, as they offer'd ſtill to ſpeak more in his commendations, he beckned with his hand, and made a ſign to them to be ſilent : which done, he roſe up, and covering the greateſt part of his head with his Garment, he made the accuſtomed prayers and vows ; and Titus alſo did the like. Then Veſpaſian ſpoke to them all in general, but in few words, and ſo diſmiſſed the Souldiers to go to dinner, which, according to the cuſtome, the Emperour I was to provide for them: himſelf departed from them to the triumphant Gate, ſo called for that all Triumphs paſſed that way ; and after they had eat there, they put on triumphant Robes, and offered Sacrifices to the Gods, whoſe Images were placed by the Gate, and ſo went in triumph all along the places deſigned for publick Shews, to the end that all people might have a better view of their magnificence. But the ſpectacles there exhibited, both for number, variety, and coſtlineſs, cannot be deſcribed ſufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could deviſe, both workmanſhip, Riches, Variety, and Novelty. For almoſt all things that ever were in any place amongſt men that lived in felicity, either Rich or Glorious, and pleaſant to behold, all were that day ſhewed and ſeen in this Triumph, as a Teſtimony of the grandeur of K the Roman Empire. For there was ſuch ſtore of works of Gold, Silver, and Ivory, that one would not have deemed them to have been made only for the pomp of that day, but to have been ſo plentiful, as if they had flowed all about the City : ſome carried fine Tapeſtry made of all ſorts of Purple, & curiouſly wrought with Pictures & Babylonian works and there was ſo many Gems and precious Stones, ſome ſet in Crowns of Gold, ſome in other works, that it appear'd that without reaſon we judged them to be rare and ſcarce.

Moreover, the Pictures of their Gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatneſs & workmanſhip, and all of precious matter. Moreover divers ſorts of living creatures were there to be ſeen, all adorned with ſome attire agreeing and alluding unto their nature. There was alſo an infinite multitude of men in Purple Garments wrought L with Gold, who carried all theſe things ; and all thoſe that were deſigned to ſerve for this pomp, were attired in ſuch Garments, than which nothing could be more Glorious.
Even the Captives were not without gorgeous attire; but the variety and beauty of the Garments made the Sadneſs of their countenances leſs remarkable. The Pageants, that were born in the Triumph, were of admirable bigneſs, ſo that the people that beheld them, wondred how it was poſſible that men ſhould carry them : for many were built with three or four lofts one above another, ſurpaſſing all that can be imagined for work and coſt ; ſome of them being hang'd about with Tapeſtry of Gold ; and all things annexed unto them, whereon they were carried, were made of wrought Gold or Ivory: Wherein was curiouſly repreſented the manner of War, and all Stratagems, and Arts of M fighting, that could be deviſed ; ſome in one part of the Pageant, ſome in another.
There might one have beheld moſt moſt fertil and fortunate Countries deſtroyed; whole Troops of Enemies ſlain, ſome flying, others taken Priſoners ; ſtrong and huge Walls battered down with Rams; Caſtles and Fortreſes deſtroyed; great and populous Cities aſſaulted, and a whole Army entring the Breach; all places filled with maſſacred men ; and how thoſe that were not able to fight, yielding themſelves, asked mercy ; the Temples ſet one fire ; and after all elſe was waſted, the houſes thrown down upon their owners heads; and a River not flowing, as it was wont, into tilled places, and to ſerve for the uſe of Man and Cattel to drink, but carrying Streames of blood to quench part of the flames, which conſum'd the City to aſhes ; all which the Jews in their War N endured. Theſe things were ſo artificially repreſented to the view of thoſe that had not ſeen them, as though they were now a-doing. Upon every Pageant ſtood the Governour of the City, repreſenting the manner how it was taken. After all theſe followed many Ships: and in every place were carried the ſpoils taken in War : amongſt which thoſe that were taken in the Temple of Jeruſalem were moſt remarkable : for there was a Golden Table weighing many Talents, and likewiſe a Golden Candelſtick, the uſe whereof was now not ſuch as we were wont to put it to ; for in the midſt of the ſtem thereof was fixed a Baſe, and out of it proceeded many ſmall branches, framed like a three-forked ſpear, every one being at the top made like a Lamp, which were 7 in number, ſhewing the honour of the ſeventh day, which is called the Sabbath amongſt O the Jews. After all this was carried the Jews Law, which was the laſt of all the ſpoils. Then followed ſome that carried ſeveral Images of Victory, all made of Gold

A and Ivory. Afterwards came Veſpaſian, followed by Titus, and Domitian accompanied them gallantly adorned, and Mounted on an excellent Horſe; and ſo they went all to the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pomp. Here they made ſome ſtay.

The year of the World, 4036., after the Nativity of Christ, 74.

For it was an ancient Cuſtom of their Country, to repoſe themſelves there, till ſome came and brought news to them of the death of him who was General of their Enemies. This at this time was Simon Giora, who was alſo carried in the Triumph, and having a Rope faſtned about his neck was drawn all along the Market-place, where they that drew him kil'd him. For it is the cuſtom of the Romans there to put malefactors to death that are condemned. After word was brought that he he was dead, all the B people made joyful exclamations, and ſo they fell to Sacrifice: which done according to the cuſtom, they returned to the Palace, where they made a great Feaſt, as others alſo did for themſelves at their own Houſes. For this day was ſacred amongſt the Romans in joy of the Victory over their Enemies, and an end of civil Calamity, and the beginning of good Fortune and hope, which they had in their new Princes.

Simon the Son of Giora is drawn with a Halter about his neck thorow the market place.

When the Triumphs were ended, and all the Roman Empire quieted, Veſpaſian built a Temple, and dedicated it to Peace, which he did in ſo ſhort a ſpace, that it was admirable: and having beſtowed great coſt upon it, he alſo beautified it with divers Pictures and carved works. And he placed in that Temple all things C that men of former Ages had gathered together from the uttermoſt parts of the Earth. And he placed there all the Golden Veſſels, and other things that the Jews uſed in their Temple, doing them great reverence. But their Law, and the Tapeſtry or Purple Veils of the Sanctuary he commanded to be kept in the Palace.

CHAP. XXV.

How Herodium and Machæron were taken by Baſſus.

D

CÆſar ſent Lucius Baſſus into Judea to be Lieutenant General there, who receiving the Army of Cerealis Vetilianus, took the Caſtle and Garriſon of Herodium by compoſition. After this, gathering together all his Troops which were diſperſed in divers places of the Country with the tenth Legion he purpoſed to War againſt Machæron; for he thought it neceſſary to deſtroy that Caſtle, leſt its ſtrength might move many to rebel: for by reaſon of the ſituation of the place, they that were in it had great aſſurance of ſafety; and thoſe that ſought to aſſault it, were in great danger: For it was built upon a Rock that was exceeding high, and which made E it almoſt inexpugnable; and nature had ſo deviſed, that it was hard to come to it being environed round about with Valleys of incredible depth and very difficult to paſs over: for that which is on the Weſt part is threeſcore Furlongs large, and endeth at the Lake Aſphaltites; on which ſide Machæron hath a very high Proſpect: and it is environed on the North and South with Valleys of the like depth; whereby it is impoſſible to win the Caſtle; but that Valley which is on the Eaſt ſide, is at leaſt a hundred Cubits deep, and endeth upon a Mountain near Macheron. Alexander King of the Jews ſeeing the Nature of the place, there built a Caſtle, which afterward Gabinius in the War againſt Ariſtobulus deſtroyed. But Herod when he was King, judged this place worthy to be fortified, as a Principal defence F againſt the Neighbouring Arabians. For it was aptly ſituate upon a Mountain, whence one might behold their borders. Wherefore making a large Wall, he built a City there in the place that enters into the Caſtle: he alſo compaſſed the very top thereof with another Wall, and in the corner he placed Towers that were 60 Cubits high, and in the very midſt of all he built a Palace for largeneſs and beauty admirable; and he made many Ciſterns to receive Water in covenient places, which ſerved the people abundantly, ſtriving as it were with nature, that the places which ſhe had made Strong, he by Art might make yet inexpugnable. He alſo laid up there in ſtore Arms and warlike Engines, and alſo all proviſions wherewith the Inhabitans might be able to hold out a long ſiege.

Rue of admirable greatneſs

G In the Kings Palace, grew the Herb called Rue, which was very admirable for the greatneſs; for no Figtree was taller or broader then it; and it was reported that it had continued ever ſince Herods time; and had endured longer, had not the Jews ruined it when H they took the place. In the Valley that lieth on the North ſide of the City, there is a place called Baaras, where alſo groweth a Root of the ſame name, the colour whereof reſembleth flame, and it ſhineth at night like the Sun-beams, and is not eaſie to be pulled up, till one caſt upon it the Urine of a Woman or her flowers: whoſoever toucheth it is ſure to dy, except he carry the Root hanging on his hand. It is alſo gathered another way without danger, after this manner: They dig all round about it, ſo that they leave a very little of the Root covered with Earth, and then they tie a Dog to it, who ſtriving to follow his Maſter, who makes as though he would go away, eaſily pulleth up the Root; and the Dog preſently dieth, as it were in his ſtead that ſeeketh to get it; but afterward none that handleth it or taketh I it, need to ſtand in fear thereof. This Herb notwithſtanding all this danger is diligently ſought out for the vertue it hath. For it driveth away Devils (which are the Souls of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be applyed unto them; whereas otherwiſe if they had no help, theſe Devils poſſeſſing their bodies would kill them. out of that place alſo do ſpring certain hot Waters, very different in taſte one from another; for ſome are bitter, ſome ſweet: there are alſo ſources of cold Waters, one near another in a Plain: but which is moſt admirable, there is a Cave hard by, not very deep, environed with an eminent Rock above, from which there ſtands out as it were two Duggs or Paps hard by one another, and out of one of them floweth very cold Water, out of the other very hot; which mingled together make a pleaſant bath, and ſerve to cure many Diſeaſes, and eſpecially K all pains of the ſinews. In the ſame place alſo are mines of Sulpher and Alum.

Baſſus having viewed this place on every ſide, reſolved to beſiege it; and he endeavoured to fill up the Valley that was on the Eaſt ſide, and ſo make away to it: which he began to do, haſtning to raiſe a very high Mount in order to batter the Caſtle. Thoſe that were inhabitants, conſtrained the Jews that were ſtrangers to go into the lower City, judging them an unprofitable multitude; and ſo they cauſed them to endure the firſt brunt of the Enemies, and they themſelves kept the Caſtle, both for that it was ſtrong, and eaſie to defend, and that they L hop'd that by yielding the place to the Romans, they might obtain pardon of them. Yet firſt they purpoſed to make Trial if they could avoid the ſiege: and therfore very couragiouſly every day they made excurſions, and fought with thoſe they met, and many were ſlain on both parts. Fortune and opportunity ſometime cauſed one ſide to be victors, ſometime another: for the Jews got the beſt, when they could aſſault the Romans unawares, and the Romans overcame, when they were aware of the Jews coming, and armed themſelves. But the ſiege was not ended by theſe Skirmiſhes: at length a chance befel, which obliged the Jews to yield the Caſtle.

The Jews that were forreigners dwelt in the lower City.

The conflict of the Jews with the Romans. Eleazar a Jew ſtrong in hand, and fierce in bold attempts.

Amongſt thoſe that were beſieged was one Eleazar a young man, very hardy and bold in any enterprize, and who oftentimes made excurſions, and ſought to M hinder the Romans work, whom always in every fight he greatly endammaged, and by his valour and adventurous courage gave thoſe that were his fellows opportunity to aſſault the Romans, and to fly again and retire in ſafety, himſelf being always the laſt that ſo retired. It hapned one day that the fight being ended, and both parts ſeparated, he as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his Enemies durſt undertake to Combate with him, ſtayed without the Gate, ſpeaking to thoſe that were upon the Wall, and giving great attention to them. Then one Rufus an Ægyptian, one of the Roman Army, ſpying this opportunity ran upon him ſo ſuddenly, that he unawares took him all unarmed as he was, N and they upon the Walls ſtood amazed, whilſt Rufus led him into the Roman Camp. Then the General of the Romans cauſed him to be led into a place, where they in the City might ſee him, and there to have all his Cloaths taken off, and to be whipp'd: the misfortune of this young man greatly diſcouraged the Jews, ſo that all the City was melted into Tears for the calamity of this one man. Baſſus ſeeing this contriv'd this device againſt them in order to move them to compaſſion, ſo that for to ſave him they ſhould yeild their Caſtle: which fell out as he deſired. He preſently commanded a Croſs to be erected, as though he would preſently have crucified Eleazar: which ſight greatly moved them in the Caſtle to ſorrow: whereupon with loud cries they lamented, ſaying, that this calamity was inſupportable. O Eleazar beſought them not to neglect him, who was now to die a moſt miſerable

A ble death; and moreover to provide for their own ſafety in yielding the Caſtle unto the Roman Forces and ſucceſs.

They moved with his words, and many alſo within the City intreating for him (for he came of great Parentage and had many Kindred) though contrary to their natures, compaſſion took place in them: and ſo ſending ſome of their company ſpeedily, they deſired to parley, declaring that they would yield the Caſtle on condition that they might ſafely depart away, and Eleazar might likewiſe be reſtored to them. Which offer of theirs the Romans accepted; and the Jews in the lower part of the City having intelligence of this agreement, reſolved likewiſe to fly away in the night: but ſo ſoon as they had opened their Gates, thoſe that had agreed with Baſſus, B gave him intelligence thereof; either envying that their Country men ſhould eſcape, or elſe fearing that Baſſus would puniſh them for their flight: yet for all this, the moſt valiant of thoſe that fled, who got out before the reſt, eſcaped, the reſt were ſlain to the number of one thouſand ſeven hundred men; the Women and Children were made bondſlaves. And Baſſus thinking it meet to keep his promiſe to them of the Caſtle, permitted them ſafely to depart, and reſtored Eleazar to them.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Jews that Baſſus ſlew: and how the Emperor cauſed the Lands of Judea to be ſold.

THis done Baſſus prepared to carry his Army into the Forreſt called Jardes, where he had notice that many Jews were aſſembled together, having eſcaped from Jeruſalem and Machera during the Siege. So coming to the place, and finding it to be as it was reported to him, he firſt of all invironed it with Horſemen, that if any of the Jews ſought to eſcape, the Horſemen might diſpatch them: and he commanded the D Footmen to cut down the Wood into which they had fled to hide themſelves. So through neceſſity the Jews were conſtrained to fight, in hope by a couragious Charge to make a paſſage for themſelves. Wherefore with a great Cry they violently aſſaulted thoſe by whom they were invironed, and the Romans valiantly received them, and by their valour and the Jews deſperation the fight endured a long time; yet the event of the Battle was favourable to the Romans, of whom only twelve were ſlain, and very few wounded, but all the Jews were ſlain in the fight, being in number three thouſand, and alſo their Captain Judas the Son of Jairus (of whom we have already made mention, and who during the ſiege of Jeruſalem was Commander of a Company there, and hid himſelf in a certain Cave, and ſecretly eſcaped from thence) At that time Cæſar E writ to Liberius Maximus his Governour, and to Baſſus, to ſell all the Lands of Judea: for he would not build any more Cities, but appropriated it to himſelf, leaving there only eight hundred Souldiers, and giving them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem: and he impoſed a Tribute upon all Jews whereſoever they lived, commanding every one of them every year to pay two Drachms to the Capitol, according as in former times they were wont to pay to the Temple of Jeruſalem: and this was the miſerable eſtate of the Jews at that time.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Death of King Antiochus : and how the Alans invaded Armenia.

Ceſennius Petus Preſident of Syria accuſeth Antiochus before Caſar.

Antiochus is ſuddenly invaded by Ceſennius.

Antiochus chuſeth rather to depart out of his Country with his Wiſe and Children, than to fight with the Romans.

Antiochus flieth with his wife into Clicia.

Epiphanes flieth to Vologeſus the King of Parthia.

IN the fourth year of Veſpaſian's Reign, it hapned that Antiochus King of Comagena with all his family fell into great misfortune upon this occaſion. Ceſennius Petus Governour of Syria (either for envy, or for that indeed it was ſo; for it is not well known) ſent Letters to Cæſar, declaring to him that Antiochus was determined to revolt from the Romans, together with his Son Epiphanes; that he had made a League with I the King of the Parthians; and that therefore it was neceſſary to prevent them in time, leſt if they firſt began to revolt openly, they might trouble all the Roman Empire with War. Cæſar did not neglect this news, for that the nearneſs of both the Kings Countries one to another ſeemed to require that they ſhould be quickly prevented: for Samoſata the greateſt City of Comagena is ſituate upon Euphrates, and ſo might both eaſily receive the Parthians, and be a ſtrong Hold for them; and alſo there they might eaſily paſs over the River. Wherefore Veſpaſian ſent word to Petus, That he permitted him to do what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, ſuddenly entred into Comagena with the ſixth Legion, and certain other Companies of Foot, and ſome Troops of Horſe, accompanied with Ariſtobulus King of Chalcis, and Sohemus King K of Emeſa, who came to aſſiſt him. They entred the Country without any fight; for none of the inhabitants offered to reſiſt. Antiochus though ſurpriſed with this unexpected news, yet did not ſo much as think of any War againſt the Romans; but determined to leave the whole Kingdom in that eſtate that then it was in, and with his Wiſe and Children to depart from thence, hoping hereby to clear himſelf to the Romans, from that which they ſuſpected of him: and going almoſt a hundred and thirty furlongs from the City into a Plain, there he encamped. Petus ſent men to Samoſata to take it, as they eaſily did, and were left to keep the City, whilſt he with the reſt of the Souldiers purpoſe to go againſt Antiochus: But the King, though by neceſſity urged thereto, yet would not fight againſt the Romans; but bewailing his misfortune, endured patienrly all what- L ſoever: But his two Sons being luſty ſtrong young men, and skilfull in martial affairs, could not eaſily abſtain from fight in this their diſtreſs. Wherefore they had recourſe to their forces, and in a great fight that endured a whole day, they ſhewed their Valour, and came off with little loſs. Yet Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his Country, but taking his Wife and Daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby diſcouraged his Souldiers, who diſpairing to keep the Kingdom for him, revolted to the Romans. But Epiphanes and the reſt were forced to ſeek to ſave themſelves, before ſuch time as they were left deſtitute, and ſo accompanied with ten Horſemen, they paſſed the River Euphrates: And ſo being out of danger, they went to Vologeſus, by whom they were received, not as Fugitives, but with great honour, and according to their de- M gree, as though they yet poſſeſſed their ancient dignity.

Antiochus taken.

Petus coming to Tarſus of Cilicia, ſent a Centurion to arreſt and carry Antiochus bound to Rome. But Veſpaſian permitted not the King to be ſo ill treated, conſidering more the old Friendſhip between them, than the offence which he believed had given occaſion to this War. Wherefore he commanded, that in the way as he came, he ſhould be unbound and ſtay a while at Lacedemon, and forbear his journey towards Rome; allowing him money ſufficient to maintain his Kingly dignity.

Epiphanes, and thoſe with him hearing this, were eaſed of the great concern they took for their Father, whom they greatly feared to be fallen into ſome danger; and now they alſo conceived ſome hope to be reconciled to Cæſar; whereof Vologeſus writ to Veſpaſian, N who courteouſly gave them leave to come to Rome; and their Father was preſently ſent for to them from Lacedemon, and ſo they remained at Rome in great honour.

Antiochus reconciled to Cæſar.

The Alans enter Media to ſpoil the ſame.

The Nation of the Alanes, being originally Scythians, inhabit about the River Tanais, and the Marſhes of Mæotis, as in another place we have recounted. They conſpiring with the King of Hyrcania to paſs into Media and ſack it (for he was Maſter of that paſſage which King Alexander had made in ſuch wiſe, that it was ſhut up with Iron Gates) obtained leave to paſs, and ſo came into Media, whilſt the Medes nothing feared any ſuch matrer, and ſacked and ſpoiled all their populous and wealthy borders being full of Cattel, none daring to reſiſt them; for Pacorus King of that Country, for fear fled into the ſtrongeſt hold he had, and left all his goods behind him, and with much O ado redeemed his Wiſe and Concubines, whom they had taken, for a hundred talents.

A Having therefore Licence to rob and ſpoile, for that no man reſiſted them, they came into Armenia, and waſted all the Country thereabout. Tyridates was then King of that Country, who with an Army coming to fight againſt them, was almoſt by them taken alive in the Battle; for one caſt a halter about him and began to draw him amongſt the Enemies: and ſo had done, but that he with his Sword quickly cut the rope and fled: and they being more enraged, by reaſon he fought againſt them, waſted all the Country, and carrying with them a great multitude of Men and Cattle out of both Countries, they returned into their own.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Maſſada, a very ſtrong Caſtle, was taken.

Baſſus dying in Judæa, Flavius Sylva ſucceeded in his place; who perceiving that all the Country elſe were Conquered ſave one only Caſtle, he with all the forces he could make went againſt it. This Caſtle is called Maſſada. The Captain of the Sicarians, named Eleazar, who commanded in it, was a very ſtrong and valiant man, of the Tribe of Juda, who perſwaded a great many Jews, as is beforeſaid, not to enrol them- C ſelves when Cyrenæus was Cenſor, and ſent to tax Judea. For at that time the Sicarians had conſpired againſt thoſe that obeyed the Romans, and in all things uſed them like Enemies, taking and driving away their Goods, and firing their Houſes, affirming that they nothing differed from ſtrangers, who betrayed the liberty of their Country; rather than they would fight for it, and that they had rather they were on the Romans ſide. But this was only an excuſe to hide their avarice and injurious dealing, as the proof made manifeſt; for they themſelves revolted and bore Arms againſt the Romans, and their enterpriſes againſt the Romans were worſe than the reſt; and when their firſt forged pretence was known and confuted, they raged more than before againſt thoſe that upbraided them with it.

D For at that time the Jews abounded with all manner of Iniquity, ſo that none was left uncommitted, yea, though one endeavoured to invent ſome new Villanies, yet could he deviſe none that was not then practiſed: All laboured with this malady; both in particular, and in common; and every one ſtrove with other to ſurpaſs his fellow in impiety againſt God, and injuſtice towards his Neighbour. The mighty vexed the weaker ſort; and the meaner ſort deſtroyed the Potentates, and took their riches away from them; thoſe gaped after rule and dominion, theſe after miſchief.

The time among the Jews which was moſt fruitful in all manner of impiety.

The Sicarians were the firſt that were ſo cruel and injurious againſt their neighbours: for not provoked thereunto, either by deed or word, they ſlew and injured all men without cauſe; but in compariſon of John they were very moderate. For he did not only E ſlay all that counſelled that which was good and profitable, as his greateſt Enemies, eſpecially the Citizens; but alſo he many wayes injured his Country, like one who impiouſly contemned God himſelf. For he did eat forbidden meats, and violated the purity of his Countries Cuſtomes: ſo that it was no wonder to ſee him obſerve no juſtice nor fidelity towards men, who had now infringed the Laws of God. Again, what Villanies did Simon Giora leave undone? Or what injury did he abſtain from offering to their Bodies, who had choſen him for their Ruler? What did kindred and friendſhip then avail any man? Yea, it occaſioned them to be more cruelly uſed, and more tyrannouſly butchered, than otherwiſe. For they thought it a pittiful offence to abuſe Strangers, but a glory to exerciſe cruelty upon their moſt familiar Friends.

John Giſcala.

Simon Son of Giora.

F The Idumæans were followers of this fury, who kill'd the high Prieſts, and left not any one of note in the City, by whom God might be honoured; and induced all injuſtice poſſible, wherein the Zealous excelled. For they committed all miſchief, leaving nothing unattempted, that had ever before that time been practiſed: yet they took their Name from thoſe that practiſe good and godlineſs, but in truth it was to mock and flout thoſe that did well (ſo ſavage and cruel was their nature) or elſe accounting the greateſt impiety to be goodneſs. But their end was as they deſerved; God puniſhed their impieties with his juſt vengeance: For even till the end of their lives, they endured all the miſeries that is poſſible for mans nature to abide, undergoing all ſorts of torments. Perhaps one will ſay that their puniſhment was not ſo great as they deſerved: G but what puniſhment could be deviſed ſufficient for their deſerts? I cannot now ſtand to lament thoſe who periſhed by theſe mens cruelty: Wherefore I will return where I left.

Sylva the Captain of the Romans beſiegeth Maſſada.

A Sylva being advanced againſt Eleazar, and thoſe that kept Maſſada with him, who were Sicarians, he preſently ſubdued all the Confines and borders round about, and put in every fit place Garriſons, and invironed the Caſtle with a Wall, leſt any of the beſieged ſhould eſcape, and that the beſiegers might there keep a continuall guard. Moreover, he placed his Camp in a fit quarter for the Siege, where the Rock that the Caſtle was built upon joyned to the other Mountain; but it was an unfit place to get neceſſaries in: For not only victuals were fetcht far off by great labour of the Jews, who were commanded to do it; but alſo water for the whole Army ſome-where elſe, for there was no Fountain near that place.

The ſituation of Maſſada.

This done, Sylva attempted the Caſtle; wherein it was requiſite for him to uſe both art and labour, by reaſon of the ſtrength of the Caſtle, which is thus ſituate. B It is invironed round with a huge Rock very high on every ſide; and the Valley underneath is ſo deep, that one can ſcarce ſee the bottom, all rocky and inacceſſible to all Animals; ſaving only that in two places there is a difficult paſſage to it, one from the Lake Aſphaltites towards the Eaſt, and the eaſieſt of the two on the Weſt ſide: the firſt is called a Snake; taking its name of the ſtraitneſs and crooked turnings; for the Rock that is eminent, ſeemeth as it were broken in ſunder, and by little and little often returneth again into it ſelf, and is by degrees extended in length, ſo that he that goeth that way, can make no haſt, but muſt ſtep with one foot firſt upon them, and the other upon another, and muſt ſtand upon one foot while he removeth the other, and he that falleth is C ſure to be killed in the fall: for there is ſuch a hollow place on either ſide between the Rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldeſt man alive. When one hath gone thirty furlongs by this way, one comes to the top of the Hill, which is not ſteep, but hath a Plain upon it. Jonathan the high Prieſt was the firſt that built a Caſtle in this place, and called it Maſſada: and Herod after him beſtowed great labour and coſt in fortifying it, for he invironed it with a Wall of ſeven furlongs Circuit, all of white ſtone, twelve Cubits high, and eight Cubits broad; and placed in it twenty ſeven Towers that were fifty Cubits high, by which men paſſed into the houſes that were round about the Wall within.

The journey by the Rock called the Snake.

The top more fruitful and fatter ſoil than the Plain.

Herods Palace.

The King appointed the top of the Hill for Tillage, becauſe it was a more fertile and fat ſoil than any ground elſe, ſo that if at any time they within the Caſtle wanted proviſion, yet they might not be famiſhed, having this ground to furniſh them. D He alſo built in this place a Palace for himſelf, the way to which was on the Weſt ſide within the Caſtle wall, whoſe proſpect was towards the North; and he invironed the ſame with a very ſtrong Wall, and in the Corners thereof he built four very firm Towers threeſcore Cubits high, and very ſumptuous within, having divers Roomes, Galleries and Baths, ſupported in every place with Pillars, every one of which was one only ſtone: The Walls thereof were of ſolid ſtone of divers colours: and to every houſe, and in the top of the Hill, and round about the Palace, he hewed certain Ciſterns out of the Rock to hold water; ſo that by this means water was as plentiful, as though they had had Fountains within the Caſtle. There was a way to the Caſtle under ground from the Kings Palace, which they that were without could not perceive; E but the way above ground was inacceſſible; for as we have already ſaid, by the way on the Eaſt ſide no man could paſs, and as for that on the Weſt, it was ſtopt up with a Tower built in the ſtrait thereof diſtant a thouſand Cubits from the Caſtle, by which it was impoſſible to paſs; and it was not eaſie to get it by force; and the more leiſurely one went, the greater was the danger. Thus was this Fortreſs ſtrengthened both by Art and Nature.

A Tower to the weſt-ſide.

Great ſtore of proviſion in the Caſtle.

The proviſion within the Caſtle was admirable for the plenty thereof; for there was Corn ſufficient for many years, beſides Wine and Oyl, and all ſorts of Pulſe, and great quantity of Dates. All which Eleazar, having deceitfully obtained the Caſtle with his Sicarians, found there: which proviſion was all as ſound and as freſh, as though it had newly been laid up in ſtore: F notwithſtanding, that from the time it was placed there, to the time that the Romans took it, were a hundred years: And the Romans found the reliques of the fruits incorrupted: and one may juſtly think that the cauſe hereof is the Air about the Caſtle, which by reaſon of the height of the place is moſt pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was alſo found all manner of Armour in great quantity, which Herod had made, and would have armed ten thouſand men; alſo much unwrought Iron, Braſs and Lead; ſo that one may judge that proviſion to have been reſerved for ſome great cauſe.

Fruit for an hundred years kept uncorrupt.

Herod ſuſpecting a double peril, builded the place for a refuge.

It is reported, that Herod prepared that Caſtle for his refuge, when he doubted two great dangers: First, That the People of the Jews would depoſe him, and make them G Kings whoſe Anceſtors had before reigned.

The other which was more conſiderable, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queen of Ægypt, A Egypt, who without concealing her intent often requeſted Antonius that Herod might be ſlain, and that ſhe might have the Kingdom of the Jews given to her. And it was a great marvel that Antonius doting ſo upon her, did not fulfil her requeſt. Herod upon theſe apprehenſions built Maſſada, and left it ſo furniſhed that without taking it the Romans could not put an end to the War againſt the Jews. After the General of the Romans had now compaſſed all the place, without with a Wall (as is before ſaid) to the end that none might eſcape, he began to aſſault the Caſtle, but found one only place that he could fill up with Earth. For behind the Tower which on the Weſt-ſide ſtopped up the paſſage to the Caſtle and Palace, there was a great Rock very large and long, yet not ſo high as Maſſada by three hundred Cubits: The Rock was called B Leuce, which ſignifieth white. When Sylva had gotten this Rock, he commanded his Souldiers to build a Mount thereon; and they chearfully labouring, raiſed ſuddenly a mount two hundred Cubits high: yet by reaſon of the height it ſeemed not firm nor ſufficient enough to bear the Engines; wherefore upon it was built a Platforme with great ſtones fifty Cubits high, and as many Cubits broad; the Engines were ſuch as Veſpaſian and Titus had deviſed to batter Walls with: and upon this Platform they made a Tower threeſcore Cubits high, all plated about with Iron.

The year of the World, 4038. After the Nativity of Christ, 76.

Herod ſuſpecting a double peril, builded the place for a refuge.

There was but one place about Maſſada to raiſe a mount to batter on.

From hence the Romans with many ſhot from their Engines drove the Jews from off the Caſtle Walls, not ſuffering them to lift up their heads. And Sylva having made a mighty Ram, cauſed the Wall to be continually battered therewith; but it could ſcarcely C make a breach in it; and the Sicarians quickly prevented it, by building another Wall within, which could not be broken with the the Ram, becauſe it was yet ſoft, and ſo broke the force thereof; for they ſaw'd Timber in pieces, and as it were made two rails; & then filled the ſpace between the two rails with Earth, and with other planks they kept the Earth from falling down, ſo that they made a work like the Wall of a houſe; which for that it yielded to the blows of the Ram (being ſoft Earth) the Ram could not prevail againſt it, but rather made it more ſtrong than before by ramming the Earth together.

The City battered with a large Ram, and by Sylvas appointment.

Sylva perceiving this Judged that he might ſooner deſtroy the Wall with fire than with his Engine, and ſo he commanded the Souldiers to caſt upon it many burning firebrands; and the fire quickly took hold of the Wall, becauſe it was for the moſt part D built with Wood; and eaſily alſo pierced through it, by reaſom it was not cloſe wrought together: and there was a great flame.

Firebrands darted againſt the Walls.

At the very beginning of the fire the North wind greatly annoyed the Romans; for the fire blowing furiouſly from above againſt them, it drove ſo extremely upon them, that they were in great deſpair, fearing their Engines would be burnt; but preſently the Wind changing and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods providence) it turned the fire again upon the Wall, ſo that all of it, even to the foundation thereof, was wholly ſet on fire. The Romans thus aſſiſted by God, returned again into their Camp joyfully, purpoſing the next morning betimes to give the aſſault, and that night to place ſtronger Watches, leſt any of the Enemies ſhould eſcape. But Eleazar was E far from thinking to flie; neither would he permit any one of his company to think of it. But ſeeing now the Wall was fired, and not knowing any way elſe to ſave himſelf, conſidering likewiſe what the Romans would do unto their Wives and Children if they ſhould take them, he deliberated of all their death's, which he in that extremity judged to be the beſt way they could take. And ſo he aſſembled the moſt valiant of all his companions, and exhorted them all thereunto, after this manner.

The North winds diverting the flame, turneth it on the Romans.

Generous Jews, we long ago reſolved with our ſelves to ſerve neither the Romans, nor any other ſave only God: for he alone is the true and juſt Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that requireth you to ſhew your reſolute minds: let us not therefore diſhonour our ſelves, and beſide our ſlavery, ſuffer alſo intolerable torments, if we be taken alive by the Romans. F For we were the firſt that revolted from them, and now the laſt that war againſt them. And I verily think that God hath given us this benefit, that we may die well in our own liberty, which he denied to others, who were overcome contrary to all expectation. We are certain to be conquered as ſoon as it is day light: but to die valiantly with our deareſt Friends, is a Glorious reſolution for valiant men; and of this our Enemies cannot debar us, who labour to to take us alive, and carry us away Captives; and we are not able to vanquiſh them in fight. For truly, at the firſt (when we who coveted liberty ſuffered all miſery at the hands of our own Countrymen, and worſe at the hands of our Enemies) we ſhould have conſidered, that God, who was ſometimes favourable to the Nation of the Jews, had now condemned it to perdition: for had he yet been favourable to us, or had he been but lightly offended with us, G he would not have permitted ſo many men to have periſhed, and have delivered his Holy City into the hands of the Enemies to be conſumed with fire. We only amongſt

The puniſhment of thoſe crimes, which the Jews in Jury attempted againſt the Gentils.

The beſt grave is when liberty is maintained.

all our Nation have hoped to live in liberty, as though we had no ways offended the divine Majeſty, or been guilty of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquity. So you ſee how we are puniſhed for longing after vain hope, being brought into greater extremity than we expected. Neither hath our Caſtle, by Nature inexpugnable, any thing profited us to our preſervation; but we having ſtore of Victuals and Arms, and all other neceſſaries, have loſt all hope of ſafety, God himſelf manifeſtly taking it from us. For the fire that once was carried againſt our Enemies, did not of it ſelf return againſt us and the Wall we built: But it was for the puniſhment of offences, who furiouſly raged againſt our own Nation: wherefore I requeſt you, let us not be puniſhed by the Romans, whoſe forces are invincible, but of our ſelves let us ſatisfie the anger of God, and ſo it will be more tolerable for us; even by that means our Wives ſhall die undefiled, and our Children ſhall not taſte of ſervile Captivity. After whoſe deaths, we will one help another to die with credit preſerving our liberty, which is the beſt Sepulture of all. Yet let us firſt fire our Caſtle, and burn our Treaſure: for it will be no ſmall grief to the Romans, if they neither get our bodies alive, nor find any jot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let us only leave our victuals as a ſufficient Teſtimony, that Famine did not cauſe us to be conquered; but that we, as at firſt we reſolved, preferred death before bondage.

Eleazar having thus ſpoken, they that were preſent did not all accord with him; for ſome joyfully haſted to execute his advice, thinking it a glorious death. But others moved with compaſſion towards their Wives and Families, were ſomething backward or elſe abhorred to kill themſelves, and looking one upon another with Tears, ſhew'd their diſagreement from that which Eleazar adviſed. Which when Eleazar perceiv'd, and that his counſel through fear was defeated; fearing alſo that they who courageouſly had at firſt accorded thereunto, would be withdrawn by the Tears of others, he did not ſo end his exhortation; but ſtanding up, he begun with a vehement diſcourſe to ſpeak to them of the immortality of the Soul, and fixing his Eys upon thoſe that wept with a great exclamation, ſaid:

Eleazar's Oration as touching the immortality of the Soul.

A Soul tied in a mortal body. The power of the Soul.

Sleep the Argument of the immortality of the Soul.

The profeſſors of wiſdom among the Indians burn themſelves.

How much am I deceived, who thought that valiant men fighting for their liberty would rather chuſe to die than to live? but ye ſhew your ſelves not to excel any ordinary men, who fear to die, notwithſtanding that thereby you may eſcape great miſery and calamity; though in this point you ought not to have expected any admonition thereunto, nor to have made any delay to do it. The ancient cuſtomes, which have endured ever ſince men had reaſon, the divine doctrine of our Nation, which hath continually been confirmed by the deeds of our predeceſſours, do inſtruct us, that it is miſerable to live, and not to die. For Death diſmiſſeth our Souls from priſon to their moſt pure and proper place, where never after they ſhall be touched with calamity. But whilſt they are bound in a mortal body, and participate of his miſeries, they may in a manner be affirmed to be dead. For there is no proportion between two things, one whereof is Divine, and the other Mortal. True it is, that our Souls can do much being joyned to our bodies, which they uſe as their inſtruments, ſecretly producing in them motion, and many other actions paſſing the Nature of Mortal things. But when the Soul is looſed from that heavy burthen, which weighs it down to the Earth, and hath recovered its proper habitation, then it injoyeth free and perfect felicity, and remaineth inviſible to mortal Eyes, as God himſelf is, as likewiſe it is in our bodies. For it cometh ſecretly into them, and ſo departeth from them again, that no man can perceive it, being of a nature incorruptible, and yet cauſing great changes in our bodies. For whatſoever the Soul toucheth, that preſently liveth and flouriſheth; and what it forſaketh, that incontinently withereth and dyeth: ſo much doth it participate of immortality. Sleep may be an evident argument to you of this which I ſpeak, in which the Soul not being diſtracted taketh a moſt pleaſant and ſweet repoſe; and communicating with God, it foreſeeth many future events. Wherefore then ſhould we fear death, who love the reſt that we have in ſleep? were he not a mad man that for a ſhort life would hinder himſelf of that which is eternal? It is neceſſary that we who are inſtructed in the Law of our Nation, ſhould give example to others to deſpiſe and contemn Death. But if we ſeek confirmation hereof from ſtrangers, let us ſee the examples of the wiſer ſort of Indians: for they being juſt men tolerate this life as a neceſſary office of nature for a certain time, though againſt their wills; yet do they even in perfect health haſten to unlooſe the Soul bound in this Mortal Body, though not urged thereunto by any calamity or neceſſity, but only for deſire of immortality, and ſolemnly take leave of their Friends; neither doth any one ſeek to hinder them, but eſteeming them moſt fortunate, they ſend by them commendations and other meſſages to their Friends departed: ſo firm is their belief that the Souls of the dead have Communion and converſation together. And thus having all inſtruction what to ſay to the Souls departed, they with great applauſe leap into the fire, that thereby their Souls may be purified and ſeparated from their Bodies. And their Friends go more joyfully with them

when

A when they go to their death, than any doth, that bringeth his Friend on the way when he is to go a great journey ; and they bewail only themſelves, and not thoſe who are dead and have attained immortality. Shall not we then be aſhamed not to believe ſo firmly as the Indians do ? deſpiſing through our own ſloth our Country-laws which are to be reverenc'd of all men : Nay, ſuppoſing that by our law we had been inſtructed contrariwiſe, to wit, that to live in this life is bliſs, and to die is calamity : yet notwithſtanding, this preſent neceſſity, this preſent time had been a ſufficient motive to cauſe us to embrace death rather than life, ſeeing that the will of God and neceſſity oblige us thereunto. For who can doubt that God, to puniſh us for having made ill uſe of life, ha's long ſince reſolv'd to deprive us of it ? and that it is not to our own forces or the clemency of the Romans that we are beholding for not being all ſlain in this B War ? But a more potent cauſe hereof there was which made them conquerours. Were they the Romans that ſlew the Jews that inhabited at Cæſarea, whom the Inhabitants thereof upon the Sabboth-day, they being aſſembled in one place together with their Wives and Children, maſſacred, notwithſtanding that they had no intent to revolt from them, nor ever lifted up their hand in their own defence, nothing fearing the Romans, who only accounted thoſe of our Nation their Enemies that revolted from them ? But ſome may object the Jews at Cæſarea, and the Inhabitants thereof were always at variance, and that now they revenged their old quarrel, having gotten opportunity. What then ſhall we ſay of the Scythopolitans, who bare Arms with the Grecians againſt us, and denied to aſſiſt their own kindred againſt the Romans? What profit did they receive by this their good will and fidelity ? for they were C altogether with their whole Families cruelly ſlain ; and this was the reward they had for their labour, for having withſtood us from doing the like to them. It were too long to recount particularly all things to this effect. For as ye know there is no City in all Syria that hath not maſſacred the Jews inhabiting in it, and that is not more an Enemy than the Romans were.
They of Damaſcus, although they could not deviſe any probable cauſe for it, yet maſſacred all the Jews living among them, amounting to the number of eighteen thouſand, beſide their Wives and Children. And is it not for certain reported, that the number of the Jews ſlain by the Egyptians were above 60000 ? It may be, that finding no aſſiſtance in a ſtrange Country, they were martyred by their enemies : but they that in their own Country fought againſt the Romans wanted nothing that might have cauſed perfect hope of a full victory over the Romans;
D they had Weapons, Armour, Walls, and ſtrong holds inexpugnable ; and reſolution to ſhun no danger for the ſake of liberty ; in a word, nothing that might put us into a condition to reſiſt.
But for how long time did this ſuffice ? For our fortreſſes all were taken and ſubdued by the Enemies, as though they had been built to make their victory more Famous: and not to do us ſervice. And we may juſtly deem thoſe happy who were ſlain in the War; for they died in liberty.
Yet who doth not pity the multitude of thoſe that fell into the Romans hands ? or who would not haſten to die, rather than endure the like miſery that they ſuffered ? Some of them were tortured with ſtripes others burnt, others halfe eaten of wild Beaſts, were reſerved alive for the ſecond meal : the moſt miſerable of all are thoſe that are yet alive, who often wiſh for death, and cannot find it. Where is now that potent City ; that was once the Capital City of E all our Nation, ſo ſtrengthened with Walls, ſo fortified with Towers & Caſtles to defend thoſe Walls, ſcarcely able to contain the proviſions for War, having in it ſo vaſt a multitude of men to fight for it , wherin God himſelf was thought to dwell ? What is now become of it ? It is razed down, even to the very foundations ; and ſcarce any memory or reliques thereof left ſtanding; the whole people deſtroyed, only a few old and unhappy men ſurvive, who ſit among the Aſhes of the Temple, and a few Women, whom the Enemies reſerved to ſatisfie their filthy luſt. And will any amongſt us, conſidering all theſe things, deſire to behold the light of the Sun, although he could live without moleſtation? who is ſuch an Enemy to his Native ſoil? who is ſo effeminate, or deſirous of his life, that he doth not grieve to have lived till this time ? would God we had been all in our graves, before we had ſeen that ſacred City fired by a hoſtile hand, before we beheld F the Holy Temple deſtroyed by impious fire : and ſeeing that the hope we had to be revenged on our Enemies, is now vaniſhed, and that we are left alone in miſery and neceſſity, let us haſten to die well, and take compaſſion on our ſelves, our Wives and Children, and that whilſt we have time. For we are all born to die, and all that are begotten by us, and the ſtrongeſt men living cannot avoid it : but injury, and bondage, and to ſee our Wives and Children abuſed before our faces, is no neceſſity proceeding from Nature , but they only are forced to endure it, who, when they might have died without it, did refuſe for fear. We firſt of all truſting to our ſtrength, rebelled againſt the Romans ; afterwards they exhorted us to obedience, but wee denied : which of them then will not be enraged againſt us, if they can take us alive ?

Let us with our Wives and Children die Freemen, let us together depart out of this life. The Romans would have it otherwiſe: who fear leſt any of us ſhould periſh, and not fall into their hands alive. Let us therefore haſten, that inſtead of their hope, whereby they verily perſwaded themſelves to take us alive, we may contrary to their expectation daunt them with ſudden admiration of our glorious deaths.*

Whilſt Eleazar was yet ſpeaking, and deſirous ſtill to continue his exhortation, they interrupted him: every one now in a fury bent to follow his advice, made haſte to effect it; and as though they had been urged by ſome Spirit thereto, one laboured to prevent I another in the execution thereof, judging him to ſhew moſt valour and fortitude, that firſt diſpatched himſelf. They were alſo deſirous to kill their Wives and Children with themſelves. And which is moſt ſtrange, their minds were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody work; but with the ſame reſolution they had, when they heard Eleazars ſpeech, every one retained his good affection towards his Friends: yet permitting reaſon to tak no place, and perſwading themſelves that thus they had well provided for their Children, they embraced their Wives and Children for their laſt farewel, and took their leaves of them, kiſſing them with Tears, and then all at once ſlew them, as though it had been done by the hands of other men, and not their own, comforting themſelves in being forced ſo to do, and that hereby they ſhould eſcape the tyranny and K cruelty of their Enemies. Finally, no man was ſo cowardly, who durſt not venture on this action; ſo every one of them killed his deareſt friends. O miſerable people, whom neceſſity forced to ſlay their Wives and Children, and to account this action the very leaſt of all their miſeries. After which, not enduring the grief that enſued upon this fact, and thinking that in living any while after them, they ſhould injure thoſe whom they had ſlain, they with all ſpeed poſſible gathered all their riches together, and ſet them one fire: which done, they elected ten by lot, who ſhould kill the reſt; and every one proſtrating himſelf upon his Wife and Children, and embracing them in his Arms, was ſlain willingly by thoſe that executed that wrethched office: who having without fear diſpatched them, they caſt lots whoſe fortune it ſhould be to kill all the L reſt; and he upon whom the lot ſhould fall, was to kill the other nine, and laſtly himſelf upon them all; and every one ſo encouraged one another, that there was no difference between thoſe that were to be killed and thoſe that were to kill; and ſo the reſt offered themſelves to death: which done, he who was the laſt of all, being yet alive, went amongſt the dead bodies, and ſearched to ſee if any ſtill lived that needed his hand in ſo great a multitude of ſlain people; and finding all of them diſpatched, he went and fired the Palace: which done, he with all his force thruſt his Sword into his own body up to the Hilts, and ſo fell down by his deareſt Friends.

The Jews gathering all their goods together caſt them into the fire.

Ten choſen by lot to kill the reſt of the Jews.

In this manner they periſhed with a belief that they left not one perſon alive to fall into the Romans hands: but a certain old Woman, and another who was Eleazars Couſin, (who in learning and wiſdom ſurpaſſed all other Women) and five Children hid M themſelves in a Cave, wherein Water was reſerved to drink, whilſt the reſt were buſied in this Maſſacre: the ſlain were in number nine hundred and ſixty, accounting Women and Children. This calamity hapned the fifteenth day of April. In the morning the Romans expecting that the Jews would encounter them, made Bridges from their Mounts to the Walls, and ſo aſſaulted the Walls; and ſeeing none of the Enemies appear, but all the Walls on fire, and a profound ſilence in every place, they could not conjecture what was the cauſe of it; and at laſt they made a cry at once, as though they had been beating the Walls with a Ram, thereby to ſee if they could make any Enemies come out. The Women in the Vaults heard this cry, and coming forth de- N clared to the Romans all that had hapned. The Romans did not eaſily believe their words, by reaſon the greatneſs of the fact ſeemed incredible; but they endeavoured to quench the fire, and paſſing forward they came to the Palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies; yet they did not inſult over them as Enemies, but admired that ſo many ſhould be ſo obſtinately minded to deſpiſe death.

The Romans expect the fight.

The Romans admire the Jews fortitude and obſtinate contempt of death.

Of the Death of the Sicarians that had fled to Alexandria and Thebes.

AFter that the Caſtle of Maſſada was thus taken, the General of the Romans leaving a Garriſon there, went to Cæſarea, becauſe there was no Enemy left in all the Country. But not only Judea was deſtroyed through the continuance of the War, but many of that Nation, though far diſtant from it, taſted of its troubles; for it ſo fell B out, that afterwards many Jews periſhed in Egypt at Alexandria. Thoſe Sicarians who had eſcaped thither, were not content to be ſafe and free from danger, but there alſo they attempted alteration, and to recover their Liberty againſt the Romans eſteeming themſelves nothing inferiour to them, and that only God was their Lord. And ſome of the nobler race of the Jews, ſeeking to withſtand this Enterprize, were by theſe Sicarians ſlain; which was no ſooner done, but they incited the People to revolt.

The murtherers, authors of new calamity.

The better ſort of the Jews ſeeing this, and that they could not repreſs them without danger, they aſſembled all the Jews together, and declared to them the temerity of theſe Sicarians, accuſing them as the Authors of all the miſery that had befallen the Jews, G and that if they thought it ſufficient to force them to fly, yet they were not certain of their lives; becauſe the deſign being known to the Romans, they would puniſh them for it, though no partakers of their wickedneſs. Wherefore they admoniſhed the multitude to beware, leſt they drew themſelves into the ſame danger, wherein the Sicarians were, and to provide for their own ſafety by delivering ſuch people to the Romans. The Jews were perſwaded by theſe ſpeeches: and foreſeeing the danger that might enſue, they furiouſly aſſaulted the Sicarians, and took of them ſix hundred: and ſhortly after thoſe who fled into Egypt and Thebes were taken and brought back again; whoſe hard-hearted obſtinacy was ſo great, that none can without admiration hear of it. For notwithſtanding that all torments and tortures, that could be deviſed, were inflicted up- D them, only to force them to confeſs that Cæſar was their Lord; yet not one of them would ſay ſo, or make any ſhew thereof; but all perſevered in their former opinion, as though the Body tormented had been dead and not alive. Moreover, the incredible obſtinacy of their Children was moſt to be admired, for not one of them could be conſtrained to call Cæſar Lord. So much did their Reſolution overcome the Torments inflicted upon their Bodies.

How the Temple of Onias at Alexandria was ſhut up.

AT That time Lupus was Governour of Alexandria, and with all ſpeed by Letters gave Cæſar notice of theſe troubles. The Emperour, ſeeing that it was neceſſary to beware of the Jews, who were naturally inclined to ſedition and unquietneſs, fearing alſo that they would once again gather themſelves together, and cauſe ſome to joyn with them, he commanded Lupus to deſtroy the Temple, which they had in the City F Onion, which was built and ſo named upon this occaſion: Onias the Son of Simon, one of the high Prieſts, being driven out of Jeruſalem, when Antiochus King of Syria warred againſt the Jews, he came to Alexandria, and was courteouſly entertained by Ptolomæus, who was then alſo Enemy to Antiochus, affirming, that he would draw into his Country the People of the Jews, if he would agree to that which he required. The King according to all that could be granted, he requeſted him to permit him to build a Temple in ſome place of his Country, wherein he might worſhip God according to the cuſtom of their Country: for ſo the Jews would hate Antiochus the more, who had deſtroyed their Temple at Jeruſalem, and be friendly to him; and many of them would flie to him for Religion's ſake.

Onias by Ptolomies conſent buildeth a City and Temple in Egypt.

Ptolomæus agreed ſo to do, and gave him a piece of ground for that purpoſe a hun- G dred and fourſcore furlongs from Memphis, in that place which was called the Country of Heliopolis: where Onias building a Caſtle, erected alſo a Temple, not equal to that

that of Jeruſalem; but yet with a Tower like that of Jeruſalem, with very great ſtones, H and threeſcore Cubits long; and he built an Altar after the faſhion of that of his Country, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (ſave only a Cancleſtick) which had inſtead thereof a Lamp to give light, which he cauſed to be hung before the Altar in a golden Chain; and he invironed all the Temple with a wall made of Brick, and the Gates he made of Stone; and the King granted to it great revenues of money and ground, to the intent that the Prieſts might have plenty of all things which they required.

But Onias did not this with a good Conſcience, but for that he was at variance with the Jews of Jeruſalem, who had forced him to flie: and he perſwaded himſelf that by the building of this Temple, he might withdraw all men from Jeruſalem thither; and I of this there was a Prophecy nine hundred and ſeventy years before, and Iſaias had foretold that a certain Jew ſhould build a Temple in Egypt.

Lupus ſhuts the Jews out of the Temple.

Thus that Temple was built; and Lupus having received the Emperors Letters, went to the Temple, and taking away certain gifts from it he ſhut it up: and after him Paulinus who ſuceeded in his ſtead, left not one gift there (for he threatned the Prieſts if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any, that came thither to ſacrifice, to come near it; but ſhutting up the Gate thereof, he left no ſign of divine Service there; and from the time it was built, till the time it was ſhut up, were three hundred thirty and three yeares.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Maſſacre of the Jews at Cyrene.

THE Boldneſs of the Sicarians, like ſome infectious diſeaſe, ſpread over all the L Towns about Cyrene. For one Jonathan a Weaver, and a wicked man, having eſcaped, perſwaded many ſimple people to follow him, and led them into the Wilderneſs promiſing to ſhew them ſigns and viſions, and ſo he deceived the ſimpleſt ſort of the Jews: but the nobleſt of them of Cyrene, underſtanding his deceit, gave Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Governour of Lybia; who ſending ſome Horſe and Foot, eaſily ſurprized them being unarmed, and the moſt part of them were ſlain; yet ſome were taken alive and brought to Catullus. But their Leader Jonathan at that time eſcaped: yet being diligently laid and ſought for over all thoſe Countries, he was at laſt taken; and being brought to Catullus, he ſought to delay his own puniſhment by offering an occaſion of Cruelty to Catullus: For he accuſed the M richeſt among the Jews to have been his adviſers to this matter.

A part of Jonathans companions were taken and ſlain, the reſt kept captive alive, and brought to Catullus.

Catullus was glad of theſe accuſations, and exaggerated them very much with Tragical terms, ſo that he might have a pretext of War againſt the Jews, and not content to credit whatſoever was maliciouſly ſpoken, he himſelf inſtructed the Sicarians to frame ſcandalous accuſations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Jew, whom he had long hated, and his Wife Bernice, he put them firſt of all to death; and after them all that were rich, who amounted to the number of three thouſand. And this he thought he did without controul, becauſe he confiſcated their Poſſeſſions to Cæſar.

Three thouſand Jews ſlain by Catullus.

And leſt any Jew living in any other place, ſhould complain of his injuſtice, he extended N his malicious lies againſt others further off; and perſwaded Jonathan, and certain others that were taken with him, to accuſe the moſt truſty and faithful Jews both at Rome and Alexandria: one of thoſe who were thus falſely accuſed was Joſeph, who wrote this Hiſtory. But this proceeding of Catullus had not ſuch ſucceſs as he hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Jonathan and the reſt bound with him, thinking that no more inquiry would be made of the falſe accuſations invented by himſelf. But Veſpaſian, ſuſpecting the matter, made diligent inquiry to know the truth: and finding theſe crimes injuriouſly impoſed upon thoſe men, at the interceſſion of Titus, he acquitted them, and puniſhed Jonathan according to his deſert; who being firſt whipt, was afterward burnt alive. O

Joſeph by Catullus perſwaſion is accuſed by Jonathan.

Jonathan being firſt beaten is burnt alive.

Catullus at that time, by reaſon of the mildneſs of the Emperour, had nothing ſaid

to

A to him : but not long after he fell into a grievous Diſeaſe, and was cruelly tormented not only in Body but alſo in mind. For he was greatly terrified, and continually imagined to ſee the Ghoſts of thoſe whom he had ſo unjuſtly ſlain ready to kill him ; ſo that he cried out, and not able to contain himſelf, leapt out of his Bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. Aud this Diſeaſe daily increaſing, his Guts and Bowels rotting, and iſſuing out of him, at laſt he died in this manner, leaving behind him an evident argument, that the Divine Juſtice puniſheth impious Malefactors.

The year of the World, 4038. after the Nativity of Christ, 76.

This is the End of the Hiſtory, which we promiſed to ſet down with all fidelity, for thoſe that are deſirous to know the event of the War between the Jews and the Romans. And as for our Stile, we leave it to the judgment of the Reader : but touching the Verity of the Hiſtory, it is ſuch, as no man need to doubt of; B for I do affirm that to be the only ſcope, which I aimed at in this whole work.

The Concluſion of the ſeven Books of the Wars of the Jews.

The First Book

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS
The Son of Matthias. I Written againſt Appion, touching the Antiquity
Of the RACE of the JEVVS.

K

The Hiſtory of the Antiquity containeth the events of five thouſand years.

I Suppoſe, moſt worthy Epaphroditus, that I have ſufficiently teſtified unto thoſe who ſhall read the Books which I have written touching the Authentick Hiſtory of the Jews, that our Nation is moſt Ancient, and that they had their Original from themſelves, and have from the firſt beginning inhabited that Country, whereof they are poſſeſſed at this preſent. To which effect I gathered out of our ſacred Writings, and publiſhed in the Greek tongue, a Hiſtory containing the occurrences of five thouſand years. But for that I ſee there are divers, (who being too much ſeduced by the ſcandalous Calumnies and Reports which ſome, who are ill L affected towards us, have publiſhed againſt us) have misbelieved that which I have written of our Antiquity, and labour to approve our Nation to be Modern, becauſe none of the ancient and moſt renowned Hiſtorians among the Grecians have thought our Anceſtors worthy to be enrolled in their Writings : For this cauſe I hold it a part of my duty to write a ſhort Treatiſe hereupon ; both to reprove the malice and impoſtures of thoſe our Calumniators, and to correct their Ignorance, by teaching thoſe who are deſirous to know the truth, what the Original of our Nation is. For proof whereof, I will produce no other Teſtimony but ſuch as from Antiquity hath been judged worthy of credit among the Greeks ; laying open before their Eyes, that they, who have ſlanderouſly and falſly written againſt us, are convicted by their own mouthes. I M will alſo endeavour to ſhew the Cauſes why very few Grecians have made mention of us in their Hiſtories : and moreover, I will make it known, that they who have written concerning us, have been ignorant either really or feignedly of the Truth of thoſe things which they have reported.

The cauſes that moved him to write this Book,

~~First of all therefore, I do not a little marvel at thoſe who in reference to matters of~~ Antiquity ſuppoſe that the Truth ought only to be gathered from the Greeks ; and that they alone can juſtly claim the honour and knowledge of faithful writing ; whereas they neither vouchſafe either us, or any others the credit of Truth in that we ſet down ; although I am able to prove, that all things have fallen out quite contrary. For which cauſe it behoveth us not to look to mens various opinions, but to examine that which is N right, and gather the ſame by the Effects. For whatſoever is ſet down by the Greeks is new, and of late memory, and hath been brought to execution in a manner but yeſterday : I mean the Foundations of Cities, the Inventions of Arts, and the Eſtabliſh-ment of Laws, and their Application to write Hiſtory with ſome care.

All things among the Greeks are modern, but ſuch things as were done among the Egyptians, Chaldees, and Phœnicians, are of happy memory and venerable antiquity.

But for the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians, without mentioning us, they themſelves confeſs, the memory of their Writings is moſt ancient and credible. For all theſe Nations dwell in ſuch Countries as are not ſubject to the corruption of Air ; and have carefully provided, that none of thoſe things that have been done by them ſhould ſleep in obſcurity, but be kept in memory in publick Writings of the learnedſt men : whereas innumerable corruptions have crept in among the Greeks, by which the memo- O ry of things paſt is defaced.

A But alwayes thoſe who have eſtabliſhed new eſtates, have ſuppoſed in their own behalf, that whoſoever was the Founder of theirs, he was the firſt of the world. Yet they have had the knowledge of Letters very late, and have attained the ſame with very great difficulty.

Innumerable corruptions invaded Greece.

For they that ſpeak of the moſt ancient uſe of the ſame, boaſt that they received the knowledge thereof from the Phœnicians and from Cadmus. Notwithſtanding, there is not any one of them that can ſhew any Record of that time, either in their Temple, or in their publick Regiſters: whereas there is ſtill great doubt and queſtion, whether thoſe Letters were in uſe during their time, who managed the ſiege of Troy.

The Phœnicians and Cadmus the firſt Inventers of Letters.

B And indeed, their opinion, who affirm that they were ignorant of the uſe of thoſe Letters which are at preſent allowed and accuſtomed among us, is not to be refuted. For it is moſt manifeſt, that there is not any Writing extant among the Greeks, that is more ancient than Homers Poem, which, as is moſt manifeſt, was compos'd ſince the time of the ſiege of Troy. And yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his Poem in writing, but that it was compoſed of divers Songs, and only ſung by roat; by which means it came to paſs, that there are ſo many contradictions in the ſame.

Among the Greeks there is not any writing more ancient than Homers Poem.

And as for thoſe who have undertaken to write Hiſtories among them, I mean Cadmus the Mileſian, and Acuſilaus the Argive, and others, They lived but very little time before the paſſage of the Perſians into Greece.

C Furthermore, they who among the Greeks were the firſt that introduced Philoſophy and the knowledge of Celeſtial and Divine things, namely Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, all of them confeſs with one accord, that they were inſtructed by the Egyptians and Chaldees; and they publiſhed ſome few writings, which are ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient among the Greeks, and it is hardly believed alſo that they were written by them. What reaſon therefore have the Greeks to be ſo proud, as if there were none, but themſelves only, who knew the affaires of Antiquity, and could exactly write the truth thereof? Or who cannot eaſily conjecture by their own Writers themſelves, that their Writings were founded only upon hearſay and ſuppoſition, and that they followed only vain conjectures? Hence it commeth to paſs, that in their Books D they cavil and reprove one another, and make no conſcience to maintain and write contradictions about one and the ſame thing.

But it may be ſaid, that I ſhould oblige my ſelf to a fruitleſs labour, if I ſhould go about to inform thoſe who are better experienced than my ſelf, in how many points Helicanus differeth from Acuſilaus touching the Genealogies; in how many places Acuſilaus hath corrected Herodotus; or how Ephorus hath proved that Helicauus was a liar in the greater part of that which he hath recited. Ephorus hath been reproved by Timeus; and in general, all have taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timeus vouchſafed to accord with Antiochus, or Philiſtus or Callias, in the Hiſtories of Sicily. Neither do thoſe, who have writ the Hiſtories of Athens and Argos, agree better together.

E What need I reckon up the differences amongſt thoſe, who in particular have treated of Cities, or of leſs matters, ſince in the Relation of the Perſian War, and the exploits performed therein, thoſe of greateſt authority are moſt at odds? Thucydides is accuſed by ſome for a liar in divers places, notwithſtanding that he ſeemeth to have written the Hiſtory of his time moſt exactly. But the Cauſes of this diſcord are divers, as they who ſhall narrowly pry into them ſhall find. For my own part, thoſe two which I ſhall here ſet down, in my opinion are of greateſt weight.

Thucydides writ a moſt exact Hiſtory of his time.

The cauſes of diſcord among the Jews.

The firſt, and in my judgement the chiefeſt is, that amongſt the Greeks from the beginning they have not been induſtrious to keep publick Regiſters of ſuch matters as happened in any time or place: which hath occaſion'd them to erre, and given thoſe a F priviledge to lye, who afterwards went about to write any thing of ſuch matters as were acted long ſince. Neither are only other People of Greece to be accuſed of negligence for not making account of ſuch Regiſters; but amongſt the Athenians alſo (who glory in the antiquity of their Country, and who are moſt exerciſed in Sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is ſaid, that the moſt ancient and publick Writings which they have are thoſe Capital Laws which were ſet down by their Law-maker Draco, who lived but a little time before Piſiſtratus the Tyrant.

What need we ſpeak of the Arcadians, who vaunt themſelves of their Antiquity? for who knows not, that they have learned the uſe of Letters long after thoſe before mentioned? Whereas therefore there was not any Writing publiſhed before that time, which G might inſtruct thoſe that would learn, or reprehend thoſe that diſguiſ'd the Truth: from thence it is, that ſo many differences have happened amongſt Hiſtorians.

Another cauſe of their diſcord, recorded by the Grecian hiſtorigraphers

A ſecond cauſe is, for that they, who addicted themſelves to compoſe Hiſtories, did H not buſie themſelves about the inquiſition of the Truth (notwithſtanding that all of them ordinarily promiſed no leſs) but they laboured to ſhew how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole ſtudy thereon, as the only means whereby they hoped to obtain reputation above others.

Some of them therefore applyed their Stile to Fables; others by flattering praiſes thought to curry favour with Kings and Cities. The reſt employed their ſtudies to accuſe and calumniate the works of other Writers, in hope to build their own reputation upon the ruine of others.

The ſign of a true Hiſtory.

In effect they have followed that courſe in compoſing their Hiſtory, that was every way different from the true nature thereof. For the aſſured ſign of a perfect and true I Hiſtory is, when all men accord in ſetting down the ſame thing: whereas theſe Writers have endeavoured to make men believe that they were the trueſt of all the reſt, becauſe they contradicted them. We ought indeed to grant the Superiority to the Grecians in all that concerneth Eloquence and the Ornament of Language, but not in that which appertaineth to Antiquity or Truth of Hiſtory, and eſpecially in what concerneth the truth of ancient Hiſtory, and what hath paſſed in every Country.

Wherefore as the Egyptians and Babylonians long ſince uſed all diligence in writing, becauſe their Prieſts were hereunto enjoyned, who did moſt curiouſly treat of all ſuch matters; the ſame alſo did the Chaldees amongſt the Babylonians, and the Phœnicians alſo (inhabiting amongſt the Greeks) taught them to uſe Regiſters both concerning publick K and private affairs, which becauſe all men confeſs, I will omit to ſpeak off.

I let paſs alſo to recount what care our Nation hath had of this point (no doubt greater than thoſe Nations above mentioned had) charging our High Prieſts and Prophets to execute this Office; which Cuſtom hath been obſerved even until this Age, and (if I may preſume ſo far) will be obſerved in all ſucceeding Ages, as by my enſuing diſcourſe I will endeavour to make manifeſt. For our Nation did not only depute this Office to the moſt virtuous and religious men amongſt them in the beginning, and to ſuch as were conſecrated to the Service of God; but they alſo provided to preſerve the Line and Deſcent of Prieſts from all impurity, and from being intermingled with others. For no man amongſt us can be a Prieſt, who is not born of a Woman deſcended from the ſame L Line. Neither in this caſe is any reſpect made either of Riches or Honours: but the party who claimeth the dignity of Prieſthood, muſt by many Witneſſes prove his Genealogy, and that he is deſcended from Prieſts.

A cuſtom which the Prieſts obſerved.

This Cuſtom is not only of force in Judea, but whereſoever elſe any of our Nation inhabit; as in Egypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the Prieſts in their Marriages have this reſpect, not to marry with any Woman that is not of their own Line; & they ſend to Jeruſalem the Name and Pedigree of the Woman whom they have married, and all the Teſtimony hereof which they can deduce from her Anceſtors.

The Prieſts amongſt the Jews are every one regiſtred, with the name of their Fathers and this cuſtom contiuued two thouſand years

Now if War moleſt our Nation (as often it hath in the time of Antiochus ſirnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the Great, Quintilius Varus, and eſpecially in this our Age) then M thoſe Prieſts who ſurvive, make new Genealogies and Pedigrees out of the ancient Regiſters for thoſe that remain of the Sacerdotal Race. And they marry none that have been Captives, for fear they may have had commerce with ſtrangers. What more evident token can there be of the Prieſts integrity, than that every Prieſt during the revolution of two thouſand years is Regiſtred together with the Names of their Fathers? and if any one do erre or falſifie any of the things before-ſaid, he is then interdicted from the Altar, and from exerciſing any Prieſtly function. So that in the Writings of ſuch men, all things muſt of neceſſity be true and as they ought to be; for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any diſſonance and diſagreement is found in their Writings. For N ſuch things as paſt in ancient times beyond the memory of men, were only written by our Prophets, who had the knowledge thereof by inſpiration from God himſelf: but other things of latter time are only recorded by thoſe who lived in the Age, wherein the things they writ of were done.

Two and twenty Books of holy Writ.

The Books amongſt us, containing the Hiſtories of all Ages, are neither infinite, nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in 22 Books, to which Books it is impiety to deny credit.

Five of theſe Books were written by Moſes, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, with ſuch notable events as hapned even from the beginning of the World til his death; which is little leſs than three thouſand years.

After the death of Moſes, till the time wherein Artaxerxes lived, who was King of the O Perſians, and Son to Xerxes, every one of the Prophets of our Nation wrote the Hiſtory of

A of his time wherein he lived, ſo that of theſe mens Writings we have thirteen Books: the four other Books, which make up the Number already mentioned, are known to contain holy Hymns made to the praiſe of God, and wholſome Precepts for mans life and converſation. All things which from Artaxerxes until our time have hapned, are alſo ſet down in writing: yet the Books wherein they are regiſtred, do not deſerve ſo much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certain ſucceſſion of Prophets in that Age. Moreover, it is evident, that to the former works, we give as great credit as to things which we our ſelves write; and notwithſtanding they have been ſo long written, yet in all that time no man durſt preſume either to alter or to blot out any thing therein contained. For all Jews even from their Cradle do believe theſe B Books to be ſacred and divine, and therefore give all credit poſſible unto them, yea, and would willingly ſuffer death, rather than do the contrary.

Many Captives of our Nation have been cruelly tormented, and divers ways put to death in open Theaters, only for that they would not commit any thing either in word or deed againſt their Laws, nor violate the writings of their fore-fathers. Now who amongſt the Greeks did ever ſuſtain the like? Nay, they are ſo far from doing it, that none can be found among them, who would ſuffer any loſs in his goods or fortunes, to preſerve all the writings of their Nation from deſtruction: and the reaſon hereof is, becauſe every one eſteemeth the verity of their Hiſtories to depend upon the will of the Writer. And this they do alſo concerning their moſt ancient Hiſtorians; and not C without cauſe: for they every day ſee men of their own times writing Hiſtories of matters long before paſt in former ages, wherein neither themſelves were preſent, neither yet do they vouchſafe to credit the writings of ſuch as were then eye-witneſſes thereof; yea, ſome among them have divulged Hiſtories of ſuch things, as of late befel our Nation, when themſelves never have been in the place where ſuch matters paſt as they writ of, nor have lived in any neighbour place, where they might have probable report how matters paſt, but only compiling a few broken ſtories, they moſt impudently arrogate to their patcht ſtuff the name of a Hiſtory.

The Jews and Grecians are compared together.

Some others have written of the Wars of the Jews.

I my ſelf have compoſed a moſt true Hiſtory of the laſt War, and of every particular thing there done, as well I might, having been preſent in all thoſe affairs. For I was D Captain of the Galileans amongſt our Nation, ſo long as any reſiſtance could be made againſt the Romans: and then it ſo fell out, that I was taken by the Romans, and being Priſoner to Titus and Veſpaſian, they cauſed me to be an eye-witneſs of all things that paſt. Firſt, In bonds and fretters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the Seige of Jeruſalem. So that nothing could then paſs whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Roman Army, I committed to writing all things with all poſſible diligence. My ſelf did only manage all matters diſcloſed to the Romans by ſuch as yielded themſelves, for that I only did perfectly underſtand them. Laſtly, Being at Rome, and having leiſure, after all buſineſs was paſt, I uſed the help of ſome Friends (for the skill of the Greek tongue) and ſo I publiſhed a E Hiſtory of all that had hapned in the foreſaid War: which Hiſtory of mine is ſo true, that I fear not to call Veſpaſian and Titus the chief Commanders in that War to witneſs for them. I firſt gave a Copy of that Book to them, and afterwards to many noble Romans, who alſo were preſent in the War. I ſold alſo many of them to our own Nation, to ſuch as underſtood the Greek language, amongſt whom were Julius, Archelaus, Herod, a Man of great vertue, and to the moſt worthy King Agrippa, who all do teſtify, that my Hiſtory containeth nothing but truth, and who would not have been ſilent, if either for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithſtanding all this, ſome ill diſpoſed Perſons endeavour to diſcredit my Hiſtory, as though they were diſputing pro and contra amongſt children in ſchools, never conſidering F that he who promiſeth other men a true Relation of things paſt, muſt either be privy to them by his own knowledg, as having been preſent in the affairs, or elſe have that which he ſpeaketh from other mens mouths, by report of thoſe who know them: both which I have done. For I gathered my other Books of Antiquity out of holy Scripture, being my ſelf a Prieſt, and skilful in our Law; and the Hiſtory of our War I have written, my ſelf being an Agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witneſs of the reſt; ſo that nothing was ſaid or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any one excuſe them from impudency and malice, who labour againſt me to prove my Relation falſe? Perhaps they alledge, that they have read the Commentaries of Veſpaſian and Titus, yet for all this, they were not preſent in any action, repugnant G to that, which my Hiſtory recounteth.

Joſeph was preſent in all the Wars of the Jews.

Joſeph writ the Hiſtory of the Jews wars being at Rome.

Some do derogate from Joſephs Hiſtory.

Two things which Joſeph intendeth.

The Jews care to bring up their Children. The ancient Jews had no need to traffick with the Grecians.

Thus (as I thought neceſſary) I have made a digreſſion, to ſhew how they are able to H perform their word, who diſcrediting my Hiſtory, promiſe to ſet down the truth in writing. I have alſo ſufficiently (as I think) demonſtrated, that the regiſtring of things is more ancient amongſt other Nations, than amongſt the Greeks. I will now firſt of all diſpute againſt thoſe, who labour to prove our Nation of no Antiquity, becauſe (as they ſay) no Greek Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring forth proof and teſtimony of the Antiquity thereof out of other Writers; and ſo I will ſhew that their malice, who ſeek to diſcredit our Nation. Firſt therefore, our Nation neither inhabiteth a Country bordering upon the Sea, nor are we delighted in merchandiſe, nor for this cauſe wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our Cities lye far I from the Sea, in a moſt fertile ſoil, which we cultivate with all induſtry; and our whole endeavours are how to get food for our Children, and to keep our country Laws, and to leave to our poſterity the knowledg of Piety, in which work we think all our Age ought to be employed. Beſide all this, we have a form of living, different from all other Nations. All which concurring together, we had no need to traffick with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phœnicians do, who give themſelves to bargaining and merchandiſe only for the covetouſneſs of money. Neither were our Anceſtors delighted in thefts and robberies; nor did our Fathers make war upon any Nation, for deſire of larger poſſeſſions: notwithſtanding our Country was furniſhed with many thouſands of ſtrong warlike men. Wherefore the Phœnicians ſailing to the Greeks to traffick with them, they were thus made known to them; and by them the Egyptians, K and all other Nations, ſailing upon the Seas, brought Merchandiſe into Greece. The Medes alſo and Perſians were known to them, after ſuch time as they reigned over Aſia, and the Perſians brought war even into Europe.

The Romans were lately known to the Greeks. Certain Hiſtoriographers report Spain to be only one City.

Moreover, the Greeks knew the Thracians, becauſe they were their Neighbours; and the Scythians, by ſailing to Pontus; and finally, all that were diſpoſed to write, knew all the Nations bordering either upon the Eaſtern and Weſtern Seas; but ſuch as dwelt far from the Sea-coaſt, were long time unknown; as alſo appears in Europe: For neither Thucidides nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, make any mention of Rome; notwithſtanding that ſo long ſince it was mighty, and made ſo great Wars: becauſe it was but lately that the Greeks heard of it. Yea, their moſt exact Writers, L and particularly Ephorus, were ſo ignorant of the French and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to be a People only denominated from one City, wherein they inhabited; whereas the whole World now knoweth them to inhabit a vaſt Country, and a great part of the Weſtern World. Likewiſe the ſaid Greek Writers relate the manners of the foreſaid People to be ſuch, as neither are, nor were ever uſed among them. And the only cauſe why they were ignorant of the Truth, was the diſtance of place; and theſe Writers would ſeem to tell ſomething, which others of former time had not ſpoken of. No marvel therefore though our Nation was unknown, and none of them in their Writings made any mention of us, being both ſo far from the Sea, and living after a different manner. M Arguments to prove the Jews of more antiquity than the Greeks.

Manethon an Egyptian Writer.

Suppoſe therefore I ſhould deny the Greeks to be of any antiquity; and to prove my aſſertion ſhould conclude their Nation to be modern, becauſe our Hiſtories make no mention of them; would they not laugh at this reaſon, and uſe the Teſtimony of their neighbour Nations to prove their Antiquity? I therefore may argue in like manner, and uſe the Teſtimony of the Egyptians and Phœnicians, whoſe Record the Greeks cannot deny. For all the Egyptians in general are our Enemies; and among the Phœnicians they eſpecially of Tyre; which I cannot juſtly ſay of the Chaldees, who having been Princes over our Nation, and becauſe of their affinity and alliance with our Countrymen, have in their Chronicles made mention of the Jews. When I have proved what I now aver, and refeld the ſlanderous reports againſt us, I will then alſo N ſhew who amongſt the Greeks have ſpoken of us, that ſo the Greeks may alſo be deprived of this ſhift and refuge, to excuſe their malicious lies falſly forged againſt our Nation. And firſt of all I will begin with the Writings of the Egyptians, who, as they well know, do nothing at all favour us. Manethon, an Egyptian born, ſkilful in the Greek tongue, as by his Works appears (for he writ in Greek) compiling a Hiſtory of the Cuſtoms and Religion of his fore-Fathers, collected (as himſelf reporteth) out of the Egyptian holy Writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus of falſhood, through ignorance in the affairs of the Egyptians. This Manethon, in his ſecond Book of the Egyptian Cuſtoms, ſaith thus (I will ſet down his own Words, becauſe I uſe them as a witneſs.) We have a King (ſaith he) named Timæus, in whoſe Reign God being angry with us, contrary to all O expectation, an obſcure People took courage, came from the Eaſt, and pitching their Tents in

A in our Country, over-ran it, and no man reſiſted them; and committing our Princes to bonds, they burnt our Cities, and deſtroyed the Temples of our gods, and behaved themſelves moſt cruelly againſt the Inhabitans, killing many of them, and making Slaves of the reſt, with their Wives and Children: Finally, they choſe a King of their own, and gave him the Government of our Country; his Name was Saltis, who coming to Memphis made the higher and lower Provinces Tributaries, leaving Garriſons in the ſtrong holds, and fortifying certain places in the Eaſt: And weighing with himſelf that the Aſſyrians were more potent than he, and would in probability invade his Country, he found out in this Province an ancient City called Saite fit for his purpoſe, as being ſcituate on the Eaſt ſide of the River Bubaſtis, which by an ancient Divine was called Avaris; he repaired this City, compaſſed it B with vaſt Walls, and put a Gariſon in it of two hundred thouſand armed men. Saltis made this incurſion in harveſt time, to the intent that he might both pay his Souldiers, and be a terrour unto other people, and after he had reigued nineteen years, he died.

Saltis ſubdued the Egyptians.

After him ſucceeded another King called Bæon, who reigned four and forty years: next to him Aphinas, who reighned thirty ſix years and ſeven months: then Aphoſis, who reigned threeſcore and one years: and then Iandas, who reigned fifty years and one month: after them alſo reigned Alſis nine and forty years and two months; and theſe ſix were the firſt Kings amongſt them, ever deſtroying and warring upon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguiſh their race. This Nation was called Hicſos, which ſignifieth Kings ſhepherds: For Hic in the ſacred Tongue, ſignifieth a King, and Sos C a Shepherd or ſhepherds, according to the common ſpeech, and Hicſos is a compound word. Some ſay theſe People were Arabians: but in other Copies I find that Hicſos is not interpreted Kings ſhepherds, but ſhepherds that were Captives: For Hic, and Hac alſo when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue ſignify a Captive; and this latter expoſition ſeemeth to me to be the trueſt, for it is more agreeable with the Hiſtory. Wherefore Manethon reporteth theſe foreſaid Kings and Shepherds to have ruled Egypt five hundred and eleven years: and after theſe the King of Thebes, and the King of the Reſidue of Egypt, uniting their forces, invaded the ſaid Shepherds, had great and long Wars with them, and that the ſaid Shepherds were overcome by the King Aliſfragumthoſis; that then they loſt all Egypt which had been in their power, & that they D were ſhut up in a place called Avarus containing ten thouſand acres of ground, which, as Manethon reporteth, theſe Shepherds environed round about with a huge Wall, to the end that their whole Proviſion might be within their Fortifications, and the prey, which they got, in a condition to be defended. That Themoſis Son of the ſaid Aliſfragumthoſis endeavoured by force to ſubdue them, and for this cauſe beſieged them with four hundred and 80000 men: That at laſt deſpairing to take them by force, he capitulated with them that they ſhould ſafely depart out of Egypt whither they would; and that they upon theſe Conditions together with all their Families and Goods, and Cattel, departed out of Egypt into the Wilderneſs, and ſo into Syria, being in number two hundred and forty thouſand, and that fearing the puiſſance of the Aſſyrians, E who at that time reigned in Aſia, they builded a City in the Country now called Judæa, which they made ſo large, that it might receive them all, and this City they called Jeruſalem. Further, the ſaid Manethon in another Book of the Egyptian Affairs ſaith, That in the holy Writings, he findeth the fereſaid Shepherds called Captives, wherein he ſaith true. For our Anceſtors were wont to feed cattel, and ſo leading a paſtoral life, were called Shepherds, neither are they unjuſtly called Captives: For our fore-Father Joſeph told the King of Egypt that he was a Captive; and long time after called his Brethren into Egypt by the Kings Command; but we will hereafter examin this point more ſtraitly: I will now cite the Teſtimony of the Egyptians concerning this point, and relate the words of Manethon touching the time when this befel, who ſaith F as followeth.

Kings Shepherds.

After that the Nation of Shepherds were departed out of Egypt unto Jeruſalem, King Themoſis who drave them out of the Land, reigned twenty five years aud four months, and then died: And his Son Chebron ſucceeded him, who reigned thirteen years, and after him Amenophis twenty years and ſeven months, next, his Siſter Ameſſes one and twenty years and nine months, then reigned Mephios twelve years and nine months, and Mephamuthoſis twenty five years and ten months, Themoſis nine years and eight months, Amenophis thirty years and ten months, Orus thirty ſix years and five months, after him his Daughter Achemcheres, twelve years and one month, and the Brother of Rathotis nine years, Achencheres twelve years and five months, another Achencheres G twelve years and three months, Armais four years and one month, Armeſis one year and four months, Armeſeſmiamus threeſcore and six years and two months, Amenophis Sethoſis King of Egypt, made his Brother Armais Governour of his Country.

nineteen years and ſix months. Moreover, that Sethoſis having prepar'd a huge Army both of foot and horſe, and a Navy at Sea, left the Government of Egypt unto his Brother Armais, inveſting him with ſoveraign Authority, only he forbad him to wear the Crown, and to oppreſs the Queen who was Mother to his Children, commanding him alſo to abſtain from his Concubines. After which Sethoſis himſelf went to Cyprus and Phœnicia againſt the Aſſyrians and Medes, and ſubdued them, partly by the ſword, partly by the fear of his power and greatneſs: and being tranſported with his ſucceſs, he advanced againſt the Eaſtern Country, and deſtroyed with fire and ſword the Cities and Provinces of that place: and ſpending much time in theſe Wars, his brother Armais whom he left in Egypt, did without fear commit all that he forbad him to do: for he oppreſſed the Queen violently, and daily lay with the reſt of the Kings Concubines, and being counſelled by his friends he put a Crown upon his head, and rebelled againſt his Brother: of which he who was then Chief of the Egyptians holy Cuſtoms, ſent Letters unto Sethoſis, containing all that had happened, and how Armais had rebelled againſt him: That Sethoſis returning to Peluſia, recovered his own Kingdom, and by his name it was called Egypt: for Manethon writeth that this Sethoſis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais, Danaus.

Whereupon Egypt took his Name.

Thus far Manethon; from whom it is evident by computation of the foreſaid times, that our Nation was delivered out of Egypt three hundred ninety and three years before Danaus, and inhabited this Country of Judea ſo long before Danaus came unto Argos: notwithſtanding the Inhabitants of Argos boaſt their City is moſt ancient. Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for us out of the Egyptian letters: firſt, That we came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their Country again, and that ſo long ago, as it was almoſt a thouſand years before the Trojan Wars. Touching thoſe things which Manethon profeſſeth himſelf to have gathered elſewhere than out of the Writings of the Egyptians, who wrote down whatever was reported, I will ſhew, with how little reaſon they are alleadged. For I will once again leave theſe, and refer to the teſtimony of the Phenicians concerning our Nation. The Tyrians therefore have Chronicles of very great Antiquity, which they have kept with all dilligence, concerning that which hath been done among them, and indeed they are worthy of memory.

Manethon ſheweth the Jews coming into Egypt and their departure.

Solomon built a Temple in Jeruſalem 143 years and eight months, before the Tyrians built Carthage. The friendſhip of the Tyrian King and King Solomon. Problems of Hircanus and Solomon.

Amongſt theſe Records it is written, That King Solomon built a Temple at Jeruſalem, a hundred fourty three years and eight moneths before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they have regiſtred the building of our Temple; for Hircanus King of the Tyrians was our King Solomons friend, obliged to him for his fathers ſake, who for this cauſe alſo of his own liberality gave Solomon a hundred and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, cut down the noble Wood called Libanus, and beſtowed upon him, to make the roof of the Temple: for which bounty Solomon returned him many great Preſents, and among the reſt a Country of Galilee named Zabulon: But Solomons Wiſdom was the chief cauſe of this Kings Friendſhip towards him. For they ſent Problems one to the other to be anſwered, and Solomon in his Anſwers appeared moſt witty, as alſo he did in many things elſe; and even until this day, many of the Epiſtles ſent one to another are kept among the Tyrians. But not depending wholly upon the Authority of the Tyrians, I will prove by the Teſtimony of Dius (a man who by common conſent hath faithfully written the Phenician Hiſtory) who writeth as followeth.

After the death of Abibalus, Hircanus his ſon reigned in his ſtead, who encreaſed the number of his Eaſtern Cities, and inlarged Jeruſalem; he alſo joyned the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, ſcituate in an Iſland, unto it (filling up the water with Earth) and adorned it with gold.

After this aſcending into Libanus, he cut down the Wood to build Temples; and the King of Jeruſalem named Solomon ſent unto him certain Riddles to be expounded, and he again the like unto him, covenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers Riddles, ſhould pay unto the other a ſum of money, and that Hircanus, confeſſing he could not expound Solomons Riddles, did pay unto him much money.

Laſtly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the ſaid Riddles, and writ more unto Solomon, which if Solomon could not interpret, he ſhould pay unto Hircanus a ſum of money; and this teſtimony Dius beareth us concerning the foreſaid matter.

The teſtimony of Menander the Epheſian.

But I will now recount the words of Menander an Epheſian, who regiſtred the Acts of all Kings both at home and abroad, endeavouring to make a true Hiſtory out of the Writings of every Country, This man writing of the Tyrian Kings, and coming to Hiramus,

The Genealogy of King Hyramus.

A Hyramus, ſaith thus of him , Abibalus dying there ſucceeded in the Kingdom his Son Hyramus, who lived 34 years : and this King with a Rampire conjoyned Eurichorus, and erected there a Pillar of Gold in Jupiter's Temple, and went into the Woods, and cut down the Cedars of Libanus to make coverings for the Temples ; with which (pulling down the old) he erected new, and dedicated Temples to Hercules and Aſtartus ; But that to Hercules in the Month of Peritius, and the other to Aſtartus, when he with an Army went againſt the Tyrians, who pai'd him no tribute, and when he had ſubdued them, he returned again.

At this time lived Abdemonus a ſervant unto the King, whoſe buſineſs it was to expound the parables, which King Solomon of Jeruſalem ſent unto King Hyramus : and B how long it was from this Kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hyramus, his Son Beleaſtartus ſucceeded him, lived forty and three years, and reigned ſeven : after him his Son Abdaſtartus, who lived twenty years, and reigned nine ; but this King was treacherouſly ſlain by the four Sons of his Nurſe, the eldeſt of which reigned twelve years. Next ſucceeded Aſtartus the Son of Beleaſtartus, who lived fifty and four years, and reigned twelve : after him his Brother Aſtarimus, who lived fifty and four years, and Governed nine: then he was ſlain of his brother Phelletes, who reigned eight months, and lived fifty years, and was ſlain by a Prieſt of Aſtarta named Ithobalus, who lived threeſcore and eight, and reigned thirty two years : he was ſucceeded by his Son Badezorus, who lived forty five C years, and reigned ſix years : to him ſucceeded his Son Mettinus, who lived thirty two years, and reigned nine : After him Pigmalion who lived fifty ſix years, and reigned forty : in the ſeventh year of whoſe reign, his Siſter Dido builded a City in Africa, and named it Carthage : ſo that from the time of King Hyramus unto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundred fifty five years, and two Months : and for as much as the Temple of Jeruſalem was built in the twelfth year of Hyramus his reign, the computation of the time ſince that year until the building of Carthage, is a hundred forty three years and eight Monhts. What need we more beſide this teſtimony of the Phœnicians ? The truth is now ſufficiently made manifeſt ; for our Anceſtors muſt needs have come into this Country we inhabit before ſuch time as they D built a Temple in it, as I have alſo prov'd in my Books of Antiquity, collected out of our Holy Scripture.

Carthge built in Africk by Dido Pigmalion's Siſter.

Beroſus the Hiſtoriographer a Chaldean.

I will now ſpeak of that which the Chaldees writ of us in their Hiſtories, which do much agree in all other Matters with thoſe of our Nation. And firſt let Beroſus be my witneſs, who was a Chaldean born, a man famous and known unto all that love learning, for he in the Greek tongue writ Aſtronomy, and the Philoſophy of the Chaldeans. Beroſus imitating the moſt ancient Hiſtories writeth of the Deluge, & how mankind was therein extinguiſhed, and he in all things imitateth Moſes. He alſo ſpeaketh of the Ark wherein our forefather was preſerved, and affirmeth that it was carried into the tops of the Mountains in Armenia : after this he proſecuteth the Genealogy of all that reigned from Noe, until Nabulaſſarus King of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. He like- E wiſe ſetteth down how long every one reigned, and in proſecuting the deeds of this King, he recounteth how he ſent his Son Nabuchodonoſor into Egypt, & our Country with great power, who finding them in rebellion ſubdued them, and burnt the Temple at Jeruſalem, and ſo departed, carrying with him all our Nation into Babylon : whereupon our City was deſolate ſeventy years, until the reign of Cyrus King of the Perſians. Moreover he affirmeth, that this Babylonian kept in ſubjection Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, exacting more of them than ever any King of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Beroſus muſt needs be to this effect: Nabulaſſarus his Father hearing that his Subſtitute in Egypt, Cœloſyria, and Phœnicia had rebelled, he him- F ſelf not being able to take ſuch pains, committed his Affairs unto his his Son Nabuchodonoſor, gave him a part of his Army (for that he was in the flower of his age) and ſent him againſt him : Nabuchodonoſor fighting with the ſaid Subſtitute, overthrew him, and ſubdued the Country which of old belonged unto them, and at the ſame time his Father Nabulaſſarus fell ſick in Babylon, and died, having Reigned twenty nine years. But Nabuchodonoſor long after underſtanding his Fathers death, diſpoſed of Egypt and other Provinces as he thought good, and taking the Captives of Judea, Phœnicia, and the Syrians that lived in Egypt, he committed them to certain of his friends, to be brought after with his Carriages and Army to Babylon ; and ſo he himſelf, accompanied with a very few took his jorney to Babylon, through the Deſart : being G arriv'd he found the Chaldees ruled all, and that their Nobility reſerved the Kingdom for Nabulaſſarus Father to Nabuchodonoſor the King of Babylon and Chaldea.

Nabuchodonoſor conquered the rebels.

Nabuchodonoſor builded a Palace.

for him: he was made King, and commanded Houſes to be built for the Captives that H were coming in the moſt convenient places of Babylon, and with the ſpoil he beautified the Temple of Belus and other places moſt richly, and built a new City without the Wall of the old: and providing leſt hereafter the Enemies might turn the River and ſo have acceſs unto the City, he invironed the inner City with three ſeveral Walls, and the outmoſt City likewiſe, the Walls whereof were made of Brick, but the Walls of the inner City were of Brick and Bitumen: this done, he builded moſt ſumptuous Gates which might have become Temples: and moreover, neer unto his Fathers Palace he builded another far greater and more coſtly than they; the beauty and coſtlineſs whereof were hard, and perhaps tedious, to expreſs: Yet this we will ſay, and it is conſiderable, that this rich and incredibly beautiful Palace was builded in fifteen days: in I it he erected Rocks of Stone like Mountains beſet with all ſorts of Trees; he made a famous Mount, and ſupported it with Pillars: for his Wife, having been brought up in the Country of the Medes, deſired to have a proſpect into the fields and Mountains according to their way.

The teſtimony of the Phœnicians touching the Jews Antiquity.

This he relateth of the forementioned King, and many things more in his Book of the affairs of the Chaldeans, wherein he reproveth the Greek Writers, who falſly affirme that Semiramis the Aſſyrian Queen built Babylon, and that they falſly report thoſe wonderful works about Babylon to have been by her made and finiſhed. We muſt needs think, that the Chaldean Hiſtory is true, ſeeing it agreeth with that of the Phœnicians, which Beroſus writ of the King of Babylon, who ſubverted both Phœnicia and K all Syria: with them alſo accordeth Philoſtratus in his Hiſtory of the ſiege of Tyria; and Megaſthenes alſo in his fourth Book of the affairs of India; where he laboureth to prove, that the ſaid King excelled Hercules in ſtrength and valour, affirming that he ſubdued the greateſt part of Africk and Spain, and that the Temple of Jeruſalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again re-edified by Cyrus; and we may prove it out of Beroſus, who in his third book ſaith as followeth: Nabuchodonoſor, having begun the third Wall, fell ſick and died, when he had reigned forty three years, and his Son Evelmeradochus ſucceed him, who for his iniquity and licencioſneſs was treacherouſly ſlain by his Siſters Husband, named Nirigliſſoroor, after he had reigned two years. He being dead, the Traytor Nirigliſſoroor uſurped the Kingdom, and reigned four years, L whoſe Son then a child was made King, called by name Laboroſardochus, and he reigned nine months; who for corruptneſs of his manners was ſlain by his own Friends: after whoſe death they who ſlew him conſulting together made one Nabonidus, a Babylonian, King. At this time the Walls of Brick and Bitumen about the River of Babylon were built. In the eighth year of this Kings reign Cyrus, coming with an Army out of Perſia, conquered all Aſia, and came with his Forces againſt Babylon; but the King of Babylon having notice of his coming, levied an Army, advanc'd againſt him, and gaue him Battel; but being overcome, he with a very few of his men was forced to flye into Borſippa. Cyrus now beſieged Babylon, and purpoſed to deſtroy the outward Walls thereof; but finding them too ſtrong and impenetrable, he returned to Borſippa to beſiege Nabonidus the King of Babylon, who was fled thither. But Naboni- M dus not abiding the event of War, yielded himſelf unto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him, and gave him a Territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: ſo Nabonidus led the reſt of his life in that Province. This Hiſtory agreeth with ours; for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonoſor in the eighteenth year of of his reign deſtroyed our Temple, and that it ſo remained threeſcore and ten years: alſo that in the ſecond year of King Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid again, and was finiſhed and re-edified in the ſecond year of King Darius's reign, This done, I will alſo relate the Hiſtories of the Phœnicians, to re-inforce what we ſay: for they make their computation after this manner. In the reign of King Ithobalus Nabuchodonoſor beſieged Tyre thirteen years, after whom Baal reigned ten years, next him Judges were appoint- N ed, towit, they that follow Ecnibalus the Son of Balachus judged two Months; Chelbis the Son of Abdæus ten Months; Abbarus the High-Prieſt three Months; Mytomus and Geraſtus Sons of Abdilimos judged ſix years; after whom Balatorus reigned one year; and after his death the Tyrians called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him King, and he reigned four years: and he then dying, they ſent alſo to Babylon for his Brother Iromus, who reigned twenty years, in whoſe reign Cyrus obtained the Perſian Empire: ſo that this whole time is fifty four years and three Months: for Nabuchodonoſor began to beſiege Tyre in the ſeventh year of his reign, and in the fourteenth year of King Iromus his reign Cyrus was made Emperour of Perſia. O

Where-

A Wherefore both the Chaldean and Tyrian Hiſtoriographers agree with us concerning our Temple. So that the Antiquity of our Nation above mentioned is now made manifeſt, and without all controverſie. And that which is already alledged to this end, may be ſufficient for them, who are not purpoſely contentious: To ſatisfie, therefore, ſuch as believe the Writings of other Nations of little or no Authority, and will give credit to nothing but what is tranſmitted from the Greeks, I ſhall produce Teſtimony from ſuch of them as have been acquainted, and writ of our Laws.

The Chaldees and Tyrians agree with the Jews Hiſtory.

Pythagoras, a Samian born (a perſon of great Antiquity and Reputation above the reſt of the Philoſophers for Wiſdom and Holineſs of Life) was not only converſant in our Laws, but obſerved them in many things, as is teſtified particularly by Hermippus B an eminent and exact Hiſtorian, who in his firſt Book of Pythagoras gives us an account, That a Crotonian called Calliphon (a great friend of Pythagoras) being dead, his Soul accompanied Pythagoras night and day, inculcating and purſuing him with Inſtructions, and among the reſt, That he would be careful how he paſſed by a place where his Aſs had ſtumbled; That he would drink none but pure Water, and that he would be cautious of ſpeaking ill of any Body, following therein the Cuſtomes of the Greeks and Thracians: and what that Author ſaid is moſt true, for it is certain, a great part of his Phyloſophy was deduc'd from the Laws of the Jews.

Hermippus's writings and teſtimony of Pythagoras.

Our Nation in times paſt was well known to divers Cities, ſo that many of them do now obſerve our Cuſtoms, and others eſteem them worth the imitation, as Theophraſtus C doth witneſs in his Book intituled De Legibus: for he ſaith that the Tyrian Laws forbid to ſwear by any ſtrange God, and amongſt theſe prohibited Oaths, he reckoneth the Oath called Corban, which is uſed only amongſt the Jews, and in our Language ſignifieth the Gift of God.

Theophraſtus. Corban the gift of God.

Herodotus of Halicarnaſſus knew our Nation alſo, and in a manner maketh mention of it: for ſpeaking of the Colchians, he ſaith thus in his ſecond Book: The Colchians, Egyptians and Æthiopians only amongſt all other Nations did uſe Circumciſion of old: for the Phœnicians and Syrians living in Paleſtina do confeſs themſelves to have learned this Cuſtom from the Egyptians; and the Syrians living near unto Thermodoontes and the River Parthenius, and their Neighbours the Macronians, are reported but lately to have learnt it of D the Colchians: and theſe are they only that uſe Circumciſion, and they do like unto the Egyptians; but I am not able to ſay whether the Egyptians or Æthiopians learn'd it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Paleſtina did uſe Circumciſion, and it is manifeſt, that of all the Inhabitants of Paleſtina the Jews only uſe it, which he knowing writeth ſo of them.

Herodotus the Halicarnaſſian touching the Jews Circumciſion.

Cherilus alſo an ancient Poet maketh mention of our Nation, and affirmeth that our Country-men warred under Xerxes againſt the Greeks, and enumerating the Nations which followed him, at laſt he ſpeakes thus of ours, Cherilus an ancient Poet his Teſtimony of the Jews.

E A People ſtrange followed this Royal throng,
Their- Language was th'unknown Phœnician tongue:
In th'hills of Solymus their dwelling was,
Near to a Lake for greatneſs which did paſs:
Their heads were ſhav'd, and for their heads attire,
They wore an Horſe-skin dried at the fire.

It is evident (as I think) that he ſpeaketh of the Jews: for the Mountains of Solymus are in our Country, and that Lake alſo called Aſphaltites, which is the greateſt and vaſteſt of all Lakes that are in Syria; And that the Jews were not known only of the Greeks, F but alſo admired of them is eaſie to prove not out of the obſcureſt Writers, but by the Teſtimony of their wiſeſt Philoſophers: For Clearchus, diſciple unto Ariſtotle, and the beſt amongſt all the Peripateticks, in his firſt Book De ſomno, brings in a certain Dialogue his Maſter Ariſtotle diſcourſing of a Jew that he knew, in this manner.

Aſphaltites the Lake.

The teſtimony of Clearchus diſciple of Ariſtotle touching the Jews.

It would be too long to entertain you about the whole Nation, I ſhall content my ſelf to give you a hint only of this mans admirable wiſdom. Hyperochides told him, He could not do them a greater favour. I will begin then (ſaid Ariſtotle) according to the Rules of Rhetorick with what relates to his Nation. He was born a Jew in the lower Syria, whoſe preſent Inhabitants are deſcended from the Philoſophers of the Indians, who among them are called Calani, but among the Syrians, Jews; as living in Jewry, whoſe principal City is G called Jeruſalem, and very hard to be pronounced. This man entertained many ſtrangers, who came from the higher Country down unto the Sea-Coaſt, was very eloquent and couragious.

As I was travelling one time with ſome af my Diſciples in Aſia, this perſon made us a viſit, H and in his Conference with us we found that much was to be learned by his Converſation.

Thus far Ariſtotle in Clearchus, recounting moreover at large his admirable abſtinence and chaſtity: Of whom they that are deſirous to know more, are recommended to Clearchus; for I am loth to write any thing ſuperfluous. So now it is evident how Clearchus, by the way of digreſſion ſpeaking of another matter, maketh mention of us.

Hecateus Abderita brought up with King Alexander.

But Hecateus Abderita a Philoſopher, and one brought up with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomeus Lagus, did not only briefly make mention of us, but alſo writ a whole Book of our Nation the Jews, out of which I will briefly note ſome few points that occur; but firſt I will ſhew of what Antiquity he is: For he recordeth the I time when Ptolomeus near unto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which happened the eleventh year after Alexanders death, in the hundred and ſeventeenth Olympiad, as Caſtor writeth: who ſpeaking of this Olympiad ſaith, That in this time Ptolomeus Lagus overcame Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliorcetes: and all men confeſs, that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad: So that it is evident that at the time wherein Alexander lived, our Nation flouriſhed.

And Hecatæus ſaith, That after that battel fought at Gaza, Ptolomeus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the Clemency of Ptolomeus, followed him into Egypt, and converſed with him: amongſt the which one was called Ezekias, K the Jews high Prieſt, a man about threeſcore and ſix years old, and of chief notice and dignity of all his Nation, and moſt prudent and eloquent, one alſo who in all affairs had more experience than any man elſe. He likewiſe reporteth, That the number of the Jews Prieſts, who received their tenths, and rule all in general, is a thouſand and five hundred or thereabout.

A thouſand and five hundred Prieſts receive the Jews tenths.

And again making mention of the ſame Ezekias, he ſaith, This man being in reputation and honour, and converſing with us, by the help of ſome about him, declared all things wherein we and this Nation differ, and ſhewed unto us the place of his dwelling, and the manner of his converſation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecateus ſheweth what manner of People we are, and how religious in our L Laws, and how that we will rather endure all torments and death it ſelf, than violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing ſo to do: adding moreover, That being much hated of our neighbours, and having ſuffered all Contumelies both at the hands of the Perſian Kings, and their Officers, yet we could not be forced to change our Opinions, but that we are continually exerciſed to give a reaſon thereof. He alſo recordeth an example of the conſtancy of our mindes: For Alexander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purpoſing to re-edifie the Temple of Bell, commanded all his Souldiers to carry Timber to the building thereof; and the Jews only diſobeying his command, endured many ſtripes and torments, till ſuch time as the King freed them from it: And they (ſaith he) returning to their own Country, deſtroyed all the Temples and Altars that they found there, and M ſome of them were by the Officers therefore puniſhed, others eſcaped free: Adding, That we may juſtly be admired for theſe things, and that our Nation is exceeding populous. He ſhews likewiſe that many of us were carried Captives into Babylon, and there ſerved the Perſians. And that many more were diſperſt into Egypt after Alexanders death for a tumult begun in Syria.

The Jews conſtancy againſt Alexander.

The largeneſs of Jury. Fifty ſtounds are almoſt ſix German miles.

He alſo recordeth the greatneſs of our Country, and the fertility thereof. They inhabit (ſaith he) a Country that hath almoſt thirty hundred thouſand acres of moſt fertile ground; (for Jury is of this largeneſs) and that in times paſt we inhabited a large and very great City, which was very populous; he ſpeaketh alſo of the building of our Temple in this manner: The Jews have many other Towns and Villages in every Province; but they have N one moſt ſtrong City, the compaſs of whoſe Walls is fifty furlongs, and in it inhabit a hundred and fifty thouſand men; and this City they called Jeruſalem; in the midſt thereof is a building of ſtone with four Porches a hundred cubits about, it hath alſo double Gates; wherein is a four-ſquared Altar made of unhewn ſtones joyned together; and it is twenty cubits ſquare every way, and ten cubits high; and about it is a moſt huge Building, wherein is an Altar and a Candleſtick both of gold, weighing two Talents; and there is kept a continual Light night and day which never goeth forth: But in it there is no Image, nor Grove about it, as about other Temples. It is inhabited by the Prieſts, who ſpend their time there in great continence both night and day, abſteining from all manner of Wine.

The Prieſts do dwell in the Temple and drink no Wine.

The ſame Author gives an account of an action performed by one of our Nation, who O was a Souldier under ſome of Alexanders ſucceſſors; and the Authors words are theſe, A As I went (ſaith he) to the Red Sea, a certain Jew, one of the Horſemen that conducted us, named Moſollamus, a couragious man, and one who excelled all Archers elſe, both Greeks and other Nations ; This Jew (every one haſting on forward of his journey, and being will'd by a Soothſayer to ſtand) asked, for what cauſe the multitude ſtayed and went not forward : Preſently the Soothſayer ſhewed him a Bird, which he diligently viewed, and told the Jew that if that Bird did ſtand ſtill in the place, then it was expedient for them to ſtand, and if the Bird did mount up and flie, that then they ought to march on forward ; but if it ſlew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wiſdom to retire. The Jew hereat was ſilent, yet drawing his Bow he ſhot an arrow and killed the Bird ; whereat the Soothſayer and certain others were offended, and curſed him. But he taking the unhappy Bird in his hand B ſaid unto them ; Are ye ſo mad as to think that this Bird, not having the foreſight to preſerve her ſelf from this death, is able to direct us in the ſucceſs of our journey? Had this Bird foreknown future events, ſhe would have eſchewed this place for dread that Moſollamus a Jew ſhould have ſtrucken her with an arrow. But we will now leave the teſtimony of Hecateus, for every one that liſt may read his Book, and there underſtand it more at large.

Agatarchides his Teſtimony of the Jews.

I will not omit the Teſtimony of Agatarchides, a man of no evil in his own opinion, yet indeed one who hath uſed detraction to our Nation. This man ſpeaking of Stratonice, how leaving her husband Demetrius, ſhe came into Syria, and how Seleucus would not marry her as ſhe hoped (who having an Army at Babylon, warred againſt Antioch, and had taken the City) and that ſhe fled into Selucia, whereas ſhe might have made a C ſpeedier eſcape by water (but was forewarned to the contrary in a ſleep) and that ſhe was there taken and died, &c. Agatarchides, having uſed this Preface, and inveighed againſt Stratonices ſuperſtition, uſeth an Examyle of our Nation on this manner : The People that are called Jews, inhabit a moſt ſtrong City, which they call Jeruſalem ; theſe People are wont to reſt upon the ſeventh day, and do neither bear Arms, nor till their Grounds, nor any other buſineſs on that day, but their cuſtom is to remain in their Temple, and there with ſtretched out armes continue in prayer till night. And ſo upon a time, they perſevering in that foolery, whilſt they ſhould have defended their City, Ptolomeus Lagus entred it with a great Army, and greatly tyrannized over them, inſtructing them by experience, that the ſolemnity appointed by their Law, was prejudicial unto them. Such like Churches as this did teach D them and all Nations elſe to flie unto dreams, which their Law teacheth, neither conſidering that humane policy cannot prevail againſt that which muſt neceſſarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reports of us to be ridiculous ; but they that weigh it with indifferency, ſhall perceive that it is greater commendation to our Nation, who rather ſuffer their Country and ſafety to be loſt and endamaged, than to violate the Laws of God.

The Jews Sabbath.

Why certain Writers omit to ſpeak of the Jews.

I think I am thus able to ſhew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our Nation, not for that they knew us not, but for envy. For Jerom writ a Book of the Succeſſors in the ſame time that Hecateus lived, and being a friend to King Antigonus, and Preſident of Syria, never mentioneth us in all his Hiſtory ; notwithſtanding he was brought up almoſt in our Country ; whereas Hecateus writ an entire Book of us ; ſo E different are the minds of men : for one of them thought our Nation worthy to be diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindred from ſpeaking the truth : yet the Hiſtories of the Chaldeans, Egyptians and Phœnicians, may ſuffice to prove our Antiquity, together with the Greek Writers : for beſides thoſe before mentioned, Theophraſtus alſo, Theodotus, Manaſeas, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemeus, Conon, Zepyrion, and many others no doubt (for I have not peruſed all mens Books) have manifeſtly teſtified of us. For many of the foreſaid men were blinded with errors, as not having read our holy Scriptures ; yet they all joyntly teſtify our Antiquity, for which I now alledge them. Truly Demetrius Phalerius, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reaſon it is they ſhould be born withal : for they were not ſo skilful F as to teach our Writings with ſo much curioſity.

The laſt part, againſt certain detractions and ſlanders.

Being come thus far, it reſteth that I now preſent one point more, whereof I made mention in the beginning of this Book , to wit, that I declare the detractions and ſlanderous reports of divers concerning our Nation to be falſe and void of truth ; and I will uſe the Teſtimony of thoſe Writers who record, that the lying Hiſtorigraphers, at ſuch time as they committed to writing the foreſaid detractions, did alſo even againſt themſelves regiſter ſuch like ſlanders, as they did againſt us. And I doubt not but that all thoſe, who are converſant in Hiſtories, can teſtifie, that the like hath been done by moſt Writers upon private hatred, or ſuch like reſpects : For ſome of the Gentiles have attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the moſt renowned Cities, and to defame G the manners of their Inhabitants. Thus did Theopompus to Athens, and Ptolicrates to Lacedemon ; and the Author that writ Tripoliticum (for it was not Theopompus as ſome ſuppoſe) uſed the City Thebes very hardly. And Timeus in his Hiſtories of the foreſaid H places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the moſt excellent that are, in ſomething or other; ſome for envy and malice, others, that their fond babling may make them famous, and ſo indeed it doth among fools, that are known to have no ſound judgment, but wiſe men will condemn their malice.

The cauſe of malice between the Egyptians and Jews.

To be ſhort, this is the cauſe of ſo many ſlanderous reports forged againſt our Nation: ſome to gratify the Egyptians have attempted to deprave the truth, and ſo have neither reported the Circumſtances concerning our Anceſtors coming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they have had many cauſes of malice and envy urging them hereto: And chiefly for that our Progenitors in their Country waxed mighty, I and ſo departing to their own Country were made happy and fortunate.

The Egyptians Idolatry.

Secondly, the diverſity of our two Religions made great diſcord and variance amongſt us, our Religion ſo far excelling theirs in piety, as the divine Eſſence GOD excelleth unreaſonable Creatures: (for they commonly worſhip ſuch bruit beaſts for gods, and every one worſhipeth divers kinds.) vain and fooliſh men, who from the beginning have been accuſtomed to ſuch ſottiſh opinions, as would not permit them to imitate us in our divine Religion, and conformable to Reaſon: and yet ſeeing many favour and follow our Religion, they were hereby incited to ſuch hatred, that to derogate from us, they feared not to falſify their own ancient Records, not conſidering that in ſo doing they were led through a blind paſſion, to write againſt themſelves. Moreover, I will prove K all I have ſpoken to be true, by one mans words, whom a little before (being a famous Hiſtorigrapher) we have produced as a witneſs of our Antiquity.

Manethon an Egyptian Hiſtoriographer.

Manethons fabulous reports of the Egyptian Lepers.

Manethon therefore (who confeſſeth himſelf to have gathered the Egyptian Hiſtory out of their holy Writings) having by way of Preface recounted how our Predeceſſours came into Egypt with many thouſands, and there conquered the Inhabitants, afterward confeſſeth, that loſing all their Poſſeſſions in Egypt, they got the Country which is now called Jury, and in it builded a City named Jeruſalem, and a Temple; and thus far he followeth ancient Writers. And then uſurping to himſelf authority to lye, proteſting that he will inſert into his Hiſtory certain reports divulged amongſt the common People, he reports things of the Jews altogether incredible, L intending to mix with our Nation the Lepers of the Egyptians, and other ſick people of other Countries, who (as he ſaith) being abominable to the Egyptians, fled to us; affirming alſo that they had a King named Amenophis, which being a feigned name, he durſt not preſume to ſpeak determinately of the time of his Reign; though he ſpeaketh exactly of the Reign of all other Kings. Hereupon alſo he adds certain Fables, forgetting himſelf that he reported the Shepherds departure out of Egypt to Jeruſalem, to have been almoſt five hundred and eighteen years before his time: For it was in the fourth year of the reign of Thermoſis, when they departed out of Egypt, and his Succeſſors continued in the Government three hundred and ninety three years, till the time of the two Brethren M Sethon and Hermeus, the firſt of which was called Egyptian, the other Danaus, who ſupplanted Sethon, and reign'd alone fifty nine years, after whom his eldeſt Son Ramſes reign'd threeſcore and ſix years. Having therefore confeſſed our Anceſtors to have departed out of Egypt ſo many years before; at length he addeth Amenophis to the number of their Kings. He tells us that the ſaid Prince (as Orus one of his Predeceſſours had done before) had an ardent deſire to have a ſight of the Gods, and that a Prieſt of their Law named Amenophis (as he was) and Son of Papius, whoſe wiſdom in prediction was ſo admirable, that he ſeem'd to be inſpir'd, told him his deſire ſhould be accompliſhed, if he would drive out of his Kingdom all ſuch as were Leprous, and any other way infected. The King according to his directions aſſembled N of them to the number of Eighty thouſand, and ſent them with other Egyptians to work in the Quarries on the Eaſt-ſide of the Nile, among whom there were certain Prieſts who were likewiſe infected.

Manethon adds, That the Prieſt Amenophis, apprehending leſt the Gods ſhould puniſh him for having given the King that counſel, & the King for having followed it ſo ſtrictly, and finding by divination that to recompence the ſufferings of thoſe poor People, they would conquer and govern in Egypt for the ſpace of thirteen years, he was afraid to tell it to the King himſelf, but having committed his Revelation to writing, he kill'd himſelf to the great terrour of the King.

This done, he ſpeaks as followeth: So the King being requeſted for their quietneſs and defence to aſſign them a City to inhabit, appointed unto them a deſolate place O called Avaris, which had been the Shepherds City (this City the ancient Divines call Triphon)

A Triphon) but they, having got the poſſeſſion of this place fit for Rebellion, made choice of one of the Prieſts of Heliopolis to be their Captain, whoſe name was Oſarſiphus, and bound themſelves with an Oath to obey him in all things: and he preſently made a Law, That they ſhould neither worſhip the Gods of the Egyptians, nor abſtain from thoſe Beaſts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as they judged to be their Friends, and of their own perſwaſion.

Oſarſiphus Captain of Avaris.

Having ordained this and many things elſe contrary to the Religion of the Egyptians, he commanded them to build a Wall about the City, to fortify it well, and prepare to make War upon King Amenophis. Having taken ſome others of the Prieſthood into his Cabal, they ſent Ambaſſadors to Jeruſalem to the Shepherds, which were driven out of Egypt by King Themuſis, to inform them of what had paſſed, and requeſt B them to a Confederacy, and that uniting their forces, they might jointly make War upon Egypt. He promiſed to receive them into Avaris (which had been of old the poſſeſſion of their Anceſſors) and ſupply them with what ever was neceſſary, and aſſured them their opportunity was ſuch, that without great difficulty they might conquer that Kingdome. That the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem embracing the motion, raiſ'd an Army, and advanced to Avaris with 200000 men.

The war of the baniſhed againſt the Egyptians.

That Amenophis, King of Egypt, hearing of their invaſion, and remembring what Amenophis the Son of the Prieſt Papius had left in writing, was in great fear, and preſently aſſembling together the people of Egypt, and conſulting with the Princes of his Country, he ſent away all the holy Beaſts, and all that the Prieſts eſteemed, giving C them eſpecial charge to hide their Idols: He put his Son Sethon (who alſo by his Father Rampſes was called Rhameſſes) and but five years old, into the cuſtody of a Friend of his; and then with three hundred thouſand fighting men, he marched againſt his Enemies, but would not fight with them, leſt he ſhould fight againſt the pleaſure of the Gods; and ſo he retired himſelf to Memphis; and taking Apis and the reſt of the Egyptian Gods along with him, he, and his Troops of Egyptians took Ship, and fled into Æthiopia. That the King of Æthiopia having a great honour for him, received him very nobly, aſſigning his People Towns and Villages for their reſidence and ſubſiſtence during their thirteen years exile, keeping conſtant Guards upon his Frontiers, for the D ſecurity of Amenophis. That in the mean time the Auxiliaries from Jeruſalem did much more miſchief, than thoſe who had invited them. That there was nothing of cruelty or impiety that they ſcrupled or omitted. That not contenting themſelves with the demoliſhment and burning of Towns, they added ſacriledg to their ſins, brake their Idols in pieces, ſlew their conſecrated Cattel, forced the Prieſts and Prophets to kill their own Beaſts, and drave them naked out of their Country when they had done. To which he adds, That they had for their Law-giver a Prieſt of Heliopolis call'd Oſarſiph, from Oſiris, which was the God that was worſhipped in that City, and that that Prieſt having chang'd his Religion, chang'd likewiſe his Name, and called himſelf Moſes.

The Egyptian King fled into Ethiopia, and was by the Ethiopian King courteouſly entertained.

Oſarſiphus was afterwards call'd Moſes.

E Thus the Egyptians report of the Jews, and many things elſe, which for brevity ſake I omit. Manethon further writeth, that afterward Amenophis the King came with a great power out o Æthiopia, and his Son Rampſes with him accompanied with a great Army; and that joyning Battel with the Shepherds and polluted perſons, he gave them an overthrow, and purſued them unto the Borders of Syria. And this is Manethon's report; but foraſmuch as he writeth old wives tales, dotages, and lies, I will by manifeſt reaſon convince him, Firſt diſtinguiſhing that whereof I am to ſpeak hereafter. He of his own accord granteth and confeſſeth, that our Anceſtors at firſt were not Egyptians, but Strangers that came thither from another place, and conquered the Country, and again departed from thence. I will now out of his own F writings endeavour to ſhew, that the weak people of Egypt were not mixed with us, and that Moſes, who indeed was our Conductor out of Egypt, and lived many ages before, was no Leper.

Manethon's lies are confuted.

He therefore firſt of all ſetteth down a ridiculous cauſe of this forementioned fiction, which was, that King Amenophis was deſirous to ſee the Gods: What Gods do you think? He could already ſee the Ox, the Goat, the Crocodile, and the Munky, but the God of Heaven how could he ſee? And why had Amenophis this deſire? Forſooth becauſe a certain King one of his Predeceſſors had ſeen them; he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the ſight of them, needed no new device to accompliſh his deſire: But perhaps the foreſaid Prophet was a Man of great G wiſdom, by whom the King had confidence to attain his deſire; if ſo he had been, how chanceth it that he was ſo unwiſe not to perceive, that it was an impoſſible thing to ſa-tisfie the Kings deſire ? for that which he promiſed was not brought to paſs. Or what H reaſon moved him to think that the Gods were inviſible, becauſe of the Leproſie and infirmity of the people? The Gods are offended with mens impieties, not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it poſſible that at one inſtant ſo many thouſand Lepers and infirm perſons ſhould be gathered together ? or wherein did not the King obey the Prophet ? He commanded that the Lepers and infirme perſons ſhould be exiled the Country, and the King did not baniſh them the Country, but ſent them to hew Stones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purpoſed to cleanſe the Country from Lepers.

Laſtly, he ſaith, that the Prophet foreſeeing that Egypt was to ſuffer, and fearing the wrath of the Gods, killed himſelf, and left his mind in a Book written unto the King.
How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at firſt foreſee his own death, and ſo oppoſe I himſelf to the Kings deſire to ſee the Gods? Or wherefore did he fear ſuch calamities as were not to fall in his life ? or what great miſery hanged over his head, which might worthily cauſe him to kill himſelf to prevent it ? But let us hear that which followeth, more ſottiſh than all the reſt.

Manethon's words repeated.

The King (ſaith he) hearing this, and ſtriken with fear, did not however expel thoſe Lepers he ought to have exiled , but at their requeſt gave them (as he ſaith) a City, wherein before time the Shepherds did inhabit, called Avaris ; whereinto being come, they made a Prieſt of Heliopolis their Prince; who deviſed Laws for them : commanding them neither to adore the Gods, nor to abſtain from offering violence to ſuch beaſts as amongſt the Egyptians are ſacred, but that they ſhould kill and K ſpoil all things, that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep thoſe Laws, and that they fortified Avaris to fight againſt the King. Adding moreover, that he ſent to Jeruſalem for help, promiſing to yield Avaris unto them, being a place ſometime poſſeſſed by their Anceſtors, and that they from that place leading their Forces, might eaſily ſubdue all Egypt
: he then ſaith, that the Egyptian King Amenophis came againſt them with 300000; and yet, for that he would not ſtrive againſt the decree of the Gods, he fled into Æthiopia, and carried with him Apis and other Holy Beaſts, and that the inhabitants of Jeruſalem coming down invaded the Land, fired the Towns and Cities, ſlew their Nobles, uſed all ſorts of cruelty poſſible, and that the Prieſts name, who made Laws and Statutes for L them to live under, was one of Heliopolis, Oſarſiphus by name, deriving the ſame from Oſiris, the God of Heliopolis : and that this man, changing his name, was afterward called Moſes.

Moreover, that Amenophis, having lived in baniſhment thirty years, came with a ſtrong power out of Æthiopia, and fighting with the ſhepherds and polluted, he ſlew many of them, and put the reſt to flight, purſuing them unto the borders of Syria.
Manethon remembreth not, that here again he telleth a very unlikely tale : for although the Lepers and impotent perſons were offended with the King for appointing them to hew Stones ; yet it is to be thought that receiving their own deſire at the Kings hands afterwards, to wit, a City to dwell in, that then they again became the Kings well-willers.
Suppoſing alſo their hatred ſtill continued towards him, they rather ſhould have M attempted revenge by treaſon againſt him, than towards all their Nation, wherein they had many dear friends and alliance. And although they had purpoſed to War againſt theſe men, yet would they not have been ſo impious as to have rebelled againſt the Gods, and to have violated the Laws where in they were brought up.

A confutation of Manethon's words alledged.

We have therefore cauſe to thank Manethon, in that he cleareth us, and affirmeth his own country-men (yea a Prieſt) to be authors of this impiety, and that by oath they bound themſelves ſo to do. What can be more extravigant than to ſay that neither any of their country-men nor kinſmen rebelled with them, but that the poor diſtreſſed people were glad to ſend to Jeruſalem for ſuccour ? But what ſociety or friendſhip had they with the people of Jeruſalem, of whom they came to demand help? N Why , they were more their Enemies than the reſt of their Country-men, and were all of quite different manners from us. They of Jeruſalem (as he ſaith) preſently did as they were willed to do, in hope that, according as they were promiſed, they might ſubdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that Country out of which they had been driven by force ? had they lived in poverty or miſery, perhaps they might have been induced to have done it : but ſeeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich City, and poſſeſſed a goodly fertile ſoil far better than Egypt, what might move them thereto ?
What reaſon had they, at the requeſt of their ancient Enemies (and they alſo ſo diſeaſed, as they of Jeruſalem could not abide their own friends among them that had the O like diſeaſes) to thruſt themſelves into danger ? they could not fore-know the Kings

A intent to fly ; as for Manethon himſelf he ſaith, he met them at Peluſia with 300000 men.
And this they that went to War well knew. But what reaſon had they to conjecture that the Kings mind would change, and he flye ? As to what he charges upon the Auxiliaries from Jeruſalem, that they ſeized upon the ſtores, and ſecur'd all the Corn that was in Egypt, which brought great diſtreſs and exigence upon the people , hath he forgot, that conſidering they entred as Enemies, they are not thereby to be reproached, Rapacity being unavoidable among Souldiers, eſpecially if Strangers and Conquerours ? Hath he forgot he ſaid before that the Lepers had done the ſame formerly, and had to that purpoſe obliged themſelves by oath ? and that he aſſured us, that ſome years after Amenophis repelled the Jeruſalem-Confederats, and Lepers, ſlew B many of them, drove them out of thoſe parts, and purſued them to the very borders of Syria ; as if Egypt was a Country ſo eaſily conquer'd, or that thoſe who were then in poſſeſſion meerly by conqueſt, would not (upon the firſt alarme of Amenophis's march have block'd up the paſſages, and ſecured the Avenues on that ſide towards Æthiope, which they might eaſily have done, and drawn together what forces they had pleaſed to defend them ? And is it not as improbable when he ſays, that that Prince made not only a great ſlaughter among them, but purſued them with his whole army (croſs the Deſart) to the very frontiers of Syria ? whereas it is notoriouſly known that Deſart is ſo dry, that there being no Water to be found in the whole tract, it is almoſt impoſſible for an entire Army to march through it, though there was no Enemy to give them C impediment. To conclude thereſore, our Nation neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confeſſeth, neither was mingled with the diſeaſed of that Country : for it is probable, that many of thoſe ſick people periſhed in the Stone-works, many in the great fight and battel, and the reſt of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he ſpeaks of Moſes.

The Epilogue that the Jews came not of the Egyptians.

The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a divine perſon, and one to be admired, and they commit great impiety in labouring to challenge him for their Countryman, ſaying, that he was a Prieſt of Heliopolis, baniſhed with the reſt for leproſie.
For he is recorded to have lived five hundred and eighteen years before this time, and to have guided our Anceſtors out of Egypt, into that Country wherein we now inhabit : D and his own words teſtifie his body to have been clean from that Diſeaſe of Leproſie : for he commandeth all Lepers to be expelled out of the Towns and Villages, and to live apart by themſelves ; To be cloathed in different Garments, and declared that whoſoever touched them, or came under the ſame roof with them, ſhould be accounted unclean. And if a Leper happened to be cured of that diſeaſe, he appointed certain purifications, cleanſings, and baths of fortunate waters, and all his hair ſhould be ſhaved off ; and that then after many and ſundry Sacrifices, he ſhould be admitted into the holy City. Certainly, had he been viſited with that infection and calamity himſelf, he would ſurely have been more gentle, and merciful to ſuch as ſhould have been E afflicted with that Diſeaſe.

An anſwer to Manethons ſlanders touching Moſes.

Moſes was not a Leper.

He did not only make theſe ſevere Laws againſt Lepers, but he alſo interdicted all that wanted any joynt or parcel of the body, from being Prieſts, or exerciſing any office at the Alter : yea he alſo appointed, that if any Prieſt ſhould have any of theſe defects betide him after he was a Prieſt, that then he ſhould be deprived of the dignity, How can it then be probable, that to his own prejudice and diſcredit he would have enacted ſuch Laws ? And as to what he ſays about changing his name Oſarſiph into Moſes, it is as incredible as the reſt, there being no analogy between them, the name of Moſes importing preſervation from the Waters for Moy among the Egyptians ſignifies Water : and now I ſuppoſe I have made it apparent, that Manethon, whilſt he kept himſelf F to the writings of the ancients, did not err much : but when he left them, he forſook the truth, and fell upon ridiculous ſtories, which he either invented himſelf, or beleived out of prejudice to our nation. I now think it not amiſs to examine a little the words of Chæremon, who profeſſing himſelf to write the Egyptian Hiſtory, maketh mention of the ſame King Amenophis his Son Rhamſes, as Manethon doth, and reporteth that the Goddeſs Iſis appeared to Amenophis in his ſleep, checking him for that her Temple was deſtroyed, and that Phiritiphantes, a holy Scribe, told the King, that if he would expel all polluted and unclean perſons out of Egypt, that then he ſhould not be any more terrified with theſe night-viſions. Moreover, that hereupon making ſearch for all ſick and diſeaſed perſons, he baniſhed them out of his Land, to the number of 250000. And that their Captains were called Moſes and Joſeph, holy Scribes, G alſo that theſe Egyptians names were ſo, that Moſes was named Tiſithes ; and Joſeph, Peteſephus : and that they came to Peluſium, where they found 380000 left there by Moſes took his name of Moy, which in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth Water.

Againſt Chæremon the Hiſtoriographer.

Amenobpis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt : alſo they all entring into H a league together, ſuddenly invaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Æthiopia, leaving his wife great with child, who hiding her ſelf in caves and dens, did bring forth a child whom they called Meſſenes, who afterward drove the Jews into Syria, being in number 200000, and this done, he recalled his Father Amenophis out of Æthiopia. And thus Chæremon ſaith.

Meſſenes Son of Amenophis.

But I imagine, that which I have already ſaid, to be ſufficient to declare the vanity of both theſe Writers. For if that which they report were true, it were impoſſible that they ſhould ſo much differ : but they labour to deviſe lyes, and write nothing agreeable to other mens writings. For Manethon feigneth, that the cauſe of the baniſhment of the Lepers was the Kings deſire to ſee the Gods ; and Chæremon ſaith, that it was for I that Iſis after appeared unto him in his ſleep. Manethon alſo ſaith, that Amenophis gave the King that counſel ſo to cleanſe the Country ; and Chæremon ſaith, that he that counſelled the King was called Phiritiphantes. Nor do they agree better in their numbers : Manethon reports them 80000 the other 250000. Manethon ſays theſe Lepers were ſent directly to the Quarries to work there in the ſquaring of Stone, and that afterwards Avaris was given them for a Quarter, where having begun their War, they ſent Embaſſadors to Jeruſalem to get that City into Confederacy. Chæremon tells us on the other ſide that when they were forced out of Egypt, they found at Peluſium 380000 men whom Amenophis had repulſed ; that joyning with them they returned againe into Egypt, and compelled Amenophis to fly into Æthiopia. But that which is moſt obſer- K vable is, that an Author, that was ſo exact in the Story of the apparition of Iſis, ſhould forget to let us know from whence this great Army of 380000 did come, whether they were Egyptians, or Strangers, and for what reaſon Amenophis refuſed to admit them. Moreover, Chæremon feigneth a dream of the Lepers and Iſis, and reporteth that Joſeph together with Moſes was expelled, whereas Joſeph lived four ages before Moſes, every age containing at leaſt a hundred and ſeventy years. Rameſſes alſo, Amenophis Son, according to Manethons Hiſtory, being a young man fled into Æthiopia, and was baniſhed with his Father, and afterwards aſſiſted him in the Wars : whereas Chæremon reporteth that he was born in a Cave after his Fathers departure, and that he getting the victory, did drive the Jews into Syria, who were in number two hundred thouſand. L O felicity in lying! for he neither told what Nation thoſe three hundred and fourſcore thouſand were: nor yet how a hundred and fourſcore thouſand of them periſhed, neither were they ſlain in the fight, or fled unto Rameſſes : and which is moſt to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Jews, or whether he attribute this name unto the two hundred and fifty thouſand Lepers, or unto the three hundred and fourſcore thouſand which were at Peluſium.

Manethon's & Chæremon's hiſtory compared together.

The difference between Manethon's and Chæremon's Hiſtory.

But it is folly to oppoſe my ſelf againſt them, who have ſufficiently contradicted themſelves : for had other men controlled their Writings, they had been the more to be born withal. Lyſimachus was another of the ſame Stamp, and one that not only ſeconds but ſurpaſſes them in their Lyes, in ſo much that we need no more than the M extravigance of his Story to prove his hatred to our Nation. He tells us that in the reign of Bocchor King of Egypt, the Jews that were Leprous or otherwiſe infected, reſorted in ſuch numbers to the Temples to beg the charity of the people, that they communicated their diſtempers to the Egyptians. Bocchor conſulted the Oracle of Ammon, and received this anſwer, that he ſhould purifie the Temples, and ſend into the deſart all thoſe ſick and infectious people, upon whom the Sun could ſhine no longer without regret, and that by ſo doing the Earth ſhould recover its primitive fertility. That hereupon the ſaid Prince by advice of his Prieſts aſſembled all thoſe diſeaſed perſons, delivered them into the hands of certain Souldiers, who lap'd ſome of them in lead, and threw them into the Sea, conducting the reſt into the wilderneſs, and leaving N them there to be deſtroyed by Famine. That in that diſtreſs the poor people conſulted together, made great fires, kept ſtrong Guards all night, and faſted very ſolemnly thereby to make their Gods more propitious ; and that a certain perſon called Moſes adviſed them to remove the next day, and march on till they found better quarters ; to truſt no man ; to give no man good Counſel that ask'd them ; to ruine the Temples and Altars where ever they came ; and that this Counſel having been approved, they paſſed the Wilderneſs, and after much trouble and frequent diſtreſſes, arrived in a Country that was inhabited, where they gave the firſt inſtances of their crulelty by abuſing the Natives, and robbing their Temples ; in which courſe they continued, till they came at length to Judea, where they built a City, and called it Jsroſula (which is O as much as to ſay the ſpoil of holy things): but that growing afterwards more Potent, Lyſimachus is reproved for lying.

According to Lyſimachus, the ſcabbed and Leprous Jews were to be conveighed into the Wilderneſs, and caſt into the Sea.

A they changed that name (as too infamous) and called it Jeruſalem, and themſelves inhabitants of Jeruſalem.

This ſellow ſound not that King, which the two former ſpeak of, but he joyned a more new name, and leaving the Dream and the Prophet, goeth to Ammon for an anſwer touching the ſcabbed and Lepers; he ſaith, that a multitude was gathered together at the Temples; but he leaveth it uncertain, whether the Jews only were infected with this Diſeaſe; for he ſaith the people of the Jews; or whether they were ſtrangers and ſuch as were born in that Country. If they were Jews, why doeſt thou call them Egyptians? If they were ſtrangers, why doſt thou not tell of whence they were? Or how came it to paſs, the King having drowned ſo many of them in the Sea, and left
B the reſt in the Wilderneſs, that ſtill ſo many ſhould be left? how did they paſs the Wilderneſs, and get the Country we now inhabit, and build a City and a Temple famous through all parts of the World? Thou ſhouldeſt not only have told the name of our Law-maker, but alſo what Country-man he was, and of what Parents, and what moved him in his journey to make ſuch laws againſt the gods, and againſt men. For if they were Egyptians, they would not ſo eaſily have forgotten the Religion, wherein they were brought up: or of what place elſe ſoever they were, they had ſome laws or other, which they had been accuſtomed to keep. If they had vowed to have born no good will unto them by whom they were driven out of their Country, they had ſome juſt occaſion ſo to do: But to undertake War againſt all the World, and deprive them-
C ſelves of all friendſhip and help of mortal men, doth not ſhew their ſottiſhneſs ſo much, as the fooliſhneſs of him who belies them, who moſt impudently affirmeth, that their City took the name of Church-ſpoiling, and afterward changed it. For what cauſe forſooth did they change the name thereof? marry for that the former name was ignominious to their poſterity. But the Gentleman underdood not, that Jeruſalem ſignifieth otherwiſe in Hebrew, than in Greek: And therefore what ſhould I ſtand to inveigh againſt a lie ſo impudently told? But this book having been long enough, I will begin another, in which I ſhall endeavour to acquaint my ſelf of what I have undertaken.

Lyſimus his opinion confuted.

Nothing is to be ſaid againſt an impudent lye.

The SECOND BOOK OF THE ANTIQVITY of the JEVVS, H

Written by I

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

Againſt APPION of ALEXANDRIA,

And dedicated to EPAPHRODITUS. K

THrice honoured and beloved Epaphroditus, I have in my former Books, ſo far forth as I was warranted by truth, proved the Antiquity of our Nation out of the Writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldees, and Egyptians: And for the further confirmation thereof, I have produced the Teſtimony of divers Greek Authors. Furthermore, I have oppoſed my ſelf againſt Manethon, and Cheremon, and divers others. It remains now that I convince thoſe who defied me more particularly, and give an L Appion wrote ſomething very coldly.

anſwer to Appion, though indeed I am ſcarce ſatisfied that he deſerves it. For as touching part of what he hath written, it ſeemeth to be one & the ſame with that which the reſt have written; And as touching the reſt, it is very cold and barren. The greateſt part thereof is ſtuffed with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, ſhewing him to be a Man both looſe in condition, and turbulent in his life. And foraſmuch as divers men are ſo weak in their judgments, that they rather ſuffer themſelves to be won by theſe follies, than to be wrought upon by that which is written with better conſideration, vainly doting on detractions, and growing diſcontent to give ear to other mens well deſerved praiſes: I have thought it neceſſary to examine his Labours, the rather, for that he hath written againſt us, as if he intended to accuſe us before a M Tribunal, and convict us by publick trial. For I ſee that it is an ordinary courſe for the moſt part of men, to hug and take pleaſure, though perhaps he that beginneth to blame another man, is himſelf convicted and found guilty of thoſe defaults, which he imputeth and objecteth againſt his Adverſary.

The Diſcourſe of this Appion is ſo difficult and perplexed, that 'tis no eaſy matter to ~~underſtand what he means: For troubled and confuſ'd with the~~ incoherencies of his ſtories, ſometimes he relates the departure of our Anceſtors out of Egypt according to the deſcription of thoſe, whom I have confuted before. Sometimes he calumniates the Jews of Alexandria, and ſometimes condemnes the ceremonies of our Temple, and our whole Doctrine and Religion. N

Appion concerning Moſes and the Jews.

Now that our Predeceſſors have not taken their original out of Egypt, neither have been driven from thence for any infirmity, or deformity of their Bodies, or for any Wound, Ulcer, or Pollution, I ſuppoſe that I have not only ſufficiently proved, but alſo produced far more Arguments than was requiſite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Appion alledgeth: For in the third Book of his Egyptian Hiſtory, he writes thus: Moſes, as I have heard it from moſt ancient Egyptians, was born at Heliopolis, and being inſtructed in the faſhions of his Country, ſuch Prayers as were wont to be ſaid in open places and abroad, he cauſed to be ſaid in private within the City, and ordained that in praying they ſhould turn themſelves towards the riſing Sun, (for ſuch is the ſituation of the City Heliopolis) and inſtead of Obeliſques or Pyramides, O he erected certain Pillars, under which there were certain ingraven Baſons, on which the

A the ſhadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they ſtood being uncovered and in open air) they obſerved the ſame courſe that the Sun doth in the Firmament. See here what eloquence this learned Man uſed.

Appions fiction concerning the Temple and Moſes is refuted.

Now this lye of his needeth no words to refute it, ſeeing it is clearly refelled by the effects. For when Moſes firſt built that Tabernacle in honour of God, he had no ſuch intent, nor faſhioned any ſuch form, neither ordained his Succeſſours to do the like: And after this when as Solomon builded the Temple in Jeruſalem, he never thought of any ſuch curioſity as Appion forgeth. He ſaith that he hath been informed by thoſe of Antiquity, that Moſes was a Heliopolitan: for you muſt underſtand that Appion himſelf was young, and believed the relation of the aged ſort of his acquaintance, which B converſed familiarly with him; yet cannot this learned Grammarian juſtifie, where Homer was born, neither from what Country Pythagoras came, although in reſpect, they lived but yeſterday: And as touching Moſes, who lived ſo many ages, and ſo great a number of years before them, he decideth the matter ſo eaſily, and giveth credit to the reports of Antiquity ſo ſlightly, that it appeareth moſt manifeſt, that he is but a lyar. As touching the time wherein he ſaith that Moſes led away the Blind, Leprous, and Lame, this diligent Author accordeth very willingly with that which he himſelf hath ſaid. For Manethon ſaith, that the Jews departed out of Egypt about the Reign of Themoſis, three hundred ninety ſix years before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lyſimachus ſaith, that this thing happened during King Bocchorus time, that is to ſay, C one thouſand and ſeven hundred years before that time. Molon alſo and ſome others have alledged their Opinions. But Appion, who pretendeth to be a Man of more credit than the reſt, hath preciſely and exactly ſet down the time, averring that our departure was about the ſeventieth Olympiad: Nay more, in the firſt year thereof, wherein, as he ſaith, Carthage was builded by the Phœnicians. Now hath he purpoſely made mention of Carthage in this place, as an infallible argument of the truth of his Allegation, not conſidering that he draweth an argument againſt himſelf, by which himſelf may be convinced. For, if we may give credit to the Phœnician Chroniclers as touching this Colony, it appeareth by them, that King Hyram lived more than one hundred and fifty years before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I have D heretofore proved out of the words of the Phœnicians, who report that Hyram was in amity with Solomon, who builded the Temple of Jeruſalem; and that he furniſhed him with much Timber and other matter toward the finiſhing of that building. Now Solomon builded the Temple ſix hundred and twelve years after the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconſiderately reckoned the number of thoſe which were driven out of Egypt, in like manner as Lyſimachus had done, namely; of one hundred and ten thouſand men, he yielded a moſt admirable reaſon, and ſuch as may be eaſily believed: From whence he pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was derived. For (ſaith he) after they had travelled for the ſpace of ſix days, there grew certain inflammations in their Groins, by reaſon whereof they reſted on the ſeventh E day, being ſafely arrived in the Country which at this day is called Judæa, becauſe the Egyptians call Sabbatoſis an Ulcer that groweth about the Groin.

The computation of the time is different among the Hiſtoriographers.

The friendſhip between Hyram and Solomon, whereof we made mention in the firſt Book againſt Appion in the beginning.

The Egyptians do call a diſeaſe about the privy parts Sabbatoſit.

Can any man read theſe ſtories without laughter, or indeed indignation, to ſee a grave Author aver ſuch trifles with that impudence and Authority? How improbable is it, that 110000 men ſhould at one time be infected with the ſame diſeaſe? and if they were made up of blind, and lame, and other infirmities (as he affirms in another place) how could they have been able to have marched one day in a deſert? or how could they have been able to have fought, much leſs ſubdued the Nations that oppoſed them? Can it be naturally believed of ſo great a multitude? or can it without great abſurdity be imputed to accident? Yet Appion affirms, that theſe 110000 men arrived all of them F in Judæa; and that Moſes being yet upon the Mount Sinai (which in thoſe parts parts Egypt and Arabia) he continued there privately forty days; and when he came down, he delivered thoſe Laws to the Jews which are ſtill obſerv'd: Upon which I would be reſolved in two things; How it was poſſible for ſo great a number of men to croſs ſo vaſt a deſert in ſix days? and how he could ſubſiſt forty days in a place ſo wild and barren, that there was not ſo much as water to be found for his refreſhment?

Appions fiction of the ſix days journey is confuted.

His Etymologie of the word Sabbath is ſo idle and impertinent, it can proceed from nothing but ignorance and folly: for theſe words Sabbo and Sabbatum do greatly differ: Sabbatum in the Jews language, ſignifieth reſt from work: but Sabbo in the Egyptian tongue, betokeneth a Diſeaſe about the privy parts, as Appion ſaith. See here what G cavilling fictions this Egyptian Appion uſeth concerning Moſes, and our departure out of Egypt: wherein he counterfeiteth and coineth abſurdities unthought of by any others.

Appion denies his Country and Origin.

Shall we then wonder if he belie our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie himſelf? H for being born at Oaſis, a Town in Egypt, he forſweareth his Country and Nation, and counterfeiting himſelf to be an Alexandrian, ratifieth his Nations wickedneſs. No marvel then, though he tearm them Egyptians, whom he hated and railed againſt; for if he had not been perſwaded that the Egyptians were wicked baſe people, he would never have denied himſelf to be their Country-man: for ſuch as proudly boaſt of their famous Country, eſteem it a credit to bear the denomination thereof, and reprehend ſuch, as without juſt cauſe make themſelves of their Nation. Wherefore the Egyptians are one of theſe two ways affected towards us Jews, either they claim us to be their Country-men, as glorying in us and their Country; or elſe they and their Country being infamous, they deſire that we ſhould be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed I this worthy Appion ſeemeth ſo to inveigh againſt us, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for beſtowing their Cities upon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Jews at Alexandria, he as it were caſteth a bone between them, raileth not only on the Jews of that City, but on all whereſoever: and belieth both of them moſt impudently.

Appion raileth againſt the Jews, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians.

The Sea-coaſt of Alexandria.

But let us examine thoſe heinous and enormous matters (and as he ſaith) ſuch as are not to be ſuffered, of which he accuſeth the Alexandrian Jews. Coming (quoth he) out of Syria, they ſeated themſelves near the Sea coaſt in a place where, though the Sea came up, there was no Harbour.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Jews own Country was ſo alſo: yea herein Appion raileth againſt Alexandria, which K he maketh his own Country: For the Sea-coaſt is part of Alexandria, and, as all men judge, the beſt place to dwell in. Now if the Jews by force of Arms ſo vanquiſhed this place, that they could never ſince be driven out of it; it is no diſcredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gave them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great Priviledges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Appion would have ſaid, if the Jews had dwelt about Necropolis, their Tribes being even at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Appion have read the Epiſtles of King Alexander, and Ptolomeus Lagus, or others their Succeſſors Kings of Egypt, or ſeen the Pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containing the priviledges that Cæſar the Great granted unto the Jews: if (I ſay) he knew of theſe, and yet did preſume L to write the contrary, then he was partial and not to be believed, and if he was ignorant hereof, he was then unlearned and as incredible on the other ſide.

The Liberties and priviledges granted unto the Jews.

The like ignorance alſo diſcovereth he, where he wondereth that the Jews in Alexandria were called Alexandrians: For an entire Colony, though of different Nations, do all bear the name of their founder; and, that I may ſhun prolixity, the Jews of Antioch are called Antiochians; Seluceus the Founder having made them alſo Citizens: the like may be ſaid of the Jews of Epheſus, and of the other of Ionia, who by the Kings Gifts enjoy the ſame priviledges with the reſt of the Citizens.

The Romans alſo of their Clemency have granted the name of their Nation, which is no ſmall gift, not only to private perſons, but to great Nations in general. M

To be ſhort, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes and Sabines are called Romans; or if Appion will take away this denomination of the City wherein men inhabit, let him ceaſe to call himſelf an Alexandrian; for he being born in the heart of Egypt, can in no wiſe be an Alexandrian if the priviledge of the City be taken away from him, as he would have it from us.

And the Lords of the whole World, the Romans, have amongſt all other Nations only prohibited the Egyptians from having the priviledges of any City: and ſo this Gentleman being himſelf incapable of dignity, endeavoureth likewiſe to hinder them from it who have true right unto it.

Alexander.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that City, did not make choice N of us for want of People to furniſh the ſame withal; but for that he beſtowed the liberty thereof upon us as a reward and teſtimony of our virtue and fidelity, endeavouring indeed to honour and credit our Nation thereby: For Hecateus reporteth that Alexander, for the Jews good ſervice and fidelity, beſtowed upon them the Country of Samaria, and freed them from paying tribute for it.

1 Ptolomeus Lagus.

The ſame good affection towards the Jews of Alexandria, Ptolomeus Lagus continued after him, for he delivered into their hands the ſtrong holds of Egypt (judging that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himſelf Lord of Cyrene and other places in Lybia, he ſent certain Jews to inhabit the ſame.

2 Ptolomeus Philadelphus.

After him Ptolomeus Philadelphus did not only releaſe and ſet free all Captives of our O Nation in his Country, but alſo did many times remit their payments of money, and

(which

A (which was the principal point of all) he deſired to be inſtructed in our Laws and holy Scriptures, and for this cauſe ſent unto us, requeſting that we would ſend him ſome learned men to interpret them unto him : and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof to Demetrius Phalereus, Andreas and Ariſteus, Demetreus being the only mirrour of learning in his Age, and the other two Eſquires of his own Body : neither would he ever have deſired to have been inſtructed in our Laws and Cuſtomes, if he had deſpiſed us, and not rather admired us. But Appion knew that almoſt all the Macedonian Kings, his Succeſſors in order, did peculiarly affect our Nation.

The ſeventy Interpreters.

3 Ptolomeus Euergetes.

For Ptolomeus the third, which was alſo called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, B did no ſacrifice unto the gods of Egypt for his Victory, but came to Jeruſalem, and there after our manner ſacrificed unto our God, and to him dedicated gifts worthy of ſuch a Victory.

4 Ptolomeus Philometor.

Ptolomeus alſo, ſirnamed Philometor, and his Wife Cleopatra committed the Rule of his whole Kingdom unto the Jews, and Onias and Doſitheus, both Jews, were Generals of his Army, from whoſe credit Appion detracts ; whereas he rather ought to have admired them, and have thanked them for delivering Alexandria, whereof he maketh himſelf a Citizen.

For when there was a Rebellion in Cleopatra's Kingdom, and all was in peril to be deſtroyed, theſe two men delivered Alexandria from Civil War : But Appion ſaith, that C after this Onias came and brought a little Army into the City, at ſuch time as Termus the Roman Embaſſadour was there preſent. True it is, and that Fact of his was moſt juſt.

5 Ptolomeus Phyſcon ceaſed to perſecute the Jews.

For Ptolomeus Phyſcon after the death of his Father Ptolomeus Philometor, coming out of Cyrene, endeavoured to expel Queen Cleopatra and the Kings Sons, to the end that he (contrary to all juſtice) might poſſeſs the Kingdom : and this was the cauſe why Onias took Armes againſt him in Cleopatra's behalf, not forſaking his fidelity unto Kings in the time of neceſſity : yet God himſelf did manifeſtly witneſs his juſtice in this action : For when Ptolomeus Phyſcon preſumed to fight againſt Onias his Army, and took all the Jews, their Wives and Children that were in the City, and bound them, D and ſtripping them naked caſt them before Elephants to be deſtroyed (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread upon them, made the ſaid Beaſts drunken) all which fell out contrary to his expectation : for the Elephants forſaking the Jews which were caſt before them, fell upon Ptolomeus his friends that ſtood by, and ſlew many of them : which done, there appeared unto Ptolomeus a moſt horrible Viſion forbidding him to harm the Jews ; and his chiefeſt and beſt beloved Concubine alſo (whom ſome call Ithaca, others Herene) came unto him, and beſought him to abſtain from ſuch impiety : whereupon he being ſorry, did penance for that he had already committed, and that which he thought to commit : So that the Jews of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance, that upon it God did manifeſtly deliver them ; E yet Appion (who ſpeaketh well of no man) accuſeth the Jews of impiety for bearing Arms againſt Phyſcon, whereas indeed he ought rather to have commended them for it.

Of Cleopatra the laſt Queen of Alexandria

But Appion extolleth Cleopatra the laſt Queen of Alexandria, only for that ſhe was unjuſt and ingrateful unto us ; when he rather ought to have reproved her, in whom all Impiety and wickedneſs reigned, both concerning her own kindred and her husbands who loved her, and alſo generally againſt all the Romans, and the Emperours his Benefactors. She kill'd her own ſiſter Arſenoe in the Temple, who had not any ways offended her ; ſhe alſo treacherouſly ſlew her own Brother, and deſtroyed her Anceſtors gods and ſepulchres ; and receiving the Kingdom from the firſt Ceſars gift, ſhe ingratefully F rebelled againſt his Son and Succeſſor ; and infecting Antony with her poyſoned drinks and amarous inchantments, ſhe made him rebel againſt his Country, and to be unconſtant unto his own friends, depriving ſome of Kingly dignity, and compelling others to be Inſtruments of her impiety.

Antony the husband of Cleopatra.

What elſe ſhall we ſay of her, who in the Battel by Sea forced Antonius her own husband (who alſo had many children by her) to yeild himſelf, the Empire and Army unto her, and become one of her followers ? Laſtly, when Alexandria was taken by Ceſar, ſhe was ſo cruelly minded, that not remembring her own eſtate, ſhe accounted it her ſafety with her own hand to kill the Jews, that ſhe might be cruel and perfidious to every body.

G Is it not a glory, think you, to us, that (as Appion reporteth) in time of dearth and famine wheat was ſo plentiful in Jury, that it was not ſold by meaſure ? But Cleopa- tra was puniſhed as ſhe deſerved. And we call great Cæſar himſelf to witneſs of our H fidelity, and the ſervice we did him againſt the Egyptians, the Senate alſo and their Decrees, and the Writings of Auguſtus Cæſar, wherein our deſerts are teſtifi'd. Theſe Letters Appion ought to have read, and to have examined all Teſtimonies of us, which were left firſt by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomies, and what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mighty Emperours. And if ſo be Germanicus could not get corn to ſuffice all the Inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of ſcarcity and dearth, and not the Jews fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Jews it is manifeſt enough: for the Jews want of Corn was not only left unſupplied, but alſo the want of other Alexandrians. But they have alwayes kept that wherewith the ancient Princes did put them in truſt, to wit, the keeping of the River and whole Country, as I not being thought unfit for their purpoſes.

The Jews have been always truſty to their Prince.

But Appion thus urgeth us; If (ſaith he) the Jews be Citizens, how hap they worſhip not the ſame God, nor have the ſame Religion with the reſt of the Alexandrians? To whom I thus anſwer; How hapneth that you Egyptians do ſo contend and war one againſt another only for diverſity of Religion? Shall we hereupon conclude, that you are all Egyptians, or not all men, becauſe you worſhip and with great diligence nouriſh Beaſts againſt nature? Yet our Nation ſeemeth one and the ſame. If therefore amongſt you Egyptians ſuch difference of Opinions be; why doſt thou ſo marvel at this, that we in a ſtrange place, to wit, at Alexandria, do conſtantly perſevere in our firſt Religion? But he ſaith that we are the cauſe of all Sedition; which ſuppoſe he ſpeak true of the Jews of Alexandria, K yet are not all Jews in all places the cauſe of Sedition; for we are known to be peaceable amongſt our ſelves. But indeed as every one may perceive, the People, like Appion himſelf, are Authors of Sedition in Alexandria. For whilſt the Greeks and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and we lived peaceably together, and they permitted us quietly to uſe our own Solemnities: but when the number of Egyptians encreaſed, by confuſion of time, Sedition alſo by their means encreaſed: But our Nation remained unmixed. They therefore were Authors of thoſe troubles, not having the Government of the Macedonians, nor the wiſdom of the Greeks; but uſing their Egyptian manners, and renewing their old hatred againſt us, and that wherewithal they hit us in the teeth, befalleth them: for moſt of them not having the priviledges of the City themſelves, call L us ſtrangers that have them. For none of the ancient Kings beſtowed the liberty of the City upon the Egyptians, neither have any of the Emperors of Rome beſtowed the priviledge. But Alexander himſelf brought us into the City; the Kings after him encreaſed more priviledges; and it hath pleaſed the Roman Emperour to ratifie and confirm them.

The Egyptians do worſhip Beaſts not agreeable to mans nature.

The diſcord of the Jews and the Alexandrians in Religion

The cauſe of their diſcord.

Appion's fiction touching the Jews being Authors of ſedition at Alexandria is confuted.

But Appion upbraids us for not erecting Statues to the Emperours, as though the Emperours knew not hereof, or that they needed Appion to ſpeak for them: whereas he ſhould rather admire the Roman magnanimity, and modeſty, who compel not their Subjects to violate their ancient Laws and Religion, but content themſelves with ſuch honours as the giver may with piety and equity give them. For they account not of for- M ced honours which come of compulſion.

The Romans magnanimity towards the Jews.

The Greeks and divers others think it not amiſs to erect Statues; for they delight to have the Pictures of their Anceſtors, Wives, and Children, and ſome of their beloved Servants alſo: what marvel then if they accord to yield the like honour to Princes and Emperors?

But our excellent Law-maker forbad all kind of Images, as well of inanimate as animate Creatures (not having at that time the leaſt thought or proſpect of the Roman Empire) becauſe our God being incorporeal and ſpiritual, could not be reduced to humane repreſentation, without great inconvenience; nevertheleſs he did not forbid us from paying honour and reſpect to ſuch great perſons, as being next in their places, may de- N ſerve the next honour to what is due to the Gods: and ſuch is the reverence that we pay to the Emperours and People of Rome; and, as a teſtimony of it, a day doth not paſs, in which we do not offer up Sacrifice (at our own expence) for their ſafety and proſperity; which is more than we do for any other Prince or Nation in the World.

The Jews may have no Images

How Emperors and Magiſtrates ought to be honoured.

And let this ſuffice to anſwer that which Appion alledgeth againſt the Jews of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gave him this occaſion, namely Poſidonius and Apollonius Molon, who accuſe us for not worſhipping the ſame gods that others do, although they lye all alike, ſlandring our Temple moſt abſurdly: and yet for all this they do not believe that they herein commit any impiety: whereas it is a moſt ignominious thing for any free-man to lye upon any occaſion: much more of a Temple famous over O all

The lye of Poſidonius and Apollonius concerning the Jews confuted.

A all the world for ſanctity. For Appion affirmeth that the Jews in that ſacred Temple placed the head of an Aſs, and worſhipped it moſt religiouſly. And this (quoth he) was manifeſtly known at ſuch time as Antiochus Epiphanes ſpoiled that Temple, who found that Aſſes head being of maſſie gold, and of great value.

To this firſt ſlander I anſwer, That were that true which he reporteth, yet an Egyptian ought not to have ſpoken againſt us for it, ſeeing that an Aſs is of no leſs worth than a Goat, and other bruit beaſts that they honour for Gods.

An anſwer to the objection of the Aſſes head.

Is it poſſible he ſhould be ſo blind as not to perceive, that never any fable was more evidently abſurd? every body could tell him that we have conſtantly uſed the ſame Laws without the leaſt change or alteration. Nevertheleſs though Jeruſalem has had her B misfortunes as well as other Cities, and has been taken by Antiochus, Pompey, Craſſus, and at length by Titus, and our Temple been in the poſſeſſion of all of them: yet what is it they ever found there but great piety and devotion? Upon which ſubject I do not think it neceſſary to enlarge in this place.

And as touching Antiochus, many Writers of good credit report that he never had any juſt cauſe to ſpoil our Temple, but that he was drawn unto this fact for want of money; Not that he was our Enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellows he ſought ſupply, and found nothing in that place that was worthy of deriſion: and thus do Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas Damaſcene, Timagenes Caſtor the Chronicler, and Apollodorus avow, who all do witneſs, that Antiochus wanting money, brake C the League he had with the Jews, and rob'd and ſpoil'd their Temple being full of gold and ſilver.

Appion ought to have conſidered this, had he not had an Aſſes heart, and a Dogs impudency, which he and his Country-men worſhip for gods. As for us, we do neither honour nor reverence Aſſes, though the Egyptians do their Crocodiles and Aſpes, eſteeming them that are bitten by Aſpes, and devoured by Crocodiles, to be happy and fit for God: For Aſſes are imployed among us (as they are in all places, where a rational uſe is made of them) only in carrying burthens and doing ſuch things as are neceſſary about Agriculture, and when they are lazy, or treſpaſs upon their neighbours Corn, we do not ſcruple to give them correction.

Who are accounted Aſſes among the Jews, and other wiſe men.

D But Appion was either the greateſt Aſs that ever was, in telling a lye; or elſe having begun to do it, he could not compaſs his enterprizes, in that he found not any juſt cauſe of detraction againſt us.

He addeth another Fable of the Greeks to our detraction; to the which I will make only this reply, That it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and leſs uncleanneſs, to paſs through the Temple, than for Prieſts to come and feign impious words and ſpeeches; which they not reſpecting, laboured rather to excuſe the ſacrilegious Kings, than to write the truth of us and our Temple, endeavouring to curry favour with Antiochus, and to cover and hide his Sacriledge, uſed againſt our Nation, for that he wanted money.

Certain Hiſtoriographers endeavour to cover and hide Antiochus his perjury and ſacriledge.

E Appion with reflection upon the reſt, ſaith, That Antiochus found a Bed in our Temple, and in it a Man lying, and a Table ſet before him, furniſhed with all fowles belonging either to the Sea or Land; that the Man was aſtoniſhed to ſee him: And that ſo ſoon as Antiochus came into the Temple, the man adored him as though he hoped for great help from the King, falling down at his feet, and with a ſtretched out arm craving licence to ſpeak: which the King granting, willed him to declare what he was, why he dwelt in the Temple, and the cauſe of his meats before him, the man with ſighs and tears unto Antiochus bewailed his Calamity, ſaying, He was a Grecian; and that traveling in the Country to get his living, he was ſuddenly ſeized upon by certain Out-landiſh men, and brought unto the Temple, and ſhut up therein, and that no man might ſee him, and that F he was there fed or fatted with all dainties that could be provided; and that at firſt this dainty fare made him joyful, but afterward he began to ſuſpect it, and laſtly he was hereat amazed; and then demanding of a Jew that adminiſtred unto him, for what cauſe he was there kept, he underſtood the Jews purpoſe, and Law not to be revealed, for the fulfilling whereof he was there nouriſhed, and that the Jews were wont to do the like every year upon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian ſtranger, and feed him a year, and then to carry him to a Wood, and there to kill him, and ſacrifice him according to their Rites and Ceremonies, and to taſte and eat of his entralls: and in the ſacrificing of the Grecian, to ſwear to be Enemies to the Greeks; and the remainder of the murthered man they caſt into a certain pit. And that then this Greek reported unto Antiochus, That the time allotted unto him by the Jews to G live was now almoſt expired, and therefore requeſted, for the reverence he bare to the Grecian gods, to ſave his blood from being ſpilt by the Jews, and to free him out of that imminent calamity.

That the Jews ought once a year to ſacrifice a Grecian

This Fable is not only full of all tragical cruelty, but alſo mingled with cruel impudency : H yet for all this, the firſt deviſers hereof do not free Antiochus from Sacriledge, as they hoped hereby to do, who write it purpoſely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not move him to come and ſack our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it ſo (as they ſay.) Antiochus therefore was moſt impious, and not aſſiſted by Gods favour in that enterprize, (whatſoever thoſe lyes mutter) as it is eaſie to learn by the fact he committed. For we do not only differ from the Greeks in Religion, but a great deal more from the Egyptians, and other Nations; and what Nation in the World is there, that ſometime doth not travel through our Country ? Is it then probable that we only renew that Conſpiracy againſt the Greeks? Or how is it poſſible that ſo many thouſand people as are of our own I Nation, ſhould all eat of the entrals of one man, as Appion reporteth ? Or why did he not name this man, whoſoever he was ? Or why did not the King carry him with Trumpets before him into his Country ? ſeeing that in ſo doing he might have been eſteemed full of piety, and a great favourer of the Greeks, and greatly ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the hatred of the Jews by their aid ? But I omit to ſpeak more of this : for inſenſible people void of all reaſon, muſt not be reprehended in words, but by deeds : for all men that have ſeen the building of the Temple, can teſtifie what it was, and the undefiled purity thereof. For it conſiſted of four Portico's, or appartements, each of which by our Laws belonged to ſeveral perſons : into the firſt Strangers, and all people were admitted, Women only excepted that have their monthly courſes. Into the K ſecond it was lawful for the Jews only : all which might go into it, with their Wives alſo if free from pollution of their flowers. Into the third Porch, they only of our Nation that were purified and ſanctified might come. Into the fourth might only the Prieſts enter, in their Sacerdotal habits; & into the ſecret part of the Temple might only the high Prieſt come, attired with a Stole proper to him only : yea we are in all things ſo careful of piety, that our Prieſts are appointed their certain hours when to enter into the Temple.

The deſcription of the Temple and Porches.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Prieſts that were to ſacrifice entred into the Temple: and at noon again when it was ſhut ; yea it was not lawful to carry any veſſel into the Temple, but there was only there an Altar, a Table, a Cenſer, and a Candleſtick, as is in our Law mentioned, and there is no other ſecret or L hidden myſtery done, neither is there in that place any eating ; and all the people can teſtifie this which I have here ſet down, and our Writings do the like. For notwithſtanding that there are four Ranks of Prieſts, and every Prieſts Tribe containeth above five thouſand men : yet every one waiteth on certain appointed days in their turn, and their time of waiting being expired, others ſucceed them in Sacrificing ; and the day before they are to finiſh their waiting, they deliver up unto their ſucceſſors the keys of the Temple, and all veſſels belonging thereto , in the full number that they received them : and nothing is brought into the Temple, pertaining either to meat or drink , which are forbidden to be offered at our Altar; thoſe things only excepted whereof M we make our Sacrifice. What then ſhall we ſay of Appion, who examining nothing of all theſe, hath raiſed ſuch incredible reports of us ? How ignominious a thing is it for a Grammarian, not to be able to deliver the truth of a Hiſtory ? Well, he knew the piety uſed in our Temple, but he purpoſely omitted it : yet could he remember a fained tale of the Sacrificing of the Greek, his dainty fare, and hidden food, that all men that would paſſed through our Temple : whereas the moſt noble among our whole Nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be Prieſts.

What was in the Temple

Four Tribes of Prieſts, and of every Tribe more than five thouſand men.

This therefore is great impiety, and a voluntary forged lye, to ſeduce them that will not ſearch into the truth. For they have attempted to ſlander us by thoſe impieties before mentioned. And again, like one full of all piety, he derideth the vanity N of theſe fables, and reporteth that at ſuch time as the Jews for a long time together warred againſt the Idumeans, Zabidus departing out of a City of Idumea where Apollo was worſhipped, came unto the Jews, promiſing to deliver unto them Apollo the Dorians god, and bring him unto their Temple, if ſo be that all of them would there aſſemble themſelves together : and that afterwards Zabidus making a wooden Engine, and putting himſelf into it, he cauſed three rows of Candles to be ſtuck about it, which made it at a diſtance appear like a Comet to the great amazement of the Jews, who being terrified and aſtoniſhed at the viſion, gave Zabidus opportunity to paſs into the Temple, to poſſeſs himſelf of the Aſſes Golden head, and convey it to Dora. Wherefore we may ſay that Appion leadeth an Aſs, to wit, himſelf with fooleries and lyes ; for he nameth places that are not, and ſetteth down Cities to himſelf unknown : for Idumea O is a Province near unto us, and bordering upon Gaza, and there is no City in it called Another tale deviſed by Appion of Zabidus.

Dora,

A Dora; but in Phœnicia near unto the Hill Carmelus, there is a City of that name, yet nothing conſonant to Appions ſlanders, for it is four days journey from Judæa.

Dora is a City of Phænicia and not of Idumæa.

Why therefore doth he ſo raſhly accuſe us for not worſhiping the gods of others Nations, ſeeing (as he ſaith) our Predeceſſors did ſo eaſily believe that Apollo would come unto them, and that he walked upon the earth with Stars about his back? Perhaps indeed they had never before ſeen a Candle or lamp, themſelves having ſo many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite through our Country, where ſo many thouſand men are, no one of them all met him? Did he in the time of War find the Towns and Villages, by which he paſt, without any Watch-men? Well, to paſs the reſt; B The gates of our Temple were threeſore Cubits high, twenty Cubits broad, all covered with Gold, yea, almoſt all of clean Gold, and theſe Gates every day were ſhut by two hundred men: and it was too impious a thing to leave them open. Is it then credible that this Candle-bearer could eaſily open them, who alone was judged to have the Aſſes head? So that now it remaineth doubtful whether Zabidus did bring back again the Aſſes head, or elſe Appion took it of him, and brought it again to our Temple, that there Antiochus might find it, and ſo Appion might have another occaſion of lying. He alſo belieth us concerning the oath which he ſaith we Jews do take, ſwearing by the God of Heaven and Earth, and Sea, never to favour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Greeks. This lyar might better have ſaid, not to favour any ſtranger, and C eſpecially the Egyptians, and ſo his former lyes and theſe ſhould have better correſponded, if our Anceſtors had been expelled (by their Predeceſſors) out of Egypt, not for their wickedneſs, but for their calamity. But we are ſo far from the Greeks, that we ſcarcely ever think of them: ſo that no man can ſay that there is any enmity between us and the Greeks. But contrariwiſe, many of them have embraced our Religion, and ſome of them therein perſevered: others again have forſaken it; yet none of them will ſay that he heard this oath ſpoken of among us: but it ſhould ſeem that only Appion heard of it, in that he himſelf forged it. Truly his wiſdom and great providence is worthy to be admired (as ſhall hereafter appear:) for he, to prove theſe his lyes to be true, ſaith, that it is a certain teſtimony, that the Laws we obſerve D are moſt unjuſt, and that we worſhip not God as we ought to do, in that we are ſubject to divers Nations, and our City endured many calamities: Whereas touching themſelves, they are of a City that flouriſheth in abſolute Authority, accuſtomed to govern from the foundation thereof, and not to ſerve the Romans. In effect, who can reſiſt their valour? Truely no man but Appion would ever have flouted us herewith, ſeeing that few Cities ſo flouriſh and reign over other, that they again at no one time have been brought into ſubjection; for many Nations are ſubject to others: only the Egyptians are freed from the Captivity of ſuch as rule Europe and Aſia, for that (as they ſay) the gods fleeing into their Country, were ſaved by entring into the bodies of Beaſts. Yet have they not indeed had one days liberty ſince the beginning of E the World, neither under the Government of their own Princes, nor under ſtrangers.

The gates of the Temple.

Appions lye concerning the oath is confuted.

Appian upbraideth the Jews with captivity.

I will not ſtand to reckon how often the Perſians have waſted their City, deſtroyed their Temples, and ſlain their ſuppoſed Gods. For it is not decent that I ſhould imitate herein Appions fooliſhneſs: neither am I calling to memory what befel the Athenians and Lacedemonians, the laſt of which are recorded to have been moſt valiant, and the firſt to have been moſt devout and Religious: neither will I reckon up thoſe moſt godly Kings, amongſt whom Crœſus was one, who notwithſtanding fell into great calamities. Moreover, I will not recount how the Caſtle of Athens was ſet on fire, and the Temples of Epheſus and Delphos likewiſe, and many others. There is now F one Appion, a new accuſer of the Jews, who upbraideth them with their calamities, forgetting the miſery that hath befallen his Country-men the Egyptians: but he was blinded with the fable of Seſoſtris (whom he ſaith to have been King of Egypt.) We could report and boaſt of our Kings, David and Solomon, who ſubdued many Nations unto them: but it is not fit here to ſpeak of them. But Appion was ignorant of that which all the World knoweth, to wit, that the Egyptians have ſerved firſt the Perſians, and afterwards the Macedonians, and that as bond-ſlaves: whereas we remaining in free liberty, reigned over all the Cities about us 120 years, even unto the time of Pompey the Great; and when all the other Kings were ſubdued by the Romans, only our Kings for their fidelity and friendſhip towards them were dear unto them. O but G this ſticketh upon Appions Stomach! that we have not had any famous men of our Nation, who have invented Arts and Sciences, and been excellent in wiſdom, ſuch as So-

David's and Solomon's power.

Appion praiſeth himſelf.

Why the Jews do Sacrifice common beaſts, and do not eat Swines fleſh.

crates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others whom he ſetteth down : and which is moſt to be H admired, Appion puts himſelf into the number of theſe famous men : and ſaith, that Alexandria is bleſſed and happy, that hath deſerved to have ſuch a Citizen as he is :
and great reaſon that he ſhould teſtifie that of himſelf, which all men elſe perceive in him, to wit, that he is an impudent deceitful fellow, both of corrupt liſe and manners.
So that the Alexandrians had juſt cauſe to be ſorry that they ever had any better opinion of him. But that our Nation had men equal at leaſt unto thoſe whom he mentioneth, all men know that pleaſe to read the Book of our Antiquity. The reſt that his accuſation containeth, it is not amiſs to let paſs without anſwer, for that it rather impeacheth the Egyptians, his own Country-men, than us : for he doth complain of us for Sacrificing ordinary Beaſts, and abſtaining from Swines fleſh and laughed I at our Circumciſion. Touching the Sacrificing of Beaſts, we do as all Nations elſe do : and Appion, inveighing againſt our ſacrificing, ſheweth himſelf to be an Egyptian ; for were he either a Grecian or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended ; for both Greeks and Macedonians do vow to Sacrifice Hecatombs to their gods, and uſe Prieſts in thier banquets ; and yet for all this, the World is not deſolate of living creatures, as Appion ſeareth.

The Egyptian Prieſts circumciſed, and eat no Swines fleſh Appions death.

The defence of Moſes againſt Appollonius and Lyſimachus.

But were all men ſo mad as the Egyptians, it would indeed be deſolate of men, and filled with cruel Beaſts, which they (ſuppoſing them to be gods) do diligently nouriſh.
If any man ſhall ask of Appion, whom of all the Egyptians he judged to be a wiſe man, and moſt religious towards their gods; no doubt he would anſwer the Prieſts. For K they ſay, that their firſt Kings in the beginning gave them theſe two commandements in charge ; firſt to ſeek wiſdom ; and next, to worſhip the gods : they alſo are all of them circumciſed, and abſtain from Swines fleſh, and no other Egyptian Sacrificeth with them unto their gods. Appion therefore was ſurely blind, when, inſtead of detracting us, he ſpeaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom he took all this pains. For the Egyptians do not only uſe thoſe cuſtoms which Appion in us diſalloweth, but alſo do teach others to circumciſe themſelves, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verily think, that Appion was juſtly puniſhed for blaſpheming his Country-Laws and Religion.
For being forced to circumciſe himſelf to avoid a great diſeaſe, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his privy member rotting, he in extream grief and miſery L gave up the Ghoſt. For wiſe men ought to perſevere in their Country-Laws in all piety, and not to deride and detract others : but Appion forſook his own Religion, and ſlandered and belied ours. And this was Appions end : and here alſo ſhould end this Book, but that Appollonius, Molon and Lyſimachus, and certain others, partly for ignorance, partly for madneſs, have moſt injuriouſly belied our Law-maker Moſes, and the Laws he made, detracting him as a deceitful Magician, and Author of all the malice and impiety amongſt us ; and for ſuch as teacheth no vertue nor goodneſs at all.

I will therefore, as far as in me lieth, declare both our Converſation in general, and in particular : For if my Judgment be any thing, our Laws are moſt forcible M both to piety, and to all humanity in general, as alſo to Juſtice, pains-taking, and contempt of death. I only requeſt this favour of the Reader, that he will not with a prejudicate or malicious opinion, peruſe theſe Writings : for I do not write this as a praiſe and vain oſtentation of our Nation, but as a juſt Apology, refuting the ſlanderous reports that ſome have uſed againſt us.

Wherein Apollonius accuſeth the Jews

Appollonius doth not continually inveigh againſt us as Appion doth, but only here and there ; ſometimes affirming us to be hated both of God and man, ſometimes to be Cowards, ſometimes contrariwiſe complaining of our Nations Boldneſs. Saying moreover, that we are more ſottiſh than any barbarous Nation ; and that therefore we only have had none of our Nation founders of Arts or Sciences, which N are profitable for mans life ; all which objections are eaſily refuted, if we ſhew the contrary to all theſe by him reported ; both that we have obeyed our Laws, and lived in all integrity.

The lovers of order and common laws are excellent in meekneſs and vertue.

If therefore I be forced to ſhew that other Nations have made contrary Laws, not I, but they are to be blamed, who comparing ours with them of other Nations, affirm ours to be the worſe : neither of which can charge us ; eitheir that theſe Laws, which I will briefly ſet down, are not ours, or elſe that we have not perſiſted in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirm, that they who have framed themſelves to live together under certain Rules and Ordinances, and kept them inviolate, and were the firſt founders of them, were more to be commended O for humanity and vertue, than they who live under no Rule nor Ordinance

A nance at all : and every Law-maker endeavoureth ſo to attribute Antiquity to their own Ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themſelves the firſt Authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens lives. Which being ſo, it is the duty of a good Law-maker to make choice of that which is beſt, and moſt convenient for them, who are to obey their Laws, and to ſatisfie them as much as may be, in proving their Laws to be good and right, and both in wealth and wo, calamity and felicity, to remain in them, neuer changing nor altering them.
I therefore aver, that our Law-maker is more ancient than any Law maker mentioned.
For Lycurgus, and Solon, and Seleuchus of Locris, and thoſe the Greeks admire , are modern, and of late times in in reſpect of him, as is well known. For the Greeks B themſelves confeſs, that in times paſt they wanted the name of Law. This Homer can witneſs, who in his whole Works never mentioneth this word, Law, for the people of thoſe times were not governed by Laws, but by indefinite ſentences, and the Princes pleaſure, uſing cuſtoms but not written, and altering and changing them alſo as occaſion ſerved.

Moſes more ancient than all other Law-makers.

Νόμος This word, Law, is not in Homer.

The life of Moſes.

But our Law-maker being very ancient (for this is every way manifeſt, even by our adverſaries own confeſſions) ſhewed himſelf both a good Prince and Counſellor unto his people : for making Laws to direct and govern mens lives, he perſwaded them voluntarily to imbrace them, and firmly to perſiſt in them with all wiſdom.

C And firſt of all , let us conſider the works of his greatneſs. For he undertaking the conduct of many thouſand of our fore-Fathers out of Egypt into our own Country , delivered them from many calamities almoſt impoſſible to be avoided : for they being to paſs through a place wherein was no Water , and a very ſandy ground , being alſo to War, and preſerve their Wives and Children , and goods from the variable event of Wars , he in all theſe ſhewed himſelf a moſt wiſe and prudent Counſellor, and a true Patron and Guide unto them all.
For he made all the multitude ſo to depend upon him, that he might perſwade them to what he pleaſed, and yet in none of all theſe did he uſurp any Authority over them : and in that time and place wherein all men of Authority aſſume power unto themſelves , and exerciſe tyranny , at ſuch time as the people do oftentimes D offend , and live in all manner of impiety ; at the ſame time he being in Authority did contrariwiſe uſe all lenity and mildneſs, to the intent that he might be a pattern of vertue and juſtice to all the reſt, giving all thoſe that willingly followed him moſt aſſured ſafety, uſing in all accidents moſt ſtrange works. For which cauſe he rightly deemed God to be his Captain and Counſellor : and firſt examining himſelf , and finding all the Laws he had ſet down were agreeable to the will and pleaſure of God, the chiefeſt care he had was, how to perſwade his people to the ſame, which he himſelf now knew : for they who direct their Lives according to the will of God, avoid all ſins as our Law-maker did, being neither Magician nor deceiver , as his Enemies injuriouſly report, but ſuch a one as the Greeks do E boaſt Minos and others after him to have been : for ſome of them affirmed their Laws to be made by Jupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle ; either ſo believing themſelves, or elſe thinking that the people would be eaſily ſo perſwaded.
Now who of all the Law-makers made the beſt Law , and who did moſt rightly think of God, he that compareth all their Laws together may eaſily know ; for now occaſion is offered to ſpeak of them :- there are therefore an infinite company of Nations and Laws amongſt men, and ſome Nations are ruled by Monarchs, others by the common conſent of the people. But our Law-maker doing neither of theſe, did, as one ſhould ſay, therein declare his Common-wealth to be Divine, chiefly aſſigning all power and principality over us to God, cauſing all men to fix F their minds and cogitations on him , as the only Giver and Author of all goodneſs, giving them to underſtand, that whatſoever in their neceſſity they intreat him for, He heareth their prayers , and underſtandeth what every man doth in private, yea, his very cogitations ; and that he is One , Unbegotten , and in all times Immutable and Eternal , differing in a moſt excellent ſhape from all mortal creatures : and this we knew, but we are altogether ignorant what God is as touching his Subſtance and Eſſence.

Moſes maketh God his guide and Counſellor.

The origin of Laws amongſt the Greeks.

The opinion of the wiſeſt Greeks concerning God.

And thus the wiſeſt Greeks that ever were, judged of God, who how learned they were (he giving the ground of all their knowledg) I now omit to rehearſe : and that theſe things afore rehearſed are beſt and moſt agreeable to the nature and magnificence

to

to and after them the Stoicks, and almoſt all other Philoſophers have ſo thought H of the Divine nature. But they delivering this their Philoſophy in ſhort ſpeech durſt not publiſh the truth of their doctrine among the people already ſeized upon by ſuperſtitious opinions. But our Law-maker's works and words ſo agreed that he ſatisfied at large all his people, and they that were to be born of them, and their ſucceſſors, inſpiring as it were a certain conſtancy into them to perſevere in the ſame, ſtill referring the cauſe of his Laws to their own profit and commodity. For he did not affirm the worſhip of God only to be part of vertue, but he aſſigned other part thereof, to wit, fortitude, juſtice, and mutual concord of all his Citizens. For all our actions, ſpeeches, and what elſe ſoever, are all referd to divine piety. Which he left not touched without any I more diſcourſe of it. For theſe two are the methods of all diſcipline and morality, whereof one frameth and directeth the ſpeech, the other the manners and actions; which being ſo, other Law-makers were indeed wiſe in advice and counſel, and yet they made choice of one of theſe Methods, and left the other; for the Lacedemonians were inſtructed in manners and not in words; as alſo they of Crete were: but the Athenians, and almoſt all the Greeks, were directed and trained up by Laws in every thing they were to do, yet never could they put their written Laws in practice. But our Law-maker very induſtriouſly did conjoyn both theſe together: for he neither omitted the training them up in manners and good exerciſes, neither did he ſurceaſe to leave them written K Laws.

Moſes compared with other law-makers.

The methods of morality and diſcipline.

And firſt of all, makeing his entrance from the very meats, and preſcribing to every one a convenient diet, he left no man liberty amongſt us to direct himſelf in the leaſt matter concerning his meat, but he by Laws defined, both from what meats we were to abſtain, and what to eat, and what ought to be our ordinary diet, as alſo when we ought to labour, and when to ceaſe from work; ſo that we, as it were under the government of a Father or Maſter, might neither ſin willingly, nor for ignorance: for he did not apoint puniſhment for them that were ignorant of it, but by Law enacted a moſt neceſſary and mild chaſtiſement for the voluntary offenders: and for this cauſe he did not only will, that L we ſhould once or twice or oftener hear the Laws, but that once every week we all, omitting other buſineſs, ſhould come to hear the Laws, and ſo learn them perfectly; which things all other Law-makers, as it is well known, omitted: All which laudable cuſtoms all other Law-makers have neglected, and the moſt part of men are ſo far from living according to their own laws, that they are altogether ignorant of them; and having offended their laws through ignorance, they then learn by other mens means, that they have made breach of their laws; yea, the chiefeſt and moſt eminent men amongſt them do profeſs herein, that they are ignorant, cauſing thoſe that are learned and ſkilful in their Laws to ſit as it were in commiſſion M with them to direct them.

Moſes commandeth all the Jews to come and hear the Law.

Whereas every one of our Nation being demanded of our Laws can anſwer as readily, as he can tell his own name: for every one of us learning them, as it were, ſo ſoon as we come to the uſe of reaſon, we have them, as it were, written and printed in our minds, and by this means both we offend more ſeldom, and when we offend, we are ſure to be puniſhed.

And this eſpecially is that, which hath cauſed ſuch an unity and concord amongſt us. For to worſhip one God after the ſame manner without any difference in manners and converſation is the only way to eſtabliſh amity and concord in a Commonwealth. N

The concord of the Jews in Religion.

Amongſt us no man ſhall hear any different ſpeechs and opinions concerning God, whereas amongſt all other Nations it is moſt frequent and ordinary: for amongſt them not only every one of the common people doth ſpeak his pleaſure in this point, but divers Philoſophers alſo preſume to do it, ſome of them with their blaſphemous ſpeeches altogether deſtroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudency denying him to have any care of men; neither is there any difference amongſt us of affairs pertaining to mans life, but all men with us follow one common expreſs labour, and we all joyntly affirm the Son of God, and that he hath care of humane affairs, and all our actions and exerciſes: yea, any one may learn of our Women and Children, that all things whatſoever are to be reduced to piety. O

Hence

A Hence it groweth that ſome detract our Nation; for that amongſt us were no men Inventers of new matters and Arts. To whom we will thus anſwer; That other Nations account it a glory not to perſiſt in any thing that their foreſathers uſed, and hold them of moſt account who can beſt tranſgreſs their foreſathers wiſdom. But we contrariwiſe do account it the chiefeſt point of wiſdom and virtue, neither to do nor think any thing contrary to that which our Anceſtors have decreed; which is a token that our Law was eſtabliſhed by as good advice as was poſſible. For thoſe Laws that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faulty. But amongſt us who believe, that our Law was firſt eſtabliſhed by the will and pleaſure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and virtuous which may any wiſe impugn the ſame. For who can take away any tittle thereof, or add better in their ſtead? Or who is he that can B transfer and carry us from the obſervance of them, and ordain for us better Laws to govern our Common-wealth? Or what Law can be more juſt and better, than that which the Wiſdom of God (who is Lord of all things) hath eſtabliſhed? He firſt of all permitted the diſpoſing of all principal affairs to the Prieſts in general, and moſt wiſely conſtituted a high Prieſt as their head: neither were they choſen to this dignity by our Law-maker, who either excelled in nobility of birth, or riches; but he appointed ſuch to ſacrifice unto God, who were known to excel others in wiſdom and ſanctity; theſe do both keep our Laws and obſerve all other things belonging to their Office with all integrity; for our Prieſts are appointed Overſeers of all things, and to judge all ſtrifes and controverſies, and to puniſh offenders.

What ſort of People are to be made Prieſts

C What Monarchy then or Kingdom can be more holy than this? Or how can God be better honoured than amongſt us, where all people are prepared to piety, and the Prieſts commanded ſo to rule and govern the Common-wealth, as if they were celebrating ſome feſtivity?

And whereas other Nations are weary of celebrating their Myſteries (which they term Sacrifices) in a few days; we with joy, pleaſure, and immutable wills, do celebrate our Sacrifices continually without intermiſſion. It reſteth now that I ſet down our Precepts and Laws, as Arguments of that which I have ſaid.

Of God, and of the divine Providence.

The firſt is of God: of whom our Law ſaith, God comprehendeth all things, he is moſt D perfect, moſt bleſſed, he is ſufficient both for himſelf and all things elſe, he is the beginning, midſt, and ending, famous amongſt all things for his works and benefits, more manifeſt than any thing elſe; but his ſhape and greatneſs is to us unſpeakable, all matters (how precious ſoever) being compared with his excellent beauty, are nothing worth; and all Art, compared with his Invention, is un-artificial; we can neither ſee, conceive, nor imagine any thing like him.

The works of God.

He is holy, for we ſee his Works; the Light, the Heaven, and the Earth, the Sun, the Moon, Rivers, and Sea, ſo many different ſhapes of living Creatures, and encreaſe of Fruits: All theſe God himſelf made, not with hands or labour, nor as one needing any to help him, but he ſeeing them to be good, they were preſently made. He is to be fol- E lowed of all men, who ought to worſhip him by the exerciſing of Virtue; for this is the moſt holy way to pleaſe him.

We have one Temple, as alſo one God, which Temple is common to all men, as he is the common God of all men. Our Conformity is pleaſing to him, and with that our Prieſts do conſtantly adore him, and he amongſt them hath the firſt place, who by birth is the chiefeſt: He it is who firſt ſacrificeth to God, ſeeth the Laws obſerved, judgeth Controverſies, and puniſheth thoſe that are convicted by the Law: whoſoever diſobeyeth him ſhall be puniſhed as one that rebels againſt God himſelf: He offereth ſacrifices not of gluttony or drunkenneſs, for God is not pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, but rather injured, and ſuperfluous expences are thereby made.

The ſacrifices of the old Teſtament.

F But God loveth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behaviour, and eſpecially requireth in us that ſacrifice, and inviolable chaſtity. In our ſacrifices offered for our common good, we firſt of all pray in common, and then every one for himſelf, becauſe we are all fellows, and he that delighteth herein more than in his own life, is moſt acceptable to God.

We pray and vow unto God, not requeſting riches of him, for he of his own accord beſtoweth them upon every one, and left them amongſt us: but we pray that we may have part of them, and having gotten them may keep them.

Purifications uſed in ſacrifice.

Our Law hath alſo appointed purifications and abſtinence from carnal copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearſe: And this is our ſpeech and opi- G nion of God, who himſelf is our Law.

And as concerning Marriage; Our Law only alloweth natural copulation between

Of marriage.

The puniſhment for one that doth raviſh a Virgin.

The purification for the body

Man and Wiſe, done to the intent to get Children. But that men ſhould abuſe one another H againſt nature, it altogether diſalloweth, and puniſheth ſuch offenders with death. It commandeth us to marry, not reſpecting the dowry, neither muſt we take Women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitful perſwaſions, but that we rather obtain the good will of the Parent, and uſe ordinary means to perſwade. It alſo appointeth that the Woman ſhall be in all things inferiour to the Man, neither is ſhe to obey in committing wickedneſs, but as one under Government: For it is God that gave man this authority. With her the Husband only may lawfully accompany, and it is abomination for her to make trial of another man: and whoſo attempteth this, can no ways avoid death: the like penalty attendeth him if he offer violence to a Virgin eſpouſed unto another man, or if by perſwaſions he overcome a married Woman or I other that hath Children; and all this our Law commandeth: It hath alſo interdicted all Women from concealing their Children being born, or otherwiſe to deſtroy them, for ſo ſhe ſhould be a Child-killer, deſtroy Souls, and mankind: Whoſo therefore uſeth carnal copulation and corruption is unclean by our Laws, and Women after lawful copulation muſt waſh themſelves, judging that a part of their Soul was by this act defiled, and ſhe being puffed up was wounded in her body, and therefore our Law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawful for them to feaſt and banquet at their Child birth, whereby an occaſion of drunkenneſs may grow, but that their beginning ſhould be tempetate: they are likewiſe commanded to train up their Children in learning, that they may learn the Law, and actions of their fore-fathers, and imitate K them; that ſo being trained up in the Law, they may not ſin nor tranſgreſs them by ignorance.

Of the funerals of the dead.

Our Law hath alſo provided for the burial of the dead, that our Funerals ſhould neither be pompous, nor our Sepulchres gorgeous, commanding every Houſhold to perform all neceſſaries touching the burial of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to aſſemble themſelves together, and bewail the dead: It alſo commandeth every one (yea even the dead mans own family) to purify themſelves after the burial, and to go afar off, as ſeeming to be unclean.

It alſo appointeth puniſhment for them that have committed murder, either willfully or againſt their will. L

The honour due to Parents

It bindeth every man to obey his parents next after God, and commandeth that thoſe Children that do not ſhew themſelves grateful unto them, or in any thing do grieve them, that they ſhould be ſtoned to death: It alſo commandeth all young men to reverence old Men, becauſe God is Elder to us all.

It permitteth not friends to conceal any impiety; for God is not their friend who doth not diſcloſe them: And if friends fall out that do know one anothers ſecrets; yet they are commanded not to bewray them.

Againſt theft and uſury.

If any Judge take a bribe, he is to be puniſhed with death for omitting Juſtice, and aſſiſting the guilty. No man muſt take any thing away that he himſelf placed not, and no man muſt take that which is not his own. No man for lending muſt take uſury; M and many ſuch like things our Law commandeth, concerning cauſe of Communion between us and others.

It is alſo not amiſs to recount how our Law-maker provided for the entertaining of ſtrangers amongſt us: For he ſeemeth ſo to have provided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our own Laws, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally, that will come and live under our Laws, judging the community of mans life, not ſo much to conſiſt in the Nation whereof we come, as in the unity of our minds and converſation. He forbiddeth others that are ſtrangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our ſolemnities: yet he commanded us to exhibit unto them all other things neceſſary: and that we ſhould give unto all men fire, water, meat, and bury N them being dead. He hath alſo moſt mildly determined how we ought to deal with our Enemies, that we neither deſtroy their Country with fire, nor cut down their Fruittrees.

How we ought to uſe our Enemies.

We are alſo forbidden to rob and ſpoil thoſe that are ſlain in fight, and deal injuriouſly with our Captives; and eſpecially, if they be Women: yea, he ſo endeavoured to teach us humanity and mildneſs, that he provided, that we uſe even unreaſonable beaſts courteouſly, and only employ them to ſerve our lawful need, and no further: for he forbiddeth us to kill any tame thing bred in houſes, and that we ſhould not kill the old birds and their young together; and becauſe many wild Beaſts, enemies to mankind, do aſſiſt us in our labours, he commanded to ſpare them alſo. And in every point he O eſtabliſhed humanity and mildneſs amongſt us, uſing (as is beforeſaid) Laws to direct

A us therein, enacting alſo other, how they who infringe the foreſaid Laws, may be with all ſeverity puniſhed: For the puniſhment allotted to the violaters hereof is for the moſt part death. As if any man commit Alultery, raviſh a Virgin, uſe the ſin againſt nature with another, or ſuffer himſelf to be ſo abuſed.

A repetition of the precepts of the Law.

We alſo have Laws concerning our Servants, and our Meaſures, and Weights, and unlawful bargains and ſales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is another mans, or which is not his own; all theſe are to be puniſhed, not as other Nations puniſh them, but much more grievouſly. But whoſoever either injureth his Parents, or committeth impiety againſt God, he ſhall preſently be deſtroyed. But they that obſerve this Law are rewarded, not with gold or ſilver, nor with a Crown beſet with precious ſtone; but B every one having his Conſcience to witneſs, doth greatly profit, and gain Eternity; as both our Law-maker propheſieth, and God himſelf doth moſt aſſuredly promiſe to them that obſerve them. And if it chance that we be forced to ſuffer death for them, yet do we joyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we ſhall ſo exchange this Life for a better.

The reward of ſuch as keep the Law.

I ſhould be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifeſt; for many of our forefathers, only for that they refuſed to ſpeak againſt our Laws, or otherwiſe than our Laws permitted, have moſt manfully and conſtantly endured all torments and death it ſelf.

If our Nation were unknown to all the world, and that this our voluntary obſervation C of our Laws were not manifeſt to all the people, if any man ſhould report unto the Greeks, that either he had read this which I have declared, or elſe that he had found People in a ſtrange Land, ſuch as we be, having ſo pious and honeſt opinions concerning God, and who had for many ages perſevered therein; I doubt not but they would all admire and wonder hereat, conſidering the great mutability amongſt themſelves.

The continuance of the Laws amongſt the Jews.

To be ſhort, there are ſome, who ſtick not to deride them, who have lately written of the Government of Common wealths and Laws, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impoſſible. And (to ſpeak nothing of other Philoſophers, who have written of this Argument) that divine Plato amongſt the Greeks, a man who in honeſt life, virtuous ſpeech, and ſound Philoſophy excelled all others, this man is D almoſt continually ſcoffed at by them, who in their own conceit are ſkilful in civil affairs, and brought in to their Comedies. Whereas, whoſoever conſidereth his Writings with diligence, ſhall often and eaſily find matter agreeable with moſt mens manners: yea this Plato himſelf confeſſeth, that he dare not by reaſon of the common peoples ignorance ſet down the true opinion of God.

Plato admired amongſt the Greeks.

But many think Plato's words full of vanity, and licentiouſneſs, and admire Lycurgus and the City of Sparta, for that it ſo long time perſevered in his Laws. It is therefore an evident demonſtration of Virtue to remain in their Laws. But if thoſe who ſo admire the Lacedemonians do compare them with us, and the time during the which their Laws were in force, with the time of our Common-wealth; they ſhall find that ours hath E continued more than two thouſand years. They ſhall alſo find that the Lacedemonians did only perfectly obſerve their Laws, during ſuch time as they were in proſperity and liberty, and that when their Fortune changed, they then became unmindful of their Laws.

Lycurgus the Law-maker amongſt the Lacedemonians.

But we, who have felt many thouſand miſ-haps, by reaſon of the often change of Princes in Aſia, have not in theſe our laſt miſeries and evils forſaken our Law. Neither can any man ſay, that liberty and licentious Life is the cauſe why we ſo diligently obſerve them, ſeeing that whoſo pleaſe may ſee ſufficient proof, that they tye us to more ſtrict Life and laborious, than thoſe of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the Earth, nor uſed any handy-craft, but ceaſing from all labours and pains-taking, F lived in their City, fat and in fair liking, having both their meat and all other neceſſaries provided and prepared for them by others, and eſteemed that only their felicity to do and endure any thing, ſo that they might prevail againſt thoſe againſt whom they enterprized Wars: And that they failed alſo herein, I omit to rehearſe. For not only one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole Companies of them, forgetting their own Laws, yielded themſelves to their Enemies. And can any one tell of (I ſay not many) but of one or two of us that ever was treacherous to his own Laws, or that feared to dye for them? I mean not a common death, ſuch as Souldiers are ſubject unto, but ſuch a death as is effected by all torments and tortures that can be deviſed. Which I think thoſe that prevail againſt us, impoſed upon us not for hatred, but that they G deſired to ſee ſo admirable a matter; and to ſee we being but men, and ſuch who eſteemed it the greateſt impiety poſſible to do it, could be compelled by them to ſpeak or do any thing contrary to our Laws. Yet it is no wonder that we for our Law do dye with ſuch conſtancy, rather than any other Nation: For other Nations cannot abide to endure that which we account a trifle, to wit, labour and ſimple fare, abſtinence from our Wives, and obſervation of our days of reſt, and we are always careful that when we fight againſt our Enemies, we obſerve our Laws concerning our Meats. And thus we take pleaſure to obſerve and keep our Laws, and to exerciſe fortitude in obeying them.

Moſes forbiddeth to deride and blaſpheme falſe gods, only for the name of God imputed unto them.

The number of gods amongſt the Gentiles infinite.

The Fable of Jupiter and Pallas.

Jupiter.

Let now Lyſimachus or Molonus paſs, and all ſuch as they be, wicked lying Writers, and Sophiſters, deceivers of young men, and detracters of our Nation, as though we were the wickedeſt People living. As for me, I will not examine the Laws of other Nations: for it is our Cuſtom to keep and obſerve our own, not to detract others; yea, and our Law-maker openly prohibited us from blaſpheming ſuch, as other Nations hold for gods, only for the Name of God attributed unto them: yet may we not leave the Objections of our accuſers unanſwered, ſeeing that which we are to ſpeak againſt them is not our own device, but many before us have ſpoken it. Who then of all the wiſe Greeks will not condemn the moſt famous Poets, and eſpecially the Law-makers, who at firſt brought and ſetled ſuch vain opinions of the gods among the common People? affirming the number of them to be as many as they thought good, and that they were born at divers times, allotting to every one his proper place, as unto other living Creatures: ſome to be under the Earth, others in the Sea, and the ancienteſt amongſt them in Hell, fettered and bound: and thoſe whom they place in Heaven, in words they do term him a Father, but in deeds they ſhew him to be a Tyrant; and for this cauſe they report that his Wife, his Brother, and his Daughter, whom they affirm to have been born of his Brain, conſpired againſt him to bind him and hang him, as they report him alſo to have dealt by his Father. Againſt theſe vanities all excellent and wiſe men do worthily inveigh, who beſide this already rehearſed in deriſion add, how ſome of the gods are young, ſome are old, ſome infants, others are gods of Arts and Sciences, and one is a Smith, another a Weaver, another a Pilgrim, and at variance with mortal men, others delight in Muſick, others in Shooting: Moreover that they are at variance one with another amongſt themſelves, and that they fall out one with another in mens behalf, and that not only one of them layeth violent hands upon the other, but that alſo they are wounded by mortal men, and ſorrow, and grive for the wounds; and that which is moſt abominable of all, do uſe carnal Copulation with mankind, and that moſt undecently, that their unbridled luſt is extended both to men and women. Then that their chief god, whom they call Father, contemned and drowned certain women, whom he himſelf had deceived and gotten with Child, and that he could not deliver the Children born of theſe Women from calamity, for that deſtiny had obliged him, nor ſee their deaths without tears.

This is all good ſtuff, as alſo is that which followeth, to wit, Adulteries committed in Heaven ſo openly and impudently among the gods, that ſome profeſs themſelves to envy their fellow gods and goddeſſes tied together in ſuch filthineſs. And what ſhould the reſt of them do, when as their King, the moſt antient amongſt them, could not refrain his luſtful licentiouſneſs and debauchery? Moreover, Some of them became ſervants unto men, ſome built houſes for money, and others became Shepherds, others like malefactors were chained in Hell. What man then, that ever was accounted wiſe, would not bluſh at theſe follies, and reprove the inventors hereof, and the fooliſh believers alſo? Others made them ſubject to terrour and fear, and madneſs, and ſuch ſimplicity, as that they might be deceived, and all other naughty paſſions to be found in the nature of their gods, and have perſwaded whole Cities to offer ſacrifice to the moſt noble amongſt them. And they are in great perplexity, thinking that ſome of the gods are the givers of all good things, others again to be their enemies, and ſo ſeek to pleaſe them with gifts as they would do wicked men; and they are verily perſwaded, that they ſhall ſuſtain great dammage by their means, except they do daily pacify their wrath by frequent gifts.

What is the cauſe of ſuch error concerning God.

What is the cauſe of this ſhameful ignorance, and erroneous iniquity concerning God? Truly I am perſwaded, For that their firſt Law-makers were themſelves herein to ſeek, and ignorant of the nature of God, or elſe that they did not faithfully deliver unto their Common-wealth, ſo much as themſelves knew concerning this point; but as though it had been a thing of leaſt moment, did willfully let it paſs, giving licence to Poets, and permitting them to deifie and make gods whom they pleaſed, and that the Orators ſhould write of the Common-wealths affairs, and tell what them liked of ſtrange gods.

Moreover, the Painters and Image-makers amongſt the Greeks had a great hand in making

A making of gods, it being lawful for them every one to frame what ſhape he liſt, and how he liſt, ſome of Earth, others of Colours; and the chiefeſt god-makers amongſt them uſed Ivory and Gold to make their god of; a true argument of their mutable novelty.

Poets and Painters cauſe the multitude of gods.

And then the ancient gods, whom at firſt they honoured and reverenced, as much as they could poſſibly deviſe, being now withered with Age, are out of credit, and other youngſters poſſeſs their places and honours: their Temples alſo, ſome are deſolate, others newly erected, as men pleaſe. Whereas contrariwiſe, they ought moſt conſtantly to keep their opinion of God, and his Religion.

Apollonius Molon was one of theſe proud Fools; but thoſe Grecians that followed the B true Philoſophy were not ignorant of what I have ſaid of the Nature and Eſſence of God, but agreed with us in our Opinions, and laughed at theſe ridiculous Fictions. Which Plato well ſeeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a Commonwealth, and ſendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, leſt that he with his Fables ſhould deſtroy or deprave the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others eſpecially imitated our Law-maker, as he did herein alſo, commanding his Citizens, that all of them ſhould perfectly learn his Laws, and that for no caſualty any ſtrange forreign Cuſtom ſhould be admitted into their City, but that their Commonwealth ſhould be pure, and they perſiſt in the obſervation of their Laws. But Apollonius Molon not reſpecting this, inveigheth againſt us, for not receiving into our ſociety C men of ſtrange opinions in Religion, whereas not only we do ſo, but commonly all Greeks, yea and the moſt prudent amongſt them.

Plato decreed that no Poet ſhould be permitted in a Commonwealth.

The Lacedemonians expelled all ſtrangers, and did not permit their Citizens to travel into other Countries, fearing that both wayes their Laws might be corrupted. They therefore are to be ſpoken againſt rather than we, ſeeing they neither admit ſtrangers to converſe with them, nor to inhabit amongſt them, nor impart their Religion unto them; but we, though not deſirous to learn the Religion of other Nations, yet do we not deny to impart ours to ſtrangers, who deſire to embrace it: which, if I be not deceived, is a token of magnanimity, and clemency in us: but this ſhall ſuffice concerning the Lacedemonians.

The Lacedemonians did expel all ſtrangers.

D Apollonius was ignorant how matters ſtood with the Athenians, who boaſt that their City was free to all Nations: But they did moſt ſeverely and without all mercy puniſh thoſe that did but ſpeak any word againſt their God. For what was the cauſe of Socrates his death? he neither betrayed the City to Enemies, nor deſtroyed their Temples, but only ſwore by a ſtrange Oath, which as he ſaid (whether in jeſt or in earneſt) a Devil taught him, and for this offence he was put to death by drinking Hemlock: his Accuſers alledging, that he corrupted young men, and contemned the Laws and Religion of his Country. And this Socrates ſuſtained being a Citizen of Athens.

Anaxagoras.

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: and for that he affirmed the Sun, which the Athenians worſhipped for God, to be a fiery ſtone, he was by the ſentence of ſome few condemned E to dye. They alſo proclaimed that whoſoever would kill Diagoras of Melus, ſhould be rewarded with a talent for his labour, only for that this Diagoras was ſaid to deride their myſteries: Protagoras alſo had been by them taken and put to death, had he not eſcaped, only for that they ſuppoſed him to have written certain doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they uſed their men at this rate, when they practiſed the ſame cruelty upon their Women, one of their ſhe Prieſts being put to death for worſhiping a ſtrange God; their Laws appointing that who ever brought a ſtrange God into their City ſhould be puniſhed with death? It is therefore evident, that they who enacted ſuch ſtrait Laws, believed not the gods of other Nations; for had they believed in them, they would not have deprived themſelves of the benefit of many F gods.

A talent is 600 Crowns.

The very Scythians (who delighted in man ſlaughter ſo much, that they very little differed from bruit Beaſts) yet did they think themſelves bound to maintain their own Laws, as beſt, ſo that they ſlew Anacharſis a famous Greek, that came unto them, only for that he ſeemed to attribute too much unto the Grecian gods; yea, thou mayeſt find many among the Perſians, who for this cauſe have been tortured. And it is evident that Apollonius approved the Perſian Laws: for when the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I mean the fortitude they ſhewed at the burning of their Temples; this Apollonius in all things imitated the Perſians, violating other mens Wives, and putting out their Childrens Eyes; whereas our Laws adjudg him G to death, that ſo uſeth unreaſonable beaſts: And neither the fear and terrour of Potentates, nor the favour of them whom all men reverence, could ever cauſe us to forſake or abandon theſe Laws : neither do we exerciſe fortitude, to deprive other men of their H all other injury, yet if any man do in our Religion provoke us, we preſently ſeek revenge, not reſpecting our own ability ; yea though thereby we work our own utter ruine and calamity. What therefore ſhould move us to imitate the Laws of other Nations, when they that made thoſe Laws (yea even the Law-makers themſelves) did

Yea not content to do ſo themſelves, they alſo aſcribed the like unto their gods to be ſome manner obſerved a Sabbath as we do, and faſting days, and Lamps, all which they learned of us; yea many do alſo obſerve our Cuſtoms concerning their meats, and our unity and concord, wherein we excel all other Nations, our community alſo and induſtry without any violence or force : And whoſoever doth diligently conſider his own Nation them hold their malicious tongue from any further Calumniation. For I do not take upon he propheſied, proceeded from God : yea, although our ſelves did not know the goodneſs of our Laws, yet the multitude of them that imitate them were a ſufficient motive to induce us thereunto. But I have at large, and with all ſincerity diſcourſed of our Laws and Common-wealth in my Books of our Antiquity. And now again I have made mention of them neither in contumely of other Nations, nor in praiſe of our own, but N only to reprove ſuch as have moſt malitiouſly and impudently belied us contrary to the known truth : And I think I have already fully performed that which I have promiſed.

The intention of the Jews Laws.
For I have ſhewed our Nation (contrary to their affirmations) to be moſt ancient, which I have proved by the teſtimony of many ancient Writers, who in their Works have mentioned us.

Our Adverſaries affirm us to have come of Egyptians : I have ſhewed that our fore-fathers came into Egypt out of ſome other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt, for that we were infected with diſeaſes ; I have proved that our Predeceſſors came from thence to their own Country by means of their own prowelſs and force of their own accord. Others labour to defame our Law-maker as a wicked O perſon, whoſe virtue many of ancient times, and ſo long time as hath been ſince him, do witneſs.

A It is not needful to ſpeak more largely of our Laws : for they by themſelves appear pious and good, and ſuch as do not invite or incite us to the hatred of other Nations, but rather to communion and friendſhip, being both enemies to Iniquity, and commanders of Juſtice, baniſhers of Luxuriouſneſs, and teachers of Frugality and Labour, forbidding all Wars enterprized for Avarice, and preparing the people to ſhew Fortitude in them, and for them, inflicting inevitable puniſhment upon their tranſgreſſors, not eaſily to be deceived by glozing ſpeeches, and executing in action all that they in word command : yet amongſt us the execution of them and obſervation is more ready than the words of them.

The Origine of the Jews Laws.

I therefore confidently affirm, that we do teach more pious and virtuous manners, than B other Nations do. For what can be better than inviolate Piety? What more juſt than to obey the Law? What more profitable and commodious, than to be at Unity and Peace amongſt our ſelves? and neither to forſake one another in calamity, nor injure one another in proſperity, to contemn and deſpiſe death in time of War, and in Peace to labour and till our Grounds, and to uſe other Arts and Works, and always to think and believe, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and diſpoſeth all things?
If this be either written or obſerved by any one before this time, we are then to thank them as being their Scholars: but if they were never extant before, then we are known to be the firſt Authors, & Inventers of it. Let therefore Appion and Molon periſh, and all others that with them are convicted of lying and ſlandering us. This Book is written to thee

IRREGULAR PAGINATION.

I Am at the inſtant requeſt of Polibius of Megalopolis to put in writing the conſtant Sufferings of the Maccabees worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetorical and pleaſing ſtile, but rather after our own country faſhion, thereby to exhort our Nation to patience in their Calamities. But firſt of all, it is neceſſary to ſpeak ſomething of Reaſon, and aſſign unto it the power and virtue to deliberate. Reaſon hath dominion over our paſſions.

Whoſo therefore will renounce the World, and aſpire only to Cœleſtial things, muſt exerciſe Sobriety, baniſh Gluttony, Laſciviouſneſs, and all other ſuch Vices as may poſſeſs and captivate the mind : He muſt likewiſe mount up to the top of Virtues Tower, that from thence he may reſiſt and impugn the Vices of his Body, Grief and Fear.

There are many examples of the Valiant Souldiers of God, which I could produce, but the brave perſons deſcended from one ſingle Woman (not at one, but ſeveral births) may ſuffice.

And firſt I will ſpeak of Eleazar and ſeven Brethren, and relate what Tortures and Torments their Mother endured : yet cannot man, but only God determine, who amongſt them was firſt, and who laſt in this noble agony. They therefore, being all of one opinion, reſembling one another more in mind than in body, duely conſidered the frailty of this Life, and neither delighted in the flatteries of the World, nor the alluring enchantments thereof. They valued not torments, fetters, nor any other ſort of tortures impoſed upon them : To return, they reſolved upon patience, and to endure whatſoever the Judges cruelty could deviſe. I will therefore praiſe the fortitude of theſe Brethren, or rather with all truth rehearſe the noble conflicts of theſe holy men ; and ſetting all adulation apart, proſecute with a bare Hiſtorical narration, the manner of their Martyrdome.

The death of the ſeven brethren, and their mother.

But before I begin to declare the death of theſe brave men, I will a little treat of Reaſon, which, as I have affirmed, is no ſmall motive to Martyrdom. Reaſon it is that maketh us obſerve Faſts, and Abſtinence ; Reaſon makes us deſpiſe Money, by it we are taught not to account of Dignities and Honours, which all men generally aim at, yea Reaſons gift it is, that we do reſiſt the heat of luſtful deſires. Hence cometh it, that having once overcome ſuch things as the fleſh delights in, we find our ſelves a little able to reſiſt, we alſo learn to deſpiſe pains and torments, and by degrees reſolve to ſuffer all things that ſhall be impoſed upon us.

The deſcription of Reaſon and Wiſdom.

Which that it may more plainly appear ; let us ſearch out the cauſe of this order, and wee ſhall find wiſdom to be the cauſe hereof. For no man can determine and diſtinguiſh H good from evil, that is not endued with wiſdom; this wiſdom is always accompanied with juſtice, and juſtice is ſtill joyned with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be ſeperated; ſo that this wiſdom conſiſteth upon four parts.

Grief and pain cauſe or hinder paſſion.

Beſides theſe, there are two things that either do cauſe or hinder paſſion, to wit pain and pleaſure; one of which we do always refuſe, and the other we do always deſire; yet where pleaſure ariſeth, and is preſently by reaſons rule put away, the mind is there ſtrengthened; and pain compared with glory, is through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; and being come, our mind is aſhamed not to ſuffer that which before it was reſolved to do.

Reaſon reſembleth a ſkilful Gardiner.

Reaſon therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we deſpiſe torments, and I deteſt vice; like a ſkilful Husbandman it pruneth and cutteth away ſuperfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtful humours, only leaving that which may ſome way be profitable to us.

Thus reaſon corrects our paſſion, encourages us to ſuffer, and ſupports us in our ſufferings. Who is not deſirous to eat the fleſh of wild Beaſts and Fiſhes? And who luſteth not to eat of feathered Fouls? nay, do not the dainty diſhes either from Sea or Land invite us to eat them? What then cauſeth us to abſtain from them? what makes us all deſire them, and yet none of us eat them? even reaſon, by which the mind is taught to overcome it ſelf in delightful objects and pleaſure, that when occaſion of Martyrdom is offered, ſetting aſide all vanities we will not for a little pleaſure K forget our accuſtomed virtue.

An inſtance of Joſeph's chaſtity.

By reaſon it was that Joſeph (to his great praiſe) maſter'd his concupiſcence, and ſuffered not himſelf to be overcome by his luſt, which was but too incident to his age: Reaſon ſo worketh with ſound advice and mature counſel, that it again recovereth loſt friendſhip, gaineth new, and ſuffereth no cruelty to be committed. Of this we have alſo the example of Moſes, who had he not had juſt occaſion to be angry againſt Dathan and Abiram, reaſon (no doubt) would have cauſed him to have ſmothered his paſſion. Did not our father Jacob with great vehemency reprove his Sons Simeon and Levi, who without reaſon had uſed ſuch cruelty, ſaying, Curſed be your anger? Which anger had it been bridled with reaſon, neither had they been curſed, nor the other L had periſhed. For this cauſe, God the maker of mankind, when he faſhioned us and our manners, having finiſhed the lineaments of our body, he placed the mind in it, to rule it with certain concomitant precepts, to wit, temperance, purſuance of that which is good, cleaving to juſtice, by which rules we might be able to bridle our paſſions, and obſerve the precepts of God.

But ſome will ask me, why we commit wickedneſs, ſeeing that reaſon ruleth our paſſion? But it is ridiculous to think that reaſon hath ſo perfect a dominion: for reaſons rule cannot hinder the appetite from deſire, but only correct it ſo far, that it ſuffer with patience the loſs or abſtinence from ſuch things as it deſired. For example ſake, Reaſon cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can ſo work, that thou commit no impiety when thou art angry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from deſiring filthy M pleaſure, yet can it cauſe thee not to yield unto it.

An inſtance of David's thirſt.

2 Sam. 2. 18.

Reaſon therefor cannot eradicate vice, but only bridle it. Witneſs in this the example of holy David, who fighting againſt Strangers with great ſucceſs, and being at Evening weary and faint, retiring into his Tent, that was guarded by Souldiers, he found them all at meat: yet himſelf being thirſty would not drink, notwithſtanding Water was hard by, becauſe his Religion diſſwaded him, for he had vowed not to drink but from a Fountain in the Camp of the Enemy.

David in his thirſt refuſed to drink the Water he ſo deſired.

Whilſt thus his thirſt encreaſed, three luſty young men armed themſelves, and taking with them a veſſel, they went unto their Enemies Camp, and aſſaulted the watchmen, who for fear of death fled, and ſo they paſt through the Camp, till ſuch N time as they came where the Water was, and filling their pot, they brought it to the King. But holy David ſo bridled his appetite, that his reaſon quenched his deſire, and ſhewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the fear of God was to be preferred before all things. For taking the Water he had ſo much wiſhed for, and which had been gotten with ſuch danger, he preſently poured it on the ground, as a ſacrifice to God, chuſing rather to die for thirſt, than to offend the divine Majeſty: yet reaſon is not ſo forcible, that it is able without due conſideration to repreſs the inordinate motions of the mind, and mitigate the grief of the body. But it is now time to come to our Hiſtory, yet is not this former diſcourſe to be thought impertinent, for O that it is ſomewhat previous to the matter enſuing. Such was the wiſdom and fidelity of

A of our forefathers, that Seleucus King of Aſia enriched our Prieſts, and being a man of another Religion, aſcribed all his actions and worthy deeds to the Religion and Faith of our Anceſtors. But wicked mens madneſs could not herewith be ſatisfied. For one Simon, hating the High-Prieſt Onias, and finding no ways or means to be revenged of him in his own Country, went unto Apollonius, Governour of Syria, Phœnicia, and Cilicia, and before him in a publick aſſemby declared, that he could help the King to an infinite treaſure, for (ſaith he) there is hidden in Jeruſalem an infinite deale of Gold and Silver, which by right belongeth unto King Seleucus.

Seleucus and Nicanor. Simon a Traitor to his Country.

Apollonius hearing this, praiſed and commended Simon, and confiſcated the Gold and Silver to the Treaſure-houſe of Seleuchus; and having authority from the King B to get it, he levied an Army; and ſo accompanied with Simon, came unto our Country, purpoſing if any violence were offered, to uſe the defence of his Souldiers.

Apollonius Captain of Syria, came with an Army to Jeruſalem

When the Treaſure-houſe of our Temple was now a ſacking, Onias wept bitterly, and ſaid, that it was a heavy ſight to them, to whom this treaſure was committed, to ſee it, or any part of it taken away. But Appollonius, neither reſpecting the Tears and intreaties of the old Men, Women, nor Children, preſſed into the Temple, they all praying God to puniſh him, and to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy Temple, there appeared certain Angels on Horſeback with weapons in their hands, and ſhining with a fiery flame about them, C and they daunted the courage of this infidel Apollonius, who preſently fell down flat upon his face, and lying ſo a great while, at laſt he came a little to himſelf: and riſing up, he leaned upon his ſhoulder who kept the Temple, not being able to ſtand alone, he was ſo terrified with the viſion he had ſeen. When by degrees he recollected and found ſome little hope of recovery, he ſtretched both his hands towards Heaven, and deſpairing to obtain pardon by his own prayers for his offence committed, he beſought the Hebrews (whoſe Temple he came to ſpoil) to make interceſſion for him, himſelf with Tears craving pardon for his offence, and not only acknowledging his fault; but confeſſing himſelf to have deſerved death, and all puniſhment poſſible. Holy Onias ſeeing this, and fearing alſo, that if Apollonius ſhould then dye, the Hebrews would D be ſuſpected to have made him away, made prayers to God for him, and obtained his Enemies life. Apollonius preſently haſted to Seleucus to let him underſtand what had hapned: but when he came he found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus reigning in his ſtead, a man of Tyrannous nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high Prieſt: and therefore made Jaſon his Brother high-Prieſt in his ſtead, Jaſon promiſing Antiochus in recompence to pay him 3660 Talents of Silver every year.

Antiochus his rage againſt the Jews.

Jaſon being made high-Prieſt, and chief amongſt all the Nation of the Jews, preſently forced all the people to impiety, and to forſake their Religion; ſo that to build baths, he hindred the defence and compleating of the Temple, and many of our Nation conſpired with him in this iniquity. But hereat God was preſently wroth: and being E diſpleaſed, it was not needfull to ſeek forreign Enemies, for Antiochus himſelf was incited againſt them, who warring againſt Ptolomeus King of Egypt, had heard it reported, that the Jews eſteem'd him to be dead, yet was he very nobly entertained by the inhabitants of Jeruſalem: and preſently after the fight, he made an edict, that who ſo among the Jews refuſed to offer Sacrifice to the Gods, ſhould preſently dy upon the wheel. But the godly-minded of our Nation did little eſteem this edict; yea the Women circumciſing their infants (as our Law requireth) did afterwards caſt themſelves down headlong, to the end that they might ſo obtain a preſent death without longer delay.

Antiochus perceiving that the ſeverity of his edict could not compel the Hebrews to F forſake their Religion, but that men voluntarily did chuſe death; he ſitting in an eminent place from whence all the Jews might behold him, calling all of them together, cauſed Swines fleſh to be ſacrificed upon the Altar, and to be offered to every Hebrew to eat.

Amongſt this whole multitude aſſembled from all places was one Eleazar a Prieſt, well inſtructed in learning and the fear of GOD, a man aged in reſpect of his years, of a very reverend countenance, one that was known to all men, & famous for his vertue. To this man Antiochus ſaid thus:

Eleazar is brought unto Antichus. 2 Macc. 6.

Be adviſed by me, holy old man, eſchew thoſe torments prepared for ſuch as are obſtinate, preſerve thy reverend age, and caſt not away your life, take the Sacrifice, and eat of the Swines G fleſh: for it is contrary to all wiſdom and diſcretion to follow the Jews opinion, and refuſe that meat, which Nature hath as well ordained for Mankind as any other. We are unthank-

full

full for Gods benefits, when we contemn his graces, and make difference where Nature hath H made none; or what reaſon is there to ſhew that this beaſt is more abominable than others? Either all beaſts are to be eaten, or elſe all to be eſchewed: it is ſuperſtition and folly to bar our ſelves from any thing by a Law, when we have no other for it, but our will. Set apart thoſe vain and ſottiſh opinions, and at leaſt in this venerable age change thy opinion. And though your Laws are ſtrictly to be obſerved, yet will they excuſe thee, ſeeing thou doeſt not ſin voluntarily but by compulſion.

Eleazar's anſwer to Antiochus.

Eleazar was permitted to ſpeak, and replyed to Antiochus, who exhorted and preſſed him to the breach of his Laws. We, Antiochus, do not follow vain report, but obſerve the verity of Religion which our Fathers kept, and fear of torments cannot make us embrace another Religion, and forſake our own: yea, ſuppoſe our Religion delivered to us by our I Fathers had no firm grounds, yet would I not be compelled by torments to forſake it. Do not eſteem it a ſmall matter to eat impure meat, and taſt of that which is ſacrificed to Idols, for it is profane to touch things that are profane. Our Law condemneth your Philoſophy, wherein he is moſt ignorant that thinketh himſelf moſt wiſe.

We are taught to embrace ſobriety, to ſubdue our inordinate appetites, to keep our bodies chaſt, to ſuffer with patience whatſoever for Gods ſake is inflicted upon us, and not to deny the Truth, Juſtice, Piety, or God, who alone is true: and therefore I refuſe this profane meat, well knowing what I ought to eat, as warranted therein by the precept of the Almighty God, whoſe Laws I have learned to obey, and eſchew all meats ſacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all vigour that which is expedient for the Soul: and it is no leſs than Tyranny to compel a K man to that which his Religion forbids, and to command that which is contrary to Juſtice.

Do what thou wilt, deſpiſe us as you pleaſe, it ſhall be returned upon your own head, and you ſhall be as deſpicable your ſelf, as others are to you. I will perſiſt in the holy ſteps of my forefathers; though with Tyrannous hands you pluck out mine Eyes, and rip up my bowels with a knife, thou ſhalt never conquer me. I will dye ſecure and patient in the love of God; neither flatter thy ſelf for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: If need be, that I muſt be ſacrificed for Gods ſake, thou ſhalt find me in the vigour and reſolution of a young man. Prepare then your fire, and get ready your racks: thou ſhalt find me more conſtant in my torments, than before I come to them.

Eleazar's conſtancy.

O ſacred Religion! I will never violate thee, the foundation of my ſalvation, the defence of L the believer, the grounds of faith; never will I lift up my hands contrary to thy precepts; never will I believe any thing to be juſt, which is repugnant to that which thou haſt taught me: I will not loſe the merit of ſo many years, nor relinquiſh the faith I have hitherto embraced. The chaſt, pure, and devout Company of Fathers ſhall receive me into their number, where I ſhall not fear (O impious King) thy threats. But thou haſt changed the name of King to Tyrant, yet thou ſhalt never alledge againſt me my deed, my conſent, my word.

Eleazar cruelly whipped

Whilſt Eleazar, full of conſtancy and liberty, ſpake thus, the Souldiers that ſtood thereabout haled him to be tortured; & ſtripping him naked, they hang'd him up, & whipped him, and whilſt on either ſide he was beaten, a Crier with an impious voice ſtill cried unto him, Obey the Kings pleaſure and command. But worthy Eleazar was M not overcome by torment, but ſuffered all with great patience, and lifting up his venerable Eyes to Heaven, he knew in whom he believed, and to whom he ſacrificed his Soul; after which obſerving his fleſh to be wounded and cut on each ſide of his body, and the blood guſhing out in great abundance, he admired his own patience, and thanked God, who was the Author thereof. At laſt his body being unable to hang longer upon the rack, he fell down flat upon his face, ſtill glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then one of the Souldiers, to gratifie the King, like a mad man ſpurned and trod upon him to increaſe his torments. But Eleazar, ſtrong in body and mind, like a right Champion of the true GOD, never ſhrunk at thoſe pains, but the good old man by patience overcame the cruelty of his torturers, and put his very N torturers into admiration of his conſtancy. Then the Kings Officers coming unto him ſaid;

How long, Eleazar, wilt thou neglect the Kings commands, and refuſe to free thy ſelf from torments? eat Swines fleſh, and thou redeemeſt thy ſelf from all thou endureſt. Eleazar, although in the height of his tortures he had been ſilent, could not without anſwering endure to hear ſo profane counſel, but as tormented with this ſpeech, he cried out; We Sons of the Hebrews are not ſo effeminate as to forſake the way of our Salvation, wherein we have walked even until our old Age, neither are we taught for the avoiding of torment, which will not long continue, to give others example and occaſion to ſin. It is but a while that this life can laſt: ſo that we loſe but a ſmall moment for that which is eternal. Far then be it from me to prolong O the ſmall remainder of my life by ſo puſillanimous an action: or expoſe my ſelf by my Cowardice

A dice to the contempt of the World, you your ſelf would deſpiſe me, and upbraid my inconſtancy: let us dy therefore couragiouſly, and our Souls take their flight into Abrahams boſome.

The Souldiers ſeeing his conſtancy, by the Kings command caſt him into the fire, and poured ſtinking and loathſom liquors into his noſtrils. Which the reverend old man moſt patiently ſuffered till at length he was conſumed with the flame: when he found himſelf departing and giving up the Ghoſt, he ſpake after this manner, lifting up his dazled Eyes to Heaven:

Thou art He (O God) from whom life and Salvation proceedeth: behold, I dye for obſerving thy Laws, be merciful to this thy Nation, and do not forſake them whom thou haſt B hitherto protected as in thy boſom, and under the ſhadow of thy Wings; let my death put an end to all our miſery and pacifie thy wrath againſt our whole Nation for their offences; recieve me for them all, and beſtow them all upon me. And amidſt theſe Speeches he joyfully expired.

Eleazar's laſt words in the fire.

It is moſt true therefore, which we at firſt affirmed, that Reaſon regulates our paſſions, and diſpoſeth us to ſuffer chearfully: which once we having determined and reſolved the anguiſh of our ſuffering is abated, and our reſolution and conſtancy confirmed.

If therefore reaſon and the inferiour powers be at variance, we muſt ſubject them to Reaſon, if we will make a perfect Victory. With this guide our Father Eleazar was moſt ſafely directed neither to yeild or ſink under his pains, nor give place to unlawful C inticements and allurements: he ſaved the Ship of his body from the ſhipwrack that might ariſe by the tempeſtuous ſtorms of vanity, and ſuffered not himſelf by contrary Winds to be driven from the right courſe: yea, though it was toſſed upon the Waves of Tyranny, yet did it remain ſound and unbroken, and keeping a direct courſe, arrived in the haven of Salvation. Never any man did ſeek ſo valiantly to defend his City from an Enemy, as this holy old man did his Soul, who amongſt ſtripes, croſſes, and flames was ſtill the ſame man. For as the top of a high Rock ſtandeth ſafe, and reſiſteth the Wave without any dammage unto it ſelf; even ſo did the Rock of Reaſon in this man beat back the rage of thoſe tempeſtuous Waves that daſhed againſt his body, nor permitting them to break in, and pierce the Celeſtial and Divine D power of the Soul.

Reaſons victory.

A ſimilitude taken from the Rock.

O happy old man, more bleſſed than all of thy Age! O Prieſt more ſacred than all other Prieſts! who didſt not pollute thy ſacred lips with profane meats; impiety found no entrance that way, from whence ſo many prayers to God had proceeded. The Tyrants cruelty could not prevail againſt thee; Thou therefore art made an example for all Prieſts of God to imitate. Such a one behoved it a Prieſt to be, more ſtrong than torments, more able to ſuffer than the torturers to inflict puniſhment, more forcible than Princes commands, yea, and more potent than the fire, wherein thou didſt periſh: and finally, thou waſt ordained to be crowned with the Laurel of Martyrdom for thy ſufferance. Thou haſt ſurpaſſed all Antiquity, thou ſhalt be an example to all poſterity.

Eleazar's praiſe.

E If then feeble old Age, wherein all ſtrength and heat of body was extinguiſhed, grown unfit for torments (as being already broken with Age) could by the ſtrength of Reaſon endure ſo many miſeries, who dare deny Reaſon to be the chief cauſe of our ſufferance? We have ſeen the higheſt cruelty hath been overcome by a firme determination to perſiſt in the Service and fear of God: yet many affirme, that every man, who hath the uſe of Reaſon, is not able to undergo ſuch Agonies; but their aſſertion is vain and of no force: for moſt evident it is, that he only is overcome by pain, whom wiſdom hath not armed with patience. And no marvel if he who raſhly enterpriſeth ſo weighty a matter, and without due conſideration, do at laſt forſake and repent himſelf of that which he ſo unadviſedly undertook. But if we with due advice and deliberation F arm our ſelves, it is not an eaſie matter to remove us by any misfortune from our determition; when we foreſee and preconſider the diſtreſſes that may befall us, when they do happen we are not ſo much ſurprized or diſmayed, becauſe we expected them before.

He therefore that is wiſe is reſolute and able to conquer his paſſions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he cometh to tryall, can put his determination in execution. Neither is the wiſdom of this old man ſo much to be admired, ſeeing Children, and as it were Infants, have deſerved the ſame commendations, and wrought aſtoniſhment in their tormentors; for the indignation and cruelty of Antiochus (though overcome by the wiſdom of this old man) was but the more increaſed, and therefore G by wicked counſel he cauſed ſeven young Gentlemen of the Hebrews to be brought unto Antioch out of their Caſtle Soſandrum, who being tender in years, and as he thought

Antiochus cauſeth ſeven noble young men of the Hebrews and their Mother to be brought to Antioch.
2 Mac. 7

though weak and unable to ſuffer torments, his hope was that either by perſwaſions, H or terrours, or tortures, he might force them to renounce their Religion. He therefore commanded theſe ſeven together, with their Mother Salomana, who now grew antient, to be brought before him: ſo they according to his command were brought being very graceful in their perſons and every way worthy of ſo vertuous a Mother; yea, they reſembled Angels, their Faces ſhining like the clear light of the Sun; their Eyes ſparkled in moſt comely and decent manner, as teſtifying, that they ſurpaſſed in vertue all other of humane race and condition. The Mother was deſcended of moſt vertuous and noble parentage, and ſo ſhe her ſelf had continued and lived; but that excellent feature of body and nobility of blood was much dignified by her vertue and fortitude, in which ſhee paſſed all that could be ſaid in her commendation. I The Tyrant beholding them and their mother together, with a counterfeit ſmile he accoſted the Children in this manner.

The Kings exhortation to the ſeven brethren.

I wiſh your good (O admirable young men: for ſo both your beauty of body and noble Parentage perſwade me): do not therefore like mad men reſiſt my command: avoid not only torments but death alſo. For I deſire not only to exalt you unto honour, but alſo to encreaſe your riches and poſſeſſions; contemn the ſuperſtitious and ſuperfluous belief of your own Country-men, and embrace our Religion: Which if you refuſe to do (as I hope you will not) I will deviſe ſuch torments, as that I may by a lingring and painful death be able to conſume you.

And to terrifie them the more, he commanded the inſtruments of their torments to K be preſented unto their view. And accordingly Wheels, Rods, Hooks, Rakes, Racks, Cauldrons, Cages, Gridirons were brought forth; and Engines to torment the fingers and hands, Gauntlets, Aules, Bellows, brazen Pots, and Frying-pans: for theſe are the names which we find. That which I term Bellows, was a thin plate of Iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a Fan; and far more horrible devices of torments were ſhewed unto them, too long to rehearſe: whereof they having had a ſight, Antiochus ſaid:

The young mens conſtancy.

Conſent unto me, O prudent young men: for if that I command you to commit a ſin; yet do not you offend in doing it, ſeeing you commit it only upon compulſion. But the young Youths inflamed with a divine Spirit and Senſe, contemned ſo many kinds of torments, L and deſpiſed the Tyrants threats and flatteries; and their conſtancy (for they gave him no juſt occaſion) put the Tyrant into a great rage.

By this it is evident, how much Reaſon is maſter over Paſſion: for if any ſlothful man not before trained up to it ſhould of a ſudden come to ſuch a puſh, at the very ſight of ſuch torments his mind would be troubled, & his countenance appalled, his Legs under him would have trembled, and he with fear have been confounded: ſo that he would preſently have retracted, and profeſſed himſelf unable to bear up againſt ſo many and ſo grievous torments, ſaying:

My ſelf being unwiſe, what ſhould I have made choice of? Whether to endure theſe torments, or accept of their promiſed benefits? Whether I ſhould have been moved to pity mine M own age, or to compaſſionate my mother; God would not have denied pardon for this deed, I being forced thereunto: and by doing it though againſt my will, I ſhall get the Kings favour.

The ſeven brethren reply to Antiochus.

But where Reaſon and advice taketh place, and hath well trained the mind to perfection, the other conſequently followeth: As by the example of theſe brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eat the ſacrificed Swines fleſh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (ſaid they) O Tyrant doſt thou perſecute us that are innocent? We both deſire and wiſh to die, and will, until ſuch time as death expelleth life, firmly keep that which God commanded, and Moſes taught us. And thou, Tyrant, do not ſeek to ſeduce us by pretending love towards us: thou lover of injuſtice, maſter of cruelty, deviſer of iniquity, the N pardon which thou doeſt offer is to us more painful than puniſhment: we contemn death, and eſteem not thy words, as being by our late maſter Eleazar taught to deſpiſe them. Why then doeſt thou ſuppoſe ſuch puſillanimity to be in us young men, ſeeing of late thou foundeſt ſuch courage in an old man? We follow him: thou canſt not try and know our minds, except by tearing our bodies thou ſearch them out: We will ſafely and ſecurely ſuffer for our God any thing, and leaving this Earth, we ſhall be entertained into Heaven: and thou for ſo Tyrannizing moſt cruelly upon innocent Souls, ſhalt be reſerved to eternal fire.

Antiochus commanded Maccabeus to be racked.

The Tyrant enraged, that he could neither prevail by fair promiſes, nor by threatnings, cauſed them to be beaten with Bulls pizzles: and firſt of all he commanded Maccabeus, the eldeſt of the ſeven brethren, to be ſtript, and ſtretched out upon a O Rack, and his hands to be bound behind him, and then to be moſt cruelly beaten,

who

A who wearied his tormenters by his ſuffering (ſo great the force of vertue is) in ſuch manner, that they deſired more to leave beating him, than he requeſted they ſhould leave. This done, he was put upon a wheel, and a weight hanged at his feet, and ſo ſtretched round about it, that his ſinews and entrails brake, and his pains increaſed : yet being overcome with pain, his mouth was not for all this ſtopped, or hindred from calling upon God, who beheld all ; and reproving the Tyrant for deviſing thoſe torments for the Innocent, he took ſtrength, and is ſaid to have cried out aſter this manner.

Bloody Tyrant, who perſecuteſt the Majeſty of God; I whom thou thus tormenteſt, am no Witch, nor one who have murthered and killed another man, but one who dies for juſtice, ob- B ſerving the Law, and for Charity.

Then when the torturers (overcome with compaſſion) perſwaded him to ſubmit to the Kings pleaſure, he anſwered :

O ye wicked miniſters of Tyranny! your wheels are not ſo ſharp and cruel, that I thereby will be forced to forſake Heaven, whereon my mind is fixed : tear my fleſh ; yea, if you ſo pleaſe, roſt it at the fire : torture and torment each parcel of my body with ſeveral cruelty ; you ſhall for all this find your ſelves unable to force us young men to impiety.

The death of the eldeſt brother.

As he thus ſpake, a fire was kindled, and he, as he was upon the Wheel racked, was ſo thrown into the fire : and thus he was by flames and torments ſo burned, that C his bowels appeared ; his mind nothing moved, when his fleſh yielded to the tortures, who amidſt his pangs cryed thus unto his brethren. O beloved brethren, learn of me an example of vertue: conſider the ſtrength of an invincible courage: contemn and deſpiſe the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God than this Tyrant, who can if he pleaſe humble the proud and mighty, and exalt the lowly and dejected.

As thus he ſpake, he was taken out of the flame, and flaid alive; his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and he put into a frying pan; and ſo he departed out of this life, to the great admiration of all that beheld him, and the joy of his brethren and mother ; and went before them to Heaven, there to prepare a Kingdom for himſelf and them.

The ſecond brother brought.

D After him the ſecond brother, called Aber, was haled by the Souldiers : and before the Tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he cauſed all thoſe torments to be ſhewed him, thereby to terrifie him : but he nothing thereat moved, and denying to eat of that foreſaid Sacrifice, his hands were bound with Iron chains, and he being hanged up by them, the skin of his body was ſlain off from the Crown of his head unto his knees : ſo that the entrails in his breſt appeared naked ; yet in ſuch manner as he might abide greater torments. For he was caſt before a cruel Libard, thirſting moſt extremely after blood, to the intent that he might devour with his teeth the reſt of his body ; but the beaſt ſmelling of him (no doubt by the great handy work of Almighty God) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, did no hurt to the E Martyr.

But hereat the Tyrants rage increaſed ; and the Martyr by ſuffering ſuch torments, was made more conſtant, crying aloud :

O how pleaſant is that death unto me, which is cauſed by all ſorts of torments for Gods ſake! yea, ſo much the more pleaſant, for that I aſſuredly hope to find reward for it in heaven. Let theſe torments inflicted upon me (O Tyrant) ſatisfie thy cruelty ; for my pain is not by thy tortures increaſed, but rather my pleaſure, as thou ſhalt find by my patience in this Agony, More willing am I to ſuffer than thou to puniſh ; yet my pain in ſuffering is leſs than thine by inflicting the ſame upon me. I am tormented for vertue and obſerving the Law ; and the juſtice of God ſhall baniſh thee from thy Regal ſeat : Thou by tormenting art tormented, and almoſt conſumed: thy wrath and fury being almoſt ſpent upon me in vain, thou ſhalt not eſcape F the day of judgment : eternal torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy profane mind is able to endure, nor thy great power to decline, thy ſinful Soul being condemned to eternal puniſhments. Thus, remaining conſtant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to Heaven.

Machir the third brother is brought

Then Machir, the third ſon, was brought, whom all men now pitied for the death of his two brethren, and many exhorted him by his Brothers examples to deſiſt from his Opinion, and ſo avoid puniſhment : but he being angry hereat, replyed ; One Father begot us, one Mother bare us, one Maſter inſtructed us, we are all of one mind, and all like affected ; do therefore no longer prolong the time in vain. I came hither to ſuffer, and not to G ſpeak : uſe all your tyranny poſſible againſt this body : for you have no power at all over my Soul.

The

H The Tyrant hereat moved to ſee this third nothing relent by his brothers death, deviſed more cruelty than humane wit alone could invent. Wherefore he commanded a Globe to be brought, and tyed the holy Martyr about it in ſuch ſort, that all his bones were ſet out of joynt and diſplaced : whereat the holy Martyr was nothing diſmai'd. The skin alſo of his head and face was pull'd off, and then he was put on the Wheel : but he could not be rackt any worſe, for that his bones were all diſplaced, and did hang one ſeparated from another in moſt pitiful manner : and when the blood iſſued from him abundantly, he was deprived of the uſe of his hands and feet; but perceiving his life to be ſpent, he ſpake thus and dyed : We, O Tyrant, endure this Torment for the love of God, and thou the Author of ſuch unjuſt cruelty ſhalt ſuffer everlaſting pain.

I Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth, he was put into a frying pan, and ſo amidſt thoſe torments yielded up the Ghoſt.

Judas the 4. brother is brought.

Next after followed Judas, the fourth brother, whom all the people perſwaded and entreated to obey the King : but he contemning their prayers and exhortations, ſaid thus with all conſtancy: Your fire ſhall neither ſeparate nor ſever me from the Law of God, nor from my brethern, who inſtead of this mortal life, enjoy life everlaſting. I denounce unto thee, O Tyrant, deſtruction and overthrow; but to ſuch as believe, ſalvation : make tryal of me therefore, thou cruel wretch, and ſee if God will forſake me, who hath with open and ſtretched out Armes received my three brethren which are gone before me, and whom the womb of ſo holy a Mother at ſeveral times brought forth unto glory.

K The cruel Tyrant hearing this, was much moved, and from his Chair leapt down to torment this Martyr himſelf, and in his fury commanded his tongue to be cut forth : but he hereat not terrified, ſaid to Antiochus :

This cruelty will nothing avail thee, neither ſhalt thou hereby, Tyrant, as thou ſuppoſeſt conquer me. Our God needs not by voice to be awakned, but rather by ſecret cogitation to be prayed unto to help his ſervants : he provideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of ſuch as do call upon him, if they deſerve to be heard, and only requireth purity of Soul. For our God knoweth all things before we ask, and before we our ſelves enter into cogitation thereof, he underſtandeth our neceſſity : cut out my tongue, thou canſt not cut out my mind while my life remaineth. Thoſe prayers, which by it I have uttered to Almighty God, have taught it to ſuffer : would God thou wouldſt ſo ſanctifie all parts of my body by puniſhing them; L for thou therein inflicteſt puniſhment on thy ſelf, and reward upon me; and think not that thou ſhalt thus eſcape long unpuniſhed.

When he had thus ſpoken, his tongue was cut out of his mouth, and he bound to a ſtake, and there he was beaten with ropes ends, and he did patiently endure this, notwithſtanding the colour of his face became dead and wan. Being looſed from thence, he was put upon the wheel : and then praying for his Country-men, he by death went unto the reſt of his brethren.

The death of the 4. brother

Achas the 5. brother preſenteth himſelf to torments before he was called.

Then Achas, the fifth brother, before he was haled to torments, ſpake in this manner; Behold (thou Tyraut) I come to be puniſhed before thou command me, hope not therefore any jot to alter his mind, who as thou ſeeſt deſireth to be tormented. M The blood of my four innocent brethren, which thou haſt ſhed, hath condemned thee to Hell-fire : I am to make them up the number of five, that by it thy pains may be encreaſed. Tell me (bloody wretch) for what offence by us committed doeſt thou thus puniſh us? for what impiety doeſt thou ſo perſecute us? what villany have we commited? what wickedneſs? what naughtineſs have we attempted? This is all that thou canſt alledge againſt us, that we honour God our Creator, and live juſtly in obedience of his Laws, and therefore do not eſteem thy puniſhments : but they are to us honour and Salvation, and not puniſhment : we ſhall be greatly rewarded by God, if no part of us be left free from torment.

Whileſt thus he ſpake, his executioners by the Kings command took him, and caſt him into a brazen pot, and he was preſt down in it, his head to his feet : and afterward he ſuffered all other torments, N which his brethren had endured; yet not amazed hereat, he ſuddenly ſtarted up, and thus bitterly inveighed againſt the Tyrant : Cruel Tyrant, how great benefits doſt thou againſt thy will beſtow upon us! yea, the more thou art incenſed againſt us, the more acceptable to God ſhalt thou make us : yea, I ſhould be ſorry if thou ſhewdeſt mercy upon me. This ſhort affliction gaineth us life everlaſting; if this temporal death ſhould not betide me, everlaſting life could not befall me. And thus he finiſht his Agony, and dyed.

Then the tormenters laid hands upon the ſixth brother, who was called Areth, to whom the Tyrant made offer either of honour or puniſhment: but he diſdaining his offer, ſaid : Although (Tyrant) I be younger in years than my martyred brethren, yet my con- O ſtancy of mind to theirs is not inferiour : for we were all nouriſht up together, all together inſtructed

A ſtructed, and we will all dy together in the fear of God. Haſten therefore your torments, and that time which thou wouldeſt ſpend in exhorting me, ſpend it in deviſing tortures for me.

The valour of the ſixth brother.

Antiochus hereat confounded commanded him to be bound to a Pillar with his head hanging down, in ſuch wiſe as the defluxion of humours might cauſe ach: and this done, he cauſed a fire to be made ſo far off him, that it could not burn him, but roſt him. He alſo commanded him, as he hung, to be pricked with awls, that ſo the heat might pierce into the holes they made in his fleſh. Whilſt thus he was tormented, much blood like froth gathered about his head and face, and he then ſpake in this manner. O noble fight! O valiant War! O ſtrife between piety and impiety! Theſe men have paſt their Agonies, whoſe Crown of Martyrdom is the puniſhment of their perſecutors: I do moſt willingly B follow my brethren, that as by blood I am conjoyned unto them; ſo by death I may not be ſeparated from them. Deviſe, O Tyrant, ſome new Torment, for theſe I have already overcome. O maſter of cruelty, Enemy of piety, perſecuter of juſtice! we ſix Brethren have conquered the Kings power, and what his Kingdom or the whole world could afford. Thy fire is cold and heateth not, and the Kings weapons are bended and blunted in our bodies; our God giveth us more courage to ſuffer, than thou haſt to puniſh: and ſo the precept of God remaineth firm in us.

The ſixth brother ſharply reproves Antiochus.

And as he thus ſpake, one took hold of his tongue with a hot pair of tongs, and ſo with the ſame torments, that his brethren had ſuffered, being fryed in a pan he gave up the Ghoſt.

C Six of the Brethren being now dead by diverſity of torments, only one of the ſeven remained alive with his mother, named Jacob, younger in years (but not in conſtancy of mind) than the reſt of his brethren. He preſenting himſelf before the Tyrant, moved him to compaſſion, both for that he was left alone, and the laſt of his brethren, and alſo that he was to periſh: wherefore he called the child unto him, and into a place where no inſtruments of torments were, and taking him by the hand, he ſaid thus unto him, hoping to win him by fair ſpeeches: By thy brethrens calamity thou now well haſt learned, what is prepared for thee, if thou diſobey me: deliver thy ſelf therefore from theſe torments, and I will give thee what honour my kingdom can afford: thou ſhalt be a Magiſtrate, and General of my Army, and one of my Counſellors.

Jacob the ſeventh brother brought to torments.

D But perceiving himſelf not to prevail, he cauſed the young man's Mother to be called unto him: who coming and ſtanding near her Son, the Tyrant ſaid thus unto her; Where are now, O worthy woman, all thy Children? Behold of ſuch a number, if thou pleaſe, the deſtiny affords thee one: adviſe therefore thy Child, and mollifie his obſtinate mind by wholſom counſel.

The Mother having heard what the King ſaid, made her reverence to the King: which done, that the King might not underſtand her, ſhe ſpake in Hebrew to her Child as followeth:

Pitty thy Mother, O ſon, and comfort thy ſorrowfull Mother, who bare thee nine months in my womb, and gave thee ſuck three years, and with great induſtry have brought thee up to this E age. I pray thee, dear ſon, conſider the Heaven and Earth, and all that in them u; and know, that God created them all of nothing, who alſo of nothing created Mankind. Fear not this Ethnick's pains and torments, but imitate thy brethren, and contemn death, that in the day of mercy I may receive thee and thy brethen again in Heaven.

As his mother thus admoniſhed him, he in the Hebrew tongue requeſted to be unbound, for that he had a ſecret to diſcloſe to the King: who being unfettered he preſently ran to the torments prepared: for there was a Frying-pan red hot, that was prepared for ſuch as were to ſuffer: unto the which the Child coming, remembring his brethren, and beholding alſo the King, he ſaid unto him; Cruel tyrant, I now know thee not only to have been cruel againſt my brethren, but even cruelty it ſelf. Wretch that thou F art, who gave thee this purple? and who exalted thee to this Kingdom and dignity? even he, whom thou in us doſt perſecute, whoſe ſervants and worſhippers thou killeſt and tormenteſt, for which thy wickedneſs thy ſelf ſhall ſuffer eternal fire and torments which ſhall have no end. Thou art of higher dignity and authority in this world than other men, yet he that made other men, made thee alſo of the ſame nature that they are: for all men are born and muſt die alike. He that kills another, ſheweth that he himſelf may be killed: thou teareſt and tormenteſt thy own picture and image in vain: thou in thy fury killeſt him, whom not long ſince God created like thy ſelf, and according to the ſame law thou thinkeſt all lawful, which thy Kingly power can command: thou pulleſt out our tongues, and teareſt our bodies with fleſh-hooks, and conſumeſt with fire: but they, who have already ſuffered this, have received everlaſting joy for their reward; and thou ſhalt anſwer for all the puniſhments inflicted upon them.

G

The death of the youngeſt brother.

H Think not that I expect any favour at thy hands; I will follow my brethren, and remain conſtant in our Law. The Tyrant hearing this was wroth, and cauſed him to be tormented: but his Mother in his torment comforted him, and with her kind hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood iſſued out of his mouth, noſe and privy parts, the tormentors not ceaſing till life in him was almoſt ſpent: but they (by Gods appointment) gave over, and ſo he took ſtrength again to endure more, than any of his brethren had done; at laſt, his Hands and Arms being cut off, he lifted up his Eyes to Heaven, and cryed, O Adonai, O Sabaor, be mercifull unto me, and receive me into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now ceaſe, and grant them mercy, who by us do make interceſſion to thee:

I Having ſaid thus, his tongue being pulled out, he of his own accord went into the fiery Frying pan, and ſo to the great admiration of Antiochus died.

Reaſon, Miſtreſs of our affection.

Behold how evident it is, that reaſon can rule our affections, ſeeing that Children hereby ſhewed more conſtancy, than the Tyrant could ſhew cruelty. For it was reaſon's force, that wrought in them that determination to ſuffer all torments, rather than to forſake the way of Salvation.

A ſimilitude of the waves. The ſeven brethren exhort one another to ſuffer death manfully.

Theſe conſtant young men do fitly reſemble inexpugnable Towers, and them, who after a great tempeſt and ſhipwrak do ſafely enter the harbour of Salvation, who guiding their courſe amidſt the boyſtetous waves, at laſt obtain the wiſhed ſhore. For every one of them ſtrengthened the other by advice and good counſel, and none of K them was ſo effeminate as to decline his Martyrdom. None uſed delay herein, but one followed anothers example. Let us therefore dy for our Law, and imitate the three Children, whom the Aſyrians fury condemned to the fiery Furnace, whoſe patience ſpread their fame even unto Heaven.

True brotherhood.

A pledge and ſign of brotherly amity.

Whilſt thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to paſs, that none of them offended, but each one reſolute in his Religion, took example of the virtue, courage and conſtancy of their fore-father Iſaac, who underſtanding that it was God's will, that he ſhould be Sacrificed, refuſed not to ſubmit his body to his Fathers Sword. Let us (ſaid they) yield our Souls to him, of whom we receied both Soul and Body: It is a ſmall matter for us to ſuffer loſs of theſe members, ſeeing that we ſhall in lieu of L them receive everlaſting bliſs. Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob do joyfully expect us, as Co-heirs of their Kingdom: let us glorifie that womb, wherein we were for ten months ſpace: let none of us be more coward than the other, nor none of us degenerate from the other. we that were all begotten of one Father, and ſucked of one milk, muſt in all things reſemble one another: we had one teacher, and one law inviolate. And in this golden bond of concord were theſe brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to ſee the other tormented, but all rejoyced at the others death. O Children, whoſe dignity ſurpaſſeth the Royalty of Kings and Princes, whoſe glory and virtue is unſpeakable! None of you were terrified with fear, but you ſo haſtened to your deaths, as though you had been to go to bliſs and felicity: you were truly brethren, who even M by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our Nation, & in you ſhewed us all an example of fortitude: whom therefore I think he cauſed to be ſo many in number, as were the days, wherein he created the World, ſo that theſe ſeven brethren may reſemble the ſeven days, wherein all things were made. And why ſhould we ſo admire this fortitude in theſe young men, when a woman armed her ſelf with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to be called a Mother, but to be honoured with a higher title than humane frailty can afford, who bare into this World ſo many triumphs.

The mothers grief.

For the Mother ſeeing her Children dead, was with a kind and godly zeal inflamed alſo to ſuffer: and no marvel, ſeeing that the very brute beaſts, if they perceive violence offered to their young, do expoſe themſelves to perils in their defence, and protect N them with their wings, teeth, and tallons; yea, and every one, that is any way able to make reſiſtance, oppoſeth her ſelf to the Enemy to defend her young. And not only brute Beaſts do this, but even Bees do defend their young, and their honey, threatning their Stings to them that offer to taſt thereof, and more eſteeming the good of their young than their own lives. But this zealous mother directed by the Spirit of God, and the dictates of reaſon, incouragd her Children to dy, and being to dy after them choſe rather to be a ſpectator of their death than otherwiſe.

When all her family had ſuffered, ſhe as the laſt and glory of them all came to execution deſpiſing the Tyrants threats, offering her motherly breſt to thoſe torments, which her Children had ſuffered. O bleſſed ſtock, and bleſſed increaſe of the ſelf ſame womb! Why ſhould I not affirm, that in all lineaments and feature of O the body you are like your mother? and if this be a commendation in them, that beſide

A features of the body receive nothing of their Mother, I will ſay more of you, that you are like your mother in Fortitude, Vertue, and Religion ; and that you ſo in all things reſemble her, that you are every way equal unto her, ſave only herein, that ſhe with her Eyes beheld the immanity of your torments, and was afterward as conſtant in her own Martyrdom, as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, that ſhe ſuffered ſeven torments before ſhe came to ſuffer in her own perſon, & feared in every one of them leſt ſhe ſhould be overcome. But O thou example of all women, I cannot tell, whether thou bareſt theſe Children in thy womb, or createdſt them, who couldſt with dry Eyes look upon them, whilſt they were torn in pieces : yea, I ſay little, affirming that thou B patiently didſt behold thoſe ſights ; for even thou thy ſelf didſt exhort them thereunto ; thou rejoycedſt to ſee one of them torn in pieces with Fleſh-hooks, the other to be racked upon the Wheel, the third to be bound and beaten : thou joyfully admiredſt the others burning, and exhortedſt the reſt not to be terrified here with ; and although, whilſt thou beheld'ſt their torments, thy grief was greater, than that which thou hadſt in Childbirth, yet didſt thou bear a lightſome and chearful countenance, as though it had been one triumphing. While they were a killing, thou didſt laugh, and ſeeing only one of all thy Children left hereat thou didſt nothing relent. Can I deſcribe how every one periſhed, ſeeing thou their mother didſt laugh at their deaths, and when their ſinews were cut in two, their heads flaid, their tongues pulled forth by the Roots, their C hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and caſt upon Iron plates red-hot, and upon Wheels, and their ribs pulled in ſunder, and many other torments for which we want names ? Never was any Swan, which (if you will believe antiquity) Sings ſweeteſt before her death, comparable to the Funeral notes of thy dying Children.

The mother ſuffereth ſeven torments before ſhe was tormented.

And you, bleſſed offspring, were not overcome by that Syren's enchantments, but to honour God ſcrupled not to leave your Mother without Children : And ſhe being as pious & brave on her ſide, choſe rather to want you for a time, than to incur eternal damnation, wiſhing rather that the bodies of her Children ſhould be tormented, than their Souls. Well ſhe knew, that nothing was more frail and infirm than our bodies, which, though perſecution be wanting, are often killed with Agues, and other Maladies: Who is ignorant, that ſhipwrack is incident to Sailers, diſaſters to them that travel, ſudden death D to thoſe that live at eaſe ? ſudden caſualty by fire, and by the hands of Theives, and a thouſand other ways to diſpatch our lives ? Seeing then that our mortal bodies are ſubject to ſo many miſeries to bring us to our end, who would not make choice of a quick diſpatch, whereby we loſe goods of this World and gain life everlaſting ? O thou moſt reverend of all women, the credit of thy Nation, and honour of our Religion, who, like the Ark of Noe, didſt perſiſt inviolate amongſt ſuch ſtormy Waves ! for as the Arke withſtood the force of the deluge, and being built ſtrongly with firm boards, did not ſuffer any thing within it to periſh: ſo thou ſufferedſt not the Tyrant to overcome the holy Ghoſt, which thou hadſt received in thy heart.

A ſimilitude from the Deluge.

Behold of what force and efficacy Reaſon is ! which oftentimes maketh men inferiour E to women. For neither was Daniel ſo tortured at the ſight of the Lions, nor the three Children with the fiery Furnace, as this woman was afflicted at the death of all her Children, before ſhe came to her own Agony. What would another woman and Mother have done in this Caſe, but wept, and with pitiful lamentations have cryed ?
Ah wretch thas I am! moſt unhappy and miſerable of all that breath! who therefore bare ſo many Children into this World, that their ſeveral deaths might be ſo many ſeveral occaſions of my grief and ſorrow: ſhe would have commemorated her frequent labours & the pains ſhe endured in her ten Months bearing them, ſhe would have bewailed her ill fortune, who brought forth her ſons to ſo many deaths and dangers, ſhe would have recounted the milk wherewith ſhe fed them, and their meat ſhe had prepared for them, the F pains ſhe had taken with them, how ſhe had carried them in her Arms, and ſung to them, and taught them to ſpeak ; her cares, her watchings, her fear, leſt any miſ-hap ſhould betide them ; and with weeping tears would have ſaid, Shall I never be a Grandmother, and embrace your Children, who a while ago was a fruitful mother my ſelf, but am now deprived of you all ? If this day I dy, I have none to bury me. But this handmaid of God forgot all theſe complaints, that another mother would have made, and with an Adamantine fence more impenetrable than the never-yielding Rocks, did neither forſake her Children in their torments, nor in their death, but rather compelled them to periſh, and never ſorrowed thereat. For being apprehended, together with her ſeven Sons, ſhe conſidering Eleazar's Martyrdom, did thus exhort them in the Hebrew G tongue.

The mothers ſpeech exhorting her ſeven Sons to ſuffer.

O my moſt dear and loving Children, let us haſten to that Martyrdom which may make us a H credit to our Nation, and gain of God an everlaſting reward; let us without fear preſent our ſelves unto thoſe torments, which Eleazar's aged body endured; calling to mind our Father Abraham of worthy memory, who, having but one only Son, did ſacrifice him, being willed by God ſo to do, and feared not to bring him to the Altar, though he was the fruit and only comfort of his age. Iſaac alſo was willing to be ſacrificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things: the like may be ſaid of Daniel and the three Children: believe me, we are rather tried than tormented. For whatſoever this World affordeth is mortal and tranſient.

A Golden ſaying of the mother of her ſeven Children.

Thus did this mother arm her Childrens minds with fortitude, and though a woman infuſed courage and conſtancy into men. And when her Children were all dead, ſhe I a worthy mother of ſo many Champions, kneeling down in the place of torment, beſought God to put an end to her life, proteſting, that ſhe had not for love of life ſo long deferred to dye, but only for her Childrens ſake, and that now ſhe had ſeen them all ſeven triumphing. Whereupon the rage of Antiochus grew hot, and he commanded this noble perſon to be tormented, and accordingly (as the Tyrant willed) ſhe was ſtriped naked, and hanged up by the hands, and moſt cruelly whipped: her dugs and paps were pulled off, and ſhe put into the red-hot Frying-pan, being moſt willing to follow her Childrens ſteps in torment; and lifting up her Eyes and hands to Heaven, ſhe prayed for all women with Child, and ſo yielded her chaſt Soul to God. But Antiochus was ſtriken with fire from Heaven. O thou! miſtreſs of juſtice who followed'ſt K thy triumphing Children: O Conquerer of Tyrants, and a Looking-Glaſs for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not only to women, but to all men that ſhall be after thee, reverenced of them that now are, and to be worſhiped of them that are to come, and to be admired not only of our Nation, but of all other people. Thy light obſcureth the bright ſhining Moon: and though ſhe fill the World with her brightneſs, yet is ſhe not comparable to thy ſhining light. Seven lights inviron thee about, dazling the brightneſs of the ſeven Planets. Could any Painter expreſs, or any hand in writing declare the torments which you ſuffered? none could with dry eyes read or behold them. All people would flock about to ſee it. All people would praiſe, and eſteem him to have offered a great gift, who to God's glory had painted ſo incomparable a picture. L And if any skilful workman ſhould engrave this Tragedy upon a Sepulchre, or in his houſe, doubtleſs he ſhould be freed from all plague and miſfortune. But where could a ſtone be found able to contain ſo many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the Mother and her ſeven Sons are for their Nobility graced with a Sepulchre, and a great reverence is done unto them of all men, yea, even by men that are not of our Religion; and there is a conſtellation of eight ſtars ordained as an argument of their juſtice; and Angels did execute their Funerals. The Tyrant himſelf was aſtoniſhed to ſee the conſtancy of ſuch godly minds. And thus have they found ſuch favour in the ſight of God, that they have obtained remiſſion of the ſins of our Nation: For preſently after the Tryrant was deſtroyed, and Iſrael was freed from his Tyranny. M

The mother followed her Sons in torments.

The light of the juſt. 1. Cor. 15.

Antiochus leavied an Army of Footmen from amongſt the Hebrews.

But Antiochus, ſeeing the greatneſs of their Faith, and their contempt of death, gathered an Army of Foot out of the Hebrews, by whoſe help he terrified his Enemies, and got great Renown. O bleſſed ſeed of Abraham! behold what benefit the Sufferings of the Mother and her ſeven Sons brought to us their Country-men! let us perſiſt in this piety, that ſo we may be like our Forefathers: behold! the death of a few did end all the miſeries and ſins of our whole Nation, and you by your Country-mens hands vanquiſhed their perſecutors Enemies, & after that victory our ſins were remitted; & laſt of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrails devoured with Worms, he ſmelling like Carrion, gave up the Ghoſt, and was ever after death puniſhed for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Jeruſalem to forſake their Law, he made War againſt N the Perſians, and there received that which he deſerved.

Antiochus died ſtinking exceedingly 2. Mac. 9.

An Epitome of the life of the ſeven Sons and their mother.

It now remaineth, that we briefly repeat all that is before ſaid. For in her Agony, this ſacred mother ſaid thus unto the ſtanders by; Whileſt it was lawful for me, I kept my ſelf a Virgin; and then I married and lived a Chaſt Wife, and forſook not my own houſe. I brought forth ſuch Sons, as I need not be aſhamed of; and though daunted with my Husbands death, yet I did not forſake my Faith. This, and many things elſe ſhe recounted. And what more? She ſet before her Childrens Eyes the examples of the Prophets; how Abel by his brother was ſlain, Iſaac to be offered in ſtead of a ſacrifice; how Jacob was baniſhed, Joſeph kept in priſon, Daniel caſt before the Lions, the three Children into the O fiery furnace: She rehearſed alſo unto them the Book of Iſaiah, where it is ſaid: Although,

A though thou do go through the fire, the flame ſhall not burn thee. That of David, The juſt ſhall have much tribulation; and Solomon, who propoſeth the tree of life to ſuch as do the will of God; not omitting that of Ezeckiel, Theſe dry and withered bones ſhall live again: Alſo that of Moſes Canticle, I will kill and reſtore to life, and the length of your days is in my hand. Unhappy Tyrant, what did thy Cauldrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what availed thee to cut away their Eye-lids, and to pull out their tongues? thou thy ſelf for ſo doing doſt now endure far worſe than all theſe. And they whom thou killedſt (believe me) enjoy Everlaſting comfort, and are now ſecure of bliſs and revenge. For they, who ſuffer for Gods ſake, ſhall have happy ſucceſs, when God the Father of all things ſhall reward them with life everlaſting that follow
B him. Thus have I conſecrated theſe worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of the ſacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, who ſhall live in any age hereafter.

The joy of the bleſſed in everlaſting Life.

PHILO'S RELATION OF AN EMBASSY I

(In which he was the Chief Perſon)

From the Jews of Alexandria to the Emperour CAIUS CALIGULA.

The PREFACE of Philo, upon the blindneſs of man, and the incomprehenſible Grandeur and Majeſty of God. K

HOW long ſhall we confound old Age and Infancy, and be as imprudent at ſixty, as at ſixteen ? For what greater imprudence can there be, than to look upon Fortune as a ſettled and certain thing, when there is nothing more inconſtant, and to conſider this Nature (which is immutable) as ſubject to continual changes ? Is it not to invert the order of things, and ſhuffle them together like Counters? to fix our Eyes upon uncertain things, as if they were more firm and durble than thoſe which were certain ? The reaſon of this Error L proceeds from this, that preſent objects doe more eaſily affect Men of ordinary underſtanding, than objects that are more remote ; and moſt men do allow more credit to their Senſes (though deceitfull) than to the reflections of their mind ; becauſe nothing is more eaſy, than to ſuffer our ſelves to be taken with what is preſented to our Eyes ; whereas there muſt be Argumentation and Reaſon to compreheud things that are future and inviſible. Not but that the Eye of the Soul is as quick and piercing, as the Eye of the Body, but ſome people dazle it by their intemperance, and others by their ſtupidity, which is the greateſt fault of all.

So many extraordinary events happening in our Age inforces a beleif that there is a providence, and that God Almighty takes particular care of virtuous Men, who have recourſe to him in their neceſſityes, and more eſpecially of thoſe who are conſecrated to his ſervice. M They are as it were the partage and propriety of this Supream Soveraign, whoſe Empire has no end. To theſe people the Chaldeans gave the name of Iſraelits, which is as much as to ſay, Seers of God, and certainly it is an happineſs preferrable to all the Treaſures of the Earth : For if the preſence of thoſe, whoſe age renders them venerable to us (as our Maſters, Superiours, and Parents) imprints ſo great a reſpect in us, that it many times corrects our Enormities, and diſpoſes us to virtue ; How great an advantage, and incouragment is it to us to elevate our minds above all Created things, and accuſtom our ſelves to the contemplation of God, who is not only uncreated, but infinitely good, infinitely beautiful, infinitely happy, or (to ſpeak more properly) whoſe goodneſs ſurpaſſes all goodneſs, whoſe beauty ſurpaſſes all beauty, and whoſe happineſs ſurpaſſes all happineſs, and yet this is but a weak and imperfect explication N of his Grandeur: for how can words be able to deſcribe him, who is ſo tranſcendently above every thing, that after our mind has advanced it ſelf as high towards him, as is poſſible, by the attributes which it has given him, as by ſo many ſtairs, yet it is forced back again without being able to approach or underſtand him ? for he is ſo vaſtly incomprehenſible, that, if every Ceature of the Creation was changed into ſo many Tongues, they could not expreſs that ſoveraign power, by which he Created all things; that Royall conduct meriting an Eternal Monarch, and by which he preſerves the World, and that juſt diſtribution of rewards and puniſhments, which are diſpenſed with ſo much equity and wiſdom, that our chaſtiſments may be put into the number of his Mercies and Bleſſings, not only as they are part of his juſtice, but as they are many times ſerviceable to the converſion of ſinners, or at leaſt as they reſtrain and hinder O them from continuing in their Crimes for fear of thoſe pains, which they ſee inflicted upon others.

CHAP. I.

The incredible Felicity of the firſt ſeven Months of the Reign of the Emperour Caius Caligula.

The Emperour Caius Caligula is an Eminent example of what I have ſaid: Never was there ſeen a greater tranquillity, than that which was injoyd by all the Provinces both by Sea and Land, when he was advanced to the Empire after the death of Tiberius: B The Eaſt, the Weſt, the North and South were all in profound peace: The Greeks had no difference with the Barbarians: The Souldiers and Citizens lived quietly and in good intelligence together. So great a felicity ſeemed to be incredible: & it could not be ſufficiently admired, that ſo young a Prince mounting the throne he ſhould be attended with ſo much proſperity, that his deſires could not exceed his injoyments: His Riches were immence, his Forces both by Land & Sea great and formidable, his Revenues prodigious flowing, into his Exchequer (as from an inexhauſtible Stream)from all parts of the habitable World: For his Empire extended to the Rhine, and the Euphrates; the firſt ſeparating it from Germany and other wild Nations, and the other bounding it from the Parthians, Sarmatians, Scythians and other people no leſs barbarous than the Germans. So that it might be ſaid, from the riſing to the ſetting C of the Sun, not only upon the continent, but in the Iſles, and even in the parts on the other ſide of the Sea, all was in peace and felicity: The people of Rome, all Italy, and all the Provinces both in Europe and Aſia lived in a perpetual feaſt: For it was never ſeen before under the Reign of any of their Emperours, that every man by the bleſſing of God injoy'd his eſtate in that quietneſs, and bare ſo great a ſhare in the publick felicity, that there was nothing wanting to his deſires. In all the Towns there was nothing to be ſeen but Altars, and Victims, and Sacrifices, and Prieſts in their white Robes, with Garlands of flowers upon their head. All places were full of Chearfulneſs, Feaſting, Playing, Muſick, Running of Horſes, Banqueting, Dancing to the Flute, D and the Harp and all other Divertiſments imaginable. No difference to be diſcerned in the contentment of either Rich or Poor, Common Perſons, or Perſons of Quality Maſters and Servants, or Creditor and Debtor. The felicity of that time was equal to all conditions, and what was verified then, made it almoſt credible, what the Poets had ſaid formerly in their fables of the age of Saturn. And in this manner they paſſed ſeven compleat Months.

CHAP. II.

E The Emperour Caius, having Reigned but ſeven Months, fell deſperatly ill: The great concernment which all the Provinces expreſſed for it, & their incredible joy at his recovery.

The next Month this happy Emperour fell into a great fit of ſickneſs; for having left his old way of living ſoberly and temperately, which preſerves people in health, and was the way he took, whilſt Tiberius was alive, he plunged himſelf into Intemperance and Luxury: He drank much Wine, eat to exceſs, bath'd unſeaſonably, cram'd himſelf, till he could not keep what he had taken down, and when he had diſgorged, crammed himſelf again: He gave himſelf up wholly to Women, and to pleaſures
F more unnaturally criminal; in ſhort he abandoned himſelf to all other diſorders that were moſt likely to alter that Temperament and Harmony of body and mind, which Temperance maintains in health and vigour; whereas Intemperance weakens it, and expoſes it to Diſtempers, that are moſt commonly mortal.

It was then about the beginning of Autumn, which is the laſt Seaſon in the year that is proper for Navigation, and the time in which thoſe, who traffick in forreign parts, return home. By this means the news of his ſickneſs was in a moment carried all over the World, and changed their joy into ſadneſs. The Towns, and the houſes were generally full of mourning and affliction; and the Emperours ſickneſs became the diſtemper of all the Provinces; and theirs was the greateſt, becauſe his infirmity was only in G his body, but theirs in their minds, apprehending to looſe with their peace the injoyment of all thoſe good things, which were concomitant with it, and having obſerved

the

the death of their Emperors attended commonly with Famine and other calamities, that H that are the conſequents of War, they could not ſee any thing ſo likely to exempt them, as the health of their Prince.

His ſickneſs beginning to abate, the news was immediately ſpread abroad, and carried joy to the very ends of the Earth; For nothing is more nimble than fame; and every body expected the news of his recovery with incredible patience; and when it arrived every body believed himſelf recovered with him, and reſtored to his former felicity. It is not remembred, that any joy was ever ſo general, all people ſeeming to have paſſed, as it were in a Moment, from a ſavage and ruſtick, to a ſoft and a ſociable life; from Deſarts to Towns; from Diſorder to Order; and all by their happineſs in being under the conduct of a bountiful and legitimate Prince. I

CHAP. III.

The Emperor Caius abandons himſelf to all ſorts of Debauchery, and with horrid ingratitude, and terrible cruelty obliges young Tiberius, the Emperor's Grand-ſon, to kill himſelf.

BUT it was quickly diſcernable, that the Spirit of man is blind in its imaginations; that he is ignorant of what is moſt for his advantage, and that he takes the K ſhadow many times for the ſubſtance. For this Prince, who was conſider'd as an admirable Benefactor, and one whoſe Munificence and Favours were ſpread all over Europe and Aſia, became a Monſter for cruelty, or to ſpeak more properly, he diſcovered that humour, which though born with him, he had diſſembled till that time. The Emperour Tiberius had by his Son Druſus (who dyed before him) this young Tiberius: and by his Nephew Germanicus he had Caius Caligula, whom he preferred to Tiberius in the Succeſſion of the Empire upon condition, that he ſhould acknowledg the greatneſs of the benefit by the manner of his comportment with his Grand-Child: But Caius, inſtead of being concern'd for having received that by Adoption, which belonged to young Tiberius by Succeſſion, prov'd ingratfull, and carried it to that exceſs of Inhumanity, that L not contented to have defeated him of his Empire, he cauſed him to be put to death upon pretence of practices againſt him; as if a perſon of his age had been capable of ſo great a deſign; but many people are of opinion, that if young Tiberius had had ſome few years more over his head, his Grandfather would doubtleſs have made him his Succeſſor, and laid aſide Caius, of whom he began already to be jealous.

And this was the way which Caius took to execute his deteſtable Reſolution upon a Perſon, with whom in juſtice he ought to have parted the Soveraignty. He cauſed the young Tiberius to appear before him, aſſembled his friends, and told them, I love Tiberius, not only as my Kinſman, but as my Brother, and I wiſh with all my heart, it was in my power to take him preſently as a partner into the Government, that I might M thereby fulfil the laſt will and Teſtament of his Grand Father: But you ſee the tenderneſs of his years, and that he is fitter to have a Governor, than to be a Governor himſelf. Were it not for that, what joy, what eaſe would it be to me to have diſcharge my ſelf of part of ſo great a burden, as it is to manage and conduct ſo many ſeveral Nations? Seeing then the affection which I bear him obliges me to it, I think good to declare to you, that I am reſolved to ſerve and take care of him, not only as a Governour, but as a Father; by which name I deſire he may call me, and I ſhall call him Son for the future.

When Caius by this Artifice had deluded all that were preſent, and by his counterfeit Adoption rather rob'd, than confer'd upon the poor Prince that part of the Empire, N to which he might lawfully have pretended, there was nothing left, that might obſtruct his falling into that Snare, which he had laid for him: for the Laws of the Romans do give the Parents an abſolute power over their Children, and then the Supream degree of authority in which he was eſtabliſhed, left no man in a Capacity to queſtion any thing he did. So that looking upon this young Prince as an Enemy, he treated him accordingly without reſpect to his age, or any conſideration, that he had been brought up by the Emperor with hopes of ſucceeding him in the Government: for after his Father Druſus was dead, the Emperour took him into his tuition, and uſed him rather like his Son than his Grand-Child.

It

A It is reported, that Caius commanded him to kill himſelf in the preſence of ſeveral Tribunes and Captains, forbidding them ſtrictly to give him any aſſiſtance, becauſe (forſooth) it was not decent, that the deſcendents of an Emperour ſhould die by any inferiour hands: For he would needs paſs for a ſtrict obſerver of the Laws, at the very time when he broke them, and a Bigot in Religion, when he was committing ſo great a Crime, without the leaſt compunction or remoſe for making a Stalking-Horſe of the truth by ſo ſtrange an hypocriſie.

The poor Prince, who had never ſeen any murders before, nor been accuſtomed to thoſe counterfeit Combats, in which young Princes are uſually exerciſed in time of Peace, preſented his Throat to the perſon who ſtood next him; but he and all the reſt B refuſing to diſpatch him, he took the Dagger himſelf, ask'd them where he was to ſtrike, and they in their great Civility having inſtructed him, he ſtab'd himſelf immediatly, and that with many blows, till by a lamentable and unmercifull compulſion he had murder'd himſelf.

CHAP. IIII.

Caius puts to death Macro Colonel of his Pretorian bands, to whom he was oblig'd C both for his life and his Empire.

WHEN Caius had finiſhed that buſineſs, which of all his affairs was of the greateſt importance, there being no body left that could pretend to the Empire, or to whom any turbulent perſons could in prudence apply, he turn'd his indignation upon Macro, reſolving, that he alſo ſhould feel the effects of his Cruelty and Ingratitude.

This Macro had not only ſerv'd him faithfully ſince his advancement to the Throne, (which would have been no extraordinary thing, becauſe Princes who are fortnnate ſhall never want flatterers) but he had been a great means, that Tiberius had choſen him D for his Succeſſor: For beſides that there never was Prince of greater Sagacity and Penetration than Tiberius, the experience, which his years had given him, gave him ſo large an inſight into the ſecreteſt Cogitations of Man, that he began to be jealous of Caius: he ſuſpected him an Enemy in his heart to the whole family of the Claudii; and that if he had any natural affection at all, it was only for his Relations by the Mothers ſide, ſo that Tiberius began to be apprehenſive for his Grand Child, if he ſhould leave him a Minor. Again he looked upon Caius as uncapable of the Government of ſo great an Empire, by reaſon of the weakneſs and levity of his parts, which ſeem'd rather inclining to folly than otherwiſe: ſo little Solidity was there to be obſerved either in his word or his actions: But there was no Stone that Macro left unturned to E diſcuſſe theſe ſuſpitions, and eſpecially his apprehenſion for his Grand-Child. He aſſured the Emperour, that Caius had an extreme reſpect for him, & ſo great an affection for his Couſin, that he would willingly leave the Empire to him, & that it was nothing but his retention and modeſty, that made people think him weak in his intellectuals. When Macro found theſe Reaſons would not work, he feared not to offer himſelf in Caution: and the Emperour had no reaſon to ſuſpect his Sincerity after the Teſtimony, which he had given of it not only in diſcovering, but defeating the Conſpiracy of Sejanus. In ſhort, he was always commending Caius, (if it may be called commending to undertake his juſtification againſt all uncertain ſurmiſes, and undetermined accuſations) and carried himſelf ſo towards him, that, if Caius had been his Brother or F his Son, he could not have done more: Several have attributed the Cauſe to the reſpects, which Caius always ſhew'd to Macro, but more to the good offices of his Wife, who for ſome private Reaſons was always crying him up, and magnifying him to her Husband, and every one knows the influence of Women, eſpecially if they be immodeſt, for then no Art nor Flattery can eſcape them, that may conceal their tranſgreſſions from their Husband. Macro, being ignorant of ſome paſſages in his houſe, interpreted theſe artifices for affection, & the greateſt of his Enemies paſſed in his thoughts for the trueſt of his friends. That he had preſerved Caius in ſo many dangers, and could not imagine, that he would ever be ingrateful, gave him the confidence to admoniſh him with great liberty upon an apprehenſion, that he would either ruin himſelf, G or be corrupted by other people. He was like a good workman, jealous of his own manufacture, and could not endure it ſhould be ſpoil'd. Caius falling aſleep one day at at the Table, Macro was bold to wake and admoniſh him, that it was neither decent nor H ſecure; for he in that condition might eaſily be ſlain. When Caius was looking upon his Dancers or Mimicks with ſuch extraordinary pleaſure and attention, that he could not contain from imitating their Geſtures; when not contenting himſelf to ſmile, or be pleaſ'd, he brake out into a loud Laughter among the Comedians or Buffoons; or when he ſung or play'd among the Muſitians, he jog'd him Gently, if he was with in reach, to the end he might give over, and told him in his Ear, what no body elſe durſt have ventur'd to have ſaid.

You are not, SIR, to abandon your ſelf to the pleaſures of your ſence like other men, but are rather to ſurpaſs them in gravity and prudence, as much as you tranſcend them in dignity and I extraction. How ſtrange will it appear, for the Monarch of the World, to be unable to moderate himſelf in ſuch ſlight and contemptible things? The great honour, that invirons you, obliges you to do nothing unſuitable to the Majeſty of ſo great and ſo redoubted an Emperour: When you are in the Theatre, or Circus, or in the place of any publick exerciſe, you are not to conſider the ſhow or ſpectacle ſo much, as the pains and care, which thoſe perſons, who preſent it, have taken to do it to your content; and are to argue thus with your ſelf; If theſe perſons have taken ſo much pains in things that are uſeleſs to the life of man, and only ſerviceable to the pleaſures of the ſpectators, that thereby they may merit their applauſes & acclamation, what is there incumbent upon a Prince, who profeſſes an art infinitely more eſtimable? Do you not know, that there is nothing equal to governing well, ſeeing it cauſes plenty in all places capable of Cultivation, and ſecures Navigation, by which all the Provinces have Commerce, and communicate their reſpective Commodities? Envy and Jealouſie, to fruſtrate this happy K Communication, have like poiſon infected ſome perſons, and ſome Towns: But ſince your Auguſt Family has been advanced to the Sovereignty and Supreme power, which extends it ſelf as well over the Seas as Lands of the whole Earth, it has repelled theſe monſters into the moſt recluſe and obſcure Solitudes. To you alone it is that this ſupreme Authority is committed. Providence has plac'd you, as a judicious Pilot, to manage the Helm. It is your office to look to the good conduct of this incomparable veſſel fraughted with the welfare of all mankind; and as ſo noble an office is above all eſtimation, you ought not to take pleaſure in any thing ſo much, as in rendring ſo many Nations, as are under your dominion, happy by your benefits. 'Tis true they may be oblig'd by particular perſons, but it is from their Prince only they are to expect L this excellent conduct, by which he ſhowrs down his bounty upon them with full hands, reſerving only ſuch things, as in prudence are neceſſary for the remedying of ſuch accidents, as cannot be foreſeen.

Thus it was, that this unfortunate Counſellor adviſ'd Caius with deſigne to have made him better; But his wicked nature turned his remedies into poiſon, made a mock of his counſel, and became much worſe; in ſo much as, when Macro came towards him one time, he ſaid to thoſe who were then about him; Do you ſee that impertinent Schoolmaſter, that ridiculous Pedagogue? he would take upon him to give inſtructions, not only to a Child, but to a perſon wiſer than himſelf. He prates, as if a ſubject was to command an Emperour, and an Emperour, that is not ignorant in the art of Governing, and he believes himſelf excellent in that ſcience. But I would fain know, where he learned it. For my M part, I was brought up to it from my Cradle, receiving continual inſtructions from my Father Brothers, Uncles, Couſins, Grand-Father, Great-Grand-Father, and many other great Princes, from whom I am deſcended both by the Father and Mother, without ſo much as mentioning the ſeeds of vertue, which Nature mingles with the blood of thoſe, ſhe deſigns ſhall command: For by the ſame reaſon as Children are obſerved to reſemble their Parents, not only in the lineaments of their face, and the qualities of their mind, but in their very geſtures, inclinations and actions, by the ſame reaſon thoſe, who proceed from a Race accuſtomed to dominion, do receive with their exiſtence a diſpoſition, that makes them capable of all the impreſſions neceſſary for the formation of a great Prince. I therefore may ſay, that, when my Mother carried me in her womb, and even before I was brought into the World, I was inſtructed in the N art of Governing, and yet a private perſon, whoſe thoughts have nothing in them that is noble and ſublime, has the confidence to give me Counſel in the Conduct and Regiment of my Empire, which to him is an impenetrable myſtery.

In this manner Caius conceiv'd every day more and more averſion to Macro, endeavouring to charge him with falſe crimes, but ſuch as might at leaſt carry in them ſome appearance of truth; and of this ſort he believed he had found one by theſe words, which fell from Macro upon a time.

The Emperour is of my making, and has no leſs obligation to me, than to thoſe who brought him into the World. Three times by my prayers and contrivances have I reſcued him from the O fury of Tiberius, who would have put him to death; and when Tiberius, who would have put

A put him to death, and when Tiberius dyed, I cauſ'd him to be declared Emperour by the Guards, which were under my Command, remonſtrating and inculcating to them, that the only way to keep the Empire entire was to pay obedience but to one perſon.

Many people approved this diſcourſe in Macro, as knowing it was true, and not yet underſtanding the inconſtancy and diſſimulation of Caius: But not many days after the unfortunate Macro and his wife were put to death; which was all the recompence that the ingratitude of Caius afforded to the fidelity of his ſervant, for having ſecur'd him againſt death, and advanc'd him to the Empire. Some ſay, Macro was compelled to kill himſelf, and that his wife did the ſame, though it was more than ſuſpected Caius had been kinder to her formerly. But what is more unconſtant than love, by reaſon B of the frequent exceptions and diſguſts that happen, where the affection is irregular? Nay ſo inſatiable was the cruelty of Caius, that he put to death the whole family of Macro, leaving not ſo much as one of his Servants alive

CHAP. V.

C Caius cauſed his Father in Law Marcus Syllanus to be ſlain for giving him wiſe Counſel: and the Murder of him was followed by the Execution of ſeveral others.

WHEN this perfideous Prince had in this manner quitted himſelf of his Competitor in the Empire, and of a perſon to whom he ought both his authority and life, there was a third deſign that remained to be executed, to the perpetration of which he imploy'd his utmoſt addreſs. His Father in Law Marcus Syllanus (who was a perſon of great Generoſity, and of illuſtrious extraction) after the death of his Daughter who died very young) continued to Caius the affection of an own Father rather than of a Father in Law, believing that, though the Princeſs was dead, he could not but have the ſame ſentiments for him. Upon this D ſcore he ſpake to him with great liberty about the meaſures, which he was to take by his actions to anſwer the hopes which were conceived of him: But Caius, being ſo vain an Opiniaſter, that inſtead of owning or mending his faults, he flattered himſelf with a Fancy, that he was excellent in all kinds of virtues, & look'd upon thoſe as his Enemies, who gave him good counſel, he perverted the good Counſel of Syllanus, reputed it an inſolence, grew inſupportable towards him, and could not endure any longer to have him an impediment to the irregularity of his paſſions. After this he baniſh'd as well out of his thoughts as his heart the remembrance of his wife, and by more than barbarous Cruelty cauſed him to be put to death for Treaſon, from whom ſhe had received life, and who ought to have been reſpected by him as an own Father. The noiſe of E this murder, which was followed by the execution of ſeveral others the moſt conſiderable in the Empire, was ſpred all over the World: every body ſpake of it with horrour, but in private, their fear obſtructing the publication of their reſentment. Nevertheleſs the people being eaſily deluded, and not without difficulty to be perſwaded, that a Prince, who had appeared ſo good and ſo gentle, ſhould be ſo ſuddenly changed, it was ſaid in his excuſe. That, as to the death of the young Tiberius, the Soveraign power could not admit of a Partner: That he was only prevented by Caius; for if his age would have permitted, he would have treated him in the ſame manner: That it was perhaps by the Providence of God, and for the benefit of the whole World, that Tiberius loſt his life, to ſecure the Empire from Civil and Forreign Wars, which would have devided into F factions by the ſeveral great perſons, who would have eſpouſed the intereſt both of the one and the other: That nothing is more diſirable than peace: That Peace cannot ſubſiſt but by good conduct in the Provinces; and that a Province canot be well govern'd, unleſs the Government be in a ſingle perſon, whoſe authority maintains all things in quiet and repoſe: That, as to Macro, he was grown ſo ſawcy and proud, that in appearance he had quite forgot that excellent direction of the Oracle at Delphos, Noſce teipſum, which is a thing ſo neceſſary, that with the knowledg of ones ſelf one cannot fail to be happy, nor avoid being unhappy, when it is not attained: That it was inſupportable for Macro to ſet himſelf up above the Emperour, as if it was not his office to command, and the ſubjects to obey: In this manner it was that the ignorant either out of flattery or folly interpreted the wholeſome counſels of Macro: and, as for G Syllanus, it was ſaid, that it was ridicuculous in him to pretend to as much power over his Son in Law, as a Father has over his own Son, ſeeing thoſe Fathers, who are but Citizens, do ſub-

that it was imprudently done in him to imagine,that,being but his Father in Law,he ſhould have a right to interpoſe in publick affairs, without conſidering that his allyance with the Emperour was extinguiſhed by the death of his Daughter, Marriages being but outward ligaments, which, though they joyn Families together at preſent, yet they are broken upon the death of either of the parties.

This was the diſcourſe, which was uſed in ſome of their aſſemblys to excuſe the Emperour's cruelty; for there having been none of his predeceſſors, of whoſe meekneſs and bounty they had conceived a better opinion, they could not (as I have ſaid) imagine he ſhould be ſo changed in a Moment.

CHAP. VI.

Caius requires the veneration of one of the Gods.

THeſe horrid and criminal actions paſſed in the mind of Caius for ſo many victories obtain'd againſt the moſt conſiderable perſons of his Empire; For his fury had extinguiſhed the luſtre of the Imperial Family in the blood of his Couſin young Tiberius, whom he ought in juſtice to have taken into the partnerſhip of the Government. His K abominable inhumanity had exaſperated the Senat by the death of Syllanus his Father in Law, who was one of their greateſt ornaments: and his horrible ingratitude had taken away the life of Macro a perſon of the firſt Rank in his Court, and to whom he was oblig'd particularly for the Grandeur, to which he was advanc'd.

Having perpetrated theſe great things, he believed, that, there being no body left, who durſt oppoſe himſelf againſt his pleaſure, he ought not to be ſatisfied with the greateſt honors, that could be confer'd upon man; but that he might expect and challeng what was given to the Gods; and it is reported, that to perſwade himſelf to ſo ſtrange an extravagance his argument was thus:

As thoſe, who conduct and have the care of Heards of Cattel whether Oxen, or Sheep, or L
Deer, are neither Oxen, nor Sheep, nor Deer themſelves, but men of a nature infinitely more excellent, than the nature of thoſe animals: ſo they, who have the command of all the men and Creatures in the World, ought to be conſidered as more excellent than men, and receive reverence like Gods.

Having admitted this ridiculous fancy into his head, and taken the boldneſs to publiſh it, he came by degrees to the effects: He began firſt to deſire to be reverenced as one of the demy-Gods, ſuch as Bacchus, Hercules, Caſtor and Pollux, Trypbon, Amphiarus, Amphilocus, and others; but he laugh'd at their Oracles and Ceremonies, and raviſh'd them from them, that they might be attributed to himſelf.

He changed his habit and dreſs like a player. Sometimes to perſonat Hercules he wore M a Lions skin about his ſhoulders, and a Club in his hand: ſometimes he wore a Hat like Caſtor and Pollux; and ſometimes in imitation of Bacchus he wore the skin of a young Hind. But in this point he differed from thoſe pretended deities, that, whereas they were contented with their reſpective and particular Ceremonies without envying what was confer'd upon the reſt, he required them all, that he might be accounted above them.

Nevertheleſs that, which contracted the great throng of ſpectators, was not that he had three bodies like Gerion, but becauſe he transformed himſelf into as many different ſhapes as Proteus, who, as Homer deſcribes, changed himſelf into ſeveral Elements, Animals, and Plants. N

But, Caius, this vain reſembance with theſe Demy-Gods was not the thing, you ought to have affected; you were rather to have imitated their actions and virtue. Hercules by his glorious labours delivered both Land and Sea from ſuch Monſters, as troubled the repoſe of mankind: Bacchus, who was the firſt that planted the Vine, brought a liquor into the World ſo pleaſant and comfortable both to the body and mind of man, that it made them forget their ſorrows, exhilarated and fortified their hearts in ſuch manner, that the effects of it are ſtill ſeen in the dances and feſtivities, not only of the moſt civiliz'd, but of the moſt barbarous Nations. As to Caſtor and Pollux, the two Sons of Jupiter, is it not ſaid, that one of them being immortal and the other mortal, he, who had the advantage of immortality, not being able to think that his brother ſhould O die, would needs equal and debaſe himſelf to the condition of his Brother by communicating

A nicating to him part of his immortality, and in ſome meaſure ſubjecting himſelf to death, which was the greateſt expreſſion of kindneſs that could be imagined. Theſe Heros then, who were the admiration of their own ages, and are ſtill the wonder of ours, were not adored and reverenc'd as Gods, but for their benefits and good actions to man. But, Caius, what have you done in imitation, that may in courage you to ſuch an exaction? To begin with Caſtor and Pollux have you imitated the perfect friendſhip, that was between thoſe two Brothers, and made them ſo glorious? you without compaſſion to the youth and tenderneſs of him, who ought to have been to you as a Brother, and with whom you were in juſtice obliged to have ſhar'd the whole Empire, you (I ſay) have cruelly embrued your hands in his blood, and ſent his ſiſters B into Exile, to reign with the more ſecurity and quiet your ſelf. Have you imitated Bacchus, and diffus'd an univerſal joy and chearfulneſs over the whole Earth by any admirable invention? you, who being to be conſidered no otherwiſe but as a publick Plague, have found out nothing but new inventions to turn that joy into ſorrow, that chearfulneſs into ſadneſs, and make peoples lives a burden: You, who in recompence of the infinite wealth and advantages, which flow in to you dayly from all parts of the World, do with your inſatiable avarice cruſh and depreſs your people with the weight of ſo many new Tributes and Impoſitions, that you inforce them to abominate your horrible inhumanity. Do you imitate Hercules in the nobleneſs of his actions, and in the difficulty of his Labours to introduce and eſtabliſh peace, to diſtribute juſtice and reſtore C plenty both at Land and at Sea? you, who on the contrary being moſt lazy and fearful of your ſex, have baniſhed all order, and quiet, and happineſs, to introduce diſorder, and trouble, and all kind of miſery in their places. Is it then by theſe meaſures you think to paſs for a Demy-God? and do you deſire to be immortal, that you may continue theſe afflictions eternally? Is it not more rational on the other ſide to believe, that, if you were really one of the Gods, the odiouſneſs of your conduct would degrade you, and tumble you down again into the degree of a man, ſeeing vice is as efficacious to make people mortal, as virtue to immortalize? Forbear then to compare your ſelf to Caſtor and Pollux, who were ſo much Celebrated for their Brotherly love, after you have been ſo cruel as to have murdered your own Brother; and do not petend to the honors, D which are given to Hercules and Bacchus, who ſignalized themſelves by their good deeds, whilſt your crimes and iniquities are ſufficient to render them uſeleſs.

CHAP. VII.

The folly increaſing every day, he exacted the honour of a God, and imitated* Mercury, Apollo, and Mars.

E BUT the arrogance of Caius reſted not there: he thought it beneath him to be honoured as a Demy God, and therefore pretended to be equal with the Gods. At firſt he would paſs for Mercury, and habited himſelf like him, wearing a Caduceus in his hand, and winged Buſkins upon his Legs. To repreſent Apollo he appeared another time with a Crown upon his head gliſtering with Rays, a quiver at his back, with Arrows in his left hand, and with his right hand diſtributing Largeſſes among the people, to ſhew that his bounty was greater than his exaction.

After that he inſtituted ſacred dances, in which ſongs were ſung in praiſe of this new God who before, whilſt he perſonated Bacchus, contented himſelf with the names of Evius, Liæus, and Liber. Many times alſo, when he repreſented Mars, he arm'd F himſelf with a head piece, a Cuiraſſe, and a Buckler, ſhowing himſelf publickly with a naked Sword in his hand, accompanied with Bravo's and Hectors ready for any murders that he ſhould command them, and all to imitate the fury of that deity, who breath'd nothing but ſlaughter and blood. So extraordinary a ſpectacle fill'd with aſtoniſhment the minds of his people, who could not ſufficiently admire, that he ſhould pretend to any reſemblance with thoſe, having nothing of their virtue or good qualities to recommend him, and that he ſhould affect to take upon him the marks of that good, which they had procured to mankind. For what elſe is ſignified by the Winged Buſkins of Mercury, but that he was an Embaſſador of the Gods, and an Interpreter of their wills, the Greek name implying no otherwiſe, but that he was the meſſenger of G happy news, which he conveyed with expedition? And not only a God, but a man would with great difficulty be perſwaded to be the meſſenger of bad. The Caduceus

What did it import, but that he was the Stickler, and Mediator in Treaties, and all matters of Peace; ſeeing men alſo uſed the ſame upon the like occaſions, and otherwiſe there would have been no end of the ill conſequences of War? But that Caius put on his winged Brodequins upon his Ankles, was it to publiſh and ſpread abroad thorow all the Provinces the noiſe of his Crimes, which ought rather to have been buried in perpetual Oblivion? And why ſhould he give himſelf ſo much trouble, when without ſtiring from his place, he committed ſuch an infinite number of impieties, which ſtreaming inceſſantly from that deteſtable ſource, overflow'd the whole world, and was a more pernicious Deluge than the former? And why ſhould he carry a Caduce, when there was nothing to be found either in his words or actions, that had the leaſt appearance or tendency to Peace; But on the contrary, there was not a Province or Town in all Greece or Barbary, in which he was not the occaſion of diviſion and troubles? Let our pretended Mercury then quit that Name, which is ſo unſuitable for him. H I

And as to Apollo, In what was it that he could pretend to reſemble him? Was it in the glittering of his Crown, as if the Sun and the Day were more proper for the commiſſion of Evil, than Darkneſs and Night? There are none but actions that are virtuous, and worthy of praiſe, that are fit for the Day, whilſt actions that are wicked and ſcandalous ought to look out the thickeſt and moſt private obſcurities in Dens and Caves.

This counterfeit Apollo has no leſs overturned and perverted the Order of Phyſick; For, whereas the true Apollo invented wholſome and ſalutiferous Remedies for the Cure of Maladies, this made uſe of nothing but ſuch poyſons as were mortal and deſtructive. His inſatiable avarice animated him principally againſt the greateſt and moſt opulent perſons of Italy, becauſe among them there was more Gold and Silver to be found, than in all the reſt of the World; and had not God Almighty delivered it, there had not been a place in the whole Empire, that his avarice would not have pillaged, ruined, and deſtroyed. K

Apollo was celebrated likewiſe not only for his excellency in Phyſick, but for his Predictions, which by his Oracles he communicated for the good of Mankind, that they might not ſink under thoſe Calamities which hung over their heads. But the Oracles of Caius extended no further, than to the foretelling to the moſt Illuſtrious, and beſt qualified perſons, Confiſcation, Exile and Death; the only favours, that were to be expected from his oppreſſion, injuſtice and tyranny. What ſimilitude was there then betwixt theſe two Apollo's? And what ſhame was it, that Songs ſhould be ſung equally in commendation of them both, as if it were a leſs crime to attribute to a vitious man the honours, which were due only to a God, than to counterfeit Money, which carries but the Image of a Prince? L

But nothing was more ſtrange, than to ſee a man, whoſe Mind and Body were ſo notoriouſly effeminate, arrogate to himſelf the force and courage of Mars, and delude the Spectators by changing his Habit as frequently as a Player upon a Stage. For in what was it that he might be ſaid to reſemble not only the fabulous Mars, which is but a fiction, but the true one (if there was ſuch a one) which he deſired to reſemble, that has a Courage generous and beneficent, always ready to relieve the oppreſſed (as the Greek word ſignifies) a Courage, that by juſt and lawfull Wars was ſtill followed with a happy and an honourable Peace. For Mars hath two Names, One implying and repreſenting him a lover of ſuch Peace, as conduces to the tranquility of the Publick; and the other deſcribing him, as a lover of War, which cannot be accompanied but with Calamity and Confuſion. CHAP. VIII.

Caius takes a prejudice againſt the Jews, becauſe they would not, like other People, Reverence him as a God.

I Suppoſe I have clearly demonſtrated, that Caius had but little reſemblance with the Demi-gods, and leſs with the Gods themſelves. Never Prince had more wicked B inclinations. He embraced blindly and with an immoderate vehemence whatever came into his mind; his ambition was little better than madneſs; his obſtinacy was invincible; and his irregular deſires had no bounds in the abuſes and outrages which he committed by his Power.

The Jews (formerly happy enough) felt the deplorable effects of it: for he looked upon them as the only perſons capable of oppoſing his Deſigns, in reſpect that from their Infancy they had learned from their Parents by a conſtant Tradition (and it had been inculcated and confirmed to them by their ſacred Laws) not to acknowledge any but the true God, the Creator of Heaven and Earth; For all other Nations, though groaning under the burthen of his tyrannical domination, in flattery complied with his deſire, and by that means augmented his preſumption and vanity.

C Several Romans were not aſhamed likewiſe to proſtitute and diſhonour the Liberty of their City by introducing into Italy the ſame baſe conſormity and ſubmiſſion, which the Barbarians uſed in their puſillanimous Adorations. But he knew that the Jews, on the contrary, rather than conſent to the leaſt violence or intrenchment upon their Laws, ran to death as to immortality. For as a Stone cannot be taken out of a Building, but by little and little the whole Fabrick will run to ruine; it is the ſame in matter of Religion, to the deſtruction of which nothing could contribute more, than ſuch an impious and audacious enterprize, as the pretending to change a mortal Man into an immortal God, which is far more difficult, than that God ſhould be changed into a Man; beſides that it would open a door to horrible infidelity, and dreadful ingratitude towards God D Almighty, whoſe infinite Goodneſs is perpetually ſprinkling and diſpenſing his Mercies and Favours upon all Creatures.

This was the occaſion of that cruel war made upon our Nation: and what greater miſfortune can beſal any Servants than to have their Maſter their enemy? But the Subjects of Emperors are Servants; and whereas the moderation of the Princes, which governed before Caius, made their Dominion gentle and pleaſing to all People, his Government was inſupportable. Mercy was a Virtue unknown to him; and ſo far was he from any remorſe, that he made it his boaſt, when he trampled upon the Laws and aboliſhed them, to make room for his own Violence and Tyranny. But the principal Object of his Fury were the Jews; It did not ſatisfie him to uſe them as Servants, but he treated them as Slaves, E and as the moſt vile and abject of Slaves: So that it may with too much verity be affirmed, That they had in him, in ſtead of a kind and indulgent Maſter, a cruel and unmerciful Tyrant.

CHAP. IX.

The antient Inhabitants of Alexandria take occaſion of Caius his animoſity to the Jews, to do them all imaginable miſchief: They demoliſh moſt of their Oratories, and erect Statues F of Caius in their places; Indignities that were never practiſed under Auguſtus or Tiberius. The Praiſes of Auguſtus.

WHEN the Pique, which this Emperour had againſt the Jews, came firſt to the knowledge of the Inhabitants of Alexandria, who had had alwayes a mortal and inveterate quarrel againſt them, they thought they could never have a fairer opportunity to revenge themſelves; and therefore, as if they had received Orders to that purpoſe from the Emperour, or, having overcome the Jews in Battel, the right of War had expoſed them to their fury, They fell upon them with irreſiſtable violence, forced their Houſes, turned their Families out of doors, ſack'd, plundred, and carried away all G the beſt of their Goods, and that not in the night like Thieves, who were fearful of puniſhment, but at noon day, expoſing and ſhewing what they had taken to every body they met, as if they had been their own, and bought with their money; ſome of them, H by a deteſtable aſſociation in that impious action, ſharing their plunder in the Market-place in the preſence of thoſe very perſons which they had robb'd, and added mockery to their violence.

But what is it to have brought ſuch People to indigence as were rich and ſplendid before; to have forc'd them from their Houſes, and expoſed them like Vagabonds to all the injuries of the Air? Theſe inhumane Alexandrians drove the Jews with their Wives and Children from all parts of the Town to coop them up like Beaſts in ſo cloſe a place, that not having given them liberty to bring any thing with them, they doubted not but that they would dye either with hunger, or the infection of the Air; Free reſpiration being ſo neceſſary to the Life of Man, by reaſon of the heat of the Bowels, that it is I like adding fuel to fire, inſtead of freſh and cool air to refrigerate the Lungs, to give them nothing but the hot ſtifling Air of a great throng of People crowded together in a Preſs.

In this extremity theſe poor People, at leaſt to take Breath, diſperſed themſelves, ſome into the Deſarts, ſome along the Sea-Coaſt, and others into the Sepulchres; and if in any place of the ſayd Town any of the Jews appeared, as not knowing what had paſſed, the Alexandrians knocked them down, or lam'd them with ſtones or with Cudgels, and handled them in the ſame manner as they did thoſe who had eſcaped out of that little place, where they had throng'd ſo great a multitude.

Theſe cruel Perſecutors upon the Banks of the River way-laid the Jewiſh Merchants, K who traffiqued to Alexandria, they rob'd them of their goods, and burnt the Merchants alive; ſome in fires made of the wood of their own Veſſels; others in the middle of the City, and that in a way more cruel than the other; becauſe their fire, being made of a greener and more moiſt wood, choak'd them with the ſmoke, as well as tormented them with its flames; others they drew with Cords thorow the Streets and Market-places with ſuch fury and indignation, that, their death being unable to ſatisfy their rage, they trod their dead bodies under their feet, and tore them into ſo many pieces, that had any body been ſo well diſpoſed as to have buried them, he would not have found any thing remaining that might have exerciſed his Charity.

When they perceived the Governour of the Province (who in a moment might have L appeaſed a greater Commotion) did not only connive, but incourage it, by pretending to be ignorant; they grew more inſolent and audacious; they aſſembled in Troops, ran in great throngs to the Oratories of the Jews, (which were many in all the quarters of the Town) cut down the Trees that were about them, demoliſhed ſome of them utterly, burned others, and the flames of them conſumed ſeveral of the neighbouring Houſes, by which alſo the guilt Bucklers, Statues and Inſcriptions, which the Roman Emperours had ſet up in honour of the Courage or Virtue of ſeveral of the Jews, which ought to have been reverenced, were burned and conſumed.

In ſhort, Nothing was able to reſtrain their madneſs; For in ſtead of apprehending puniſhment or Correction, they underſtood the hatred which Caius had conceived M againſt the Jews, and that nothing would pleaſe him better, than to have them treated with that terrible Cruelty.

Again, to cajole the Spirit of this Prince by their new flatteries, to oppreſs and deſtroy us with more ſecurity, and invade and ſubvert our Laws without fear, they ſet up his Statues in ſuch Oratories, as they were not able to demoliſh by reaſon of the great number of Jews which gave them oppoſition; and that, which they erected in the principal of all the Oratories, was placed in a Chariot drawn with four Horſes in Braſs, in which they were ſo ardently zealous, that having no Horſes lately caſt, they took them out of the place appropriated to their publick Exerciſes, lame and crippled as they were, and as was reported, made antiently for Queen Cleopatra, the laſt of that Name: Which N action of theirs ought rather to have offended Caius than otherwiſe; For ſeeing he affected ſuch extraordinary honours, though the Horſes had been new, yet having been made for a Woman, they were unworthy of him; and though they were ſet up in favour of him, yet they were too much ſpoiled and imperfect to give him ſatisfaction. Beſides they thought they ſhould merit very much by changing theſe Oratories into Temples, to augment the number of thoſe which were dedicated to him; which nevertheleſs they did not ſo much in honour of him, as in hatred to our Nation. And of this there needs no better proof, than that for three hundred years together, during the reign of ten of their Kings, they never conſecrated a Statue to any of them in their Chappels, though they placed their Kings in the rank of their Gods, and gave that Title to ſome of them. And O it is no wonder, that, though they knew they were but men, they ſhould honour their

Princes

A Princes like Gods, ſeeing they payed the ſame adoration to Doggs, Wolfs, Lyons, Crocodiles and ſeveral other amphibious Creatures, inſomuch as all Egypt is full of Temples, Altars and Groves conſecrated to their honour.

But as they were the greateſt flatterers in the World, and conſidered the Fortune more than the perſon of any Prince, they will anſwer perhaps, That the Roman Emperors being more puiſſant and proſperous than their own Kings, it was but juſtice to give them more honour.
What anſwer can be more ridiculous? For why then did they not give the ſame honour to Tiberius, to whom Caius was obliged for his Empire, ſince that Prince reigned three and twenty years with ſuch prudence and felicity, that he preſerved to his dying day, not only the Greek Provinces, but the Barbarous in profound Peace, and the enjoyment B of all things? Was it that in his Birth he was inferiour to Caius? He excell'd him on both ſides, both by the Father and Mother. Was it that his Education or Learning was leſs? What perſon in his time was wiſer or more eloquent? Was it that his years were not ſo many, and by conſequence his Experience not ſo great? What Emperor ever ended his days in a happier old Age? And even in his Youth was not his capacity and judgement wonderful; which is not commonly acquired but but by number of years?
yet you never thought him worthy of ſuch extraordinary honour.

What ſhall I ſay likewiſe of that ineſtimable Prince, who ſeemed by the Eminence of his Virtues, to be raiſed above the condition of men; and by the multitude of his good deeds, and the felicity of his Reign, was the firſt who merited the glorious name C of Auguſtus, and having received it himſelf from no body, tranſmitted it to his poſterity?
The Sea was in oppoſition againſt the Land, and the Land againſt the Sea. Europe was in Armes againſt Aſia, and Aſia againſt Europe. All the Grandees of the Empire divided to determine who ſhould remain Maſter, and it may be ſaid, that the whole race of mankind was ready to periſh by this bloody and cruel war kindled at the ſame time in all parts of the world; when in ſo horrible a Tempeſt this great Prince took the Rudder into his own hand, reſtored Peace to the whole World, renewed Plenty and Trade, civiliz'd the Manners of the moſt barbarous Nations, overwhelm'd as it were all the great Towns with ſo much happineſs, that they might have paſs'd for Free States, maintain'd Peace, encouraged Juſtice, and forbore not unceſſantly to pour out his Favours D upon the People with full hands, even to the end of his days.

This incomparable Emperour had Egypt under his Dominion for three and forty years together; yet you never paid him that honour, which you have done to Caius; you ſet not up his Statues in the Oratories of the Jews, though never Prince deſerved ſo much reverence as he, not only as he was the Foundation of the Auguſt Imperial Family; But as he was the Uniter of that Soveraign Power, which was divided before, and uſed it with ſuch moderation, that thereby he procured the publick Felicity, there being nothing more certain than that ſaying of the Antients, The Government by many is moſt dangerous in reſpect of the miſchiefs which do follow their diverſity of Judgement. The Example likewiſe of other People ought to have obliged you: for in all other places they payd him E divine honour, and conſecrated many rich Temples to him, ſuch as are not to be ſeen (either Ancient or Modern) in other Towns, and particularly in Alexandria:
For what other is comparable to that, which upon his account bears the name of Sebaſtian, built near the Port, and in ſuch eſteem with Marriners and Sea-men? It is ſo ſpacious and lofty, it is viſible a far off. It is full of excellent Pictures, admirable Statues, and other rich Preſents both of Silver and Gold, that have been offered by great Perſons; nothing is more Magnificent than its Portico's, its Quire, its Galleries, its Library, and its Grove. In ſo general a Concourſe of People, could any man of ſenſe ſay, That this was not to pay Auguſtus all the honour that was due to him, except putting up his Statues in the Oratories of the Jews? No without doubt: But that which hindred it F then was, that they underſtood that incomparable Prince took as much pleaſure to ſee every body live regularly, and according to the Laws of their Country, as he did care to have the Roman Laws put in execution; and if he received any honours extraordinary from the blindneſs of his adorers, it was not that he approved it himſelf, but that he thought it might conduce to elevate and enhance the Grandure and Majeſty of the Empire.
For what can be a greater inſtance of his Moderation, and that he would not ſuffer himſelf to be puffed up or dazled by the vanity or extravagance of their reſpects, than that he would never admit the Tittle either of a God or a Maſter? and indeed not only rejected that flattery, but expreſſed great approbation of the horror and deteſtation of thoſe which declare for ſuch things? Otherwiſe how could he have permitted that the G Jews (the greateſt part of whom have been Enfranchiſed by ſuch Maſters as had taken them Priſoners in the Wars) ſhould be allowed to poſſeſs in Rome ſo great a part of the City as lyes beyond the Tyber? He was not ignorant that they had their Oratories, where H they met for their Devotions, eſpecially on their Sabbath day; That they raiſed their Tenths to ſend them to Jeruſalem, and that they offered their Sacrifices there alſo. Yet he did not Baniſh them from Rome; and he was ſo far from aboliſhing their Religion, or ſubverting their Laws and their Cuſtoms, that he gave rich Preſents to our Temple, and ordained, that every day Sacrifice ſhould be made to God Almighty, which is obſerved to this day, and will be obſerved for ever, and remain an eternal Mark of the virtue of that incomparable Emperour.

He ordered likewiſe that the Jews ſhould be compriſed in the publick diſtributions of Money and Corn, which were made among the People in certain Months; and if it happened thoſe Diſtributions were made upon their Sabbath-day, at which time it is not permitted I among them to do or receive any thing, eſpecially for their own profit and advantage; he took care that their portions ſhould be reſerved, and delivered the next day; which made the Jews ſo conſiderable among other Nations, that, though naturally they had no kindneſs for them, yet they durſt not moleſt them in the exerciſe of their Religion.

And Tiberius treated them in the ſame ſort, though Sejanus did what he could by his Calumnies to ruine thoſe who inhabited at Rome, becauſe he knew they could not be brought to joyn in his abominable Conſpiracy againſt his Maſter. And this Prince ſent afterwards to all the Governors of Provinces, that, except ſome few who had been medling in that Plot, all the reſt of the Jews ſhould be well treated, and not obliged to K change any thing of their Cuſtoms; becauſe they were naturally peaceable, and had nothing either in their Laws or Manners contrary or inconſiſtent with the Tranquillity of the Empire.

CHAP. X.

Caius being already inraged againſt the Jews of Alexandria, was much exaſperated by an Egyptian called Helico, who had been formerly a Slave, but was then L in very great favour.

CAIUS having paſſed to that degree of Vanity, as not only to pronounce, but to believe himſelf a God, he found no People either among the Greeks or Barbarians more ready than the Alexandrians to humor him in his extravagant imagination: For there are no People more ſubtile, more hypocritical, more flattering, nor greater lovers of Confuſion and trouble, than the Inhabitants of that Town. And ſo little is their reſpect for the Name of God, that they make no difficulty to attribute it to Ibis, and ſeveral other Creatures. And as they are very prodigal of that honour, they do eaſily delude ſuch, as are not acquainted with that impiety in the Egyptians, whereas it is impoſſible to do ſo M with thoſe, who do know and deteſt it.

Caius being ignorant of their cunning, ſuppoſed it was real and not pretended, that they thought him a God, becauſe they proclaim'd it publickly, and with all the formality and acclamations, wherewith they were accuſtomed to declare their reſpects towards their Gods; beſides he conſidered the ſacriledges they had committed upon our Oratories, as a great teſtimony of their Zeal; and there were no Poems or Hiſtories that he could read with ſo much delight and pleaſure, as the Relations that were ſent him upon that Subject.

Thoſe who made it their buſineſs to applaud or decry what ever lik'd or diſpleaſed him, contributed much to that humour, for moſt of them were Egyptians, and unfortunate N ſlaves, brought up from their infancy in that abominable error, which prompted them to pay divine Worſhip to Serpents and Crocodiles. The chief of this abominable Band was a wicked fellow called Helico, who by his ill practices had wrought himſelf into the Court. He had ſome ſmattering of Letters, and he, whoſe ſlave he was firſt, and had taught him his knowledge, preſented him to Tiberius: But that Prince had never any great eſteem for him, by reaſon that the manner, in which he had been educated in his youth, had rendred him grave and ſevere, and made him deſpiſe every thing that was not ſerious. When after his death Caius ſucceeded to the Empire, this dangerous creature obſerving that there was nothing diſſolute or voluptuous, to which Caius was not inclined, ſaid thus to himſelf: Now is the time, Helico, that muſt needs be favourable O to your deſigns; be ſure you do not neglect to improve it to your advantage: You have a Maſter

A as you would deſire your ſelf. You have acceſs, and are acceptable to him; your wit is plyable enough; you have a faculty in Drolling; and thoſe tricks and inventions which are ſo apt to diſpoſe People to mirth, are your excellence and element; you are verſed in the Liberal and all other Sciences; you do not only know how to pleaſe by your flatteries, but by expreſſions, whoſe cunning (the more dangerous by how much it is more ſecret and occult) excites ſuſpicion and indignation againſt them, whom you have a deſign to prejudice, when your Maſter is in an humour to hear you; and that he is ready almoſt alwayes to do, ſo much is he diſpoſed to hear any thing of Calumny or Reproach; you need not trouble your ſelf much for ſubject, for with that the Jews will abundantly ſupply you, you have no more to do but to declaim againſt their Laws and their Cuſtomes, and that you have learned from your Infancy, not only from particular B perſons, but from moſt of the inhabitants of Alexandria. Let us ſee then what you can do.

Theſe things running in Helico's head, he ſtirred not from Caius either night or day; and in the times of his pivate relaxations and divertiſements, he left no opportunity of incenſing him againſt the Jews by his forgeries and ſuggeſtions; which were the more effectual by being ſlyly and wittily delivered; for he would not profeſs himſelf their Enemy, but acted cunningly and ſubtilly; by which means he did them more miſchief, than if he had openly declared himſelf.

When the Embaſſadors of the Inhabitants of Alexandria, who had acted ſo cruelly againſt us, underſtood how much this wretched man was ſerviceable to them, they gave him not only money, but hopes of procuring him great honours, as ſoon as the Emperor C ſhould come to Alexandria, where they did not queſtion, but he would ſuddenly be; and on the other ſide there was nothing but he promiſed them, ſo much did he hugg himſelf in the hopes of receiving thoſe great honours in the preſence of the Embaſſadors, who would not fail to repair to ſo famous a City, from all parts of the World, to pay their Complements to ſo great a Prince.

Having no knowledge that we had an Enemy ſo dangerous and conſiderable as Helico, we aimed only to defend our ſelves againſt ſuch as were profeſſed; But when we found it we applyed all our Intereſt and induſtry to ſweeten and take him off: No man did, or could do us more miſchief than he; for he was one at all Games, at all Recreations, Feaſts and Debaucheries with Caius; His Office of firſt Gentleman of the D Bed-Chamber (which was one of the beſt places about the Court) gave him the advantage of his Ear when ever he deſired, and his Maſter took great pleaſure in hearing him: He laid aſide all other deſigns, and intended nothing ſo earneſtly, as to ruine us by his Calumnies and Scandals, which he did with ſo much artifice, and mingled them with his Jokes in ſo pleaſant a manner, under pretence of entertaining of Caius, rather than malice to us, that he made ſuch an impreſſion againſt us in the Emperours mind, as we could never extinguiſh.

CHAP. XI.

The Jews of Alexandria appoint an Embaſſie to Caius to repreſent their Sufferings; in which Embaſſie Philo is chief. Caius receives them kindly in appearance, but Philo found he was not to be truſted.

AFter we had tried all our skill to make Helico our Friend, finding it was but labour in vain, becauſe he was ſo inſolent and proud no body durſt come near him, and not knowing beſides whether it was from any perſonal or particular ſpleen againſt us, that he provoked and exaſperated the Emperour to our Deſtruction, we concluded to F ſteer another Courſe, and reſolved to preſent a Petition to the Emperour, which ſhould contein in ſhort what we had Remonſtrated not long before to King Agrippa, when he was at Alexandria, in his paſſage to Syria, to take poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, which had been conferred upon him by Caius: Hereupon we departed for Rome, ſecure, as we thought, of finding the Emperour an equitable Judge, whereas we could not have had a mortaller Enemy. He received us in the field of Mars, as he was coming out of his Mothers Gardens; his Countenance was pleaſant and chearful, his Words obliging, he made a ſign with his hand that he would be our Friend, and ſent us word afterward by the Maſter of the Ceremonies called Homus, that he would hear our buſineſs at leiſure: In ſo much as there was not one of thoſe who were preſent, nor indeed one of G our whole Nation (unleſs of more than ordinary ſagacity) that believed not our Embaſſie would ſucceed to our deſires, and every body came and Complemented us thereupon:

upon: But my age and experience in Mundane affairs giving me a further proſpect H and penetration, that which tranſported other people became ſuſpected by me: for I reaſoned thus with my ſelf:

How comes it to paſs that, Embaſſadors being here from all quarters of the World, we ſhould be the only perſons, to whom the Emperour ſhould vouchſafe to ſend word, that he would give us Audience? For, do's not he know, that being Jews we ſhould think our ſelves happy to be treated like other People? Can we without folly expect favour extraordinary from a young Prince of another Nation, or believe that he has not greater inclination for the Alexandrians than for us, and makes ſuch haſte to determine our buſineſs in obligation to them? I wiſh to God that, in ſtead of being an equal Arbitrator, his ſentence be not Arbitrary, and that he does not prove himſelf our Enemy and their Protector. I

CHAP. XII.

Philo and his Collegues diſcover, that Caius had commanded Petronius the Governour of Syria to ſet up his Statue in the Temple of Hieruſalem.

WHilſt theſe thoughts were in my head, and gave me no quiet either night or day, another miſfortune that could not be foreſeen, and portended not only K the deſtruction of a part, but of the whole Nation of the Jews, fell out to accompliſh my trouble. We waited upon the Emperour to Puteoli; to which place being retired along the River for diverſion, he entertain'd himſelf in the Houſes of Pleaſure, which are numerous, and very Magnificent, not thinking in the leaſt of our Affaire, though he had ordered us to follow the Court, and we were ready, expecting every hour, when he ſhould have decided our Controverſie; when on a ſuddain a certain Perſon came to us, with his Eyes ſtaring, his Breath ſpent, and an univerſal diſcompoſure in his Looks; he took ſome of us aſide, and ſaid, Have ye not heard the terrible News? He would have proceeded, but his Tears came ſo faſt upon him, that they ſtifled his Words ſo ſtrangely, that, do what he could, it was not poſſible for him to go L on. One may eaſily conceive our aſtoniſhment and ſurprize. We conjur'd him to tell us the cauſe of his affliction, ſeeing it was nothing in appearance but for weeping before us; and if the occaſion was worthy of ſo many tears, it was but juſt (being accuſtomed to ſorrows as we had been) that we ſhould conſent, and add our Compaſſion to his. He made a new effort, and told us with more ſighs than words, The Ruine of our Temple is decreed; for the Emperour has ordered his Statue to be ſet up in the Sanctuary, and to give the Name of Jupiter to it as an Inſcription. The unexpectedneſs of the news made us almoſt immovable, and it was quickly confirmed to us by other People. We immediately retired, and ſhut our ſelves up in our Lodgings, to lament the general deſtruction of our Nation, and ſorrow being Eloquent, what was it that it did not prompt us to ſay? M

Having in this manner expos'd our ſelves in the midſt of Winter to the perils of a dangerous Voyage in hopes to have foun'd ſome redreſs for our Sufferings, we met upon the Land with a Tempeſt much more cruel, than thoſe which happen at Sea, becauſe they are natural, and by conſequence ſupportable; whereas this was cauſed by a man, who had nothing humane but his ſhape, by a young Prince, who lov'd nothing but change and trouble, and who ſeeing his Will and Pleaſure ſuſtained by the whole Power of the Empire, he ſuffered himſelf to be carried away without any reſtraint to all Licentiouſneſs and Tyranny; which was an Evil the more great and deplorable, becauſe not capable of any viſible remedy. For who durſt be ſo bold as to repreſent to him, that it was not conſiſtent with his duty to violate the ſanctity of the moſt Auguſt N Temple in the World? Or could one indeed without the loſs of his Life have remonſtrated againſt ſo great an impiety?

Let us dye then (ſaid we among our ſelves) ſeeing nothing can be more honourable, than to lay down our Lives in defence of our Laws. But our Death not being able to produce any good effect, and being Embaſſadors as we are, may it not be to augment the affliction of thoſe who ſent us, and give advantage to ſuch of our own Nation, as have no friendſhip for us, to ſay, that to deliver our ſelves from ſome preſent inconvenience, we deſerted the Intereſt of the Publick? though the leſſer Intereſts are alwayes to give place to the greater, and Private to Publick. For in the ſubverſion of Government, all the Laws, by which its Grandure and Conſiſtance was maintained, do for the moſt part ſuffer the ſame O Fate, and are aboliſhed with it.

May

A May it not be imputed to us likewiſe as a crime to abandon the Jews in Alexandria, by abandoning an affair in which their Safety or Ruine is involved, and the Safety or Ruine of our whole Nation, and leave them in fear, that a Prince of his Violence and Cruelty will entirely deſtroy them?

If it be Objected, That ſeeing, which way ſo ever we reſolve, no Succeſs is to be expected; why ſhould not we think of retiring in ſafety? I Anſwer,

That to do ſo, we muſt have either no hearts, or no knowledge in our divine Laws. God perhaps will make uſe of this opportunity as a tryal of our Virtues, and to ſee how we are diſpoſed to comport under affliction: Rather, inſtead of placing our ſafety in the uncertain ſuccours of Man, let us put our whole confidence in God with a firm Faith, that he will aſſiſt us, as he has B aſſiſted formerly our Fore-fathers, when their Perils were (in appearance) beyond all Remedy.
Thus it was we endeavoured to comfort our ſelves under ſo great and unexpected a Calamity, flattering our ſelves with hopes of ſeeing happier times.

When we had remained ſilent for a time, we ſaid to him who brought us the firſt ill News, Why do you content your ſelf, by having thrown an unhappy word among us, to have kindled an univerſal trouble in our minds, which as a ſingle Spark will grow to a Flame, and do not tell us, what it is that hath tranſported the Emperour to ſo extravagant a reſolution?

Every body knows (replied the perſon) that he would be reverenced as a God: and be- cauſe he is perſwaded, that the Jews are the only perſons, who will not acknowledge him for ſuch, C he believes he cannot any way afflict and puniſh them more, than by diſhonouring the Majeſty, and profaning the ſanctity of their Temple, which he knows is the moſt beautiful in the World, decorated and enriched with the Preſents of ſo many Ages, which no doubt, but his boldneſs and impiety will tempt him to ſeize.

Capito, a Commiſſioner for the receipt of the Tributes in Judea, has irritated him likewiſe againſt us by Letters which he has writ. This Capito having little or no fortune before he was ſent into this Province, and having feathered his Neſt well by his exaction ſince he came, he has a mind to prevent by his Calumnies the juſt Complaints, which he apprehended the Jews would make againſt him, and he has made uſe of the occaſion aforeſaid.

Jamnia is one of the moſt populous Towns in Judea, and all its Inhabitants are Jews, ex- cept ſome few Strangers, who (unhappily for us) are come thither to acquaint themſelves with D the neighbouring Provinces. Their averſion for our Manners and Cuſtoms is ſo great, that they ceaſe not to do us all the miſchief that they are able to do; and underſtanding that Caius was inflamed with an idle paſſion to be worſhipped as a God, and that on that account he had conceived a mortal hatred againſt us, they thought they could never hope for a fairer opportunity to deſtroy us. Wherefore they erected an Altar of Brick upon no other deſign, but becauſe they were ſure we would never ſuffer the Laws of our Anceſtors to be violated in that manner; and their malice and cunning has had the effect which was intended. For the Jews having pull'd down their Altar, they who ſet it up made complaint immediately to Capito, who was the con- triver of the plot, on purpoſe to ruine their fellow Citizens. This wicked man, tranſported as it were to have ſucceeded ſo far, failed not to write to Caius, exaggerating every thing, and E adding much to the truth, to provoke him the more. The violent and audacious Emperour no ſooner had the news, but he commanded, that inſtead of an Altar of Brick, they ſhould ſet up a Statue of him as big as a Coloſſus, which was to be Guilt over with Gold, and placed in the Temple of Jeruſalem: in which reſolution he had two principal Councellors, Helico that noto- rious Buffoon, and Apelles the famous Comedian, who (as is reported) having proſtituted himſelf, and expoſed his beauty for money when he was young, was now got upon the Theater in his old age, and the modeſty of that profeſſion every man knows. By theſe excellent qualities theſe two excellent perſons were got to be of Caius his Counſel. With the one he conſulted in mat- ters of Railery and Wit; and with the other how ſuch a ſpeech was to be pronounced upon the Stage, not ſo much as concerning himſelf with the Peace and Tranquility of the Empire.
F Helico, being an Egyptian, bit us like an Aſp; and Apelles being of Aſcalon was no kinder than he.

Every word, that this perſon ſpoke, was like a dagger at our hearts: but theſe two wicked Counſellors were not long without their Reward; For Caius cauſed Apelles to be clapt in irons for other Crimes, and tortured him upon the Wheel, but with ſeveral intervals, to increaſe and ſpin out his puniſhment; and Claudius ſucceeding Caius in the Empire, he put Helico to death for other conſiderable Reaſons;

CHAP. XIII.

Petronius his great trouble about executing the Order which he had received from Caius, to ſet up his Statue in the Temple of Jeruſalem, becauſe he was ſenſible of the injuſtice of it, and foreſaw the ill Conſequences.

CAIUS wrote then that his Statue ſhould be conſecrated, and ſet up in our Temple, and omitted nothing, that might injoyn the Execution of that Order. He I commanded Petronius Governour of Syria, to take half the Army, which was diſpoſed along the Euphrates to defend thoſe Countries againſt the Kings and People of the Eaſt, and to cauſe them to attend the Statue; not that they were to add to the Solemnity of its Conſecration, but to cut thoſe Jews in pieces, who ſhould have the boldneſs to oppoſe him. Is it ſo then, moſt cruel Prince, that, fore-ſeeing theſe poor people will ſooner expoſe themſelves to death, than ſuffer the violation of their Laws, and the profanation of their Temple, you declare War againſt them, and ſend a formidable army to conſecrate your Statue by the blood of ſo many innocent Victims, without ſparing either Women or Men?

This Order gave Petronius much trouble, by reaſon that on the one ſide he knew K Caius could not endure the leaſt delay in his obedience, and on the other ſide he ſaw the execution of his Commands very difficult, becauſe the Jews would ſuffer a thouſand deaths rather, than ſuffer any violation of their Religion; For, though all other people are tender of their Laws, yet it comes far ſhort of the bigottry of the Jews, who look upon theirs as Oracles given by God himſelf; They were brought up in it from their youth; They have it ingraven in their hearts; They forbear not to admire it; They receive into the number of their Citizens ſuch Strangers as imbrace it; Look upon thoſe as Enemies who deſpiſe it; And have ſo great a horror for every thing that contradicts it, that there is neither grandeur, nor fortune, nor any temporal felicity able to tempt them to violate it; Nor is there any greater evidence of their Reſpect and Veneration for their L Temple, than that it is certain death for any of them to dare to enter into the Sanctuary;
But for the reſt entrance is free to all thoſe of their Nation, of what Province ſoever.

Petronius revolving theſe things in his mind, found the Enterprize ſo dificult, that he made no haſt to put it in execution; and the more he conſidered this affair, the more he was perſwaded not to touch upon our Religion, as well becauſe Juſtice and Piety obliged him to alter nothing therein, as becauſe of the danger he was like to encounter, not only from the Judgement of God, but from the Reſiſtance of the Jews, who by that action would be driven to deſpair. He conſidered likewiſe the numerouſneſs of that Nation, which is not like the reſt crowded up in one Province, but diſperſed in ſo great numbers almoſt quite over the World both upon the Continent and in the Iſlands, that M they are well nigh equal in number to the Natives. And this gave him occaſion to apprehend, that aſſembling together from all parts they ſhould kindle a War, that could not eaſily be extinguiſhed, ſeeing they were already very ſtrong in Judea, no leſs Politick than Valiant, and ready to dy with their Swords in their hands with invincibe Courage, rather than abandon the Laws of their Fathers ſo excellently Juſt, though their Enemies would needs have them to be Barbarous.

This wiſe Governour was apprehenſive likewiſe of ſuch of that Nation as inhabited beyond the Euphrates, in Babylon and thoſe Provinces: for he knew for certain, as having ſeen it with his Eyes, that they ſent every year to the Temple, under the Title of Firſt-fruits, the money which they called Holy; without conſidering the danger of the ways, N how great ſoever it was, and all becauſe prompted by a principle of Devotion. So that he believed, and not without reaſon, that as ſoon as the Jews ſhould have notice of the Conſecration of this Statue, they would put themſelves inſtantly into the Field, and block him up on every ſide.

Theſe thoughts detained him for ſome time; but it put his mind into great agitation and trouble, when he conſidered he had for his Maſter a young Prince, who knew no other Juſtice than his Will; who could not endure to be diſobeyed, let his Commands be never ſo unequal, and whoſe pride and preſumption tranſported him to that exceſs of folly, that cauſing him to forget his Humanity, he would needs paſs for a God: So that he could neither execute nor decline the execution of his Orders without manifeſt danger O of his Life; only there was this difference, he might ſave it perhaps in the War, where

A where the events are uncertain; where as it was impoſſible to eſcape, if he refuſed obedience to his unmerciful Prince.

CHAP. XIV.

Petronius gave Order for this Statue, but it went on but ſlowly. He endeavoured in vain to perſwade the Jews to receive it. The Jews forſake the Towns and the Country to wait upon him, and begg of him not to execute an Order, that would B be more inſupportable to them than death, but to give them leave to ſend their Deputies to the Emperour.

THE Roman Officers, who with Petronius had the greateſt charge in the affairs of Syria, were all for a War; becauſe, knowing the fury of Caius, they doubted not, but, if they declin'd it, he would diſcharge his indignation upon them, in confidence that they muſt needs be acceſſory in this diſobedience. But by good fortune it hapned, that they had time to deliberate, whilſt the Satue was making: for there was none ſent out of Italy, which, I ſuppoſe, God in his mercy ſo ordered for the ſafety of his People, as alſo that there was no direction to take the hanſomeſt and beſt wrought that could be found C in Syria, for without that the War had broke out ſo ſuddainly, that no remedy could have been found for ſo great a miſchief.

Petronius, having concluded to have a Statue made, cauſed the ableſt Statuaries in Phenicia to be ſent for, furniſhed them with materials, and appointed Sydon to be the place, as the moſt proper for ſuch a buſineſs. Having done ſo, he ſent for the Chief Prieſts and Magiſtrates of the Jews, declared to them the Emperor's Command, and exhorted them to ſubmit, and not run themſelves into Calamity and Troubles which would be otherwiſe unavoidable; for the greateſt part of the Army in Syria had Orders to proceed with fire and ſword in caſe of diſobedience; And Petronius did not doubt, but if he could have prevail'd with them, they could have perſwaded the reſt of the People, but he D found himſelf miſtaken: for this diſcourſe went ſo near them, that after for a while they had ſtood ſtill as immovable, they brake out into Rivers of Tears, tore their beards and their hair, and cry'd out with a voice interrupted with ſighs. Have we then lived to this hour, to ſee what our Anceſtors never beheld? But how can we poſſibly ſee it, who will chooſe rather to loſe our Eyes and our Life, than be ſpectators of ſo horrible an impiety?

This report being ſpread abroad in Jeruſalem and in all Judea, the Jews left their Houſes and Fields, as it had been by conſent, and repaired to Phenicia to wait upon Petronius.
Their innumerable multitude made thoſe People believe, who were ignorant, how populous a Country Judea was; that it was a great Army marching againſt Petronius, of which they gave him immediate advice; but they had no other Arms then their ſighs and their E cryes; which fill'd the Air with ſuch a noiſe, that it ceaſed not, when they laid them by, and had recourſe to their Prayers, which the exceſs of their ſorrow put into their mouths.
They were diſtributed into ſix Claſſes, three on the one ſide, the Antient, the Young Men, and the Children; and three on the other, the old Women, the young Women, and the Maidens.

When they were brought in to Petronius (who was placed higher than the reſt) they threw themſelves before him upon the ground, beating their Breaſts, and ſobbing out ſo many ſighs, that nothing could be more pittiful; and though Petronius commanded them to riſe and come nearer, they were ſcarce to be perſwaded: At length they approached with aſhes upon their Heads, their Eyes ſwimming with tears, and their Hands F behind their Backs, as if they had been going to Execution; and he, who was Spokeſman for them all, delivered himſelf to Petronius in theſe Terms. SIR, To remove all pretence of accuſing us of any evil deſign, we are come not only without arms, but without any intention of making uſe of our hands, which are the Armes, that Nature has given to all mankind, and do therefore preſent our ſelves before you to be treated as you pleaſe. We have left our Houſes deſtitute, and brought our Wives and our Children along with us, to the end we may joyn their inſtances with our own, and by your mediation ſupplicate the Emperour either to preſerve or extinguiſh us all together. We are naturally lovers of Peace, and are the more impetuouſly inclined to it, becauſe, our greateſt pleaſure being to bring up our Children in our own way, there is nothing that conduces more to it. When Caius was advanced to the Empire, and G we underſtood it by his Letters to Vitellius (who was then Governour in Jeruſalem, and in whoſe place you have ſucceeded) we gave him a teſtimony of our joy, and ſignified it by publiſhing liſhing the good news thorow the reſt of the Cities. Our Temple was the firſt place, where ſacrifice H was offered for the happineſs of his reign; Would it be juſt that it ſhould be the only place, where that Religion ſhould be aboliſhed, which had been obſerved there in all Ages? We will leave our Houſes, our Goods, and our Poſſeſſions to your Mercy: all we beg is that nothing be introduced into our Temple, but that it may remain in the ſame condition, as it was left to us by our Fathers. If you will not grant us that favour, take away our lives, which we can loſe with much more ſatisfaction, than behold the violation of our bleſſed Laws. We are informed, that great forces are preparing to fall upon and conſtrain us, in caſe we oppoſe our ſelves againſt this Order; but we are not ſo imprudent as to reſiſt our Maſter; We will ſooner dy, than entertain any ſuch wicked deſign: He may kill us, and cut us in pieces, if he pleaſes, without any ſuch danger; we intend nothing of defence; we will be rather our own Prieſts, and when we have I ſacrificed our Wives, and our Children, and Relations, we will ſhed our own blood and mingle it with theirs, and expire in petitioning God Almighty, that he would not impute it to us as a Crime, ſeeing we do it not either for want of reſpect to the Emperour on the one ſide, nor for non-obſervance of our Laws on the other. But before we are reduced to that extremity, our humble requeſt to you, Sir, is, That you would vouchſafe us but ſome time, till we can make our addreſſes to the Emperour: 'Tis poſſible we may obtain from him, that he will not intrench upon the Worſhip, which we conceive due only to God, nor diſturb us in the exerciſe of our Religion, and put us into a worſe condition, than other Nations, to whom he has indulg'd their ancient Liberties and Cuſtoms, and confirmed the Decrees of Auguſtus and Tiberius his Predeceſſors, who were ſo far from condemning our Conduct, or reprehending our manners, that they entirely K approved them. It may be he may be mollified by oud addreſſes: The anger of Princes is not immortal, nor are their wills alwayes the ſame. It is only by Surmiſes and Calumnies that the Emperour is exaſperated againſt us. Permit us (if you pleaſe) to juſtify our ſelves, and inform him of the Truth. And what could be more ſevere, than that we ſhould be condemned without being heard? If we can obtain nothing from him, who will hinder him then from what he wonld do now? But do not, Sir, we beſeech you, by refuſing us the only hopes which remain to ſo great a multitude, obſtruct our application, ſeeing we beg it out of a true ſentiment of Piety, and not any Intereſt, unleſs it be ſaid (as is true) that no Intereſt is ſo great, as that which reſpects Preſervation.

CHAP. XV.

Petronius affected with the Condition and Humility of the Jews, and believing it unſafe to run them into deſpair, writes to Caius in ſuch a manner as might gain time. Caius reſents it highly, but diſſembles it in his anſwer to Petronius.

THIS Diſcourſe was accompanied with ſo many ſighs and tears, that it wrought compaſſion in all that heard it, and particularly in Petronius, who was naturally M moderate, and merciful. For the requeſt made to him in the Name of the whole Nation of the Jews ſeem'd not unreaſonable, and nothing could be more deplorable, than the condition into which they were brought.

Petronius propoſed and debated the buſineſs with his Councel, and was much pleaſed to find thoſe perſons, who were moſt bitter and inveterate againſt them before, come about and grow more gentle and mild, and others not afraid to declare, how much they were concerned for the Extreme affliction of that People; ſo that though he was not ignorant of the Cruelty of Caius, and that he never forgave any man, yet he ſeem'd to act by the motion of that Spirit, which the Piety of our Religion infuſes: Whether it was that, being a learned Man, he had had ſome ſmattering of it before; whether he had N gain'd it ſince his Governments in Aſia and Syria (in which Countries there are great numbers of Jews) whether it was his own natural propenſity, that inclin'd him to what was reaſonable and juſt; Or whether it was becauſe God does give uſually good inclinations to great Men, both for their own benefit and the advantage of the Publick; which of theſe it was, I cannot determine, but ſo it was at that time. The reſult was, that the Statuaries ſhould not be preſſed; but that Orders ſhould be given them to imploy the utmoſt of their skill, and make the Statue ſo accurately, that it might paſs for a Maſter-piece.

Pieces, which are a ſhort time in doing, are a ſhort time in decaying; whereas ſuch, as are made with more deliberation, laſt longer by far, and are eſteemed through ſeveral O Ages.

Petronius

Petronius did not incourage the Jews to ſend their Deputies towards the Emperour, becauſe he thought it not for their advantage to depend wholly upon the Capricio of a young Prince; yet he did not abſolutely forbid them, becauſe he ſaw there was danger both on the the one ſide and the other. However, he wrote a Letter to Caius (without mentioning the Application which the Jews had made to him) imputing the Cauſe of the Delay on the Conſecration of the Statue to the Artiſts, who being to make it excellent had required more time, that it might be done more ſuitable to the dignity of the perſon it was deſign'd to repreſent. He thought by this trick to gain time, and it was likely Caius might comply, becauſe Harveſt was at hand, and he might very well apprehend that the Jews (being made deſperate, and not valuing their Lives, after the violation of their Laws) might burn their own Corn and deſtoy all their fruit, which would be the more inconvenient, becauſe he was aſſured that Caius was upon a Voyage to Alexandria; for it was not likely that he would expoſe himſelf wholly to the dangers of the Sea with ſo great a Train, but rather ſteer his Courſe along the Shore of Aſia and Syria, where he might imbark and diſimbarke as he pleaſed, and have the benefit of his Long-boats (of which he had 200 in his fleet) to ſupply it with proviſions and forrage, which was requiſite to be prepared in great quantities in all the Towns in Syria, but eſpecially the Ports, by reaſon of the vaſt numbers which attended him as well from Italy as from all other parts of the world.

It was not doubted but this Letter would have been kindly received by Caius, and that he would have approved of the delay, not in conſideration of the Jews, but for the convenience of making ſuch proviſion of Victuals, and therefore it was written and diſpatched. But the Choller of this Prince was ſo inflamed at the reading of it, that his Eyes ſparkled with fury, and clapping his hands together in a great tranſport, he ſaid,

How Petronius! Have not you yet learned to obey your Emperour? Your great imployments have puff'd you up with pride, and it ſeems you know nothing of Caius but his Name; but you ſhall know him better hereafter by your proper experience. You have more conſideration of the Laws of the Jews (who are my mortal Enemies) than for my Commands who am your Prince. You apprehend their great numbers, as if you had not an Army as great, and terrible to the King of Parthia, and the whole Eaſt; yet your compaſſion for that pitiful Nation is ſtronger than your deſire to pleaſe and obey me. You pretend (forſooth) the neceſſity of making proviſion for my paſſage to Alexandria; as if I could not be accommodated from the neighbouring Provinces, and as if the plenty of other Countries were not able to ſupply the ſterility of Judea.

But why do I protract and ſpend time in unprofitable words? 'Tis by the death of this impudent fellow that I muſt convince him of the greatneſs of his fault, and that mine anger never ceaſes, though my threatnings may.

This furious Prince returned an Anſwer to Petronius; but being fearful of provoking ſuch of his Governours as were capable of raiſing Rebellion, and particularly thoſe who commanded ſuch potent and large Provinces as that upon the Euphrates, and who had the command of ſuch Armies as that which was then in Syria, he dſſembled his Choller; applauded the deſcretion and prudence of Petronius; only adviſed him by the by not to protract the Conſecration of his Statue any longer, for ſeeing Harveſt was over, there could be no conſiderable reaſon to defer it.

H

CHAP. XVI.

King Agrippa comes to Rome, and being told by Caius that he would have his Statue erected in the Temple of Jeruſalem, he falls into a ſwond; having recollected himſelf, he writes a Letter to Caius.

NOT long after King Agrippa arrived at the Emperors Court, knowing nothing of the Letter from Petronius, nor of the Anſwer which Caius had returned: when Agrippa came to pay his duty to the Emperour, he eaſily diſcovered by the manner I of his reception that he was highly offended. He conſidered with himſelf whether he had done any thing that might diſguſt him; but remembring nothing of that, he concluded (as was true) that his paſſion was againſt ſome Body elſe. Nevertheleſs obſerving that that agitation of Spirit appeared not in his Countenance, but when he caſt his Eyes upon him, his fear continued, and it came often into his mind to take notice of it to him; but he forbore, leſt by an imprudent curioſity he ſhould pull the anger of his Prince, which was fixed upon other People, upon himſelf.

No man ſeeing farther into Peoples thoughts then Caius, he quickly perceived that Agrippa was diſturbed, and told him; I will tell you what you are ſo deſirous to underſtand. You know me too well to be ignorant, that I ſpeak no leſs with my Eyes than with my Tongue: K Theſe honeſt men of your Nation are the only People who diſdain to acknowledge me for a God; and do ſeem to run themſelves deſperately into ruine, by refuſing their obedience to an order that I have given for the ſetting up a Statue of Jupiter in their Temple. They have met together from all the Cities and Countries to preſent a Petition, which in effect is nothing but to teſtify their contempt and diſreſpect to my Commands.

He would have proceeded, but Agrippa was ſurpriſed with ſo violent a ſorrow, that he fainted before him, and had fallen down, had he not been ſuſtained by thoſe who were about him. He was carried off to his Lodgings, where he continued inſenſible for a conſiderable time.

The concernment of this poor Prince augmented the hatred that Caius had conceived againſt our Nation. L If Agrippa (ſaid he) who has alwayes had an affection for me, and has been obliged to me by ſo many favours, has ſo great a Paſſion for the Laws of his Country, that he is not able to endure that I ſhould croſs them, or ſo much as mention it to him, without hatred to his Life, what am I to expect from the reſt of the Jews, who are not obliged by any Conſiderations of me to abandon their ſentiments?

All that day, and a good part of the next, Agrippa remain'd in ſuch aſtoniſhment, that he could not recollect himſelf; at length about evening he began to lift up his head; and opening his eyes with much trouble, he caſt them upon the People who were about him, but knew no body, and having done ſo he fainted again, but with ſomething more freedom of breath. Not long after he opened his eyes again, and coming a little to himſelf, M Where am I (ſaid he) with the Emperour? and is he preſent?

Take courage Sir, (ſaid ſome about him) You are in your own Lodgings, and the Emperour is not preſent. You have ſlept enough, awake now if you pleaſe, and try if you know us. Here are none but your Friends and your Servants, whom you love, and I am ſure they love you beyond their own Lives.

Then the Prince opened his Eyes, recollected himſelf, and found by their countenances what an impreſſion his malady had made in their hearts. The Phyſitians cauſed the greateſt part of thoſe who were preſent to withdraw, that they might apply their remedy, and give him to eat with more convenience. Upon their preſenting him ſomething to eat, he told them, N

Trouble me not with your Delicates; in the affliction I am in, it is ſufficient to keep me from ſtarving; and indeed I ſhould not perſwade my ſelf to eat at all, had I not ſome hopes of being able to aſſiſt my Country-men in ſo unfortunate an extremity.

Theſe words he delivered with Tears, and then took what was barely neceſſary, for the ſuſtenance of his Life, and would not ſuffer them to mingle one drop of Wine with the Water which he drank. After which he told them, I have now received what I could not have refuſed without deſtruction to my body. There remains nothing, but that I imploy the utmoſt of my endeavours with the Emperour to divert the ſtorm that impends: and thereupon calling for materials, he writ this Letter to the Emperour,

O

SIR,

A SIR,

“ MY Reſpects and awe for your Majeſty deters me from preſenting my ſelf before “ you. Your Luſtre amazes me, and your Comminations affright me : “ A Letter will better expreſs my humble requeſt, than I could do it by word of “ mouth. You know (great Sir) that Nature has engraven in every man's heart an “ ardent affection for his Country, and a ſingular veneration for the Laws which have “ been derived to him from his Anceſtors, as you have ſufficiently teſtified by your “ Affection to the one, and by the great care your Majeſty takes to have the other obſerved.
B “ The ſame inclination is ſo naturally and ſo ſtrongly radicated in all ſubjects, “ that there is ſcarce a People, to whom their Laws do not ſeem juſt (though in effect “ they be otherwiſe) and the cauſe is, for that they judge commonly more by Reſpect “ than by Reaſon.

“ You are not ignorant Sir, that I am by Nation a Jew, and born in Jeruſalem, where “ that bleſſed Temple is placed that is decicated more particularly to the honour “ of Almighty God. My Predeceſſors have been Kings of that happy Country : Some “ of them have been Chief Prieſts, and exulted more in that dignity, than the Crown; “ being perſwaded, that as God was above Men, ſo the Prieſthood was above the “ Throne ; Divine things being the Object of the one, and but Humane things of the C “ other.

“ Finding my ſelf (Great Sir) obliged by ſo many Ligaments to this Nation, this “ Intereſt, and this Temple, I could not refuſe them my Interceſſion to your Majeſty ; “ Let me therefore with all humility beg, that you would not permit my poor Country-men “ to leſſen their Zeal and Allegiance to you, of which no People in Europe or “ Aſia have alwayes given greater teſtimony for your Auguſt Imperial Family, in what “ ever their Religion and Laws would diſpence with. They have not only made Vows “ and Sacrifices for the proſperity of your Empire upon publick Feaſts and Solemnities, “ but every day. Which ſhews that it was not only by bare words, and falſe oſtentations, “ but by real effects proceeding from the ſincerity of their hearts, that they ſignified D “ their affection to your Predeceſſors.

“ As to that ſacred City in which I had the happineſs to be born, I may ſay it is not “ to be conſidered only as the Metropolis of Judea, but it is the Capital City of ſeveral “ other Provinces, by reaſon of the many Colonies with which it has peopled Egypt, “ Phenicia, the upper and lower Syria, Pamphilia, Cilicia, ſeveral other parts of Aſia, “ as far as Bithynia, and a great way on the other ſide of the Sea.

“ In Europe, it hath furniſhed with Colonies, Theſſalie, Beotia, Macedonia, Etolia, “ Athens, Argos, Corinth, with the greateſt part of Peloponneſus, beſides the moſt celebrated “ Iſles, as Eubea, Cyprus and Candia.

“ What ſhall I ſay likewiſe of the Countries beyond the Euphrates, in which (unleſs E “ it be part of the Province of Babylon, and ſome other Governments) moſt of the “ Cities that are ſeated in fruitful Countries are inhabited by the Jews? So that if “ the Country, in which I had the honour to be born, may find favour in your Eyes, “ you will not (great Sir) oblige one ſingle Town, but a vaſt number of Cities in all “ places of the World ; and it would be a thing ſuitable to your Grandeur and Fortune “ to have all people participate of your favours to them ; for there is no part of the “ Earth in which your glory will not be proclaimed, nor any perſon living that will refuſe “ you thoſe praiſes and acknowledgments that will be due to you.

“ At the requeſt of ſome of your private friends you have given whole Cities the “ freedom of Rome, and thereby advanced them before others, to whom they were formerly F “ inferiour ; in which you obliged (no leſs than the Towns) the Perſons by “ whoſe interceſſion you granted that honour.

“ I can ſay without vanity, that among all the Princes, who pay obedience to your “ Majeſty, there are very few who precede me in dignity, but none who ſurpaſſes (I “ may ſay equals me) in point of affection to your Majeſty, both as I am born your “ Subject, and obliged by many expreſs and particular favours. I dare not be ſo confident “ as to beg the freedom of Rome for my Country-men, to exempt them from Tributes, “ or give them Infranchiſment : I requeſt, Sir, only a favour that will be no “ charge or inconvenience to your Majeſty, but a great benefit to them ; and there is “ none ſo great a benefit to the Subject, as the favour of their Prince.

G “ Jeruſalem had the firſt news of your happy ſucceſſion to the Empire, and publiſhed “ it immediately through all the neighbouring Provinces. Since then Jeruſalem was the

the firſt City in the Eaſt, that proclaimed you Emperour, may not ſhe with reaſon H hope for ſome particular grace, at leaſt not to be put into a worſe condition than any of her Neighbours?

“Having ſpoken for my Nation and Country-men, it remains that I do now with all humility ſupplicate you for our Temple, being conſecrated to God Almighty, and his Majeſty inhabiting it. We have never admitted any Image or Statue there, becauſe Painters and Sculptors repreſent only ſuch Deities as are viſible, and the God which we worſhip being inviſible, our Anceſtors have thought, that they could not without impiety undertake any ſuch repreſentation.

“Agrippa your Grandfather had a reſpect for this Temple: Auguſtus ordered by Letters expreſs that the Firſt-fruits ſhould be brought thither from all parts, and that not a I day ſhould paſs but Sacrifices ſhould be made.

“The Empereſs your great Grandmother had it in the ſame Veneration. There was neither Greek nor Barbarian, nor Prince (how great ſoever his pique was to us) nor Sedition, nor War, no Captivity, nor other of the greateſt deſolations that could happen to any People, that could ever prevail with us to admit an Image into our Temple; for even our greateſt Enemies have born a reverence for this place, becauſe it was conſecrated to the Creator of the Univerſe, for fear of thoſe dreadful Judgements, which they knew had befallen thoſe perſons, who had had the boldneſs to violate it; of which, without inſtancing in Forreign Examples, I ſhall recount ſuch as are domeſtick to your Majeſty. K

“When Marcus Agrippa your Grandfather in favour to King Herod my Grandfather condeſcended to viſit Judea, and coaſt along the Shore to Jeruſalem, he was ſo taken with the Magnificence of the Temple, with its Ornaments, the diverſity of the Orders of the Prieſts, with their Veſtments, and particularly with the habit of the Chief-Prieſt, with the formality of their Sacrifices, and the Devotion of thoſe who aſſiſted; That he could not forbear teſtifying his admiration. He took ſo much pleaſure in the contemplation of theſe things, that there was not a day paſt, whilſt he remained at Jeruſalem, but he viſited them all, offered magnificent Preſents, and granted to the Inhabitants of that great City all that they could deſire but exemption from Taxes.

“Herod paid him all the honour he could deviſe, and having received much greater L from him, attended him in perſon to the Sea-ſide, the People flocking from all parts to throw boughs and flowers in his way, accompanying him with a thouſand Benedictions.

“Is it not, Sir, a thing known all the World over, that the Emperour Tiberius your great Uncle during the 23 years of his reign had the ſame reſpect for our Temple, not ſuffering any body to make the leaſt alteration in the Orders obſerved there? Upon which account (though otherwiſe I was a great ſufferer by him) I cannot contein from recounting an action that redounded much to his honour, and I know you take delight in hearing the Truth. Pilate the then Governour of Judea conſecrated to him in the Palace of Herod at Jeruſalem certain guilt Bucklers not ſo much in honour to M him, as hatred to our Nation. There was no Image ingraven upon the Bucklers, nor no Inſcription, but the Name of him who dedicated them, and the Name of him to whom they were dedicated. Neverthleſs the People tumultuated in ſuch manner, that they imployed the four ſons of the King, the other Princes of the Blood, and the moſt conſiderable Perſons of our Nation to perſwade Pilate to cauſe the Buckers to be removed, by reaſon it was contrary to the Cuſtoms of their Anceſtors, which Cuſtoms neither Kings nor Emperours had ever infring'd before; and ſeeing Pilate (who was of a violent and obſtinate nature) did ſeem to refuſe them, they cryed out, Have a care of troubling the Peace which we enjoy: Have a care how you provoke us to Revolt, and to War: 'Tis not by the violation of our Laws that the Emperor is to be honoured; you N muſt find another pretence to colour ſo unjuſt an Enterprize, and ſo inſupportable to us; for this magnanimous Prince is far from intrenching upon our Cuſtoms: If you have any Commiſſion to that purpoſe, any Letter or other Order to authorize you in what you do, let us ſee it, and we will depute perſons to wait upon him with our humble Remonſtrances. Theſe words exaſperated Pilate, yet gave him much trouble; for he feared, that, if they ſent their Deputies, they would inform the Emperour of his Exactions, Injuſtices, and horrible Cruelties, by which he had afflicted many innocent perſons, and put as many to death.

“In ſo great an anxiety Pilate, notwithſtanding his Paſſion and Severity, knew not what way to ſteer. He durſt not take away the Bucklers, becauſe they had been con-ſecrated; and if he durſt have ventured upon that, he could not frame himſelf to com- O ply with the People, and beſides he knew the mind of Tiberius.

A “Thoſe who interceded for the Jews perceiving, that though he diſſembled it what he could, yet he repented of what he had done, writ a Letter to Tiberius with great inſtance and reſpect; and there needs no further proof of its effects, than that after he had ſignified his diſpleaſure to Pilate in his immediate Anſwer, he ſent to him his Commands to remove the Bucklers to the Temple at Ceſaria, which was built in honour to Auguſtus, and it was done accordingly; by which invention all due reſpect was paid to the Emperour, without any invaſion of our Laws. Thoſe Bucklers had no image upon them, and yet now our Controverſie is about a Statue: Thoſe Bucklers were placed only in the Palace of the Governour; and this Statue muſt be ſet up in the Sanctuary, a place ſo holy, that there is only the high Prieſt permitted B to enter, and that only one time in the year (after a ſolemn Faſt) to burn Perfumes in honour to God, and by his humble Prayers to implore his bleſſing on our whole Nation for the next year. If any other, not only of the Comonalty, but of the Prieſts (not excepting him who is next to the high Prieſt) preſumes to enter; or if the high Prieſt himſelf enters it above once a year, or more times that very day in which he has liberty to enter, than what is allowed by our Law, it will coſt him his Life; nothing can ſave him; ſo peremptory has our great Lawgiver been in his Orders for the reverencing this holy Place, and for the making it inacceſſible. You are not then to doubt, great Sir, but your Statue ſhall be no ſooner erected, but ſeveral of the Prieſts will rather kill themſelves, their Wives, and their Children, than be ſpectators of ſuch C violence to their Laws.

“Thus it was that Tiberius acted upon this occaſion; and as to that Prince (the happieſt that ever govern’d the Empire) your moſt excellent Predeceſſor (who, having given Peace to the whole World, deſerved for his virtue and great exploits the glorious name of Auguſtus) when he underſtood, that we admitted not into our Temple any viſible Image, as being improper to repreſent an inviſible God, he admired the Piety and Knowledge of our Nation, being learned himſelf, and accuſtomed to paſs the greateſt part of his time at meals in diſcourſe of Philoſophical points, that he had been taught by the greateſt Maſters, and in the Converſation of learned Men, which he kept conſtantly about him, that his Mind might receive its repaſt as well as his D Body.

“I could inſtance in ſeveral other things evincing his kindneſs to our Nation, but I ſhall content my ſelf with two.

“Being informed that there was a neglect in bringing in our Firſt-Fruits, he ſent to the Governours of the Provinces in Aſia, to permit only the Jews to aſſemble together, becauſe their meetings were not like the Bacchanals, to drink and debauch, and contrive againſt the Peace of the Publick; but Academies of Virtue, where People were inſtructed to love Juſtice and Temperance; and as to their Firſt-Fruits, which were ſent annually to Jeruſalem, they were imployed only to offer Sacrifices to God in the Temple. Wherefore this great Prince expreſly forbad every body for moleſt- E ing the Jews in what related to their Meetings and Firſt-Fruits. If theſe were not the very words, I am ſure it was the ſence, as your Majeſty may know by one of the Letters of C. Norbanus Flaccus, of which I have brought you a Coppy.

“C. Norbanus Flaccus to the Magiſtrates of Epheſus, Greeting. The Emperour has writ to me, that in all places under my Government, where there are any Jews, I ſhould permit them to aſſemble according to their ancient Cuſtoms, and to raiſe mony to be ſent to Jeruſalem: I do adviſe and require, that you give them no interruption.

“Doth not the favour and affection of Auguſtus to the Jews appear clearly hereby, ſeeing he permits the Jews to aſſemble publickly to collect their Firſt-Fruits, and perform other actions of Piety and Devotion?

F “I will give you another proof, and that no leſs conſiderable. He commanded that a Bull and a Ram ſhould be offered every day at his charge in honour to our God, which is obſerved to this day without any diſcontinuance; yet he knew that there was no Image permitted either within the Temple or without: and no perſon ſurpaſſing him in knowledge, he thought it but reaſonable, that there ſhould be a Temple peculiarly dedicated to the inviſible God, in which there ſhould be no Image, and where men might utter their Prayers and Devotions with confidence of relief.

“The Empreſs Julia, your Majeſties great Grand-mother, imitating the Piety of her incomparable Husband, adorned our Temple with ſeveral ineſtimable Veſſels of Gold, without any Image ingraved upon them, becauſe, though Women do not G eaſily comprehend inviſible things, yet her Wit and inclination to great matters had ſo elevated her in that (as in other things) above the pitch of her ſex, that ſhe underſtood “ derſtood intellectual things as well as ſenſible ; and ſhe was perſwaded that the later H “ were but Types and Shadows of the former.

“ Since then you have ſo many pregnant Examples at home of the great affection of “ your Predeceſſors to us ; Continue, I beſeech you, what they, from whom your per-“ ſon and ſucceſſion is derived, have ſo carefully preſerved.

“ They are Emperours, who intercede in the behalf of our Laws to an Emperour ; “ They are great Princes, to a great Prince ; They are Grand-fathers and Grandmo“ thers, to a Grand-child ; Several to one ſingle Perſon ; all of them admoniſhing as it “ were in theſe terms ; Do not you aboliſh what we have eſtabliſhed, and what has been “ alwayes obſerved ; but conſider, that though the ſubverſion of this Order may poſſibly “ produce no ill effects immediately, yet the uncertainty of future Events ought to make “ the moſt hardy to fear, if they have not wholly renounced the fear of their Cre- I “ ator.

“ Should I go about to recount all my Obligations to your Majeſty, the day would “ fail me before I had finiſhed ; and yet it troubles me to paſs them over too ſoon ; But “ ſo great benefits will publiſh themſelves. You have beat off my Irons, but thoſe Irons “ incumbred but part of my Body, and the pain, that I now ſuffer, oppreſſes my Soul.
“ You have delivered me from the apprehenſion of Death, and afterwards reviv'd me, “ when a greater apprehenſion had put me into ſuch a ſtate, that I was lookt upon as “ dead. Preſerve then, I beſeech you, that Life, that you have reſtored, and would “ not doubtleſs have reſtor'd to have prolong'd my misfortunes.

“ Your Majeſty has advanced me to the greateſt honour, that can be aſpired; you have K “ given me a Kingdom, and added to that Kingdom Trachonitis and Galilee. After ſuch “ extraordinary Favours, do not, I beſeech you, refuſe me another ſo neceſſary, that the “ not granting of that will make the other unprofitable; and when you have raiſ'd me to “ ſo glorious, ſo illuſtrious a condition, do not humble me down again into darkneſs “ and ſorrow.

“ I do not beg of you to continue me in that high ſphere, where your favour has plac'd “ me. All that I beg is, That you would not interfere with the Laws of my Country ;
“ and if you deny me that, what will my Country-men, what will the whole World “ think of my Intereſt with you ? Will not they have reaſon to believe, that I have either “ betrayd my Country, or loſt the honour of your favour, which are two the greateſt L “ Evils that I dread ? Nevertheleſs I muſt of neceſſity fall into one of them, ſeeing I “ muſt either be Cowardly or Perfidious in deſerting an Intereſt, that ought to be ſo “ dear to me ; Or elſe I muſt have loſt my Intereſt in your kindneſs, if, imploring your “ Mercy for the preſervation of the Temple and my Country, you ſhould not “ think fit to uſe me with the ſame favour, that former Emperours have ſhown to all ſuch, “ as they did honour with their kindneſs.

“ If I be ſo unfortunate as to be pleaſing to you no longer, do not caſt me into Bonds
“ as Tiberius did, but put me immediatly to death ; For why ſhould I deſire to live “ having loſt your Majeſties favour, in which only I repoſ'd my greateſt confidence and M “ hopes ?

Caius was wrought upon by Agrippa's Letter, and ſent to Petronius to do nothing in the Temple at Jeruſalem. But he repented preſently, and cauſed a Statue to be made in Rome, which he ordered to be ſent privately to Jeruſalem at the ſame time, when he ſhould go to Alexandria, where he likewiſe reſolved to be acknowledged for a God. The Injuſtice and Cruelty of that Prince.

B

WHEN King Agrippa had ſeal'd and diſpatch'd this Letter to Caius, he expected the ſucceſs with all imaginable impatience, as judging, that not only the Conſervation or Ruine of Judea was at Stake, but the Intereſt of the whole Nation of the Jews ſpread abroad over the whole Earth.

This Letter produced great agitation in the mind of Caius. He could not with patience behold his Pleaſure diſputed, and yet he could not but be touched with the Reaſons and importunity of Agrippa. He blam'd his affection for them, who were the only People, that durſt withſtand the Conſecration of his Statue; and yet he could not but approve C the ſincerity of that Prince, as proceeding from the nobleneſs and generoſity of his mind. At length his kindneſs for Agrippa prevailed againſt his Choller; he was mollified by degrees, returned him a favourable anſwer, and granted him the higheſt of all favours, that he would deſiſt from the aforeſaid Conſecration. After which he writ to Petronius to make no farther alteration in the Temple; but he blended his grace with ſuch ſevere Conditions, as gave them always occaſion to tremble; for he added this Clauſe to his Letter, But if in any other Town beſide Jeruſalem any body thinks fit to erect any Statue or Altar to me or mine, and any one he found ſo audacious as to oppoſe it, it is our pleaſure, that he be puniſhed upon the place, or ſent Priſoner to us.

Was not this to revoke or cancel his favour at the ſame time when he granted it, ſeeing D thoſe words could not be conſidered, but as ſeeds of Commotion and War? For who doubted but thoſe People, who were Enemies to the Jews, would fill their Provinces with ſacriledge, and ſuch marks of honour, as are due only to God (and that rather to deſtroy our Nation, than to oblige Caius) and then the Jews not being able to ſuffer ſuch an outrage upon their Laws, Caius, to puniſh their reſiſtance, would de novo command the Statue to be ſet up and conſecrated in the Temple? Nevertheleſs, by the manifeſt protection of God, none of the People adjacent to Judea gave them this occaſion of trouble, though there was ſo much cauſe to apprehend it. But ſome will ſay, What advantage had they by it? for though others ſate ſtill, Caius himſelf did not: For he immediately repented of the favour which he had granted, reaſum'd his old reſolution, and taking E no notice of the Statue that was making at Sidon (leſt it ſhould beget a revolt) he gave order for a new one to be made of gilt Braſs in Rome, with directions that it ſhould be ſent privately by Sea, and without notice ſet up in the Temple of Jeruſalem, when he went himſelf into Egypt.

He omitted no Order in the preparation for his Voyage to Alexandria, ſo great was his deſire to ſee it; and ſo firm his reſolution to continue therein ſome time, becauſe no other place ſeem'd to him ſo convenient for the execution of his ridiculous deſign of being owned for a God, out of an opinion he had, that the example of that great City (by reaſon of its ſcituation, and the reſort thither from all parts of the world) might induce other Towns leſs conſiderable to give him the ſame divine honour, as he was aſſur'd F of in Alexandria. Beſides, he was of ſo light and inconſtant a nature, he never did any good thing, but he repented of it immedately, and found out ſome way to revoke it, and make things very much worſe than before; and of this I ſhall give you ſome proof.

Having ſet certain Priſoners at liberty one day, he cauſed them about an hour after to be clapt up again without any hopes of ever being diſcharged any more, though they had committed nothing in the interim, that might move his diſpleaſure.

Another time he ſent others into Exile, who had committed nothing at all, and he looked upon that ſentence as a favour, becauſe they, knowing his horrible inhumanity, expected, and had prepared themſelves for death. Accordingly they were ſent into the Iſlands, where they were put to plough and cultivate the Earth, and they took their miſ- G fortune patiently. But on a ſuddain, though they had given no new provocation, he ſent Souldiers, and put them all to the ſword, which was a great affliction to ſeveral great Families in Rome.

H If he gave money at any time to any body, he would be ſure to have it again, not by way of loan, or upon condition to pay them Intereſt, but by way of Authority and Violence; and the poor people were not only glad to reſtore it, but they ſcap'd well, if it did not coſt them all their own, whether it was their Patrimony, or acquired by their own Induſtry and Labour.

Thoſe, who thought themſelves higheſt in his favour, he ruin'd under pretence of affection; obliging them to ſuch exceſſive expences in vain Feaſting and Entertainments, that ſometimes one ſingle Treat was ſo magnificent and ſumptuous, that it was ſufficient to undo a man utterly, and forced him to borrow, what he was never able to pay; upon which ſcore ſome perſons were affraid of his friendſhip, becauſe it was not only uſeleſs, but dangerous; and to be eſteemed rather a ſnare, than an advantage.

I This was the humour of Caius, who hating no nation like the Jews, no Nation felt ſo much the effects of his hatred. He began in Alexandria to ſequeſter their Oratories, and fill them with Statues, and no man durſt oppoſe ſo great a Violence. There was now only the Temple at Jeruſalem unviolated; and to compleat his Impiety, he would needs raviſh that from God, and impropriate it to himſelf, with this Title,

THE TEMPLE OF THE NEW JUPITER, THE ILLUSTRIOUS CAIUS.

K What do you intend, moſt preſumptuous and infatuated Prince? You are but a Man, and would uſurp upon God. 'Tis not enough for you to have dominion over ſo many People, that there is ſcarce a Nation or Climate, to which your Empire does not extend! But you will not ſuffer in the whole World one ſingle Place to be appropriated to God Almighty, in which it may be lawful with ſincere Piety to pay him that Devotion, which is due to his Divine Majeſty.

Are theſe the great hopes which the World conceived of your Reign? Or do you not know, that this courſe is no leſs, than to draw upon your ſelf and your whole Empire a deluge of all imaginable miſchiefs?

L

CHAP. XVIII.

With what auſterity Caius treated Philo, and the other Ambaſſadors from Alexandria, and how he would not be perſwaded to hear what they could ſay.

M BUT we muſt come now to the Paſſages in our Embaſſie. The day appointed for our Audience being come, we were no ſooner introduced, but we could eaſily perceive by his Mine and his Geſture, that Caius was rather become a Party than a Judge. For if he would have acted like a Judge, he ſhould have adviſed with his Counſel in an affair of that importance, wherein all the Priviledges were in queſtion, that for four hundred years together had been enjoyed by ſo great a multitude of Jews, as lived in Alexandria, without the leaſt intrenchment or moleſtation. He ought to have heard both ſides, debated the whole matter with his Counſel, and afterwards pronounced a juſt and equitable arreſt. But, inſtead of proceeding by thoſe methods of Juſtice, the pitileſs Tyrant, bending his brows upon us with a furious Brutality, cauſed the two Intendants of the Gardens of Mecenas and Lamia (which are near both the Town and his Palace) to N be called to him (for he had been retired thither for his recreation three or four days) He commanded them to open the doors of the ſeveral Appartments, which opened into thoſe Gardens, for he was diſpoſed to walk, and gave Order that we ſhould follow.

We threw our ſelves down at his feet, and ſaluted him with the Titles of Emperour and Auguſt. The manner in which he received our Salutation was ſuch, that we quickly found, that we were to deſpair not only of ſucceſs in our Embaſſie, but the ſafety of our Lives. For he told us frowning, and with an angry kind of ſmile; Are not you the declared Enemies of the gods? Are not you they, who, when others acknowledge my Divinity, do refuſe and deſpiſe me?

O And ſaying ſo, he lifted up his hands towards Heaven uttering ſuch expreſſions, that I heard with too much horror to repeat them again.

Our

A Our Adverſaries obſerving it, and concluding that they had gain'd their Cauſe, could not conceal their exceſs of Joy; and there was not one of all the Attributes, wherewith God himſelf is honoured, but they gave to him.

There was a perſon named Iſidorus, a great and dangerous Calumniator, who, perceiving Caius to be infinitely well pleaſed with his Flatteries and Cajolments, ſaid to him, Sir, You would abhor theſe people much more, and thoſe who ſent them, did you know their malice againſt you. They are the only People, who refuſe to offer Sacrifice for your ſafety; and generally the whole Nation is guilty of the ſame ſtubbornneſs. At which words we were not able to contein, but cryed out, that it was falſe, for we ſacrificed Hecatombs to that purpoſe; and having waſht our Altars with the blood of our Victims, we did not devour the fleſh
B our ſelves like ſeveral other Nations, but burned all together in that ſacred fire, and this we have done more than once or twice; for we did it three times, Firſt upon your advancement to the Throne: Next, when you recovered of your great fit of ſickneſs, which was an affliction to the whole World: And the third time, when we made it our ſolemn prayer to God Almighty to give you ſucceſs in your Enterprizes in Germany.

Tis true (the furious Emperour reply'd) you offered Sacrifices, but it was to another, not to me: and therefore, What honour did I receive by it?

We could perceive at thoſe horrid words our blood to freeze in our veins. In the mean time Caius paſſed from one appartment to another, finding fault where any thing was amiſs, and giving order how it ſhould be mended. We followed him, joſt-
C led and derided by our Adverſaries, who abus'd and mock'd us, like Mimicks on a Stage; and indeed our whole negotiation might have paſſed for a Comedy, having nothing in it but appearance of Truth. For he, who ought to have been our Judge, was our Accuſer; and our own party animated him againſt us. Having him therefore for an Enemy, and ſuch an Enemy, what could we do but be ſilent? And being ſilent is a kind of defence, eſpecially where nothing can be ſaid, that would have been pleaſing to him, and the fear of his violence upon our Laws had ſhut up our mouths.

When he had given direction about his buildings, he demanded ſeriouſly and with great gravity of us, Why we were ſo ſcrupulous in eating of Hogs-fleſh? Upon which our Adverſaries (to Cajole him with their flatteries) fell out into ſo immoderate and un-D decent a laughter, that ſome of the Prince's Officers, which were about him, could ſcarce brook ſo great a diſreſpect; and it was ſo much the greater, by how much his humor was ſuch, there was not any but his Privado's and Intimates, that could without danger take the liberty upon them of but ſmiling in his preſence.

We replyed moſt humbly to the Emperour, That the Cuſtoms of People were different, and that as among us there were ſome things forbidden, ſo there were others prohibited to other Nations. And one of our Company inſtancing in thoſe who eat no Lamb, the Emperour laught & reply'd, They have no reaſon, for the fleſh is not good. Theſe railleries augmented our trouble very much; but at length, in ſome kind of heat he asked us, upon what grounds we founded our freedom? We began to lay before him our grounds, and he fore-
E ſeeing well that they would be reaſonable, and that we had many more to corroborate them, he roſe up on a ſuddain, and ran into a great Chamber, cauſing his ſervants to ſhut the Windows, whoſe glaſs was contrived ſo as to let in the Light, but keep out the Wind; and was as clear as Chryſtal. We followed, and he came to us again, and demanded of us very moderately, what we had more to ſay? We would have gone on with our Reaſons, but in ſtead of hearing them, he ran again in great ſpeed into another Hall, where he had commanded ſeveral ancient Pictures to be brought for him to ſee; ſo that finding our ſelves ſo often interrupted in our affairs, and in ſuch different manner, ſuppoſing we were to expect nothing but death, we addreſſed our ſelves in our extremity to the true, for protection againſt the counterfeit God: and it pleas'd him to F have compaſſion on us, and by his infinite goodneſs to moderate the fury of Caius, who commanded us to withdraw, and went away himſelf, only ſaying to thoſe who were next him, Theſe People are not ſo bad, as unfortunate and beſotted not to believe me to be of Divine nature.

In this manner we departed not only from his Judgment, but from his Theater, and Priſon, for what was it but a Theater, where we were laughed at and derided? And the rigors of a Priſon are they comparable to the torments we endured from ſo many Blaſphemies againſt God, and ſo many Menaces from an enraged Tyrant againſt us? Becauſe ours (forſooth) was the only Nation, that obſtructed his being owned for a God.

G Upon this we deſiſted, and reſpited for a while, not out of love to our Lives, for could our death have been ſervicable to the conſervation of our Laws, we would have embrac'd it with joy, as conducting us to a happy Eternity. But becauſe beſides this it would H have been deſtructive to our Laws, and offenſive to thoſe who ſent us, for as much as the management of ſuch things are uſually judged by their ſucceſs, we comforted our ſelves in ſome meaſure, that we had eſcaped ſuch a danger, yet not without continuing in great apprehenſions, what judgment the Emperour would give. For how could he be informed of the Equity of our Cauſe, when he vouchſafed not ſo much as to hear us?

And what could be more cruel, than to ſee the ſafety of our whole Nation depend upon the manner, after which we five (who were Embaſſadors) ſhould be treated? For if Caius ſhould declare in favour of the Alexandrians, what other Town would let the Jews live in quiet? What other Town would forbear them? What other would not deſtroy their Oratories? What other would not refuſe them the Exerciſe of their Religi- I on? So that the abolition of all their Priviledges, and the entire Ruine of the whole Nation were before us, and the thoughts of them overwhelmed us with ſorrow; and the more, becauſe we could ſee no reſort nor refuge from our miſeries: For thoſe who before ſeemed to favour our Affairs, began now to deſpair of our ſafety, and retired not daring to aſſiſt us any farther, though we ſent to importune them; ſo little expectation had they of Bounty or Juſtice from a Man, who would make himſelf a God.
